Assuming, according to the proposition relied on, that where there has been an exposition of the law by judicial decision, or a settled course of practice or understanding of the law among legal practitioners, the language of an instrument may, in certain cases, be interpreted according to such a standard, we have in the present instance nothing amounting to these conditions. All that is shewn is, that a practice has grown up—at what period does not distinctly appear—on the part of the servants of the Crown, of not insisting on the right of the Crown to use patented inventions without remuneration to the patentees. This may have arisen from a desire to encourage useful inventions, or perhaps from a sense of justice to inventors, whom it might be thought there was the greater reason for paying for their inventions now that articles used in the public service are paid for, not, as in ancient times, out of the immediate revenues of the Crown, but out of sums voted by parliament for the various departments of the State. Considerations of public convenience having now, as the Attorney General informs us, led the heads of the public departments to insist on the application of a stricter rule as regards the right of the Crown, though one's sense of justice may be shocked at the retrospective application of this doctrine to a patent taken out when a different practice and understanding prevailed, we cannot, when called on to interpret this patent according to the legal effect of its terms, do otherwise than deal with it according to the rules and principles that would have been applicable to it had such a practice never arisen. The language of the present grant is the same as is to be found in the patents granted immediately after the Statute of Monopolies; nay, it is to be found in patents for monopolies granted anterior to that statute. Dealing with it judicially, we are bound to give the same effect to it as though the question had arisen at an earlier period. The rules of law as to the construction of such grants have not been altered, nor have we power to vary them, our duty being to administer the law, not to make it. There can be little doubt that had the question, whether the Crown was precluded from the use of articles in respect of which such a privilege had been granted to a subject, arisen in the times when this form of grant was first adopted, the decision would, in accordance with the then established rules of construction, have been in favour of the Crown. At a time when almost every commodity was the subject of a monopoly, it cannot be supposed that it was intended that the Sovereign should be bound to respect the privilege thus conferred on subjects, or that the Crown lawyers would have allowed the grants to be conferred in terms which would thus have bound the Sovereign. At all events, in the absence of any authority to the contrary, we must give effect to this patent according to the rules which we find laid down from the earliest times as applicable to grants from the Crown; nor should we be justified in departing from them by reason of any practice or understanding which for a time may have arisen, but to which the language of the grant, remaining the same as heretofore, has no reference whatever.

Our view as to the construction to be put on the language of the patent is confirmed by a consideration urged upon us by the Attorney General. According to the statute of James, the power of the Crown to grant the right of monopoly in the case of inventions is not to be exercised where public inconvenience would ensue. Now a patentee, having the sole right to the use of his invention, is not bound to permit any one else to use it; so that, if the Crown were subject to the general restriction, the State might be deprived of the use of an article essential to the public service—possibly for the defence of the realm—while a foreign power, perhaps an enemy, would have full opportunity to profit by the invention. It is true this inconvenience might be prevented by the introduction of a clause securing the use of the invention to the Crown. But such a clause has never yet been inserted in a patent. We must therefore consider the letters patent as they stand; and it seems to us that the circumstance that the construction contended for by the patentee would lead to the inconvenient consequence referred to, and so might have the effect of avoiding the patent altogether, is a strong argument against the construction contended for on his behalf.

Our judgment being, for the reasons we have given, in favour of the Crown on the first and main question arising on the demurrer, it might appear unnecessary to express any opinion on the second, namely, whether a petition of right can be brought against the Crown in respect of an alleged wrong; more especially as this question has recently been the subject of a decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Tobin v. the Queen (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 310), which, as the decision of a Court of concurrent jurisdiction, we should of course be disposed to follow. Nevertheless, as we have been invited, on account of the importance of the question—especially as petitions of right have become of more frequent occurrence since the recent statute, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 34,—to pronounce an opinion on the subject, and as the matter was very fully discussed before us, we think it right to state we can see no reason for dissenting from the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Common Pleas. We concur with that Court in thinking that the only cases in which the petition of right is open to the subject are, where the land or goods or money of a subject have found their way into the possession of the Crown, and the purpose of the petition is to obtain restitution, or, if restitution cannot be given, compensation in money, or where the claim arises out of a contract, as for goods supplied to the Crown or for the public service. It is in such cases only that instances of petitions of right having been entertained are to be found in our books. No case has been adduced, after all the industry and learning that has been brought to bear on the subject, both in this case and in that of Tobin v. the Queen (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 310), in which a petition of right has been brought in respect of a wrong, properly so called. The case of Gerveis de Clifton, Year-Book, 22 Edw. 3. fol. 5. pl. 12, as was explained by Lord Lyndhurst in the case of Lord Canterbury v. the Attorney General (1 Phill. 306, 326), was, in fact, not a petition of right at all, but a petition addressed to the grace and favour of the King, praying, not for redress according to the ordinary course, but for the appointment of the petitioner to the stewardship of the Honour of Peveril, as a compensation for wrongs alleged to have been sustained at the hands of certain servants of the King. In Conradus of Colon's case, which was also relied on by Mr. Bovill, the petition had reference to a ship and cargo which had been seized as forfeited to the Crown by reason of the petitioner being in rebellion against the King; and the petition comes, therefore, under the class already referred to, in which the petition of right is a substitute for an action to recover restitution.

Not only is there no precedent for a petition of right being entertained in respect of a wrong, in the legal sense of the term, but, if the matter is considered with reference to principle, it becomes apparent that the proceeding by petition of right cannot be resorted to by the subject in the case of a tort. For it must be borne in mind that the petition of right, unlike a petition addressed to the grace and favour of the sovereign, is founded on the violation of some right in respect of which, but for the immunity from all process with which the law surrounds the person of the sovereign, a suit at law or in equity could be maintained. The petition must therefore shew on the face of it some ground of complaint which, but for the inability of the subject to sue the sovereign, might be made the subject of a judicial proceeding. Now, apart altogether from the question of procedure, a petition of right in respect of a wrong, in the legal sense of the term, shews no right to legal redress against the sovereign. For the maxim that the King can do no wrong applies to personal as well as to political wrongs; and not only to wrongs done personally by the sovereign, if such a thing can be supposed to be possible, but to injuries done by a subject by the authority of the sovereign. For from the maxim that the King cannot do wrong it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the King cannot authorize wrong. For to authorize a wrong to be done is to do a wrong; inasmuch as the wrongful act, when done, becomes, in law, the act of him who directed or authorized it to be done. It follows that a petition of right which complains of a tortious act done by the Crown, or by a public servant by the authority of the Crown, discloses no matter of complaint which can entitle the petitioner to redress. As in the eye of the law no such wrong can be done, so, in law, no right to redress can arise; and the petition, therefore, which rests on such a foundation falls at once to the ground. Let it not, however, be supposed that a subject sustaining a legal wrong at the hands of a minister of the Crown is without a remedy. As the Sovereign cannot authorize wrong to be done, the authority of the Crown would afford no defence to an action brought for an illegal act committed by an officer of the Crown. The learned counsel for the suppliant rested part of his argument on the ground that there could be no remedy by action against an officer of state for an injury done by the authority of the Crown, but he altogether failed to make good that position. The case of Buron v. Denman (2 Exch. Rep. 167), which he cited in support of it, only shews that where an act injurious to a foreigner, and which might otherwise afford a ground of action, is done by a British subject, and the act is adopted by the government of this country, it becomes the act of the state, and the private right of action becomes merged in the international question which arises between our own government and that of the foreigner. The decision leaves the question as to the right of action between subject and subject wholly untouched. On the other hand, the case of the general warrants, Money v. Leach (1 Term Rep. 493), and the cases of Sutton v. Johnstone (3 Burr. 1742) and Sutherland v. Murray (1 Term. Rep. 538), there cited, are direct authorities that an action will lie for a tortious act, notwithstanding it may have had the sanction of the highest authority in the state. But in our opinion no authority is needed to establish that a servant of the Crown is responsible in law for a tortious act done to a fellow subject, though done by the authority of the Crown—a position which appears to us to rest on principles which are too well settled to admit of question, and which are alike essential to uphold the dignity of the Crown on the one hand, and the rights and liberties of the subject on the other. We entertain no doubt that, if the effect of the letters patent had been to exclude the Crown from the use of the invention, an action could have been maintained by the patentee against any one by whom the invention had been used in the public service. On the other hand, as the infringement of a patent right constitutes a tort or wrong, in the proper sense of the term, and as no wrongful act can be alleged against the Crown, we are of opinion that, even if our decision on the first question had been in favour of the suppliant, a petition of right to the Crown would not be open to him as a means of redress. Our judgment must therefore be for the Crown.

Judgment for the Crown.

[IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 3, 4, June 13, 1866.

KELLY v. SHERLOCK.

35 L. J. Q.B. 209; L. R. 1 Q.B. 686; 7 B. & S. 480; 12 Jur. N.S. 937.

Approved and applied, Falvey v. Stamford, [1875] E. R. A.; 44 L. J. Q.B. 7; L. R. 10 Q.B. 54; 31 L. T. 677; 23 W. R. 162 (Q.B.).Libel—New Trial—Inadequacy of Damages—Provocation by Plaintiff.

LIBEL AND SLANDER. PRACTICE.—Libels of a gross and offensive character, respecting the antecedents and demeanour of the plaintiff as a clergyman, were published in the defendant's newspaper. In the action brought on account of these libels, no justification was pleaded. At the trial no special damage was proved, and it was shewn that after the publication of articles offensive to the plaintiff which were in evidence before the jury, but before publication of the more serious libels, the plaintiff, in a letter addressed to the editor of another newspaper, had spoken of the defendant's paper as "the dregs of provincial journalism," and in a sermon preached and circulated by him, before action brought, charged some of his opponents with subornation of perjury. The jury found for the plaintiff, with one farthing damages:—Held, by the majority of the Court (Blackburn, J., and Mellor, J.), that there were circumstances which might have led a jury to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to substantial compensation, and that a new trial could not be granted.

Held, by Shee, J., that the verdict clearly shewed that the jury had come to a compromise without deciding upon the issues submitted to them, and that a new trial was necessary to prevent a failure of justice.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was a clergyman of the Established Church and incumbent of St. George's Church, Liverpool, and contained counts for different libels upon the plaintiff, published in the defendant's newspaper. These libels consisted chiefly of articles upon the plaintiff's sermons and upon certain dissensions between him, the corporation, the churchwarden and the organist. They were full of abusive epithets, and the plaintiff was repeatedly charged in them with having desecrated a portion of the church by converting it into a cooking apartment.

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at Manchester, at the Summer Assizes, 1865, it was proved that after publication of one of the libels and of a number of articles offensive to the plaintiff, which were put in evidence before the jury, a letter from the plaintiff had been published in the Liverpool Courier, in which, speaking of the defendant's paper, he said, "With that paper—the dregs, I consider, of provincial journalism, of which the town of Liverpool, and especially any class of religionists in it, ought to be ashamed—I desire to have nothing to do, not even in the way of contradicting its mis-statements." He had also printed and circulated a statement with reference to a charge of assault alleged to have been committed by the plaintiff upon a young man who had attempted to remove music-books from the church, in which were the words: "The only resource of hope is desperate; the penitent acknowledgment of the conspirators that, stung by resentment, and thinking they were doing society a service, they swore to the thing which is not."

The defendant, in a correspondence which took place before the action, declared that he considered that he was alluded to as one of the conspirators. It also appeared that the plaintiff had brought three other actions for libels at the same assizes. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages one farthing.

The plaintiff in person having obtained, in Michaelmas Term, 1865, a rule for a new trial, on the ground that the damages were inadequate—

T. Jones shewed cause.—It is conceded that the articles complained of are libels, for which substantial damages in certain circumstances might have been awarded. But the plaintiff has himself made use of language of such a description as to take away his right to complain. It is not easy to see how the jury could have excluded this circumstance from their consideration.

The plaintiff in person supported the rule, and contended that the words which he had used were not of such a character as to afford any provocation to the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgments (June 13) were now delivered.—

SHEE, J.—The plaintiff, who is a clergyman of the Established Church, and incumbent of St. George's Church, at Liverpool, brought his action to recover damages for a series of libels published in the defendant's newspaper, the Liverpool Mail, between the dates of the 21st of November, 1863, and the 13th of August, 1864, inclusively. The defendant pleaded not guilty, and gave notice, under Lord Campbell's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), of his intention to give, in mitigation of damages, an apology, which he had offered to the plaintiff. The cause, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, damages a farthing, was tried, before Baron Bramwell and a special jury, at the Manchester Summer Assizes of the last year, and we have had the advantage of being furnished with a verbatim report of the trial, and with two appendices, containing the articles in full, of which parts are set out in the declaration, and with a correspondence between the attorneys of the parties, to all of which reference was made by the plaintiff, and by the learned counsel for the defendant, in their discussion before us, of the rule.

I agree with my learned Brothers that, regard being had to the number and character of the libels of which the plaintiff complains, and to the lateness and meagreness of the defendant's apology for them, a verdict for substantial damages would have been much more satisfactory, and more in accordance with the truth and justice of the case, than the verdict which has been given, and which, on the judgment of my learned Brothers, overruling my opinion, must stand. If a peremptory rule of practice prevents us from granting a new trial, because the damages are too low, unless there has been some mistake in point of law on the part of the Judge who presided, or in the calculation of figures by the jury, the application for a new trial in this case, which was acceded to by the Full Court, on neither of those grounds, ought not to have been entertained, and we ought not to have put the plaintiff to the trouble and exertion of endeavouring, as he did, with great ability and perfect propriety, to support his rule.

The cases which have been referred to by my learned Brothers, on the point of practice, do certainly shew that the Courts are reluctant to grant new trials in actions of tort, solely because the damages are too low; but they are not such as, in my judgment, should govern our discretion in a case like this, and are not the only cases on the point. In the first of them, Gibbs v. Tunaley (1 Com. B. Rep. 641), an action for negligence against a surgeon, the jury, having been properly told by the Judge that if they thought the defendant guilty of any negligence, the plaintiff would be entitled to nominal damages, but to serious damages if they thought that the loss of the plaintiff's limb was attributable to the defendant's carelessness, adopted the former alternative; with which course the learned Judge certified that he was satisfied. In Rendall v. Hayward (5 Bing. N.C. 424; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 243), a case of verbal slander, the damages were not of an amount so low as to indicate a desire to disparage the plaintiff, and would probably have been thought abundant had they been paid before action brought, that is, had it not been for the law of costs.

This Court, on the other hand, Lord Denman at the time presiding in it, and Patteson, J., Williams, J. and Coleridge, J. being members of it, held, in the case of Armstrong v. Haley (4 Q.B. Rep. 917; s. c. Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 323),—an action to recover damages for an injury which the plaintiff had sustained through the negligent driving of the defendant's servant, although it was pressed upon them, in language which the Court had recently used, that it "would not take upon itself to unravel the grounds and motives which may have led to the determination of a case once settled by the jurisdiction to which the law has referred"—that a farthing damages were no damages at all, and granted a new trial. If, in a case of personal injury, the supposed rule of practice was deemed too weak to countervail the plain justice of the case, it ought not, surely, to be deemed inflexible where we think that an injury to personal feelings, to honour and character, such as entitled the plaintiff to substantial damages, has been done. We have, ourselves, twice during this Term, though there had been no mistake of the Judge in point of law and no miscalculation of figures by the jury, set aside verdicts, and granted new trials, on account of the inadequacy of the damages, because we, my Lord Chief Justice, my two learned Brothers and myself, were of opinion that there had been no real assessment of damages, and that the machinery of justice had failed.¹

I think it right to say, that much of what fell from the learned Judge in the course of the trial, and which has been made the subject of complaint to us, appears to me to have been misunderstood by the plaintiff; but I also think, that instead of giving the jury so many reasons for assessing the damages at a low amount, and instead of the nice disquisition (in answer to the question what amount of damages would carry costs) about the law of costs, and the mischief of giving a shilling more than the exact amount of damage proved to have been sustained (there being no proof of pecuniary damage) in order to give the plaintiff costs, the learned Judge would have done better to have advised them that, regard being had to the character, the falseness and the long continuance of the libels, and the inadequacy of the defendant's apology, in respect of time and substance, with reference to the requirements of the statute, under which alone it was admissible, the case was not one for nominal damages; and, upon the whole, the result of the plaintiff's appeal to the law of his country, adding, as it does, insult to injury, and giving a victory over him to his reviler, is, in my opinion, much to be regretted, and one which, with the utmost respect for the judgment of my learned Brothers, we might well have interfered to prevent.

MELLOR, J.—In this case a rule had been obtained by the plaintiff for a new trial, on the ground that the damages assessed by the jury were inadequate to compensate him for the various libels of which he complained. I should certainly have been better satisfied with the result of the trial if the jury had assessed the damages on a higher scale, as I think that the persistence of the defendant in the reiteration of defamatory statements concerning the plaintiff, either wholly untrue or grossly exaggerated, was not sufficiently met, either by his tardy and meagre apology, or palliated by any actual provocation which he individually had received. At the same time, I cannot perceive that there was, in the course of the trial, any misdirection in point of law by the Judge, or any mistake as to their duty on the part of the jury, or any unfair practice on the part of the defendant, which can bring this case within the exception to the general rule laid down and acted upon by the Courts with regard to their interference with the assessment of damages by the jury. In Rendall v. Hayward (5 Bing. N.C. 424; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 243), Chief Justice Tindal, in refusing the rule for a new trial, is reported to have said, "I think a more complete measure of justice would have been attained if the jury had given higher damages; but the Court never grants a new trial because the damages are low, unless there has been some mistake in point of law on the part of the Judge or in the calculation of figures by the jury." And in Gibbs v.

(1) See Springett v. Balls, 1 Law Journal Notes of Cases, 190.

Tunaley (1 Com. B. Rep. 641), the same learned Judge observed, "It is not usual for the Court to grant a new trial on the ground that the damages are smaller than the Court may think reasonable."

If, indeed, I could see that the jury had evaded the duty of applying their minds to the consideration of the amount of damages, we might and ought to treat it as no verdict at all, as we have done in other cases; but I am unable to perceive any such evasion of duty in the present case. In actions of libel and slander, and in other actions of tort not resulting in special damage which can be matter of computation, we think that we should be very chary in interfering with the province of the jury, and that the least which can be required of a plaintiff who complains of the inadequacy of the damages assessed by the jury, is that he should be able to shew that he has not afforded by his conduct any legitimate ground upon which the jury could fairly and reasonably have acted in estimating the damages to which he may be entitled at a nominal sum. Now, in the present case, it cannot be disputed that the plaintiff did, by preaching a sermon on the 8th of November, 1863, on the appointment of a Roman Catholic chaplain to the borough prison of Liverpool, and another sermon, on the following Sunday, on the occasion of the election of a Jew as a mayor by the corporation of Liverpool, and by publishing both sermons in the newspapers, challenge the criticism of the press and the public. Upon those sermons appearing in print, the defendant, as editor of the Liverpool Mail, published, on the 21st of November, an article in his newspaper, which comprised the libel complained of in the first count of the declaration, and which, undoubtedly, so far exceeded the bounds of criticism as to come within the legal definition of a libel. This article was followed by other articles, not complained of in the declaration, but which led to a letter from the plaintiff, published in the Liverpool Courier of the 5th of February, 1864, in which, in assigning reasons for not sending that letter for insertion in the Liverpool Mail, of which the defendant was editor, he described that paper as "the dregs of provincial journalism, of which town of Liverpool, and especially any class of religionists in it, ought to be ashamed." Other matters subsequently arose, all of which were the subject of comment and criticism in the defendant's newspaper; and other allegations of an offensive character were made with reference to the use of the church and the vestry by the plaintiff, which certainly appears to have been thoroughly explained, and to have been of a character entirely different from that represented by the defendant. Unfortunately, some other disputes occurred between the plaintiff and the organist of his church, which gave rise to proceedings against the plaintiff before the magistrates for assault, and the plaintiff himself took the opportunity of making observations in his church, as well as at a meeting, regarding those proceedings, of an offensive character, which he caused to be published in the newspapers, and which the defendant alleged that he understood to impute to him a charge of inspiring the complainant in the proceedings against the plaintiff for the assault, "to swear to the thing which is not," and also charging that iniquity had been worked against him by "perjury and conspiracy." These latter remarks the defendant alleged gave rise to the article complained of in the ninth count of the declaration, and, ultimately, after a correspondence with the plaintiff's attorney, in which an apology was offered, but not in terms satisfactory to the plaintiff, this action was commenced, amongst others. It is impossible to deny that these various matters being in evidence before the jury might reasonably affect the measure of damages. It is not enough to justify us in setting aside the verdict that we believe that the jury did not form the same estimate that we might have done of the fact that the libels extended over a long period of time, and reiterated imputations which had been satisfactorily explained. It may suffice to say, that as to the amount of damages, it was the province of the jury to weigh both the matters of aggravation and mitigation, and to determine the result. We are therefore of opinion that we cannot, without departing from a well-established practice, grant a new trial in the present case. This rule, therefore, will be discharged.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case I have come to the same conclusion as my Brother Mellor. I do not think that there is any inexorable rule of practice by which we are precluded from ever granting a new trial on account of the smallness of damages. In several cases alluded to by my Brother Shee, where the smallness of the damages shewed that the jury had made a compromise, and, instead of deciding the issue submitted to them of guilty or not guilty, had agreed to find for the plaintiff without damages, the Courts granted a new trial; but there the case is much as if the jury had held out, and had been discharged without a verdict. But in the present case there could be no doubt that the publications were libels, and libels of gross and offensive character; and if the question had been one of punishing the defendant, no one could have doubted that the verdict ought to have been heavy. But the question was not what fine ought to be imposed on the defendant, but what compensation ought the plaintiff to have for his injured feelings, for it is to be observed that there was no actual pecuniary damage, and that no one who in these unhappy controversies was not already prejudiced against the plaintiff would think the worse of him in consequence of the vulgar abuse of the defendant. Now there can be no set-off of one libel or misconduct against another; but in estimating the compensation for the plaintiff's injured feelings, the jury might fairly consider his conduct and the degree of respect which he himself had shewn for the feelings of others; and finding, on the evidence, that he published in the local press sermons reflecting on the local authorities, that he published a statement which I own I think borne out by the articles, that the defendant's paper was so conducted as to justify the epithet of "the dregs of provincial journalism," and, above all, that he delivered from the pulpit and published in the provincial paper a statement that some of his opponents, no matter, in my opinion, whether including the defendant or not, had been guilty of subornation of perjury, and would, as he devoutly hoped, repent on their death-beds and confess their guilt, I cannot say that I think that the jury were bound to give him substantial damages, though I heartily wish that their verdict had not been such as to give an appearance of triumph to the defendant. The rule must, in conformity with the opinion of the majority, be discharged.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

May 7, 8, 11, June, 22, 1866.

LYLE AND ANOTHER v. RICHARDS AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 214; L. R. 1 H.L. 222; 15 L. T. 1; 12 Jur. N.S. 947.

Boundaries—Construction of Written Documents—Deed with Map Indorsed—Parcel or no Parcel—Parol Evidence—Falsa Demonstratio—Latent Ambiguity.

BOUNDARIES. DEED AND BOND. EVIDENCE.—A grant of a mine was made to L. by deed, with map indorsed; the southern boundary being described in the deed as "a straight line drawn from J. V.'s house" to a certain boundstone; and the description of parcels concluded with these words, "which said premises are particularly delineated by the map on the back thereof." On this map the line appeared to be drawn from the north-east corner of J. V.'s house. L. brought an action of trespass against R. for working through this southern boundary and taking the plaintiff's ore. At the trial, parol evidence was admitted to shew that J. V.'s house was wrongly placed on the map, and that if corrected the line would run to the south of J. V.'s house, and the whole question was left to the jury:—Held, by Lords Cranworth (L.C.) and Chelmsford, (Lord Westbury dissenting), that, though it was properly a question of evidence for the jury to identify and determine the position of J. V.'s house, it was a question of construction for the Judge to decide what was the true meaning of the deed; that in so doing the Judge was bound to look at the map, and that he ought to have directed the jury that the true boundary line was that drawn from the north-east corner of J. V.'s house when identified and correctly placed.

This was an appeal on a joint case under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, from a rule made by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench which had discharged a rule to enter a verdict for the defendant or to reduce the damages, and ordering the verdict to be entered for the defendant.

The appellants and the respondents were lessees under the same freeholder of conterminous mining properties in Cornwall. The appellants (who were respondents in the Court of Exchequer Chamber and executors and personal representatives of the plaintiff in the Court below) claimed the West Basset Mine under a grant, by way of lease or sett, dated the 28th of February, 1852. The respondents (who were appellants in the Court of Exchequer Chamber and defendants in the Court below) claimed the South Frances Mine under a similar grant, dated the 13th of May, 1843.

In February, 1858, a Mr. Lyle, since deceased and now represented by the appellants, brought an action of trespass against the respondents, and charged them with breaking and entering into his, the plaintiff's mine and taking away 250 tons of copper and copper ore, of the value of 4,000*l.*, and he claimed 10,000*l.* The defendants paid into court 525*l.*, and pleaded that that sum was enough to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

The action was tried at Bodmin, in August, 1858, before Mr. Baron Channell and a special jury, when the point in dispute was as to the true line of boundary between the plaintiffs' mine on the south and the defendants' mine on the north.

In the defendants' deed of grant, made in 1843, the boundary on the north of the South Frances Mine, thereby leased to them, is described as "a straight line against the Wheal Haste sett." The Wheal Haste sett was the same property as that leased to the plaintiff by the deed of 1852, under the name of the West Basset Mine. A lease of the Wheal Haste sett had been made by deed, dated the 10th of January, 1835, to other parties, who had assigned to the plaintiff, who then surrendered that lease and obtained the lease or grant made by the deed of 1852. The deed of 1835 was put in by the plaintiff, and was admitted by the defendants as evidence to explain the deed of 1852.

The description of the boundaries of the Wheal Haste sett, as contained in this deed, was identical with that of the boundaries of the West Basset Mine, as set out in the deed of 1852, except that there was a map indorsed on the deed of 1835, to which reference was made at the conclusion of the parcels in these words: "which said premises are particularly delineated by the map at the back of this sett," while on the deed of 1852 there was no map, and by consequence no words of reference. The parcels granted were in each of the deeds described as "bounded on the north and west by the estate of Bosleake, the property of E. W. W. Pendarves, Esq., and the estate of Treskillard, the property of Lord Granville, on the south, by a straight line of about 355 fathoms from John Vincent's house at the south-west extremity of the sett to a boundstone at the north-west extremity of the South Wheal Basset sett, and from thence eastward by the north side of the road leading to Carnkie to a boundstone fixed at the corner of the North Wheal Basset sett, and from thence due north about 170 fathoms to a boundstone fixed at the south-east corner of Bosleake estate."

As to the position of the boundstones, there was very little dispute; but John Vincent's house had a depth of about thirty feet, and the question was, whether the damage should be assessed on the footing that the true southern boundary of the plaintiff's mine was a line drawn from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, or a line drawn from the south-west corner of the house. In the latter case the amount paid into court would not be sufficient by many thousands of pounds. The question to be tried was, therefore, whether the triangle of land bounded by the house as its base and by the straight lines drawn from its north-east and south-west corners respectively to the boundstones, was or was not parcel of the grant made by the deed of 1835. If it was passed by that deed, it could not have been the subject of the grant made to the defendants in 1843, and the plaintiff would be entitled to it under his deed of 1852. If it was not passed by the deed of 1835, then the defendants were entitled to it under their deed of 1843. The map on which the determination of this question depended was drawn to a very small scale, John Vincent's house being represented by a very minute oblong rectangular spot, but it appeared with sufficient distinctness from the map on the lease, that the line to the boundstone was drawn from the north-east corner of the spot. But on the map, on the counterpart, it was drawn to the middle or a little below.

Parol evidence shewed that the house was misplaced some 150 yards too far westward, and some fifteen yards too far to the south, and the plaintiff claimed that the map should be corrected by placing the house in its proper position, leaving the line as nearly as possible as it was delineated on the map, thus making it run from the south angle of the house. And the defendants claimed that the house should be placed in its proper position and the line shifted northwards with it, thus preserving the north angle of the house as the starting-point. Parol evidence also shewed that there was to the north and to the east sides of the house a lean-to, and that if these additions were included in the house the whole would be represented by two parallelograms, and not by one oblong rectangle. The whole question was left to the jury, and it was agreed that in either case the damages should be assessed by arbitration. A great deal of other extrinsic evidence was laid before the jury, and they found by their verdict that the southern boundary of the plaintiff's mine should be a line drawn from the south-east corner of John Vincent's house to a boundstone at the north-west extremity of the South Wheal Basset sett. But leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict the other way, or to reduce the damages on the footing of the other line of boundary, if the Court should be of opinion that the evidence did not warrant such a finding.

In pursuance of this leave reserved, a rule to enter the verdict for the defendants, or to set aside the verdict as against the weight of evidence, was granted in November, 1858; but it stood over for argument until the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber should be given in the case of Reynolds v. Buckley.

This case of Reynolds v. Buckley related to precisely the same premises and raised the same question, but was between different parties, that is to say, between grantees interested in the Wheal Haste sett, under the deed of 1835, as plaintiffs, and former grantees of the South Frances mine as defendants. In that case some evidence which was produced before the jury at the trial of the subsequent case of Lyle v. Richards was not produced; but the whole case was left to the jury, as in Lyle v. Richards.

The jury found that the boundary should run from the south corner of the house. This verdict had been disputed, on the ground that it was a question of construction for the Judge, and not one for the jury; and that, on the true construction of the deed, the line should run from the north corner. But the Court of Queen's Bench confirmed the verdict; Erle, J., in July, 1858, delivered the judgment of the Court, that an extrinsic evidence had raised an ambiguity in the application of a written document to land, it was properly left as a question of evidence for the jury as to the intention of the parties in respect of parcel or no parcel, and that it was not a question of construction for the Judge.

This judgment was, on appeal, confirmed by the Court of Exchequer

Chamber, but solely on the ground that the Court had come to the same conclusion as the jury; and Williams, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court (February, 1861), observed that it was not necessary to decide whether the construction of the lease in question was properly a question for the Court or a question for the jury; but his Lordship referred to the case of Lord Waterpark v. Fennell (7 H.L. Cas. 650).

The rule granted in 1858 in Lyle v. Richards came on for argument, before the Court of Queen's Bench, in January, 1862, when the Lord Chief Justice delivered the judgment of the Court that it was a matter for the jury on the whole evidence; but having regard to the fact that in Reynolds v. Buckley there had been, with reference to the same boundary, a verdict of another jury to the contrary, which verdict the Court of Exchequer Chamber had approved, leave was given for a new trial on payment of costs.

This decision was reversed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in June, 1864, when Erle, C.J. delivered the judgment of the Court, that it was for the Judge to construe the written instrument; that as there was nothing in the delineation by the map that was repugnant to the description in words, there was no room for evidence to shew what the meaning of the plan was; and as the plan shewed clearly that the boundary ran from the north-east corner, the Court ordered the verdict to be entered for the defendants, unless the arbitrator should award that the 525l. paid into court was not sufficient to cover the damages sustained on the footing that the line ran from the north-east corner. But the Lord Chief Baron, while agreeing with the judgment of the Court, declared that his impression was, that a map ought to be considered as a species of respectable hearsay evidence, or (if admitted by both sides) as a kind of statement made by the parties themselves, in either case for the jury, and not for the Court to look at, and to say what it really is.

The present appeal was from this judgment.

The Solicitor General (Sir R. P. Collier) and Rolt (Buller with them), for the appellants.—This was properly a question to be decided by extrinsic evidence; for if the description of the parcels in the deed was not sufficient to determine the boundary, then the case of Lord Waterpark v. Fennell (7 H.L. Cas. 650) applies, viz., where parcels are described by words of a general nature or of a doubtful import, evidence, such as evidence of usage, is proper to be received to shew what the words comprehend. If, on the other hand, there is in the deed an adequate description, then the subsequent error in the map will not vitiate the description; for if the prior description of parcels sufficiently conveys, a further description, as of a wrong quantity, will be rejected as falsa demonstratio—Llewellyn v. the Earl of Jersey (11 Mee. & W. 183; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 243), Morrell v. Fisher (4 Exch. Rep. 591; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 273). The ambiguity only appears when you come to compare the external thing with the thing described. This is a latent ambiguity, and raises the question of fact, whether parcel or no parcel; and this may be explained by evidence—7th Proposition of Wigram's Law of Extrinsic Evidence; Goodtitle v. Southern (1 M. & S. 299). Though parol evidence may not be admissible to shew what was the intention of the parties, it must be employed to shew what was the external thing referred to; and if there are two things answering the same description, you may take parol evidence to shew which of the two was intended. Here John Vincent's house might have been a point, a stone; only when you get to the house you find that it has parts and magnitude; then the terms of the deed are found to be ambiguous, for the line might run from the north or from the south, or from the middle of the house. Such an ambiguity may be explained by evidence—Paddock v. Radley (1 Cr. & J. 90) and Freeland v. Burt (1 Term Rep. 701). It is for the jury to look at the extrinsic evidence thus admitted. The construction of written documents is for the Judge; but when it is shewn by extrinsic evidence that the terms used are ambiguous, evidence is admissible to explain the ambiguity, and then it is for the jury to say in what sense the ambiguous expressions were used—per Maule, J. in Smith v. Thompson (8 Com. B. Rep. 45, and at p. 59). Where extrinsic evidence creates an ambiguity, extrinsic evidence may be employed to remove it—Bacon's Maxims, Rule 23. It is admitted that all that was passed by the deed of 1835 was passed by that of 1852, and the words of the deed of 1835 would pass the whole that the appellants ask for, because deeds are to be read most strongly against the grantor; if this was passed by the deed of 1835 the landlord could not have passed it to the respondents by the deed of 1843. The deed of 1835 would have passed all but for the map; but the map is wrong, as can be shewn by evidence and reference to roads, hedges, &c. John Vincent's house is misplaced. This was falsa demonstratio. Reject the falsa demonstratio, the rest is correct. If the appellants had rested on the deed of 1852, they would have been entitled to the land. If the deed of 1835 is to be admitted, then other extrinsic evidence must also be admitted, and in that case the appellants are entitled to succeed under the verdict of the jury upon such evidence.

The Attorney General (Sir R. Palmer) and Karslake (Pinder with them), for the respondents.—It is the duty of the Court to place questions of fact before the jury and direct them how to give their verdict according to their finding of the question. It is for the Court to construe written documents; the duties of the jury are confined to proof. In construing documents, it is the duty of the Judge to look to the deed, and not to take into consideration facts subsequent—Drake v. Drake (8 H.L. Cas. 172; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 850). When the description in the deed comes to be applied to the external thing, two questions may arise, first, is there any ambiguity? and, secondly, is there any fact to be found which would remove the ambiguity and determine the verdict? In this case the plaintiffs' evidence raised no ambiguity and solved none; the deed of 1835, put in by the plaintiff, shewed clearly that the line ran from the north-east corner of the house. This deed was put in by the plaintiff, and must be taken most strongly in the defendants' favour—Verba chartarum fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem. If the appellants are restricted to their deed of 1852, and no other evidence is admitted, then they must fail upon the language of the deed. If an error in a map or plan indorsed on a deed makes the matter a question for the jury, as the appellants contend, then any error, however trivial, in map or plan would remove the construction of the instrument from the Judge, as a matter of law, to the jury as a matter of fact and evidence. If the appellants are confined to their deed of 1852 they cannot succeed, because the respondents had already obtained by their deed of 1843 the parcel of land in question; the landlord had no power to grant the same to another party in 1852. But suppose that they rely, as they have been allowed to do, on the deed of 1835, and to shew by evidence that the house was misplaced. Here there would be a description rendered inaccurate by the superfluous addition of the locality of the house, which superfluous addition is incorrect; but it is obvious that the whole of the class of cases in which an inaccurate description has been found sufficient merely by rejecting the superfluous words is one in which no ambiguity exists, and if there is no ambiguity, there can be no question for the jury. If in this case the superfluous addition is rejected, the description is correct. Suppose the grant referred to John Vincent's house, specifying the north-east corner as the starting-point, but going on to say that the house was built of so and so, or stood so and so, this addition being wrong; this erroneous addition would have been rejected. So, here, the position of the house is immaterial. The line is drawn on the map from the north-east corner, and whether or not the house is properly placed is immaterial.

The Solicitor General, in reply.—The other side admit that this was a proper case for parol evidence, but that upon such evidence it was a question of law for the Court to decide what was the effect of it. The Court of Exchequer Chamber treated the verdict of the jury as not to be considered, because it was come to after hearing parol evidence which ought not to have been given. The point is, whether or not this was a proper case for parol evidence. If it is a proper case, the Court of Exchequer Chamber were wrong in disregarding the verdict.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This was an appeal under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, upon a case stated by the parties according to the directions of that act. The question arises in this way: a gentleman of the name of Lyle, since dead, who is represented by his executors, was the lessee of a certain mine in Cornwall. I do not know if the word "lessee" is the proper word to use, but he had the right to work the mine. We will call him the lessee. It was called the West Basset Mine. The defendants were the occupiers of a mine immediately south of the West Basset Mine, called the South Wheal Frances Mine, and the complaint of the plaintiff was that the defendants, the occupiers of this South Wheal Frances Mine, had been guilty of a trespass in working beyond their northern boundary into the mine of the plaintiff. On the trial of the action, the jury found for the plaintiff, subject to leave being reserved to set aside the verdict, and to enter the verdict for the defendants, if the Court should be of opinion that the evidence did not warrant such a finding; and eventually the case came before the Exchequer Chamber, which held that upon the evidence it was not competent for the jury to find for the plaintiff, and that consequently the verdict ought to be entered for the defendants. The question is whether that decision was right.

The question for the jury was, whether the locus in quo upon which the mine was worked by the defendants was parcel of the mine of which a sett was granted to the appellant in 1852. Parcel or no parcel is a question for the jury. It was properly left to them. But the Judge was bound to explain to them, for their guidance, what was the true construction of any documents necessary for the decision of the question "parcel or no parcel." In this case the dispute arose between the conterminous grantees. The plaintiff was grantee of a mine to the north, the defendants of a mine to the south. The defendants had worked to the north of their mine, and the question was, whether they had gone beyond the boundary line which divided their mine from that of the plaintiff. The boundary line of the plaintiff's mine, which separated it from the mine of the defendants to the south is described in the sett made to him in 1852. It was the duty of the Judge to decide what was the true meaning of the language there used for describing the boundary line. But, in order to adapt the description contained in a lease or other instrument of a boundary line (whether expressed by words or by a diagram), to the line in nature meant to be designated by the description, it is necessary to have recourse to parol evidence. The description in the deed cannot otherwise be identified with the thing intended to be described. In this case, therefore, the parol evidence was properly admitted for the purpose of shewing whether the place in which the trespass complained of was committed was or was not included in the sett granted to the plaintiff. We have no information as to what the direction was which the Judge gave to the jury; but the case was left to them on the terms that if they should find for the plaintiff, the verdict should be entered for him, and if according to the evidence they were bound to find for the defendants, then the verdict should be entered for them. The jury found for the plaintiff, but the Court of Exchequer Chamber has decided that the jury, on the evidence before them, were bound to find for the defendants; and whether the Court was right in that decision is what we have to determine. The whole question turns on what is the true boundary line between the two mines. In the plaintiff's sett of 1852 his southern boundary is described as "a straight line of about 355 fathoms from John Vincent's house, at the south-western extremity of the sett, to a boundstone at the north-western extremity of South Basset sett." It was the duty of the Court to interpret these words for the guidance of the jury. But of their meaning, aided by proof of the facts that there is near the south-west extremity of the plaintiff's sett a house called John Vincent's house, and that there is at the north-western extremity of South Wheal Basset sett a boundstone, there can be no doubt. The boundary line which the jury were bound to take as that indicated in the plaintiff's sett was a line from John Vincent's house to the boundstone in question. This, however, does not make the exact line clear. The boundstone may for practical purposes be treated as a mere point, but this cannot be said of John Vincent's house, the depth of which from north to south is shewn by the evidence to be twenty or twenty-five feet. It is obvious, therefore, that the line, if drawn from the north-east corner of the house, will give the plaintiff a less quantity of mine than if drawn from the south-east. The question, therefore, whether the triangular space included between two lines drawn from the boundstone—one to the north-east, the other to the south-east corner of John Vincent's house—being the locus in quo, was or was not parcel of the mines included in the plaintiff's sett cannot be solved by a mere interpretation of the language of the sett of 1852, for that language is equally consistent with a line drawn from the north-east as with a line drawn from the south-east corner of the house. The jury, therefore, even supposing them to have received from the Judge a proper interpretation of the language of the sett of 1852, and to have acted upon it, were yet obliged, in deciding the question of parcel or no parcel, to have recourse to further evidence.

The evidence offered consisted, inter alia, of a prior sett in the year 1835, of the same mine as that which was granted to the plaintiff in 1852; and, secondly, of two setts in 1843, of the mines now worked by the defendants, and which, as I have already stated, adjoin on the plaintiff's mine, the southern boundary of the latter constituting the northern boundary of the former. In the sett of 1835, the language used in designating the boundaries may be taken as being identical with that afterwards used in the sett of 1852, save only that on the back of the sett of 1835 there is a map descriptive of the premises included in it, and the description of the parcels is followed by the words, "which said premises are particularly delineated by the map on the back of this sett."

It was the duty of the Judge to explain to the jury the true meaning of this deed, just as it was of the deed of 1852, and, in construing this deed of 1835, the Judge, or, according to the liberty reserved at the trial, the Court was bound to look at the map as forming part of the deed. Now, on the map the boundary line is clearly drawn from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, and the Judge or the Court were bound to treat this as if in the description of the parcels the language had been, not a line drawn from John Vincent's house, but a line from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house. This shews that the locus in quo was not included in the sett of 1835. But if not included in the sett of 1835, it could not be included in that of 1852, for in the setts of 1843, under which the defendants derive title, their northern boundary is clearly made to be the same as the southern boundary of the plaintiff's sett established in 1835. The result is, that it is immaterial to consider what was the boundary line intended to be drawn in 1852, for even if it had been expressly designated as a line drawn from the south-east corner of the house, that would not have warranted a finding that the locus in quo was part of the plaintiff's sett. Lady Basset had already in 1843 granted to those under whom the defendants claim title a right to take all minerals south of the line adopted in 1835, i. e. south of the line from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house. Therefore, she had no power to grant to the plaintiff in 1852 that which she had already granted to the defendants, or to those under whom they derive title. Great reliance was placed on the fact that the map, on which so much depends, was shewn to be very inaccurate. John Vincent's house is placed on the map from forty to sixty fathoms more to the west, and considerably more to the south, than its true position would warrant; so, again, the boundstone appears by the map to be on the hedge or bank running along the south side of the road to Carnkie, whereas it is in fact in the middle of that road. These inaccuracies, however, appear to me to be unimportant. The map is referred to not for the purpose of shewing the site, either of the house or the boundstone. The facts as to the true position of the house and the boundstone are ascertained by other means. The use of the map is to clear up what without it was uncertain, namely, from what part of the house the line was to be drawn, and for that purpose the exact site is immaterial. The map is undoubtedly drawn on a very small scale, and if from that circumstance, or from any other cause, it could be considered doubtful to what part of the house the line was drawn, the view I have taken might have been different. But the plan, though on a small scale, clearly indicates that wherever John Vincent's house was situate, the boundary line was to be drawn from its north-east corner. Translating (so to say) the map into words, it is as if the description had been, "the boundary to the south is a line drawn from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, which is situated sixty fathoms to the west of the southernmost point of the road," whereas, in fact, the house is situate within five fathoms of this point. This inaccuracy would not, as I think, have been material. The boundary line would still be a line drawn from the north-east extremity of the house, wherever situate, assuming, of course, that the jury were satisfied that the house really existing is that which was referred to in the deed. The circumstance that its locality was erroneously described would not affect the description of the boundary line, namely, that it was to be a line drawn from the north-east corner. When once the jury was satisfied that the house known as John Vincent's house is that referred to in the deed, the error in the description of its locality is no more material than if it had been an error in describing it as brick-built instead of stone-built, or as a house of three stories instead of two. No error is material which would not prevent the jury from being satisfied that the existing house is the house referred to in the deed. I have treated it as clear (as did the Exchequer Chamber) that the boundary line on the map is drawn in a straight line from the boundstone to the north-east corner of the house, and that the existing house, called John Vincent's house, is that referred to in the sett of 1835. Strictly, these are both questions for the jury. It was for them to say, looking at the map, to what part of the spot there designated John Vincent's house the boundary line was drawn. But it is so plainly drawn to the north-east corner that this has always been assumed as a fact—that is, it has been assumed that if this precise point had been put to them they must and would have so found.

So, again, it was the duty of the Judge to ask the jury whether they were satisfied that the existing house, called John Vincent's house, is the house intended to be described on the map. In deciding this the jury would have to consider, on the one hand, the fact that there is no other house known by that name, and, on the other hand, the erroneous position of the house on the plan. Mere error of position on the plan cannot of itself be decisive. If the house itself had been five miles off, the jury would, of course, have come to the conclusion that such a house could not have been what was meant to be designated. If, on the other hand, the house drawn on the plan was only one yard out of its proper place, the jury would disregard such an inaccuracy—in fact, it is misplaced by about 100 or 150 yards to the west, and by 10 or 20 to the south. It was for the jury in these circumstances to say whether the actual house was or was not that intended in the sett and map of 1835 as forming one terminus of the boundary. Assuming, as we must assume, the jury to have been satisfied that in spite of the error in its position on the map the house as it exists on the land is the house intended, and that the line on the plan is drawn to the north-east corner of the house, it was the duty of the Judge to tell them, as matter of law, that the boundary line is the line drawn from the north-east corner of the actual house to the boundstone. The Court of Exchequer Chamber has assumed, and I think very reasonably assumed, that on these two questions of fact the jury must be considered to have found, first, that the line on the plan is drawn to the north-east corner of what is there called John Vincent's house; and, secondly, that the actual house, called John Vincent's house, is that referred to in the map and description under the name of John Vincent's house. Assuming this to be so, it follows as matter of law (having regard also to the two setts of 1843) that the locus in quo could not form part of the sett of 1852. On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was right, and so that the judgment of your Lordships ought to be for the respondents, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The action upon which the judgment appealed from was pronounced was brought by the plaintiff, the appellant, for a trespass by the defendants upon his mine, called West Basset Mine, and taking away copper and other ore, and the sole question to be tried was whether the locus in quo was part of the plaintiff's mine. The plaintiff claimed under a lease from Lady Basset, dated the 28th of February, 1852, in which the mine was described to be bounded "on the south" (the only part of the description of boundaries necessary to be noticed) "by a straight line of 355 fathoms from John Vincent's house at the south-west extremity of the sett, to a boundstone at the north-west extremity of South Wheal Basset sett." At the trial, in Cornwall, the plaintiff, after putting in the lease of the 28th of February, 1852, called witnesses to prove that the line from John Vincent's house mentioned in the lease ought to be taken from the south side, or from about the centre of that house. In the course of the evidence he produced a former lease of the same mine, dated the 24th of March, 1835, which contained the same description of the boundaries as in the lease of 1852, and was similar to it in all respects, except that it contained a reference to a map in these words, "which said premises are particularly delineated by the map on the back of this sett." In this map the line described as the boundary on the south clearly appears to be drawn from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house to the boundary stone. Evidence was given on both sides to shew that the situation of John Vincent's house was incorrectly described upon this map. Both sets of witnesses agreed that it was placed upon the line too far to the west, but they differed as to the extent of the error in this respect. The appellant by the evidence shewed that Vincent's house was placed on the map too far to the south, while in the evidence for the respondents it was stated that if Vincent's house were plotted in on the plan in the Wheal Haste sett in its right place, the whole of the house would be to the south of the boundary line there shewn. The respondents put in evidence two leases from Lady Basset, both dated the 17th of May, 1843, under which they held, one of which was a lease of the estate of Grylls in the description of the boundaries included in the locus in quo. The whole case was left to the jury, and they found by their verdict that the southern boundary of the plaintiff's mine should be a line drawn from the south-east corner of John Vincent's house to a boundstone at the north-west extremity of South Wheal Basset sett.

The defendants in the following term obtained in the Court of Queen's Bench a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendants instead thereof, or why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. Upon this rule being called on for argument it was ordered to stand over till after the decision of a case of Reynolds v. Buckley and others, which was an action of trespass between other parties interested in the same mines, in which an appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber was pending. There is no statement in the printed case before the House of the particulars of this case of Reynolds v. Buckley and others, nor any explanation given of the way in which it was supposed that the decision in that case would influence the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. But all that we are informed about it is, that after the decision of that case in the Exchequer Chamber, the Court of Queen's Bench ordered that "so much of the rule as sought to enter a verdict for the defendants, or reduce the damages, should be discharged, and that so much of the rule as prayed for a new trial should be suspended until the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber on this appeal, and that, in the event of this Court not entering the verdict for the defendants, the verdict obtained in the cause should be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties upon payment of costs." Notice of appeal was given by the present respondents, and pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, a case was stated between the parties, and the question for the opinion of the Exchequer Chamber was, whether the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in discharging so much of that rule as was discharged, ought to be affirmed or reversed, or, in other words, whether the verdict given for the plaintiff ought not to be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendants.

This question depends entirely upon what should have been the direction of the Judge to the jury upon the trial, whether he should not have told them that the southern boundary of the mine was a line drawn from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, instead of leaving it to them to say from what part of the house that line ought to be drawn. I have had great difficulty in making up my mind whether upon the whole evidence the proper line of the southern boundary was matter of fact for the jury, or was a question for the Judge upon the documents produced. After careful consideration of the whole case, and having had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, I agree in the conclusion at which he has arrived. The question to be decided was, what was the boundary intended to be described in the lease to the plaintiff of 1852? Lord Chief Justice Erle, in delivering judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, said, that "If the case stood upon that lease, it was very likely that the plaintiffs would be entitled to succeed." I shall have occasion presently to consider whether, looking at the question as one of judicial construction of this deed alone, the description of the boundary which it contains is not adverse to the plaintiff's claim; but the lease of 1835, with the map annexed, was put in evidence by the plaintiff, and the description of the boundaries corresponding exactly with those in the lease of 1852, the line of the southern boundary is marked on the map as proceeding from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house. If nothing more had been done than merely putting in this lease, as explanatory of the boundaries in the lease of 1852, the question would have been one entirely for the Judge. But the plaintiff, who had produced a lease and map, which on the face of them would have been destructive to his case, gave evidence to shew that the map was inaccurate as to the position of John Vincent's house, and thereupon contended that this raised a latent ambiguity, and opened the question as to the part of the house from which the boundary line was to be drawn. It is inaccurate to call this mistake in the map the disclosure of an ambiguity. It is merely the proof of incorrectness in a certain particular, in respect of which it appears that the map is not longer to be relied upon. The only inaccuracy which was proved to exist in the map was in the position of John Vincent's house, which is placed more to the west and to the south than it ought to have been; but whatever was its right position, there was nothing in the evidence to disturb the fact of the line being drawn from the north-east corner of the house, or to remove it from the fact of the map as part of the deed, where it was within the sole province of the Judge as a matter of construction. And upon considering closely the description of the boundaries in the lease of 1852, it appears to me materially to aid this construction; for when it is said that the mine is bounded on the south by a line from John Vincent's house, "at the south-west extremity of the sett," the proper construction of the words would seem to be a line from that part of the house which is nearest to the south-west extremity, which must be to the north side. Assuming, therefore, all the facts proved at the trial, the question turned upon the description of the boundaries in the leases of 1835 and 1852, and the Judge ought to have directed the jury that, whatever was the exact situation of John Vincent's house, the proper southern boundary line was from the north-east corner of the house. The Court of Exchequer Chamber has properly dealt with the case as one of judicial construction of written documents, and I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that their judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD WESTBURY.—I am sorry to be obliged to differ from your Lordships. To render my opinion intelligible, it is necessary to state concisely the manner in which the question has arisen. The plaintiff claimed the minerals in question under a sett or grant made in 1852. The defendants insisted that the minerals were not included in the parcels of that sett, but were included, and in effect passed to the defendants under two prior setts made by the same grantor in the year 1843, which had not expired. These two setts were put in by the defendants. Anticipating this defence, the plaintiff put in evidence at the trial an earlier sett made by the same grantor in the year 1835, and which was in force at the date of the setts of 1843, for the purpose of proving that the minerals in question were included in the parcels of the sett of 1835, and did not, therefore, pass by the setts of 1843, nor were included in the parcels of those two setts. The parcels in the sett of 1835 were substantially the same as the parcels in the sett of 1852, with the exception of a map, which is indorsed on the sett of 1835, and referred to in the description of the parcels. The sett of 1835 was material on another ground, because in the parcels and plan of the setts of 1843 the southern boundary line in the sett of 1835 is referred to as forming the northern boundary line of the setts of 1843. The question, therefore, in effect came to be, what was the south boundary line described in the sett of 1835? When the sett of 1835 had been put in by the plaintiff the defendants fastened upon it, and insisted that it appeared on the map indorsed on the sett of 1835 (which being referred to in the parcels became part thereof) that the southern boundary of the sett thereby granted was formed by a line drawn from the north-east corner of a house (the site of which is laid down on the map, and called John Vincent's house) to a certain boundstone therein described. We accept, said the defendants, the line from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house as our northern boundary, and it gives us the minerals in question. To this the plaintiffs answered, that the fact of the boundary line appearing on the map to run from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house is an accident resulting from the circumstance of the site of John Vincent's house being inaccurately laid down in that map, and he adduced evidence to correct the map, by proving the true position of John Vincent's house, which, if substituted for the erroneous site in the map, would no longer leave the line to the boundstone running from the north-east corner of the house. This evidence was received, subject to any question of law, and the jury found in favour of the plaintiff, and that the southern boundary of the plaintiff's sett was a line drawn from the south-east corner of John Vincent's house (that is, according to its true site) to the boundary stone. Before the Court in Banco the defendants insisted that parol evidence was not admissible to prove and correct the error in the map, or, at all events, not to alter or effect the position of the boundary line, which, whatever might be the true site of John Vincent's house must, as the defendants contend, be drawn from the north-east corner of it. It is admitted that the map must be treated as incorporated into and forming part of the parcels in the sett of 1835. In my opinion the evidence was clearly admissible. Upon a question of parcel or no parcel parol evidence is always received. The error here is latent, not being discovered until it is shewn by extrinsic evidence what was the true site of the house incorrectly laid down in the map, and in a question of the extent or correctness of the parcels in a deed (which are a description of external objects) parol evidence, for the purpose of ascertaining the thing so described or referred to, is admissible. But then the defendants contend, that although evidence may be received for the purpose of correcting the error as to the site of John Vincent's house, and proving its true position, yet that it leaves untouched the position in the map of the boundary line, which they contend is equivalent to a statement in words that the line is to be drawn from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, whatever may be its true site. This, they contend, is the material and important statement, and that the incorrect setting forth of the site of the house is immaterial, being merely falsa demonstratio. But in this argument there is a false assumption. There is no express statement in words in the sett of 1835, that the boundary line is to run from the north-east corner of Vincent's house—that is collected only from the fact of the boundary line, as delineated in the map, meeting the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, because that house is incorrectly laid down in the map. But so soon as it is admitted, or proved, that the site of the house is erroneously laid down, the relative position on the map of the house and boundary line is disturbed, and it becomes impossible to know from the map or the parcels (as written) whether the boundary line does or does not hit the north-east corner of Vincent's house, according to its true locality. Whether it does or does not do so becomes a further question of fact, to be ascertained by evidence, and not by construction; and therefore for the jury, and not for the Court. A map is a picture or representation of external objects with their relative position, and if of two adjoining objects one is laid down incorrectly, the whole of the relative description of the two is incorrect. Suppose in a map of the two adjoining counties of Surrey and Sussex that Sussex is laid down erroneously, and in the map the eastern boundary of Surrey is made to run northwards from the extreme south-eastern boundary of Sussex, and the position of Sussex is then rectified, would it not be absurd to suppose that the alleged eastern boundary of Surrey must remain? The map here is not a statement that the southern boundary line is to run from the north-east corner of Vincent's house in its actual true position, but from the north-east corner of that false site which is erroneously laid down. There is no independent statement of the connexion of the boundary line with the house, but only with the site falsely attributed to the house. In short, the relative position of the boundary line and the house is part of the incorrect description of the site of the house, and the consequence of that error. As soon as the position on a map of one object is proved to be wrong, the whole of the representation of the relative positions of adjoining objects becomes erroneous, and the map must in this respect be re-drawn according to the facts, which must be ascertained from evidence.

It is, no doubt, true that the construction of written instruments is matter of law, and that when an instrument is laid before the jury they are bound to receive the interpretation of the effect of that instrument from the Judge. But the question here is not of the interpretation of the deed itself, nor even of the construction of the description of the parcels, but of the inference to be derived from a map as to the relative position of two objects laid down as adjoining each other where one is proved to be erroneously laid down. As soon as that proof was admitted, it became obvious that the true position in nature of the thing erroneously laid down, and the true relative position of the adjoining object, must both be ascertained by external evidence. If I rightly understand the judgment of the Court below, and the opinions of my noble and learned friends, it is assumed that the map amounts to a statement that the boundary line is to run from the north-east corner of John Vincent's house, whatever that house may be. But, with great submission, there is no such statement. The map only states that the line runs from the north-east corner of the house as there laid down. In any mode of regarding the case, even that adopted by my noble and learned friends, it appears to me that the whole question was one of fact, and not of law, and was for the jury and not for the Court; and therefore that the rule, so far as it was sent from the Queen's Bench to the Exchequer Chamber, ought to have been discharged.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

June 11, 22, 1866.

MITCALFE v. HANSON.

35 L. J. Q.B. 225; L. R. 1 H. L. 242.

Referred to, Betteley v. Stainsby, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 293; L. R. 2 C.P. 568; 16 L. T. 701; 15 W. R. 1047 (C.P.). Followed, Ex parte Wiseman, '1872' L. R. 7 Ch. 35; 25 L. T. 545; 20 W. R. 138 (L. J.J.). Referred to, Robinson v. Ommanney, [1882] E. R. A.; 51 L. J. Ch. 894; L. R. 21 Ch. D. 780; 47 L. T. 78; 30 W. R. 939 (Ch. D.): affirmed, [1883] E. R. A.; 52 L. J. Ch. 440; L. R. 23 Ch. D. 285; 49 L. T. 19; 31 W. R. 525 (C. A.). Principle applied, Deering v. Bank of Ireland, [1887] E. R. A.; 56 L. J. P.C. 47; L. R. 12 App. Cas. 20; 56 L. T. 66; 35 W. R. 634 (H.L. Ir.).

The Bankruptcy Act, 1849, has been repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83. s. 20.

Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849, section 178.—Covenant to pay Premiums not a Liability to pay Money within Statute.

BANKRUPTCY.—A. borrowed money of B, and executed a deed of assignment, by way of mortgage, to B, of a policy of assurance on his own life, with a covenant to keep up the annual payments for premiums. A. became bankrupt:—Held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that there was not a liability to pay money upon a contingency provable under the 178th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849.

This was a writ of error upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in an action of covenant, in which action the present defendant in error, William Stonehewer Hanson, sued the present plaintiff in error, William Brodrick Mitcalfe, under the following circumstances:

In the year 1849, the plaintiff in error, Mitcalfe, borrowed of the defendant in error, Hanson, two sums of 600*l.* and 200*l.*, and by two several indentures, dated respectively the 5th of January and the 8th of May, in that year, and made between the same Mitcalfe of the first part, certain sureties of the second and third parts, and the same Hanson of the fourth part, Mitcalfe assigned to Hanson two policies of assurance on his own life, the one for 700*l.* the other for 250*l.*, and he covenanted, during his life, from time to time, to pay the two annual premiums of 17*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* and 6*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, for keeping the said policies on foot, and, further, to repay, with interest, any moneys which Hanson should at any time thereafter advance or pay, through Mitcalfe's default, in respect of such premiums. Mitcalfe became bankrupt in October, 1854, and obtained his certificate in November, 1855. In the four years, 1856 to 1859, Mitcalfe made default in payment of four premiums of 6*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* each on the policy of 250*l.*, and in 1859 and 1860 he also made default in payment of two of the premiums of 17*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* each, payable on the policy of 700*l.* Hanson paid these premiums and sued Mitcalfe for the amounts; Mitcalfe pleaded his bankruptcy and his certificate, and that the cause of action arose before such bankruptcy. The action was tried in London in 1862, at the Sittings after Michaelmas Term, when Crompton, J. had directed the jury that the bankruptcy and certificate did not discharge the defendant from his liability, under the covenant, to pay the premiums to the insurance company. On bill of exceptions, the Court of Queen's Bench affirmed this ruling of the learned Judge; and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in error, affirmed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff (then, and now, the defendant in error).

On this judgment the present writ of error was brought to the House of Lords, and the question was, whether the plaintiff was barred of his action upon the covenant by reason of the 178th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, which section provides for the proof of claims in respect of a liability to pay money upon a contingency.

Manisty, and J. Brown, for the plaintiff in error.—This was a liability to pay money upon a contingency, viz., the life of the mortgagor, and the value of the claim could have been ascertained. It was therefore a contingent liability provable under the 178th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), and therefore the bankruptcy and certificate discharged the plaintiff in error from all claim in respect of it. The 154th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1862 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 34), specially provides against the necessity of proving in similar cases; but the provisions of this act do not apply to bankruptcies under the act of 1849. As the introduction of such special provision into the later act was deemed necessary, it may be taken that the framers of that act considered that claims of this nature must be proved under the provisions of the act of 1849. The Courts below held that the covenant to repay was a contingent liability provable under the act of 1849; but the covenant to pay to the insurance office cannot be distinguished from that to repay; it was for the same amounts and for the same purpose; the two covenants must be held to be assimilated, and be treated as one covenant. The Courts below held that this was a case for damages, and that a covenant to pay to a third person was not within the statute; but if a covenant by A. to pay B. 50*l.* during life is capable of valuation, why should not a covenant to pay a like sum to an insurance office be also valued? If the value of the claim could be ascertained, it should have been proved—Young v. Winter (16 Com. B. Rep. 401; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 214). The only question for the Court is, whether the liability can be valued. Suppose a man covenanted to pay 500*l.* on a contingency, such as if a certain person should or should not marry; this would be a thing which could not be valued. But in this case there could be no difficulty in ascertaining the value; the whole amount could not exceed the value of the policies—Brown v. Price (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 598; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 290). Suppose this was a covenant made in 1855 for a single payment in 1856, this would be a claim for a money demand which would ripen into proof at a future period, and would be provable under the act of 1849. If proof can be admitted in the case of one single premium, it would be strange if proof for more than a single premium must be excluded. The only consequence would be that the winding-up of the estate might be delayed. The whole value might be entered against the claim, say 800*l.*; then the dividends would be retained upon that sum, and applied de anno in annum in payment of the premiums, if the debtor should be alive and should make default in paying them. The policy of the act was to relieve debtors as far as possible from these claims. Before 1849, under the act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, there had been numerous cases in which the bankrupt was held not to be discharged; the intention of the legislature was to remedy this evil, and therefore the act of 1849, after repeating, by sections 176. and 177, the provisions for proof of all the various claims provided for by the act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, introduced, by the 178th section, provision for a new claim when the trader had contracted to pay money upon a contingency, but which was not a contingent debt provable under the act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. This was the view taken by Lord Justice Turner in considering the doctrine laid down in Warburgh v. Tucker (5 B. & El. 384; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 317) in his judgment in Ex parte Barwise, in the matter of Strachan and others (6 De Gex, M. & G. 762; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 10).

The following authorities were also cited: Hankin v. Bennett (8 Exch. Rep. 107; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 326), The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside (5 Exch. Rep. 129; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 120), Toppin v. Field (4 Q.B. Rep. 386; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 148), Bennett v. Burton (10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 11), and Archbold's Practice in Bankruptcy Claims, p. 87.

Macnamara and Holl, for the defendant in error, relied on the judgment of Lord Campbell in Warburgh v. Tucker (1 El. B. & El. 914; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 56). They cited also Maples v. Pepper (18 Com. B. Rep. 177; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 243), Parker v. Ince (4 Hurl. & N. 53; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 189), and The General Discount Company v. Stokes (17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 765; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 25).

Manisty, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD CRANWORTH).—This is a writ of error from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in an action by the defendant in error against Hanson, for breach of covenant. The defendant covenanted during his life to keep up one or more policies of insurance. He neglected to do so. This action was brought for the breach of covenant. And the question is, whether or not the plaintiff is barred of his action upon the covenant by reason of the 178th clause of the Bankrupt Act. The clause is a long one, and I need not read it to your Lordships, as it has been recently before your Lordship. I shall assume that it is in your minds. It is a clause which provides that contingent debts may, in certain circumstances there mentioned, be proved in bankruptcy, and, consequently, that such a claim would in those cases be barred. But I am of opinion that in this case judgment ought to be given for the defendant in error, on the short but all-sufficient ground that the liability of the plaintiff in error, under his covenant, was not a contingent liability within the 178th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

The plaintiff in error covenanted with the defendant in error that he would, during his life, from time to time, duly pay the annual premiums becoming due on a certain policy of insurance. This he omitted to do. The liability to which he exposed himself by entering into this covenant was absolute, except so far as it is made contingent by the fact that the annual payment cease to be payable at his death. During his life the liability of the defendant to make the annual payments is absolute. I agree with Lord Campbell that this is not a liability to pay money on a contingency within the meaning of the 178th section of the act. The contingency there contemplated is a contingency the happening of which will create an obligation to pay. The only contingency in this case is the contingency of the defendant being alive on the days on which he has covenanted to pay the premiums. This is an absolute liability to make periodical payments during the whole of his life. The contingency is not that which creates the liability, but that which may possibly defeat it. That this is no subtle or refined distinction seems to me apparent from the provisions of the act. They are directed to the case of a liability, and I incline to think of a single liability, arising on a contingency, and for meeting such a case are made, if not efficient, yet as nearly so as in the nature of things is possible. But they are inapplicable to the present case. The remedy given to the creditor is to make a claim for such sum as the Court may think fit. That must mean for such a sum as the Court shall think to be the fair extent of the liability, supposing there was no contingency; and then if the contingency happens within a limited time the creditor may turn his claim into a proof, and receive dividends as if his demand had been absolute and not contingent. But such a course of proceeding is not applicable to periodical payments, which are to cease on the death of the person who is bound to make them. In order to bring such a case within the statute, the party sought to be charged must be treated as having incurred, as to every annual premium, a liability contingent on his being alive at the time when by the terms of his contract the payment is to be made. There is no power, it will be observed, to enable the creditor to make a claim for the aggregate value of all the payments, i. e. to treat his demand substantially as one in the nature of an annuity, or as if there were only one contingency. The contingency, if contingency it can be called, is different in the case of every succeeding annual payment, i. e. the contingency of the debtor being then alive. For such a case the statute does not appear to have made any provision. The decision, first, of the Court of Queen's Bench, and then of the Exchequer Chamber, in Warberg v. Tupper (10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 11), from which this case in substance is an appeal, seems to me to have been perfectly correct.

I should have come to this decision even if the Bankrupt Act of 1861 had never passed. But the fact that in that statute there is a clause expressly directed to meet the present case is strongly confirmatory of the view I have taken.

No doubt the legislature may have mistaken the law as to the effect of the former statute. But the introduction of the 154th section into that act is strong to shew the view taken by the framers of it. I think, therefore, that in this case there ought to be judgment for the defendant in error.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—I agree with my noble and learned friend that a covenant to pay the annual premiums on a policy of insurance to keep it on foot, is not "a liability to pay money on a contingency" within the 178th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. Even assuming that a covenant to pay the premiums during the life of the assured can be treated as a liability depending upon the contingency of the continuance of the life, yet the legislature in this section seems to have in view only a liability to pay money on one contingency, and not to intend to provide for a succession of liabilities arising on successive contingencies, which in such a covenant as this may be annually recurring.

I agree also with my noble and learned friend in thinking that this is not at all the case of a contingent liability. The covenant is to pay the premiums as long as the life continues. It is not a covenant to pay if a certain event happens, but until a certain event happens. It is an absolute covenant to pay as long as the life lasts. The contingency (if any) is the death of the assured, and then the liability to pay ceases.

But supposing that this covenant created a liability on a contingency, and that there was no objection on the ground of its not being a liability upon a single contingency, how can it be a covenant for payment of money within the 178th section? That section enables the person with whom a liability to the payment of money upon a contingency has been contracted to claim for such sum as the Court shall think fit, and to convert that claim into a proof. There is no liability under the covenant in question to pay money either to or for the covenantee. It is rather like a covenant to do an act, viz., to keep up the policy by paying the premiums. Can it be said that the covenantor is liable to pay the premiums? Liable to whom? Supposing he chose not to pay them, who could compel him? An action might be brought by the covenantee and damages obtained; but this would not be upon a liability to pay, which, if it existed, would be enforceable, but upon an undertaking which created a distinct and different liability, viz., in case of non-payment of the premiums to be answerable in damages for the breach of covenant. I think, therefore, that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD WESTBURY.—I entirely agree with the conclusion to which your Lordships have come in this case. It is perfectly true that when the bill or act of 1861 was in course of preparation this question was much considered, and a clause was added to the act, providing for the occurrence of such questions in future. But although they may be regarded as a declaration of the opinion of the legislature, it would not be conclusive with reference to the claim put forward by the appellant in this case.

In the course of the argument, reference was made to two sections of the act of 1849, one with regard to which it was suggested that by possibility these premiums might be regarded as annuities, and that the party entitled to benefit by them might be regarded as an annuity creditor. Upon an examination of the section to which reference was made, namely, the 175th section, I think it is impossible to hold, without doing great violence to the language, that the covenant here entitled to the benefit of the covenant can be regarded as coming within the description of an annuity-creditor. Those words in the statute undoubtedly mean a party entitled to the benefit of an annuity granted by the person who afterwards becomes bankrupt.

So, also, with regard to the next section, namely, that providing for contingent debts, it has been well settled, and cannot now be disturbed (although one may regret the confined interpretation put on the word "debt"), that the right of action under a covenant of this description cannot be regarded in law as amounting to a debt payable on a contingency.

These things were regarded as settled at the time of the passing of the act of 1849, and the legislature appears then to have endeavoured to provide for liabilities payable on a contingency; but whether the section does or does not include the present case must depend entirely on the consideration whether the machinery introduced by that section can be made applicable to the case before us, so as to admit of proof being brought forward under that section.

Now, I decline to give any opinion on the question whether the claim under this covenant is not a liability to pay money on a contingency. But assuming it to be so, it is quite clear that the 178th section was intended to apply, and does in terms apply, only to a demand of that description, which is truly ascertained upon some specified contingency; and the provisions which were introduced by the legislature were, that the Commissioner shall set aside a sum upon some estimate that he is to make of the contingency, and which sum shall be a reserved fund, to answer the proof that might be made upon the happening of the contingency. The words clearly refer to one proof and to one demand alone, because they direct that if the contingency shall happen after the bankruptcy, the person with whom the liability has been contracted shall be admitted to claim; and if the contingency has happened, and the demand in respect of such liability shall have been ascertained, he shall be admitted to prove such demand. Now, here it is quite clear that if you refer these directions to the present case, you might have the administration of the bankrupt estate kept open during the whole of the man's life, during twenty, thirty or forty years; for the covenant being to pay the premium during the life of the person insured, the consequence would be that it would be the bounden duty of the Commissioner to reserve a fund during the whole period to answer the premiums that might become due during the whole period of the life, and then those premiums de anno in annum during an indefinite period of time would be made the subject of proof. Now, it is impossible that that could be the meaning of the act of parliament, because at the end of the section, in order to limit the possibility of inconvenience, there is a proviso introduced that where a claim, either in whole or in part, shall not have been converted into a proof within six months after the filing of the petition, it may, on the application of the assignees, if the Court shall think fit, be expunged. It is clear, therefore, that even if it were, by a violent construction of the words, to apply this clause to the case that has happened, possibly the application of it would produce no benefit at all; for, supposing the bankruptcy to occur within a month after the premium has been paid, then, under a return to be made under the direction of the Commissioner, application might be made by the assignees to expunge the claim altogether within six months; that would be four or five months anterior to the time when the next premium would become due and payable. I think, therefore, it is clear, from the language of the clause of the statute, and from the nature of the machinery provided, that it is impossible to conceive that the legislature had in its contemplation any such case as the present; that both the words are inadequate and the machinery inapplicable, and that, consequently, the Bankrupt Law as it existed at the time when this question arose had not in view any contingent claim of this kind.

I concur, therefore, in thinking that the decree should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

[IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 6, 1865.*

KELLY v. TINLING.

35 L. J. Q.B. 231; L. R. 1 Q.B. 699; 13 L. T. 255; 14 W. R. 51;
12 Jur. N.S. 940.

Followed, Davies v. Duncan, [1874] E. R. A.; 43 L. J. C.P. 185; L. R. 9 C.P. 396; 30 L. T. 464; 22 W. R. 575 (C.P.). Distinguished, Purcell v. Sowler, 1876, L. R. 1 C.P. D. 781; (C.P. D.): affirmed, [1877] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. C.P. 308; L. R. 2 C.P. D. 215; 36 L. T. 416; 25 W. R. 362 (C. A.).

Libel—Privilege—Conduct of Clergyman in Use of the Church and Vestry.

LIBEL AND SLANDER.—Comments by a churchwarden upon the conduct of the clergyman, in taking meals in the vestry and in causing books to be sold in the church during service, are matters of public interest, and may lawfully be published, if they do not exceed the boundaries of fair criticism.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff was in holy orders of the Church of England, and the beneficed incumbent of St. George's Church, Liverpool, and the defendant falsely and maliciously printed and published, in a newspaper called the Liverpool Daily Courier, the words following.—[The libel, which was contained in a letter written by the churchwarden to the plaintiff, was then set out. The material part of it was, "Again, with pain, I have observed the church turned into a bookseller's shop during divine service, your errand-boy selling books under the pulpit, and money being jingled about in giving change, to the annoyance of many of the congregation. Nor can I omit to allude to the desecration of the church by converting a portion of it into a cooking apartment, and endangering the sacred edifice, which I am bound to protect."]

Plea—not guilty; upon which issue was joined.

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at Manchester, during the Summer Assizes of 1865, the learned Judge, in summing up the case said to the jury, "But is he (the plaintiff) entitled to maintain this action? I think every one of you has been present in court, and has heard what I said in the previous cases; but if any gentleman has not been in court, I will mention it again. You will remember that you have to consider, first, whether the publication is defamatory. If it is not, the defendant has his verdict. But if it is defamatory, you will have to consider whether it is within those reasonable limits of discussion I have endeavoured to explain on a former occasion."¹ The learned Judge concluded by saying, "If you think that all or any of them are defamatory publications, and not justified by the liberty of criticism accorded to the press, then you give your verdict for the plaintiff in respect of such part as is defamatory; but if you are of opinion that they are either * Decided in Michaelmas Term, 1865.

(1) This was an allusion to the summing-up in the previous trial of Kelly v. Sherlock (Kelly v. Sherlock, 35 L. J. Q.B. 209), where the learned Judge directed the jury as follows: "Anything which is calculated to bring a person into ridicule, hatred or contempt, is a libel. Although that is true as a general rule, yet it is also true that every man—and happy for us it is that it is true—that every man has a right to discuss matters of public interest. It is the most fortunate thing in the world that it should be so. A clergyman with his flock, an admiral with his fleet, a general with his army, and a Judge with his jury—we are all of us the subjects for public discussion. So, also, it is matter of public interest the dispute between the plaintiff and his organist, and the way in which the church is used: they are all public matters, and may be publicly discussed. And provided a man, whether in a newspaper or not, publishes a comment on a matter of public interest, fair in tone and temperately, though he may express opinions that you may not agree with, that is not the subject of an action for libel, because whoever fills a public position renders himself—again happily—open to public discussion, and if any part of his public acts is wrong, he must accept the attack as a necessary though unpleasant circumstance attaching to his position."

not defamatory, or if defamatory justifiable, why then you will give your verdict for the defendant." The jury gave their verdict for the defendant.

Macnamara now moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—A dispute between a clergyman and his churchwarden as to taking meals in the vestry is not a matter of public interest. In *Gathercole v. Miall*² it was doubted whether a journalist was entitled to any privilege in commenting upon sermons which had been preached and not published; and it was assumed that the conduct and management by the clergyman of a parish of a charitable society from the benefits of which Dissenters were by his sanction excluded, were not lawful subjects of public comment.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It would be a strange proposition to ask us to hold that where a clergyman is guilty of indecent conduct in the pulpit, that his behaviour is not matter of public comment.]

What is complained of in this part of the libel took place in a private room. Secondly, the comments in the libel exceeded the limits of fair criticism. In Campbell v. Spottiswoode (3 Best & S. 769; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 185) it was laid down that a writer in a public periodical has no greater liberty of criticism than a private individual.

COCKBURN, C.J.—There will be no rule. It has been urged by Mr. Macnamara that the conduct of a clergyman in the use of his church, which has been the subject of a dispute between him and a churchwarden, is not a matter of public interest. But what can be matter of greater public interest than that the sanctity of the sacred edifice should be respected? What is meant by the expression "public worship," if that worship is not matter of public interest? With regard to the comments, the language, no doubt, might have warranted the jury in coming to a different conclusion; but it was their right to say whether or not these comments were unfair, and the question was properly left to them by the learned Judge.

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Rule refused.

[IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH.]

July 7, 1866.

DONALD v. SUCKLING.

35 L. J. Q.B. 232; 7 B. & S. 793; L. R. 1 Q.B. 585; 14 L. T. 772;
15 W. R. 13; 12 Jur. N.S. 795.

Approved, Halliday v. Holgate, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Ex. 174; L. R. 3 Ex. 299; 18 L. T. 656; 17 W. R. 13 (Ex. Ch.). Referred to, Webb v. Whinney, 1868, 18 L. T. 523; 16 W. R. 973 (C. P.). Distinguished, Mulliner v. Florence, [1878] E. R. A.; 47 L. J. Q.B. 700; L. R. 3 Q.B. D. 484; 38 L. T. 167; 26 W. R. 385 (C. A.). Referred to, Burdick v. Sewell, [1883] E. R. A.; 52 L. J. Q.B. 428; L. R. 10 Q.B. D. 363; 48 L. T. 705; 31 W. R. 796 (Q.B. D.): reversed, [1884] E. R. A.; 53 L. J. Q.B. 399; L. R. 13 Q.B. D. 159; 51 L. T. 453; 32 W. R. 740 (C. A.): the latter decision reversed, [1885] E. R. A.; 54 L. J. Q.B. 156; L. R. 10 App. Cas. 74; 52 L. T. 445; 33 W. R. 461 (H.L.). Referred to, Gilligan v. National Bank of Ireland, [1901] 2 Ir. R. 513 (Q.B. D.).

Bailment—Pledge—Pawn—Right to Re-pledge—Pleading.

BAILMENT. DAMAGES.—To a declaration in detinue for debentures, the defendant pleaded that before the alleged detention the plaintiff deposited the debentures with S. as security for the repayment at maturity of a bill of exchange indorsed by the plaintiff and discounted by S, and upon the agreement that S. should have power to sell or otherwise dispose of the debentures if the bill was not paid when it became due; that the bill was not paid, but was dishonoured; that before the alleged detention and the commencement of this suit S. deposited the debentures with the defendant, to be by him kept as a security for and until the repayment by S. to the defendant of certain sums of money advanced by him to S. upon the securities of the debentures, which sums of money have been and remain wholly unpaid to the defendant, wherefore &c.:—Held, by Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, J. and Mellor, J. (Shee, J. dissentiente), that the plea was good.

(2) 15 Mee. & W. 319; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179.

Held, by Cockburn, C.J., that the transfer of a pledge under such circumstances amounts only to a breach of contract, upon which the owner may bring an action for nominal damages if he has sustained no substantial damage, or for substantial damages if the thing pledged is damaged in the hands of the second pawnee, or if the owner has been prejudiced by delay in not having the thing delivered to him on tendering the amount for which it was pledged.

Held, by Blackburn, J., that a replication that the plaintiff had paid, or was ready and willing to pay, the bill, would have been good.

Declaration in detinue for four debentures of the British Slate Company (Limited).

Third plea—That before the alleged detention the plaintiff deposited the said debentures with one James Adolphus Simpson, as security for the due payment at maturity of a bill of exchange, dated the 25th of August, 1864, and payable six months after date, and drawn by the plaintiff upon, and accepted by, one Thomas Saunders, and indorsed by the plaintiff to, and discounted by, the said James Adolphus Simpson, and upon the agreement then come to between the plaintiff and the said James Adolphus Simpson, that the said James Adolphus Simpson should have full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the said debentures, if the said bill of exchange was not paid when the same became due; and the defendant further says, that the said bill has not been paid by the plaintiff nor by any other person, but was dishonoured, nor was the same so paid at the time of the said detention or at the commencement of this suit; and that before the alleged detention and the commencement of this suit, the said James Adolphus Simpson deposited the said debentures with the defendant, to be by him kept as a security for and until the repayment by the said James Adolphus Simpson to the defendant of certain sums of money advanced and lent by the defendant to the said James Adolphus Simpson upon the securities of the said debentures, and the defendant had and received the same for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, which sums of money thence hitherto have been and remain wholly due and unpaid to the defendant, wherefore the defendant detained and still detains the said debentures, which is the alleged detention.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.

Harrington (May 29), in support of the demurrer.¹—There are two questions raised by this demurrer: first, whether the pawnee of goods has a right to assign over the pawned goods to another person; secondly, if that question is answered in the affirmative, whether the defendant is in a position to avail himself of such right. It is submitted that a pawnee of goods has no such right. His position differs from that of a mortgagee, and from that of a person who has a lien on goods. The latter person has a right to detain the goods till his lien is satisfied, but no longer; the former has the absolute property in the goods made over to him. But a pawnee has only a special property in the goods, with a right to sell them, if the money in respect of which they are pledged is not paid at the day named, or within a reasonable time after. A mortgagor could not bring an action to recover the property. The law upon the subject is laid down by Chief Justice Holt in Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181): "As to the fourth sort of bailment, viz. vadium, or a pawn, in this I shall consider two things: first, what property the pawnee has in the pawn or pledge; and, secondly, for what neglects he shall make satisfaction. As to the first, he has a special property, for the pawn is a securing to the pawnee that he shall be repaid his debt, and to compel the pawnor to pay him. But if the pawn be such as that it will be the worse for using, the pawnee cannot use it, as clothes, &c.; but if it be such as will never be the worse, as if jewels for the purpose were pawned to a lady, she might use them, but then she must do it at her peril. . . . And the reason is, because the pawn is in the nature of a deposit, and, as such, is not liable to be used. And to this effect is Owen, 123." And in the notes to the leading case at p. 194, it is said, "If the pawnor makes default in payment at the stipulated time, the pawnee has a right to sell the pledge, and this he may do of his own accord without any previous application to a Court of equity, . . . or he may sue the pawnor for his debt, retaining the pawn, for it is a mere collateral security. If he think proper to sell, the surplus of the produce, after satisfying the debt, belongs to the pawnor; while on the other hand, if the pawn sell for less than the amount of the debt, the deficiency continues chargeable upon the pawnor. . . . From all this it will be seen that a pawn differs on the one hand from a lien, which conveys no right to sell whatever, but only a right to retain until the debt in respect of which the lien was created has been satisfied, . . . and on the other hand, from a mortgage which conveys the entire property in the thing mortgaged to the mortgagee conditionally, so that where the condition is broken the property remains absolutely in the mortgagee; whereas a pawn never conveys the general property to the pawnee, but only a special property in the thing pawned; and the effect of a default in payment of the debt by the pawnor is not to vest the entire property of the thing pledged in the pawnee, but to give him a power to dispose of it, accounting for the surplus, which power if he neglect to use, the general property of the thing pawned continues in the pawnor, who has a right at any time to redeem it." There is a case in 1 Atk. 166, of Ryall v. Rolle, where goods had been mortgaged, and the following passage occurs in the judgment of Burnet, J.: "There is scarce any book that treats upon pawns but considers them in the possession of the pawnee; as where it is debated whether a pawn may not be used, and the difference laid down between a pawn and a distress is, that a distress may not be used, because the party in that case comes in possession by act of law, and in the other by the act of the party."—Owen, 124, 2 Raym. 917, Salk. 522, Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181). The distinction between mortgages and pawns is laid down in Ratcliff v. Davis (Cro. Jac. 244): "There is a difference between a mortgage of lands and pledging of goods; for the mortgagee hath an absolute interest in the land, but the other hath but a special property in the goods to detain them from his security." In Reeves v. Capper (5 Bing. N.C. 136; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 44) a chronometer had been pledged by the owner with the defendant for 50l., but he was allowed the use of it for a voyage. He afterwards deposited it with the plaintiff, but it was held that the 50l. never having been repaid to the defendant the property in the chronometer was in him. See also Bell's Com. on the Law of Scotland, 4th edit. p. 195, and Pothier, vol. v. cap. 4. (Du Nautissement), p. 475. The matter is also discussed at length in Story on Bailments, c. 5. s. 286 and the following sections. Section 319. shews that the contract of pawn is in the nature of a fiduciary contract, and in section 299. it is stated that if the pledgee voluntarily, by his own act, places the pledge beyond his own power to restore it, as by agreeing that it may be attached at the suit of a third person, that will amount to a waiver of his pledge. The defendant will rely upon a number of passages to be found in these sections, and the one which bears principally against the view now submitted to the Court is to be found in section 327: "But whatever doubt may be indulged as to the case of a mere factor, it has been decided that in case of a strict pledge, if the pledgee transfers the same to his own creditor, the latter may hold the pledge until the debt of the original owner is discharged." But it is submitted that that is not the law, and the authority given by Story, namely, Jervis v. Rogers (15 Mass. Rep. 389), is not sufficient to support it, for it was not necessary in that case to decide the point. The case was twice before the Court, and is reported first in 13 Mass. Rep. 105. It was trover for certificates for shares in the New England Mississippi Land Company. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Parker, C.J., who said, "The case is distinguishable from the common cases of agents, factors and commission merchants, to whom property has been transferred for special purposes, and who have no right to exceed that authority. We do not question any of those cases, nor those which have decided that he to whom property has been pledged cannot transfer a title in such property to another." He then goes on to decide the case upon the ground that the certificates had a negotiable character, being transferable by indorsement. The question came before the Court again in another action, when a new trial was moved for by the defendant, see 15 Mass. Rep. 369, and the question turned upon whether there was a lien arising from dealings between the testator of the defendant and the intestate of whom the plaintiff was administratrix. The Judges go rather wide of the mark and talk about pawns, and Jackson, J. gives the dictum upon which Story relies; but it was not necessary to decide the point, and, indeed, the authorities he refers to are no authority in themselves. In Ratcliff v. Davis (Yelv. 178) a hatband had been pawned to one Whitlock for 25*l.*; Whitlock's wife, with his assent, delivered it to the defendant, who converted it to his own use, although the plaintiff demanded it of him after tender of the 25*l.* to the wife, who was the executrix of Whitlock; the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, for, "in case of a pawn he who pledges it has time to redeem it during his life." The case is somewhat differently reported in 1 Bulstr. 29, and is also reported in Cro. Jac. 244, and in Noy, 137. In Mores v. Conham (Owen. 123) the question was, whether the pawnee of goods could maintain an action of assumpsit against the defendant upon a promise to pay the money if the pawn was delivered up. The Court held that the action was maintainable, for there was a good consideration for the promise, "for he who hath goods at pawn hath a special property in them, so that he may work such pawn if it be a horse or an ox, or may take the cow's milk, and may use it in such manner as the owner would; but if he misuseth the pawn, an action lies; also he hath such interest in the pawn as he may assign over, and the assignee shall be subject to a detinue if he detains it upon payment by the owner," &c. This case is generally cited for the purpose of shewing how far the pawnee may use the pawn, and it was referred to in Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181) for that purpose.

(1) The demurrer had been argued, in Easter Term, by Harrington, for the plaintiff, and by Gray, (Beresford with him,) for the defendant, before Blackburn, J. and Shee, J.; but those learned Judges requested that it should be re-argued.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The opinion of the majority of the Court is against you, and they refer to the 2nd Assize.]

But it must be remembered that Foster, J. differed. In Demainbray v. Metcalfe (2 Vern. 690) jewels and plate had been pawned by the pawnee, and the Lord Chancellor held that the original pawnor must pay all the money advanced upon the second pawn before he could be entitled to the jewels; but that was a decision in equity, and even if it be correctly decided, it does not touch the question of law. The case is reported also in the Precedents in Chancery, 419, Gilb. Eq. Cas. 104, and in 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 324. Further, it is clear that if a pawnee has a right to repawn the pledge, his pawnee must have the same right, and so on for any number of transactions of the same kind. But if that be so, to whom is the owner of the pledge to make a tender of the money when he seeks to have the pledge returned to him? Suppose the plaintiff tendered the amount of his own debt to the defendant, who received it and gave up the debentures, and afterwards Simpson had brought an action against the plaintiff, there would be no means of defending it.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The tender must be made to his own creditor. BLACKBURN, J.—Would he not aver that he was ready and willing to pay to the person whom he meant to charge. He would have an action against the original pledgee if he refused to deliver the pledge.]

But the contract of pawn is a fiduciary personal contract, and the pawnor may have had confidence in his pawnee that he will not make a bad use of the pawn, but no intention that it should be handed over to another person. The result of holding that a pawn is assignable will be that for the first time it will be held that a chose in action is assignable. It is clear that a covenant to pay a mortgage debt cannot be assigned over. Next, whatever the general rule may be, this plea is bad; it alleges that Simpson, the pawnee, deposited the debentures with the defendant to be kept as a security for his own debt; and it is consistent with the statement that they may have been deposited before the bill became due, and also as a security for a debt larger than the amount for which they were deposited by the plaintiff with Simpson. The plaintiff ought not to be put in a difficulty by having his property repledged for a larger amount than he had ever intended to pay. In Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), a person had deposited a dock-warrant for brandies with the defendant as a security for a loan to be repaid upon the 29th of January, or, in default, the brandies to be forfeited. On the 28th, the defendant agreed to sell the brandies, and on the 29th handed over the dock-warrant to his vendee. It was held that this was a conversion, as the owner had the whole of the 29th in which to repay the money and take the warrants back. Chief Justice Erle said, "The wrongful sale on the 28th, followed on the 29th by the delivery of the dock-warrant in pursuance thereof, was, we think, a conversion. The defendant wrongfully assumed to be owner in selling, and although the sale alone might not be a conversion, yet, by delivering over the dock-warrant to the vendees, in pursuance of such sale, he interfered with the right which Cumming had of taking possession on the 29th if he repaid the loan, for which purpose the dock-warrant would have been an important instrument." This is an authority to shew that the pledging by Simpson, during the currency of the bill, was a conversion; and the fact that Mr. Justice Williams differed from the rest of the Court upon the question as to the measure of damages, throws no doubt upon this decision.

Gray (Gadsden with him), contra.—By the contract of pledge the pledgor gives a right to the pledgee of which he can avail himself, so as to prevent the pledgor from getting the pledge again without repaying the money advanced. So long as the pledgor is not prejudiced, the pledgee cannot be prevented from dealing with the pledge as he pleases. There is no doubt that he must not use it so as to lessen its value; and in Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181), Lord Chief Justice Holt said, that if jewels are pawned to a lady she must use them "at her peril," but where no prejudice is done to the pledgor he cannot complain. If a pledgee takes reasonable care of the pledge, and as much as he would if it were his own property, he is not liable though the pledge be injured, and might recover the money advanced from the pledgor.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But is not the careful keeping of the pledge a duty cast upon the pledgee inconsistent with his handing it over to a third person, as has been done here?]

No; he is entitled to deal with it as a thing in which he has a property, or the property, and to say to the pledgor, "Give me the money advanced to you first of all, and then you may have the pledge." So in the present case Simpson acquired a sufficient authority to entitle him to do all that the plea shews he has done. A part of the contract was that the plaintiff was to pay the amount of the bill to Simpson before he was to have the debentures returned to him, and he has never done it, the bill having been dishonoured.

There is a difference between the contract of pledge and the law of lien, for liens are personal, and cannot "be transferred to third persons by any tortious pledge of the principal's goods," as was said by Lord Ellenborough in M'Combie v. Davis (7 East, 5), observing upon the opinions of Lord Kenyon in Daubigny v. Duval (5 Term Rep. 604), Sweet v. Pym (1 East, 4) and Kinloch v. Craig (3 Term Rep. 119). The subject is treated of in Com. Dig. tit. 'Bailment,' (A.), where the author states, "If a man delivers goods to be kept, or, which is all one, to be safely kept, the bailee undertakes to keep them only from all damage that arises from his own negligence, and, the undertaking being only to keep them, he ought not to use them as though he had an interest in them." And under the same title (B.) he states, "Pledging is where goods and chattels are delivered in security for money lent, and by such pledging the pawnbroker hath more than the naked possession in the nature of a bailment, for he hath the property and interest in the thing itself, and by the better opinions shall have a reasonable use of it, so that it be without damage to the thing thus pledged." In support of this proposition the Doctor and Student, 130, and other authorities, are cited. The conclusion is that the pledgee may use the pledge, so long as he does not damage it, or prevent himself from delivering it to the owner when he calls for it and tenders the money. See also Anon. (2 Salk. 522). The law is stated in the same way in Vin. Abr. tit. 'Bailment.' Next Mores v. Conham (Owen. 123) is an authority which decides the case in favour of the defendant. It is true that Mr. Justice Foster differed from the rest of the Court, but the case decides that the pledgee may assign over the interest which he has, and that the pledgor may have the pledge again on payment of the money. The term "special property," which it is settled that the pledgee has, means a great deal more than the right to detain; it means a property for all purposes. No doubt the second pawnee can only stand in the shoes of the first; but it is not to be assumed that the defendant would do a wrong, and there is nothing at all to shew that the plaintiff has been injured—see Ex parte Deeze (1 Atk. 228). If the pledge be injured, the pledgor may have an action for the injury; but the contract is not thereby determined—see Lee v. Atkinson (Yelv. 172) and Bac. Abr. tit. 'Bailment' (C), par. 6, Co. Lit. 57 a. In Demainbray v. Metcalfe (2 Vern. 690) the Court treated the pledge in the same way as they would have treated a mortgage.

[SHEE, J.—The reporter has put a query to that case.]

Yes; but then, as is stated in a note in Whittaker on Lien, 140, it appears from the report in Precedents in Chancery, 419, that the day limited for redemption by the owner from the first pawnee had elapsed, and he had lost his right to redeem. In Montague on Lien, 22, it is said, "A pawnee may assign the pawn to the extent of his interest," citing Mores v. Conham (Owen. 123). For anything that appears, the plaintiff had to go to the defendant and say, "I have paid the money advanced; give up the indentures to me," but this he has not done; and he is in the same position as a vendee who has not paid for the goods sold, and has no remedy in trover against the vendor who has kept possession of them—see Bloxham v. Sanders (4 B. & C. 941), which was an action of transfer of hops sold by the defendant to a person who afterwards became bankrupt, and the Court said that as the price had not been paid or tendered, the action, which was not an action for special damage by a wrongful sale, could not be maintained. This case, as well as Bloxham v. Morley (Ibid. 951), are referred to in Blackburn on Contract of Sale, 320.

[BLACKBURN, J.—These cases have never been overruled, but the law as to an unpaid vendor is peculiar.]

But Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130) is to the same effect; and in that case the majority of the Court held, that "the wrongful act of the pawnee did not annihilate the contract between the parties, nor the interest of the pawnee in the goods under that contract." This decision is irreconcilable with the position that the right in the plaintiff to the chattel revives in him upon the dealing with it by the pawnee. Again, there is authority of Story, who, in his work on Bailments, s. 324, says, "The pawnee may, by the common law, deliver over the pawn into the hands of a stranger, for safe custody without consideration, or he may sell or assign all his interest in the pawn, or he may convey the same interest conditionally by way of pawn to another person, without in either case destroying or invalidating his security. But if the pawnee should undertake to pledge the property (not being negotiable securities) for a debt beyond his own, or to make a transfer thereof to his own creditor, as if he were the absolute owner; it is clear that in such a case he would be guilty of a breach of trust, and his creditor would acquire no title beyond that held by the pawnee. The only question which, under such circumstances, would seem to admit of controversy, is, whether the creditor should be entitled to retain the pledge until the original debt was discharged, or whether the owner might recover the pledge in the same manner as if the case was a naked tort, without any qualified right in the first pawnee." And afterwards, in section 327, is the passage which has been mentioned in the argument on the other side, and which exactly applies to the present case. Next, the plaintiff would not have been obliged to go to the sub-pledgee, as he would have been entitled to have the debentures returned to him upon a tender of the proper amount to Simpson, and the plea shews that that proper amount is still unpaid. If the money advanced had been paid or tendered, there should have been a replication to that effect.

Harington replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The Court differing in opinion, the following judgments were now delivered.—

SHEE, J.—To a declaration in detinue for debentures of the British Slate Company (Limited), claiming a return or their value, and damages for their detention, we have here a plea, and a demurrer to it—that before the alleged detention the debentures were deposited by the plaintiff with one Simpson, as security for the payment at its maturity of a bill of exchange discounted by him for the plaintiff, upon an agreement that Simpson should have full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the said debentures if the bill was not paid when it became due; that the bill was dishonoured when it became due, and is still unpaid; and that before the alleged detention, Simpson deposited the said debentures with the defendant, as security for and until the repayment of moneys advanced and lent to him by the defendant upon them, and which moneys are still unpaid. This plea sets up a right to detain the debentures, founded on a bailment of pawn by the plaintiff to Simpson, under which Simpson, if the bill should not be paid, had a right to sell the debentures, paying the overplus above the amount of the bill and charges to the plaintiff; that is, to sell on the plaintiff's account, and for his and Simpson's benefit, and a repawn of them by Simpson as a security for a loan to him by the defendant. It must be taken against the defendant that the debentures were pledged to him by Simpson before the plaintiff had made default; it must be taken too that the advance for which the debentures were pledged to the defendant by Simpson, was of a greater amount than the debt for which Simpson held them; it is consistent with the facts pleaded either that it was repayable before or repayable after the maturity of the plaintiff's bill, and that the debentures were pledged by Simpson along with other securities from which they could not at Simpson's pleasure, or on tender by the plaintiff of the sum for which they had been pledged to Simpson, be detached; and therefore that Simpson had put it out of his power to apply them, "by sale or otherwise," to the only purpose for which possession of them had been given to him, viz., to secure the payment of his debt and the release of the plaintiff by the sale of them, from liability on the bill which Simpson had discounted for him. Whether this pledge to the defendant by Simpson was such a conversion by him of the debentures as destroyed his right of possession in them, and revested the plaintiff's right to the possession of them freed from the original bailment, is the question for our decision. The contention that a pawnee is entitled to exercise over the chattel pawned to him a power so extensive as the one which this plea sets up, was, before the case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), if it be not now, wholly unsupported by authority.

A pawn is defined by Sir William Jones, On Bailments, 117, to be "a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept by him till his debt is discharged"; and by Lord Holt—Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181)—to be "a delivery to another of goods or chattels to be security to him for money borrowed of him by the bailor"; and by Lord Stair,² "A kind of mandate whereby the debtor for his creditor's security gives him the pawn, or thing impignorated, to detain or keep it for his own security, or in the case of non-payment of the debt to sell the pledge, and pay himself out of the price and restore the rest, or restore the pledge itself on payment of the debt—all which is of the nature of mandate, and it hath not only a custody in it, but the power to dispose in the case of non-payment"; and by Bell, Principles of the Law of Scotland, 4th edit. p. 512, "a real right or jus in re inferior to property which vests in the holder a power over the subject, to retain it in security of the debt for which it is pledged, and qualifies so far and retains the right of property in the pledger or owner."

In the Roman Civil Law, as in our law—see Pigot v. Cubley (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 701; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 134)—the bailment of pawn implied what in this bailment is expressed, a mandate of sale on default of payment. Without it, as in the Scotch and French law, a right to have the pledge sold judicially for payment on default made, the security by way of pledge would be of little value. The pawnee is said, by Lord Coke, in his Commentary on Littleton, to have a "property," and in Southcote's case (4 Co. Litt. 480), to have a "property in and not a custody only" of the chattel pawned, by which Lord Holt—Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181)—understands Lord Coke to mean, a "special property," consisting in this, "that the pawn is a security to the pawnee that he shall be repaid his debt, and to compel the pawnor to pay him"; or, in the words of Fleming, C.J., in Ratcliffe v. Davis (Cro. Jac. 244), "a special property in the goods to detain them for his (the pawnee's) security," that is, not a property properly so called, but the jus in re, that is, in re aliena of the Roman lawyers: the opposite, as Mr. Austin says, Lectures on Jurisprudence, Tables and Notes, vol. iii. p. 192, to property, but a right of possession against the true owner and under a contract with him, until his debt is paid, and a power of sale for the reciprocal benefit of the pawnee and pawnor on default of payment at the time agreed upon.

Mr. Justice Story, On Bailments, s. 324, says, that "the pawnee may by the common law deliver over the pawn into the hands of a stranger for safe custody without consideration, for he may convey the same interest conditionally by way of pawn to another person, without in either case destroying or invalidating his security," but that he cannot pledge it for a debt greater than his own; that if he do so, he will be guilty of a breach of trust by which his creditor will acquire no title beyond that of the pawnee, and that the only question which admits "of controversy is, whether the creditor shall be entitled to retain the pledge until the original debt (that is, the debt due to the first pawnee) was discharged; or whether the owner might recover the pledge in the same manner as if the case was a naked tort, without any qualified right in the first pawnee." So much of this passage as is stated to be clear law, viz., that the pawnee may deliver the chattel pawned to a stranger for safe custody without consideration, or convey the same conditionally (i.e. it may be presumed on the same conditions as those on which he holds it), by way of pawn to another person for a debt not greater than his own, without destroying or invalidating his security, has no application to the case before us, inasmuch as the pawn by Simpson to the defendant was not for safe custody nor without consideration, nor conditionally, nor for a debt not greater than the debt due by the plaintiff to Simpson; and because the power given to the pawnee by this bailment to dispose of the debentures by sale or otherwise, should his debt not be paid, might probably be considered, at least after default made, to enlarge the ordinary right of a pawnee over the chattel pawned. There is nothing in the passage which affords any countenance, except by way of query to the position, that a pawnee who, having, as in this case, placed the chattel pawned out of the pawnor's power, and out of his own power to redeem it, by payment of the amount for which it was given to him as a security, and who has deprived himself of the power of selling it for the payment of the pawnor's debt, can by so doing shield the creditor to whom he repawns it from an action of detinue at the suit of the real owner. Mr. Justice Story, s. 299, indeed says, "that if the pledgee voluntarily and by his own act places the pledge beyond his own power to restore it, as by agreeing that it may be attached at the suit of a third person, that will amount to a waiver of the pledge."

(2) 1 Stair, "Institution of the Laws of Scotland," 18, s. 10, p. 126.

It would be difficult to reconcile any other rule in respect of the pledging by pledgees of the chattels pawned to them with the well-established doctrine of our Courts, and the Courts of the United States of America, in respect of the pledging by factors of the goods intrusted to them. Factors, like pledgees, have a mandate of sale; sale irrespectively of default of any kind is the object of the bailment to them; they have a special property and right of possession against all the world except their principal—and against him if they have made advances on the security of his goods intrusted to them. To give effect to that security, they may avail themselves of their mandate of sale; but if they place the goods out of their own power by pledging them, although it be for a debt not exceeding their advances, the pawnee from them, except under the Factors Acts, is defenceless in trover or detinue even to the extent of his loan against the true owner. Why it should be otherwise between the true owner and the pawnee from a pawnee of the true owner's goods, no reason was adduced during the argument before us; nor indeed was it possible to adduce any reason, seeing that, in all the decisions on pledges by factors, the relation between a factor who has made advances on the goods intrusted to him and his principal, has been held not distinguishable, or barely distinguishable, in its legal incidents, from the relation between pawnee and pawnor—a factor being, as Mr. Justice Story says, s. 325, 327, citing Daubigny v. Duval (5 Term Rep. 604) and M'Combie v. Davis (7 East, 5), "generally treated in judicial discussions as in the condition of a pledgee."

The case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130) is a clear authority for holding that Simpson, in dealing with the debentures in the way which he must be taken on this plea to have done, was, as the defendant also was, guilty of a conversion of them; and unless that case is also an authority binding upon us for the doctrine that the conversion by a pawnee of the thing pawned is not such an abuse of the bailment of pawn as annuls it, but that there remains in him and in an assignee from him, and in an assignee from his assignee, and so on toties quoties without limit as to the number of assignments or the consideration for them, an interest of property in the pawn which defeats the owner's right of possession, the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. As I read the case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), and the cases of Chinery v. Viall (5 Hurl. & N. 288; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 180) and Brierly v. Kendall (17 Q.B. Rep. 937; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 161), on the authority of which it proceeded, the judgments of the majority of the learned Judges of the Court of Common Pleas in the first of them, and the judgments of the Court of Exchequer and of the Court of Queen's Bench in the second and third, are based on the principle that in an action to recover damages for the conversion, it is not an inflexible rule of law that the value of the goods converted is to be taken as the measure of damages; that when a suitor's real cause of action is a breach of contract, he cannot by suing in tort entitle himself to a larger compensation than he could have recovered in an action in form ex contractu; and therefore that when a verdict is obtained against an unpaid vendor for the conversion of the thing sold by him, or against an unpaid pawnee for the conversion of the thing pledged to him, he is entitled to be credited in the estimate by the jury of the damages to be paid by him, for the value of such interest or advantage as would have resulted to him from the contract of sale, or the contract of pawn, if it had been fulfilled by the vendee or pawnor. That this was the ratio decidendi in these cases seems to me clear from the facts of Chinery v. Viall (5 Hurl. & N. 288; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 180) and Brierly v. Kendall (17 Q.B. Rep. 937; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 161), which raised no question between the litigant parties in any respect analogous to the question which we in this case have to decide. In Chinery v. Viall (5 Hurl. & N. 288; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 180) the plaintiff who was the vendee of forty-eight sheep, for five only of which he had paid under a bargain which entitled him to delivery of the whole lot before payment, brought his action against the vendor for a conversion by parting with the sheep to another purchaser. If the defendant's interest in the unpaid balance of the agreed price of the sheep had not been credited to him in the amount of damages, the plaintiff, who had only paid for five of them, would have pocketed the full value of the forty-three which had been converted. In Brierly v. Kendall (17 Q.B. Rep. 937; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 161), an action of trespass, there was a loan by the defendant to the plaintiff, secured by a bill of sale of the plaintiff's goods, in which was a reservation to the plaintiff of a right to the possession of the goods until he should make default in some payment. Before any default, the defendant took the goods from the plaintiff and sold them. For this wrong he was liable in trespass; but the measure of damages was held to be, not the value of the goods, but the loss which the plaintiff had really sustained by being deprived of the possession. The wrongful act of the defendant did not annihilate his interest in the goods under the bill of sale; and such interest was considered in measuring the extent of the plaintiff's right to damages.

These cases are manifestly not in conflict with, if indeed they at all touch, the principle relied upon in the plea which is here demurred to, that if the pawnee converts the chattels pawned to him the bailment is determined, and the right of possession revested in the true owner of them.

In Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130) the defendant, a pawnee of dock warrants, had anticipated by a few hours only the time at which, under his contract with the owner of them, he might have sold and delivered them; he had applied before the time of action brought the proceeds of their sale to the discharge of the plaintiff's debt to him, or he held them specially applicable to that purpose, and the plaintiff, had he sued the defendant in contract for not keeping the pledge until default made, could not have proved that he had sustained any damage. The Chief Justice, speaking for himself and two of his learned Brothers, did, indeed, say, that "the deposit of the goods in question with the defendant to secure repayment of a loan to him on a given day, with a power to sell in case of default on that day, created an interest and a right of property in the goods which was more than a mere lien, and that the wrongful act of the pawnee did not annihilate the contract between the parties, nor the interest of the pawnee in the goods under that contract"; but he cannot be understood to have meant by the words "interest and right of property in the goods," and by the words "more than a mere lien," other than a "special property," as defined by the authorities before referred to by me, viz., a real right or jus in re, a right of possession until default made, a right of retention or sale after default made; nor, as I think, to have intended more by the words "the wrongful act of the pawnee did not annihilate the contract between the parties" than that the contract, in the breach of which consisted the tort of which the plaintiff complained, must still be considered to subsist, at least for the purpose of being referred to for the measure of damage sustained by the pawnor and of the damages to be recovered by him.

The case before us differs, as I think, in essential particulars as respects the principle upon which damages would have been measurable, had the action been in trover, from the case in the Common Pleas. The defendant, as assignee of the pawnee, could not surely have set up in mitigation of damages an interest derived by him from the pawnee before default made by the pawnor; the pawnee, by the express terms of the bailment to him not having the right to dispose of the debentures by sale or otherwise until after default made. Besides, it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the broad distinction between the case of the sale a few hours too soon of a pawn which, as in the case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), the pawnor "had no intention to redeem,"—the proceeds of the sale being devoted before action brought to the discharge of the debt for which the pawn had been given as a security,—and the abuse of a pawn by the pawnee in wrongfully, for his own purposes, placing it out of his power and out of the pawnor's power, to redeem the pawn should he have the means and mind to do so.

By the contract of bailment between the plaintiff and Simpson, the proceeds of the sale of the debentures which are the subject of this suit had been specifically appropriated to the payment of the plaintiff's bill, in the event of his not being able to meet it with other means. Simpson held the debentures in trust, should the bill not be paid, to sell them on the plaintiff's account, or allow the plaintiff to sell them, or raise money on them, to pay his bill. Instead of that, Simpson, before default made by the plaintiff, converted them to his own use, obtaining their agreed value in pledge from the defendant, and imposing upon the plaintiff the burthen of making other provision to meet his bill.

By this act of Simpson, the plaintiff, in my judgment, did in fact sustain damage, and at the maturity of the bill, if not before, to the full amount of the current saleable value of the debentures. I am at a loss to see how the conduct of Simpson in thus dealing with the debentures, and how the title of the defendant claiming under him are to escape the operation of the rule, that if the pawnee, except conditionally (an exception for which the authority is but slender), parts with the possession of the pawn, he loses the benefit of his security—Ryall v. Rolle (1 Atk. 165), Reeves v. Capper (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), per Mr. Justice Williams, or the operation of the maxim, "Nemo potest plus juris ad alium transferre quam ipse habet." For these reasons, as it seems to me, the case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130) ought not to govern our decision. It could not be followed by us as an authority in favour of the defendant without inattention to its true principle, viz., that between the parties to a contract the measure of damages for a breach of the contract must be the same, whether the form of action be ex contractu or ex delicto, and that in such a case general rules applicable to the latter form—the only one competent for the redress of injuries purely tortious—are not to be strained to the doing of manifest injustice. It is open also, in a right estimate of it as an authority for the case in hand, to this observation: The interest of a plaintiff in the damages recoverable by him for a tort, which is, in its true nature, a breach of contract, is restricted by the implied stipulations of the contracting parties to the amount which in the conscience of a jury may suffice to give him an adequate compensation. The action of detinue for a chattel of which the bailment has been abused against a person not party to the contract of bailment, is not based upon a breach of contract, and not within the rules applicable to actions of tort which are based on breaches of contract. In detinue, the plaintiff sues not for the value "tantamount of the thing detained by him, but for the return of the thing itself, which may to him have a value other and higher than its actual value," and only for its value—Tidd's Forms, 388—"if the thing cannot be delivered to him," and for damages for its detention and his costs of suit. A judgment to recover the value only has been reversed for error—Peters v. Heywood (Cro. Jac. 682)—the integral undiminished thing itself unaffected by counter-vailing lien or abatement of whatever kind, being the primary object of the suit. In an action of trover for the conversion by the pawnee of the subject of bailment, the plaintiff, according to the judgment of the majority of the Court in Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), is entitled only to recover the amount in money of the damage which he proves himself to have sustained; in an action of detinue for the recovery from the assignee of the pawnee of the chattel pawned, and of which the pawn has been abused and forfeited, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the chattel itself, because it was a term of the contract of pawn that if the pawn should be abused by the pawnee his right to the possession of it should cease; and the defendant can have derived no right of possession from one whose own right of possession was determined by his attempt to transfer it. Unless, therefore, we were prepared to hold, in disregard of the clearly expressed opinion of Story, and of Mr. Justice Williams,—Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), that detinue can in no case be for an unredeemed pawn, however much the bailment of it may have been abused, we are not at liberty to apply the ratio decidendi in Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130) to the case before us. It raises a strong presumption against the defence set up in this plea, that nothing bearing the slightest resemblance to the right of possession which it claims for the assignee of a pawnee, is to be found in the copious title of the Digest, lib. 20, tit. 'De Pignoribus et Hypothecis et qualiter ea contrahuntur et de pactis eorum,' or in the five following titles on the contract of pawn and hypothec and its incidents, or in the title, 'De Pignoratica actione vel contra,' or (Dig. lib. 13, tit. 7.) in the works of any English, French or Scotch jurist.

The dictum of the majority of the Court in the case of Mores v. Conham (Owen. 123), that the pawnee has such an interest in the pawn as he may assign over was not the point decided in that case, nor, as it seems to me, a point essential to its decision, the point decided being, that the surrender by the plaintiff of a chattel pawned to him by a third person was a good consideration for a promise by the defendant to pay the debt for which it had been given as security. It does not seem to follow from that decision that the surrenderee thereby acquired such an interest in the pawn as would enable him to defend a detinue at the suit of the true owner, the reunion of whose rights of property and possession was, unless they meant to rob him, the real object of the transaction. The inference drawn from this very obscure and superficially reasoned case in favour of the defendant's plea, is wholly irreconcilable with the doctrine of Domat, liv. 3. tit. 1. s. 3, the highest authority on all questions depending, as this question does, upon the rules and principles of the Roman Civil Law, that the bailments of hypothèque and "gage" last only as long as the thing hypothecated is in the hands of the person charging it, or the thing pawned in the hands of him who takes it for his security, and with the doctrine of Erskine, a jurist of nearly equal eminence, that "in a pledge of movables the creditor who quits the possession of the subject loses the real right he had upon it"—Institute of the Laws of Scotland, book 3, tit. 1, s. 33.

I think the bailment to Simpson was determined by the pledge by him to the defendant under the circumstances stated in the plea; that both of them have been guilty of a conversion; that the plaintiff might, as Mr. Justice Williams said in the case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), lawfully, should the opportunity offer, resume the possession of the debentures, and hold them freed from the bailment, and may, the defendant being remitted to his remedy against Simpson, and Simpson to his remedy upon the bill, recover them or their full value, if they cannot be delivered to him, in this action of detinue.

MELLOR, J.—In an action of detinue for four debentures of the British Slate Company (Limited), the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff had deposited them with one Simpson, as security for the due payment at maturity of a bill of exchange, payable six months after date, indorsed by the plaintiff, and discounted by Simpson, “upon the agreement that Simpson should have full power to sell, or otherwise dispose of, the said debentures, if the said bill was not paid at maturity.” It then alleged that the bill was not paid at maturity, nor at the commencement of the suit, and that before the detention and the commencement of this suit Simpson deposited the debentures with the defendant, to be by him kept as a security, for and until the repayment of certain money lent by the defendant to Simpson, upon the security of the debentures, which sum of money was then due and unpaid. To this plea the plaintiff demurred, and upon demurrer I think that we must assume that the pledging of the debentures by Simpson to the defendant took place before default was made by the plaintiff in payment of the bill of exchange at maturity, and that we must also assume that the money for which the debentures were pledged by Simpson, as a security to the defendant, was of larger amount than the amount of the bill of exchange discounted for the plaintiff by Simpson.

The question thus raised by this plea is, whether a pawnee of debentures, deposited with him as a security for the due payment of money at a certain time, does, by replacing such debentures, and depositing them with a third person, as a security for a larger amount, before any default in payment by the pawnor, make void the contract upon which they were deposited with the pawnee, so as to vest in the pawnor an immediate right to the possession thereof, notwithstanding that the debt due by him to the original pawnee remains unpaid. This result seems prima facie to be disproportionate to any injury which the pawnor would be likely to sustain from the fact of his debentures having been repledged before default made. Still, if the principles of law, as laid down in decided cases, satisfactorily support the proposition above stated, this Court must give effect to them.

There is a well recognized distinction betwixt a lien and a pledge, as regards the powers of the person entitled to a lien, and the powers of the person who holds goods upon an agreement on deposit by way of pawn or pledge for the due payment of money. In the case of simple lien, there can be no power of sale or disposition of the goods, which is inconsistent with the retention of the possession by the person entitled to the lien; whereas in the case of a pledge, or pawn of goods, to secure the payment of money at a certain day, on default by the pawnor, the pawnee may sell the goods deposited, and realize the amount, and become a trustee for the overplus for the pawnor; or even if no day of payment be named, he may, upon waiting a reasonable time and taking the proper steps, realize his debt in like manner. It is said by Mr. Justice Story—Bailments, tit. ‘Pawns or Pledges,’ s. 311—that, “The foundation of the distinction rests in this, that the contract of pledge carries an implication that the security shall be made effectual to discharge the obligation; but in the case of a lien, nothing is supposed to be given but a right of retention or detainer, unless under special circumstances.” The question thus arises, is the right of retention in case of a lien, either by a custom or contract otherwise different from a deposit by way of pledge for securing the due payment of money, than in the incidental power of sale in the latter case on condition broken? In other words, on a contract of pledge, is it implied that the pledgee shall not part with the possession of the thing pledged until default in payment; and if so, is that of the essence of the contract, so that the violation of it makes void the contract?

In the case of Legg v. Evans (6 Mee. & W. 36; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 102), an action of trover having been brought against the defendants, as sheriffs of Middlesex, to recover the value of some pictures and picture-frames, the defendants justified under an execution against the goods and chattels of the plaintiff, to which the plaintiff replied, setting up a lien in respect of work done upon such goods and chattels, which had been delivered to him in the way of his trade by one Williams; and, further, set up an agreement between the plaintiff and Williams that the plaintiff should draw and indorse certain bills of exchange for the use of Williams, and should have a right to hold the said goods for securing the payment by Williams of the amount of the said bills of exchange; and it alleged that the said money and bills of exchange then remained wholly unpaid. The Court of Exchequer held, on demurrer to the replication, that it was a good answer to the plea, and Mr. Baron Parke is reported to have said, "If we consider the nature of a lien and the right which it confers, it will be evident that it cannot form the subject-matter of a sale. A lien is a personal right which cannot be parted with, and continues only so long as the possessor holds the goods. It is clear, therefore, that the sheriff cannot sell an interest of this description, which is a personal interest in the goods"; and further on he said, "Here the interest cannot be transferred to any other individual; it continues only as long as the holder keeps possession of the subject-matter of the lien, either by himself or his servant." In that case there was superadded to the lien, in respect of work done, an agreement that the person entitled to the lien should have a right to hold the said goods and chattels for securing the payment of the bills of exchange therein mentioned, and which then remained wholly unpaid. That case was treated as a simple case of lien or right "to hold," to secure the payment, not only of the amount due for work done on the goods by Williams, but also of the bills drawn and indorsed by him. It is, therefore, an authority, to the effect that in the case of lien, even to secure payment of money advanced, there is no implication of any power to sell or otherwise dispose of the subject-matter of the lien, because retention of possession by the party entitled to the lien is an essential ingredient in it.

It appears, therefore, that there is a real distinction between a deposit by way of pledge for securing the payment of money, and a right to hold by way of lien to secure the same object. In Pothonier v. Dawson (Holt's N.P. 383), cited in argument in Legg v. Evans (6 Mee. & W. 36; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 102), Chief Justice Gibbs said, "Undoubtedly, as a general proposition, the right of lien gives no right to sell goods; but when goods are deposited by way of security to indemnify a party against a loan of money, it is more than a pledge: the lender's rights are more extensive than such as accrue under the ordinary lien in the way of trade." It appears to me that considerable confusion has been introduced into this subject by the somewhat indiscriminate use of the words "special property" as alike applicable to the right of personal retention in case of a lien, and the actual interest in the goods created by the contract of pledge to secure the payment of money. In Legg v. Evans (6 Mee. & W. 36; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 102) "the nature of a lien is defined to be a personal right which cannot be parted with," but "the contract of pledge carries an implication that the security shall be made effectual to discharge the obligation"—Story on Bailments, s. 289. In each case the general property remains in the pawnor; but the question is as to the nature and extent of the interest or special property passing to the bailee in the two cases. Mr. Justice Story, in his treatise On Bailments, s. 324, thus describes the right and interest of the pawnee: "He may, by the common law, deliver over the pawn into the hands of a stranger for safe custody, without consideration, or he may sell or assign all his interest in the pawn, or he may convey the same interest conditionally, by way of pawn, to another person, without in either case destroying or invalidating his security; but if the pawnee should undertake to pledge the property (not being negotiable securities) for a debt of his own, or to make a transfer thereof to his own creditor, as if he were the absolute owner, it is clear that in such a case he would be guilty of a breach of trust; and his creditor would acquire no title beyond that held by the pawnee. The only question is, whether the creditor should be entitled to return the pledge until the original debt was discharged, or whether the owner might recover the pledge in the same manner as in the case of a naked tort without any qualified right in the first pawnee." In M'Combie v. Davis (7 East, 5) it appeared that a broker had, for a debt of his own, pledged certain tobacco of his principals, upon which he had a lien, and in an action brought by the principal against the defendant in trover for the tobacco, Lord Ellenborough being of opinion "that the lien was personal, and could not be transferred by the tortious act of the broker pledging the goods of his principal," the plaintiff obtained a verdict; and upon motion for a new trial, Lord Ellenborough said that "nothing could be clearer than that liens were personal, and could not be transferred to third persons by any 'tortious pledge' of the principal's goods;" but he afterwards added "that he would have it fully understood that his observations were applied to a tortious transfer of the goods of the principal, by the broker undertaking to pledge them as his own; and not to the case of one who, intending to give a security to another, to the extent of his lien, deliver over the actual possession of the goods on which he has the lien to that other, with notice of his lien, and appoints that other as his servant to keep possession of the goods for him." It would therefore seem that in the case of a broker or factor for sale, before the Factors Acts, although he had no power to pledge his principal's goods, except to the extent of his own lien, with notice of the extent of his interest, yet, when he pledged the goods on which he had a lien tortiously, neither the factor nor the pawnee could retain them even for payment of the amount of the original lien. The case of M'Combie v. Davis (7 East, 5), however, shews that the factor or broker's lien, although simply a right to retain possession, as between him and his principal, might be transferred and made a security to a third person, provided he professed to assign it only as a security to the like amount of that due to himself.

Still the character of the transaction is that of lien, and not of deposit by way of pledge; and although the goods were intrusted to the broker for sale, and up to the time of sale remained in his hands upon a personal right to retain them for advances, yet he could not pledge them, and if he did, the act was an essential violation of the relation betwixt him and his principal, and entitled the latter at once to the recovery of the value of the goods in trover. "But the relation of principal and factor where money has been advanced on goods consigned for sale is not that of pawnor and pawnee," as was said by the Court in Smart v. Sandars (3 Com. B. Rep. 401; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 39), and the same case after amendment of the pleadings (5 Com. B. Rep. 895; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 258). There would therefore appear to be some real difference in the incidents between a simple lien, like that in Legg v. Evans (6 Mee. & W. 36; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 102), and the lien of a broker or factor before the Factors Acts, and the case of a deposit by way of pledge to secure the repayment of money, which latter more nearly resembles an ordinary mortgage, except that the pawnor retains the general property in the goods pledged, which he does not in the case of an ordinary mortgage—Notes to Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 194): "A lien, as we have seen, gives only a personal right to retain possession; a factor or broker's lien was apparently attended with the additional incident that to the extent of his lien he might transfer even the possession of the subject-matter of the lien to a third person, appointing him as his servant to keep possession for him."

In a contract of pledge for securing the payment of money, we have seen that the pawnee may sell and transfer the thing pledged on condition broken; but what implied contract is there that the pledgee shall not in the mean time part with the possession thereof to the extent of his interest? It may be that upon a deposit by way of pledge the express contract between the parties may operate so as to make a parting with the possession even to the extent of his interest before condition broken, so essential a violation of it as to revest the right of possession in the pawnor, but in the absence of such terms, why are they to be implied? There may, possibly, be cases in which the very nature of the thing deposited might induce a jury to believe and find that it was deposited on the understanding that the possession should not be parted with; but in the case before us we have only to deal with the agreement which is stated in the plea. The object of the deposit is to secure the repayment of a loan, and the effect is to create an interest and a right of property in the pawnee to the extent of the loan in the goods deposited; but what is the authority for saying that until condition broken the pawnee has only a personal right to retain the goods in his own possession?

In Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), one Cumming, a bankrupt, had deposited with the defendant 243 cases of brandy, to be held by him as a security for the payment of an acceptance of the bankrupt for 62l. 10s., discounted by the defendant, and which would become due on the 29th of January, 1863, and in case such acceptance was not paid at maturity, the defendant was to be at liberty to sell the brandy and apply the proceeds in payment of the acceptance. On the 28th of January, before the acceptance became due, the defendant contracted to sell the brandy to a third person, and on the 29th delivered to him the dock warrant, and on the 30th such third person obtained the actual possession of the brandies. In an action of trover, brought by the assignee of the bankrupt, the Court of Common Pleas held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, on the ground that the defendant wrongfully assumed to be owner in selling, and although that alone might not be a conversion, yet, by delivering over the dock warrant to the vendees in pursuance of such sale, "he interfered with the right which the bankrupt had on the 29th if he repaid the loan"; but the majority of the Court (Erle, C.J., Byles, J. and Keating, J.) held that he was only entitled to nominal damages, on the express ground that the deposit of the goods in question with the defendant to secure repayment of a loan to him on a given day, with a power to sell in case of default on that day, created an interest and a right of property in the goods which was more than a mere lien; and the wrongful act of the pawnee did not annihilate the contract between the parties, nor the interest of the pawnee in the goods under that contract."

From that view of the law, as applied to the circumstances of that case, Mr. Justice Williams dissented, on the ground "that the bailment was terminated by the sale before the stipulated time, and, consequently, that the title of the plaintiff to the goods became as free as if the bailment had never taken place."

Although the dissent of that most learned Judge diminishes the authority of that case as a decision on the point, and although it may be open to doubt whether in an action of trover the defendant ought not to have succeeded on the plea of not possessed, and that the plaintiff's only remedy for damages was by an action on the contract, I am nevertheless of opinion that the substantial ground upon which the majority of the Court proceeded, viz., that the "act of the pawnee did not annihilate the contract nor the interest of the pawnee in the goods," is the more consistent with the nature and incidents of a deposit by way of pledge. I think that when the true distinction between the case of a deposit by way of pledge of goods for securing the payment of money, and all cases of lien correctly so described is considered, it will be seen that in the former there is no implication in general of a contract by the pledgee to retain the personal possession of the goods deposited, and I think that although he cannot confer upon any third person a better title or a greater interest than he possesses, yet if, nevertheless he does pledge the goods to a third person for a greater interest than he possesses, such an act does not annihilate the contract of pledge between himself and the pawnor, but that the transaction is simply inoperative as against the original pawnor, who, upon tender of the sum secured, immediately becomes entitled to the possession of the goods, and can recover in an action for any special damage which he may have sustained by reason of the act of the pawnee in re-pledging the goods; and I think that such is the true effect of Lord Holt's definition of a "vadium, or pawn" in Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th edit. p. 181), although he was of opinion that the pawnee could in no case use the pledge if it would thereby be damaged, and must use due diligence in the keeping of it, and says that the creditor is bound to restore the pledge upon payment of the debt, because by detaining it after the tender of the money he is a wrongdoer, his special property being determined; yet he nowhere says that the misuse or abuse of the pledge before payment or tender annihilates the contract upon which the deposit took place.

If the true distinction between cases of lien and cases of deposit by way of pledge be kept in mind, it will, I think, suffice to determine this case in favour of the defendant, seeing that no tender of the sum secured by the original deposit is alleged to have been made by the plaintiff; and considering the nature of the things deposited, I think that the plaintiff can have sustained no real damage by the repledging of them, and that he cannot successfully claim the immediate right to the possession of the debentures in question. I am therefore of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant.

BLACKBURN, J.—This is a question arising on demurrer to a plea. The count is in detinue for certain debentures. The plea is, that the plaintiff deposited the debentures with one Simpson as security for the due payment of a bill of exchange, indorsed by plaintiff to Simpson, and discounted by him, and that it was agreed between the plaintiff and Simpson, that Simpson should have full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the debentures if the bill of exchange was not paid when it became due; that the bill was dishonoured, and not yet paid by any one, and that Simpson deposited the debentures with the defendant as a security for the repayment of money advanced by the defendant to Simpson on the security of the debentures.

To this plea there was a demurrer. The plea does not expressly state whether the deposit with the defendant by Simpson was before or after the dishonour of the bill of exchange; and, as against the defendant, in whose knowledge this matter lies, it must be taken that it was before the bill was dishonoured, and consequently at a time when Simpson was not yet entitled by virtue of his agreement with the plaintiff to dispose of the debentures. We cannot construe the plea as stating that Simpson agreed to transfer to the defendant, as indorsee of the bill, the security which Simpson had over the debentures and no more. We must, I think, as against the defendant, construe the plea as stating that Simpson deposited the debentures, professing to give a security on them for the repayment of a debt of his own, which may or may not have exceeded the amount of the bill of exchange, but was certainly different from it. And it is quite clear that Simpson could not give the defendant any right to detain the debentures after the bill of exchange was satisfied, so that a replication that the plaintiff had paid, or was ready and willing to pay the bill, would have been good. The defendant could not in any view have a greater right than Simpson had. But there is no such replication; and the question which is raised on this record, and it is a very important one, is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover in detinue the possession of the debentures, he neither having paid nor tendered the amount for which he had pledged them with Simpson.

In detinue the plaintiff's claim is based upon his right to have the chattel itself delivered to him, and if there still remain in Simpson, or in the defendant as his assignee, any interest in the goods, or any right of detention inconsistent with this right of the plaintiff, the plaintiff must fail in detinue, though he may be entitled to maintain an action of tort against Simpson or the defendant for the damage, if any, sustained by him in consequence of their unauthorized dealing with the debentures. The question therefore raised on the present demurrer is, whether the deposit by Simpson of the debentures with the defendant, as stated in the plea, put an end to that interest, and right of detention till the bill of exchange was honoured which had been given to Simpson by the plaintiff's original contract of pledge with him.

There is a great difference in this respect between a pledge and a lien. The authorities are clear that a right of lien, properly so called, is a mere personal right of detention, and that an unauthorized transfer of the thing does not transfer that personal right. The cases which established that, before the Factors Acts, a pledge by a factor gave his pledgee no right to retain the goods, even to the extent in which the factor was in advance, proceed on this ground. In Daubigny v. Duval (5 Term Rep. 604), Mr. Justice Buller put the case on the ground that "a lien is a personal right and cannot be transferred to another." In M'Combie v. Davis (7 East, 5), Lord Ellenborough puts the decision of the Court on the same ground, saying "that nothing could be clearer than that liens were personal, and could not be transferred to third persons by any tortious pledge of the principal's goods."

Story, in his treatise on Bailments, ss. 325, 326 and 327, is apparently dissatisfied with these decisions, thinking that a factor, who has made advances on the goods consigned to him, ought to be considered as having more than a mere personal right to detain the goods, and that a pledgee from him ought to have been considered entitled to detain the goods until the lien of the factor was discharged. This is a question which can never be raised in this country, for the legislature has intervened, and in all cases of pledges by agents within the Factors Acts the pledge is now available in all cases to the extent of the factor's interest.

But, on the facts stated in the plea, Simpson was not an agent within the meaning of the Factors Acts; and we have to consider whether the agreement stated to have been made between the plaintiff and him did confer something beyond a mere lien, properly so called, an interest in the property, or real right, as distinguished from a mere personal right of detention.

I think that both on principle and on authority, a contract such as that stated in the plea, pledging goods as a security, and giving the pledgee power in case of default to dispose of the pledge (when accompanied by an actual delivery of the thing) does give the pledgee something beyond a mere lien; it creates in him a special property or interest in the thing. By the Civil Law such a contract did so, though there was no actual delivery of possession, but the right of hypothec is not recognized by the common law. Till possession is given, the intended pledgee has only a right of action on the contract, and no interest in the thing itself—Howes v. Ball (7 B. & C. 481). I mention this because in the argument several authorities, which only go to shew that a delivery of possession is, according to the English law, necessary for the creation of the special property of the pawnee, were cited as if they determined that it was necessary for the continuance of that property.

The effect of the civil law is thus stated by Story, in his treatise on Bailments, s. 328: "It enabled the pawnee to assign over or to pledge the goods again to the extent of his interest or lien on them; and in either case the assignee was entitled to hold the pawn until the original owner discharged the debt for which it was pledged." But, beyond this, the second pledge was inoperative, and conveyed no title, according to the known maxim, "Nemo potest plus juris ad alium transferre quam ipse habet."

In England there are strong authorities that the contract of pledge, when perfected by delivery of possession, creates an interest in the pledge, which interest may be assigned. This was the very point decided by the Court in Mores v. Conham (Owen. 123), where the Court say that the pawnee is responsible if he misuseth the pawn, "also he hath such an interest in the pawn as he may assign over, and the assignee shall be subject to detain if he detains it upon payment of the money by the owner." It is true that one Judge, Mr. Justice Foster, dissented on this very point. That may so far weaken the authority of the decision, but it shews that there could be no mistake in the reporter, and no oversight on the part of the majority, but that it was a deliberate decision.

It is laid down by Lord Holt, in his celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Barnard (1 Smith's Lead. Cas., 5th edit. p. 181), that a pawnee "has a special property, for the pawn is a securing to the pawnee that he shall be repaid his debt, and to compel the pawnor to pay him"—language certainly seeming to indicate an opinion that he has an interest in the thing, or real right, as distinguished from a mere personal right, of detention. And Story, in his treatise on Bailments, s. 327, says, "But whatever doubt may be indulged as to the case of a factor, it has been decided," (that is, in America) "that in the case of a strict pledge, if the pledgee transfers the same to his own creditor, the latter may hold the pledge until the debt of the original owner is discharged."

In Whittaker, on Lien, p. 140 (published in 1812), the law is laid down to be that the pawnee has a special property beyond a lien. I do not cite this as an authority of great weight, but as shewing that this was an existing opinion in England before Story wrote his treatise.

But there is a class of cases in which a person, having a limited interest in chattels, either as hirer or lessee of them, dealing tortiously with them, has been held to determine his special interest in the things, so that the owner may maintain trover as if that interest had never been created. But I think in all these cases the act done by the party having the limited interest was wholly inconsistent with the contract under which he had the limited interest, so that it must be taken from his doing it that he had renounced that contract, which, as was said in Fenn v. Bittleston (7 Exch. Rep. 152; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 41), operates as a disclaimer of a tenancy at common law; or, as it is put by Mr. Justice Williams in Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130), he may be said to have violated an implied condition of the bailment. Such is the case where a hirer of goods, who is not to have more than the use of them, destroys them or sells them; that being so wholly at variance with the purpose for which he holds them that it may well be said he has renounced the contract by which he held them, and so waived and abandoned the limited right which he had under that contract. It may be a question whether it would not have been better if it had been originally determined that, even in such cases, the owner should bring a special action on the case, and recover the damage which he actually sustained, which may, in such cases, be very trifling, though it may be large, instead of holding that he might bring trover and recover the whole value of the chattel without any allowance for the special property. But I am not prepared to dissent from these cases where the act complained of is one wholly repugnant to the holding, as I think it will be found to have been in every one of the cases in which this doctrine has been acted upon.

But where the act, though unauthorized, is not so repugnant to the contract as to shew a disclaimer, the law is otherwise. Thus, where the hirer of a horse for two days to ride from Gravesend to Nettlestead, deviated from the straight way and rode elsewhere, it was held that the hirer had a good special property for the two days, and although he misbehaved by riding to another place than was intended, that was to be punished by an action on the case, and not by seizing the gelding—Lee v. Atkinson (Helo. 172). This certainly was a much more equitable decision than if a rough rule had been laid down that every deviation from the right line, however small, was to operate as a forfeiture of the right to use the horse for which the hirer had paid; and it may be reconciled to the decisions already referred to, because the wrongful use, though wrongful, was not such as to shew a renunciation of the contract with the owner of the horse. Now, I think that the subpledging of goods, held in security for money, before the money was due, is not in general so inconsistent with the contract as to amount to a renunciation of that contract. There may be cases in which the pledgor has a special personal confidence in the pawnee, and therefore stipulates that the pledge shall be kept by him alone; but no such terms are stated here, and I do not think any such term is implied by law.

In general, all that the pledgor requires is the personal contract of the pledgee that on bringing the money the pawn should be given up to him, and that in the mean time the pledgee shall be responsible for due care being taken for its safe custody. This may very well be done though there has been a subpledge; at least the plaintiff should try the experiment whether, on bringing the money for which he pledged these debentures to Simpson he cannot get them. And the assignment of the pawn for the purpose of raising money (so long at least as it purports to transfer no more than the pledgee's interest against the pledgor), is so far from being found in practice to be inconsistent with or repugnant to the contract, that it has been introduced into the Factors Acts, and is in the Civil Law (and according to Mores v. Conham (Owen. 123) in our law also) a regular incident in a pledge. If it is done too soon, or to too great an extent, it is doubtless unlawful, but not so repugnant to the contract as to be justly held equivalent to a renunciation of it.

The cases of Bloxham v. Sanders (4 B. & C. 941) and Milgate v. Kebble (3 Man. & G. 100; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 277) are cases of unpaid vendors; and therefore are not authorities directly applicable to a case of pledge. But the position of a partially unpaid vendor who irregularly sells the goods, which have only been partially paid for, is very analogous to that of a pledgee, and in Milgate v. Kebble (3 Man. & G. 100; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 277) Chief Justice Tindal is reported to have used language that seems to indicate that in his opinion a pledgor could not have maintained trover any more than the vendee in that case. But the latest case, and one which I think is binding on this Court, is that of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 130). I think that the decision of the majority of the Court of Common Pleas in that case is an authority that, at all events, there remains an interest, not put an end to by the unauthorized transfer, such as is consistent with a right in the pawnor to recover in detinue. In that case the goods had been pledged as a security for a bill of exchange, with a power of sale if the bill was not paid at maturity. The pledgee sold the goods the day before he had a right to do so. The assignees of the bankrupt pledgor brought trover, and sought to recover the full value of the goods, without any reduction. Mr. Justice Williams thought that they were so entitled, giving as his reason "that the bailment having been terminated by the wrongful sale, the plaintiff might have resumed possession of the goods, freed from the bailment, and might have held them rightfully when so resumed as the absolute owner, against the whole world." And if this was correct, the present plaintiff is entitled to judgment. But the majority of the Court decided that "the deposit of the goods in question with the defendant, to secure repayment of a loan to him on a given day, with power to sell in case of default on that day, created an interest and right of property in the goods which was more than a mere lien; and the wrongful act of the pawnee did not annihilate the contract between the parties, nor the interest of the pawnee in the goods under that contract." This can be reconciled with the cases above cited, of which Fenn v. Bittleston (7 Exch. Rep. 152; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 41) is one, by the distinction that the sale, though wrongful, was not so inconsistent with the object of the contract of pledge as to amount to a repudiation of it, though I own that I do not find this distinction in the judgment in Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 130). It may be that the conclusion from these premises ought to have been that the defendant was entitled to the verdict on the plea of not possessed in trover, unless the Court thought fit to let the plaintiff, on proper terms, amend by substituting a count for the improper sale; but this point as to the pleading does not seem to have been presented to the Court of Common Pleas. The fact that they differed from Mr. Justice Williams shews that after consideration they meant to decide that the pledge gave a special property, which still continued; and though I have the highest respect for the authority of Mr. Justice Williams, I think we must in a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction act upon the opinion of the majority, even if I did not think as I do, that it puts the law on a just and convenient ground. And, as already intimated, I think that, unless the plaintiff is entitled to the uncontrolled possession of the things, he cannot recover in detinue.

For these reasons, I think we should give judgment for the defendant.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question in this case is, whether, where debentures have been deposited as security for the payment of a bill of exchange, with a right on the part of the deposittee to sell or otherwise dispose of the debentures in the event of non-payment of the bill,—in other words as a pledge,—and the pawnee pledges the securities to a third party on an advance of money, the original pawnor, the bill of exchange remaining unpaid, can treat the contract between himself and the first pawnee as at an end, and, without either paying or tendering the amount of the bill of exchange, for the payment of which the security has been pledged, bring an action of detinue to recover the thing pledged from the holder, to whom it has been transferred.

I think it unnecessary to the decision in the present case to determine whether a party with whom an article has been pledged as a security for the payment of money has a right to transfer his interest in the thing pledged (subject to the right of redemption in the pawnor) to a third party. I should certainly hesitate to lay down the affirmative of that proposition. Such a right in the pawnee seems quite inconsistent with the undoubted right of the pledgor to have the thing pledged returned to him immediately on the tender of the amount for which the pledge was given. In some instances it may well be inferred from the nature of the thing pledged,—as in the case of a valuable work of art,—that the pawnor, though perfectly willing that the article should be intrusted to the custody of the pawnee, would not have parted with it on the terms that it should be passed on to others and committed to the custody of strangers. It is not, however, necessary to decide this question in the present case. The question here is, whether the transfer of the pledge is not only a breach of the contract on the part of the pawnee, but operates to put an end to the contract altogether, so as to entitle the pawnor to have back the thing pledged without payment of the debt. I am of opinion that the transfer of the pledge does not put an end to the contract, but amounts only to a breach of contract, upon which the owner may bring an action for nominal damages, if he has sustained no substantial damages,—for substantial damages if the thing pledged is damaged in the hands of the third party, or the owner is prejudiced by delay in not having the thing delivered to him on tendering the amount for which it was pledged. We are not dealing with a case of lien, which is merely the right to retain possession of the chattel, and which right is immediately lost on the possession being parted with, unless to a person who may be considered as the agent of the party having the lien for the purpose of its custody. In the contract of pledge the pawnor invests the pawnee with much more than the mere right of possession. He invests him with a right to deal with the thing pledged as his own if the debt be not paid and the thing redeemed at the appointed time.

It seems to me that the contract continues in force, and with it the special property created by it, until the thing pledged is redeemed or sold at the time specified. The pawnor cannot treat the contract as at an end until he has done that which alone enables him to divest the pawnee of the inchoate right of property in the thing pledged which the contract has conferred on him.

The view I have taken of this case, and which I should have arrived at independently of authority, is fully borne out by the decision of the majority of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Johnson v. Stear (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 330; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 130). There, goods which had been pledged as security for the payment of a bill of exchange, having been sold before the falling due of the bill, the Court held, on an action of trover being brought to recover the goods, that although the owner was entitled to maintain an action against the pawnee for a breach of contract in parting with the goods, yet that the contract itself was not put an end to by the tortious dealing with the goods by the pawnee so as to entitle the owner to bring an action to recover the goods as if the contract never had existed. This decision appears to me to be a direct authority on the present case, and to be binding upon us. It is true that Mr. Justice Williams dissented from the other three Judges constituting the Court, holding that the contract was put an end to, and the plaintiff remitted to his absolute rights of ownership by the conversion of the goods by the pawnee. But, however I may regret to differ from that very learned Judge, I concur, for the reasons I have given, with the majority of the Court of Common Pleas, in holding that a pawnor cannot recover back goods (and the same principle would obviously apply to debentures) pledged as security for the payment of a debt or bill of exchange until he has paid or tendered the amount of the debt. I am, therefore, of opinion that our judgment should be in favour of the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH.]

June 14, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. STEPHENS.

35 L. J. Q.B. 251; 7 B. & S. 710; L. R. 1 Q.B. 702; 14 L. T. 593;
14 W. R. 859; 12 Jur. N.S. 961.

Distinguished R. v. Holbrook, [1879] 48 L. J. Q.B. 113; L. R. 4 Q.B. D. 42; 39 L. T. 536; 27 W. R. 313 (Q.B. D.). Not applied, Chisholm v. Doulton, [1889] E. R. A.; 58 L. J. M.C. 133; L. R. 22 Q.B. D. 736; 60 L. T. 966; 37 W. R. 749 (Q.B.D. Div.). Referred to, Sherras v. De Rutzen, [1895] E. R. A.; 64 L. J. M.C. 218; [1895] 1 Q.B. 918; 72 L. T. 839; 43 W. R. 526 (Q.B.D. Div.). Principle applied, Coppen v. Moore, [1898] E. R. A.; 67 L. J. Q.B. 689; [1898] 2 Q.B. 306; 78 L. T. 520; 46 W. R. 620 (Q.B.D. Div.).

Nuisance—Obstruction of River—Master and Servant—Indictment—Evidence.

MASTER AND SERVANT. WATER AND WATERWAYS.—The workmen of the defendant, a colliery owner, in working the colliery, stacked the refuse in such a manner that it fell into a navigable river, and caused an obstruction therein. The defendant was indicted for a nuisance in causing such obstruction:—Held, that the facts of his not having personally superintended the works, of his having given express orders to the workmen that the refuse should be deposited in a particular place where it would not do any harm, and that it was not to be thrown into the river, would not relieve him from liability upon this indictment.

The first count of the indictment was for a nuisance in causing an obstruction of the ancient navigable river Towy, by casting into it quantities of slate, stone, earth, rubbish and other materials.

The second count charged that the defendant was the owner of divers large quantities of slate ground from certain quarries near to the river, and that he kept and suffered to be and remain the said large quantities of slate sunk in the said river, so that, &c.

At the trial, which took place before Blackburn, J., at the last Spring Assizes for Pembrokeshire, it was proved that the defendant was a master quarryman who had owned a colliery on the banks of the river Towy for thirty or forty years before the obstruction complained of occurred. The men employed by him were competent to perform their duties, but in the course of their works at the colliery, they stacked the rubbish and refuse in such a manner that it fell into the river, and caused the obstruction complained of. It was alleged on behalf of the defendant, that he was eighty years of age, that he had not personally superintended the works, but that he had given express orders to his workmen that the rubbish and refuse was to be deposited in a particular place where it would not do any harm, and was not to be thrown into the river.

The counsel for the defendant proposed to prove these facts, but the learned Judge held that they would not raise any defence to the indictment, even if it could be proved; and he told the jury that the defendant would be liable for the acts of his workmen in depositing the rubbish from the quarries belonging to him, so as to become a nuisance and obstruction to the river, although it were done by them without his knowledge and against his orders.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

A rule was subsequently obtained calling upon the prosecutrix to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground that the learned Judge misdirected the jury, in telling them that the defendant would be liable as above set out.

Giffard and Poland shewed cause against the rule.—The direction was right; for it was the duty of the defendant to keep the refuse from causing an obstruction, and he has not done so; the facts of his not superintending the works, and of his having desired his men to put the rubbish in a safe place, cannot free him from liability unless there be some rule of law that in such a case there must be proof of the mens rea. In general, it may be necessary to prove the mens rea in the case of an indictment; but the rule is not an inflexible one, and it is submitted that it is not necessary in the present case. The evidence given at the trial would have been sufficient to justify a verdict against the defendant in the case of an action—see Tenant v. Goldwin (1 Salk. 360). In this particular case an action would not have been maintainable, because the injury was not one which peculiarly affected the individual more than the whole public, and the proceeding by indictment was the proper one. In 3 Black. Com. it is said, “Therefore no action lies for a public or a common nuisance, but an indictment only, because the damage being common to all the king’s subjects, no one can assign his particular proportion of it, or if he could, it would be extremely hard if every subject in the kingdom were allowed to harass the offender with separate actions. For this reason no person, natural or corporate, can have an action for a public nuisance, or punish it; but only the king in his public capacity of supreme governor and paterfamilias of the kingdom. Yet this rule admits of one exception, where a private person suffers some extraordinary damage beyond the rest of the king’s subjects, by a public nuisance, in which case he shall have a private satisfaction by action.” But, further, it was held in The King v. Medley (6 Car. & P. 292) that the directors of a gas company were answerable for an act done by their superintendent and engineer, under a general authority to manage the works, though they were personally ignorant of the particular plan adopted, and though such plan was a departure from the original and understood method, which the directors had no reason to suppose was discontinued. In summing up the case Lord Chief Justice

Denman said, "It is said that the directors were ignorant of what had been done. In my judgment, that makes no difference; provided you think that they gave authority to Leadbeter to conduct the works, they will be answerable. It seems to me both common sense and law that if persons for their own advantage employ persons to conduct works, they must be answerable for what is done by those servants." Further, the whole matter is set at rest as soon as it is settled that a corporation is indictable for a nonfeasance and also for a misfeasance; for a corporation cannot have the mens rea. But that is shewn by The King v. Medley (6 Car. & P. 292), The Queen v. the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company (3 Q.B. Rep. 223), The Queen v. the Great North of England Railway Company (9 Q.B. Rep. 315; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 16), and many other cases. In The King v. Pedley (1 Ad. & E. 822; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 119) the defendant was held to be liable, in an indictment for a nuisance, which existed by reason of the necessities attached to some houses which were occupied by his tenants being left in a filthy state. It was there argued that he could not be liable unless he had been guilty either of creating or permitting the nuisance; but the Court held that he was liable.

[SHEE, J.—I see that Mr. Justice Littledale said: "If a nuisance be created, and a man purchase the premises with the nuisance upon them, though there be a demise for a term at the time of the purchase, so that the purchaser has no opportunity of removing the nuisance, yet by purchasing the reversion he makes himself liable for the nuisance." BLACKBURN, J.—In that case the defendant seems not even to have had the power to stop the nuisance.]

No; it seems, therefore, that it is not necessary that the prosecution should prove any mens rea.

[MELLOR, J.—There would be a great difficulty in obtaining redress if the servant was the only person liable.]

Just so. Suppose a case where the master had told his servants that the river belonged to him, the servant could not be convicted, nor could the master, if the argument on behalf of the defendant be right, unless it could be proved that he had a guilty knowledge. In Manley Smith's Law of Master and Servant, the law is thus laid down, at p. 181: "Again, masters are liable to indictments for public nuisances, such as carrying on offensive trades, committed by their servants, although their masters have nothing to do personally with the nuisance complained of. In such cases, also, if a master could shield himself from criminal responsibility, on the ground that he personally had nothing to do with the carrying on the trade, the real offender might escape with impunity, and the public grievance remain unredressed. It has, indeed, scarcely ever been contended that the master in such cases was not guilty, on the ground that the nuisance was perpetrated through the agency of others; and where that objection has been taken, it has been speedily overruled." And he cites Turberville v. Stampe (1 Ld. Raym. 264), Bush v. Steinman (1 Bos. & P. 404) and The King v. Pedley (1 Ad. & E. 822; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 119).—They also referred to Reedie v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (4 Exch. Rep. 244; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 65), The King v. Dixon (3 M. & S. 11), The King v. Moore (3 B. & Ad. 184) and to 1 Russell on Crimes, by Greaves, 4th edit. p. 456.

Bowen and Hughes, in support of the rule.—This indictment is a criminal proceeding, and the defendant cannot be held liable, unless he gave an order, either express or implied, to do the thing which is complained of. The learned Judge misdirected the jury in saying that the defendant could not avail himself of the proposed evidence. No doubt such evidence would not raise a defence to a civil action; but neither the defendant nor a corporation would be liable to be convicted upon an indictment if such facts could be proved as the defendant was in a position to prove. There is a dearth of authority upon the subject; but the question whether this is a criminal proceeding or not is set at rest by The Queen v. Russell (3 El. & B. 942, s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 173). That was an indictment for the obstruction of a navigation; and Lord Chief Justice Campbell said that it was a criminal proceeding.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I think that the reasoning of the other Judges does not follow Lord Campbell, and I think that they are against you. MELLOR, J.—Surely the defendant was bound not only to give orders, but to see that they were carried out. BLACKBURN, J.—He gives orders to work the quarry, and it is so worked by his servants as to become a nuisance; he would be civilly liable, and why should he not be criminally liable? SHEE, J.—If he is not liable, who is?]

The foreman of the works would be. The King v. Medley (6 Car. & P. 292) ought hardly to be considered as an authority to justify the direction of the learned Judge. Mr. Taylor, in his work on Evidence, 4th edit. 124, says, "This case certainly carries the doctrine to its furthest extent." Indeed, the case differs from the present one in this, that the defendant was able to shew that the work was done without his knowledge and against his intentions. In The King v. Huggins (Ld. Raym. 1574, 1580) it was held that the defendant, who was Warden of the Fleet, was not liable criminally, although he would be civilly, for the acts of his deputy; and in Hearne v. Garton (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 216) this Court decided that the appellant could not be convicted of sending oil of vitriol by railway, if he did so without knowing what the contents of the vessels sent by him were.—They also referred to Whitfield v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 229), The King v. Almon (5 Burr. 2686) Reedie v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (4 Exch. Rep. 244; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 65), The Queen v. the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company (3 Q.B. Rep. 223), The Queen v. the Great North of England Railway Company (9 Q.B. Rep. 315; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 16), The King v. Pedley (1 Ad. & E. 822; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 119), and The Attorney General v. Siddon (1 Cr. & J. 220).

MELLOR, J.—In this case I am of opinion, and in that opinion my Brother Shee concurs, that the direction was right. It is quite true that this, in point of form, was what may be called a criminal process, or criminal procedure; but when you come to look at it in point of substance, one can see no reason why a different rule should prevail, in such an act as this, between proceedings which are civil and proceedings which are criminal. I think that the rule must depend on the nature of the act complained of. I think there may be, and I should be unwilling to decide that there cannot be, acts of nuisance of such a character that the rule I am applying here would not be applicable; but here it is perfectly clear that the only reason for proceeding criminally consists in this,—the nuisance, instead of being a nuisance merely affecting an individual, or one or two individuals, affects a public navigable river, and therefore, in that sense, affects a number of individuals, and therefore, no private individual, without receiving some special injury, could have maintained an action. Then, if the contention to those who say the direction is wrong is to prevail, see the difficulty in getting redress. The object is to get redress and to prevent the recurrence of the nuisance. They cannot proceed by action, but must proceed in the form of an indictment, and then they are to be met by this, "There is no mens rea." You are charging the defendant as a criminal, when, in reality, you have no proof that he actually knew of the act done, or that he actually himself gave orders to the servants not to do a particular act. Still, at the same time, the defendant is perfectly well aware that he finds the capital, and carries on the business; it is carried on for his benefit, and although, from age or infirmity, he does not go near the premises, it is carried on by his sons, or, at all events, by his agents. Under such circumstances, it appears to me that he must necessarily give to the parties all the authority that is incident to the carrying on the business. And it is not because he himself at some time or other had given direction that the works should be so carried on as not to allow the materials to fall into the river, and may have provided some other place for them, when for a considerable time they have been falling into the river and have become prejudicial to the public, that he may not be liable. Under these circumstances it appears to me that all it is necessary to prove is, that this was done in carrying on the works of the quarry. That being so, I think that my Brother Blackburn's direction to the jury was quite right. I quite agree with Mr. Hughes that the authorities are very bare of anything that directly affects the question. In the case to which Mr. Bowen referred us, and in which he relied very much on the observations of Lord Campbell, it may be that the observations of that learned Judge were justified by the circumstances of that case, though, as I understand the case, the judgment of the other Judges did not proceed on the same reasons. It is therefore the opinion of Lord Campbell as applied to that case; and whether there is or not any satisfactory distinction between that case and the present, may be open to question; but it appears to me, if there is no distinction, I should be prepared rather to have acted upon the inferences which influenced the other Judges, than upon those which influenced Lord Campbell. Under these circumstances, being of opinion that the object in this case is not to punish, but really to prevent, the recurrence of this mischief, and to prevent this nuisance from being continued, the prosecution is driven, under the particular circumstances, to an indictment instead of an action. I think that can make no difference as to the evidence necessary to support it. Therefore, this rule, which was obtained against my Brother Blackburn's direction, is discharged. As I have said, my Brother Shee agrees with me in that opinion.

BLACKBURN, J.—I need only say that I see no reason to change the opinion I had at the time of the trial, and I only wish to guard myself against its being supposed that, either at the trial or now, anything was done that infringes upon the rule that the principal is not responsible criminally for the acts of the servant or agent. All that is necessary to say is this, that where a person maintains works by his capital and employs servants, and uses things so that in fact the works are a nuisance, if the circumstances under which he maintains those works are such that for the nuisance an action upon the case would lie by a private person, and if the nuisance includes an injury upon a public right so that a private action would not lie, but the remedy would be by indictment, the same proof that would prove the nuisance so as to entitle a person to recover in the action would prove the nuisance so as to entitle the public to indict. That is all that it is necessary to decide and all that is decided.¹

*Rule discharged.*²

(1) Shee, J. had gone to chambers.

(2) In Michaelmas Term, Bowen asked for leave to appeal, but the Court stated that no appeal could be allowed, as the indictment was a criminal proceeding, to which the power of appeal created by the Common Law Procedure Act did not apply.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 3, 1865.

THE QUEENSHEAD INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY (LIMITED) v. PICKLES
AND ANOTHER.35 L. J. Ex. 1; 3 H. & C. 857; L. R. 1 Ex. 1; 13 L. T. 295; 14 W. R. 30; 11 Jur. N.S. 877.Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 87), section 6.—Action—Parties.

INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY.—The 6th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87. enacts, that "the certificate of registration under that act shall vest in the society all the property that may at the time be vested in any person in trust for the society":—Held, that an action on a bond given to trustees of an industrial society before the act may, after registration under the act, be brought in the name of the newly-incorporated body.

The declaration,—which was on a bond, dated the 8th of June, 1861, by which the obligors, the defendants, bound themselves to the trustees for the time being of the Queenshead Industrial Society, as sureties for the good behaviour of William Pickles while acting as salesman in the service of the society,—contained an averment that "afterwards the said society were duly registered by their then name of the Queenshead Industrial Society (Limited), under and by virtue of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862; and thereupon the Registrar of Friendly Societies of England gave his certificate of such registration; and thereupon the said society became a body corporate by the name described in the said certificate. That thereupon the name of the society became, by due course of law altered, and the plaintiffs then became incorporated by the name whereby they sue in this action; and the plaintiffs further say, that at the time of the giving and issuing of the said certificate of registration as aforesaid, the said bond and causes and rights of action were then vested in the said trustees, in trust for the said society; and thereupon all things and conditions having happened, &c., the same then became and still are vested in the plaintiffs, under and by virtue and in pursuance of the said act."

The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the plaintiffs did not become incorporated as alleged, and that the property in the said bond and the right to maintain an action thereon did not vest in the plaintiffs.

Issue thereon.

The 6th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 87. (the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1862,) enacts, that "the certificate of registration shall vest in the society all the property that may at the time be vested in any person in trust for the society, and all legal proceedings then pending by or against any such trustee or other officers on account of the society, may be prosecuted by or against the society in its registered name without abatement."

The action was tried, at the Leeds Summer Assizes, 1865, before Mellor, J., when a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 100l., with leave for the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that the action was not properly brought in the name of the society.

Manisty now moved accordingly, contending that the action was wrongly brought,—on the authority of Dean v. Mellard (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 19; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 282) and Linton v. the Blakeney Co-operative Industrial Society (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 211). In those cases the question was as to the defendants being sued in the name of their newly-incorporated body, but the same principle is to be applied in this case where the new corporation are plaintiffs; for it cannot be supposed that the statute has provided for the transfer to the new corporation of the rights of the trustees without at the same time transferring their liabilities. In any case, the right of action upon this bond is not "property" within the meaning of the 6th section of the act.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that there should be no rule in this case.

BRAMWELL, B.—The contention on the part of the plaintiffs is, that at the time the action was brought the statute had given them a right to bring in their own name an action upon a bond that had been given to trustees for their benefit. That is denied by the defendants. For my own part, I cannot see any reason why the statute should not give the plaintiffs this right. What reason can there be why the beneficial owners of a thing—I will not call it property—cannot bring the action in their own names? But it is said that we must not interpret the act of parliament according to our notion of what it should be, but according to what it is. And what is it? The 6th section says, "The certificate of registration shall vest in the society all the property that may be at any time vested in any person as trustee for the society." That must mean that it should give them something more than they had before; and on the supposition that before they had an equitable interest, it must be that they should now have a legal interest.

Then we are told that this bond, or the cause of action upon it, is not a "property." Now, "property" is not a term of art, but it is an ordinary English word. It is to be understood in its popular sense, and it is quite certain that "property" includes the debts and claims that a man has upon others, which the law calls "choses in action"; and when one sees that all legal proceedings pending by the trustees are to be continued in the name of the company, it is impossible to suppose that they cannot initiate proceedings in their own name, the property having been vested in them. It is clear that an action brought by the trustees upon a bond before the act might have been continued in the name of the company.

The two cases cited, in my opinion, have no application. If there had been a provision in the statute that the certificate of registration shall impose upon the society all debts formerly due by any person on account of the society, then those two cases would have been in the same situation as the present one is. But there is no such provision. There is no general imposition of liability on the society for the debts due from individuals on account of it, as there is a general vesting of the property in the society.

But I also think that the question arises upon the record, for if this debt is not a property within the statute, it could not vest as alleged in the declaration, which therefore contains an erroneous proposition of law, and ought to have been demurred to, rather than traversed. It seems to me, therefore, that the learned Judge at the trial was quite right in directing the verdict for the plaintiffs, and that the defendant's objection is not a well-founded one.

CHANNELL, B.—I am very much disposed to think that, if there be any objection at all, it is an objection upon the record. To decide the case on that view, however, would be taking a very narrow ground. I think the broader view may be taken, and that this application for a nonsuit should be refused on the merits.

In both the cases cited—Dean v. Mellard (15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 19; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 282) in the Court of Common Pleas, and Linton v. the Blakeney Joint Co-operative Industrial Society (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 211) in this Court—the question arose as to the form in which the societies were sued. I quite concur in the decision, that the language of the 6th section of the act of 1862 is not sufficient to impose a liability on the defendants in those cases to be sued in the name of the new corporation. We are now dealing, however, with quite a different question—the right of the plaintiffs to sue in this particular form. The old company was not a corporation, and the intervention of the trustees was, if not absolutely necessary, at least highly useful. But by the act of 1862, it was intended to transfer the property from the unincorporated company to the incorporated company created by the new act. Then it appears to me that the intervention of such trustees was no longer necessary. It would be putting a very limited construction upon the language of the act to hold that it was intended to transfer to the incorporated company the interest which existed before in the unincorporated company, and was not intended to transfer at the same time all the incidents necessary to give effect to the transfer of the property. I think the effect of the act was to put an end to the trusteeship altogether.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Rule refused.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 18, 1865.

STUBLEY v. THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Ex. 3; 4 H. & C. 83; L. R. 1 Ex. 13; 13 L. T. 376; 14 W. R. 133; 11 Jur. N.S. 954.

Applied, Skelton v. London & North-Western Railway, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 249; L. R. 2 C.P. 631; 16 L. T. 563; 15 W. R. 925 (C.P.).
Observed upon, Clarke v. Midland Railway, 1880, 43 L. T. 381 (Ex. D.).

Railway—Negligence—Level Crossing—Footpath.

CARRIERS. NEGLIGENCE.—The defendants' railway crossed a foot-path on the level close to a station. At a swing gate or turnstile erected by the company for foot passengers, which was some few yards from the line, the view of the line was very confined, but at the point at which a passenger, after passing the swing gate, would step on to the line, there was a clear view of 800 yards in each direction. A woman stepped on to the line immediately after a train had passed in one direction, and was knocked down and killed by another train coming in the opposite direction on the further line of rail. At least thirty-six trains passed the spot every day. There were caution-boards near the crossing, but there was no person stationed there by the railway company to warn passengers of trains being due. A person who was near the spot at the time the deceased was waiting for the first train to pass, called out to warn her that there was another train coming, which she could not see for the passing train, but she did not hear him:—Held, that there was nothing in the circumstances to shew that the railway company were guilty of negligence in not stationing a watchman at the crossing to warn people, or in not taking any other special precaution; and that, therefore, the company were not liable in an action brought by the husband of the deceased.

Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182.—See the next case, commented upon.

This was an action by the husband and administrator of Mary Stubley, deceased.

The declaration stated that the defendants were possessed of a railway which crossed on the level thereof a public highway, and were also possessed of an engine and train of carriages then travelling upon and along the said railway under the care and management of their servants, yet the defendants did not take reasonable and proper care, or use reasonable and proper means for the protection of persons using the said highway where it was so crossed by the said railway, and by their servants drove and managed the said engine and train of carriages upon and along the said railway in a careless and negligent manner, whereby the said Mary Stubley, who was then lawfully using the said highway where it was so crossed by the railway, was knocked down by the engine and train of carriages, and thereby wounded and injured, and by reason of the wounds and injuries thereby occasioned to her afterwards, and within twelve calendar months next before this suit, died.

The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, that the deceased was not using the highway as alleged; and, thirdly, that the railway did not cross the highway as alleged. Issues thereon.

At the trial, before Blackburn, J., at the Leeds Summer Assizes, 1865, the following facts appeared in evidence. Near the Batley Station, between Leeds and Dewsbury, on the defendants' railway, the line crosses a footpath on the level; and this footpath the deceased was using at the time when she met with her death. Before stepping on the line the foot passengers have to pass through a swing gate on a bank some few yards from the railway, and at this gate a person cannot see more than thirty yards along the line in the direction of Leeds, the view being somewhat obstructed by the pier of an arch by which the Great Northern Railway is carried across the defendants' railway; but at the point where a passenger would step on the line after approaching it from the swing gate, there is a clear view of 300 yards up and down the line in either direction.

On the 9th of December, 1864, the deceased, having passed through the swing gate, was seen by one Joseph Dean waiting at the side of the railway till a goods train from Dewsbury to Leeds had passed the crossing; he called out to her twice that there was a train coming in the other direction (which she could not see for the passing train); but she did not hear, and crossed immediately after the goods train had gone by, and was at once knocked down and killed by the express train from Leeds which passed at that moment along the other line of rails.

It was proved that caution-boards were erected near the crossing; also that thirty-six passenger trains passed the spot daily, besides goods and other trains. There was no person stationed there by the company to warn foot passengers of trains being due.

The Judge asked the jury whether, assuming that the law cast upon the defendants the obligation of taking all reasonable precautions, the defendants ought reasonably to have stationed a man at the crossing to warn people of the danger; and, secondly, if they thought that a reasonable precaution, whether the absence of such a man was the cause of the accident. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and Blackburn, J. having reserved leave to move to enter a nonsuit if the Court should think there was no reasonable evidence to go to the jury,—

Overend obtained a rule accordingly, and

Manisty and Kemplay now shewed cause.—There was evidence of negligence in the company in not taking reasonable precautions to protect the public footway, for although the legislature has authorized them to cross it on the level, they are not thereby exempted from their common law liability. If they abuse their privileges so as to endanger life, they are guilty of negligence. In Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 182), where a foot passenger was killed under circumstances very similar to those of the present case, the defendants were held liable. The company must not be allowed to set a trap for the public—see Ford v. the London and South-Western Railway Company (2 Fost. & F. 730), per Erle, C.J. No general rule of law can be laid down as to when the state of things is such as to call for unusual precautions; that must be in each case a question for the jury.

Overend (Maule with him), in support of the rule.—It was the duty of the Judge, if he saw no reasonable evidence of negligence, to tell the jury so. There is no obligation cast upon the company to guard the foot-path. There is a difference in this respect between a footway and a turnpike road. Bilbee's case (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) was that of a carriageway, although the case did not turn upon that.¹ The danger here was obvious, and the case is governed by Wilkinson v. Fairrie (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73). The company used all necessary precautions, and there was nothing undone by them which they ought to have done. They cannot prevent the public from crossing the line. (He was then stopped.)

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case it is said that the learned Judge should not have left the matter to the jury, as if there was any negligence on the part of the company. Now the railway appears to have been in a straight line for 100 yards on either side of the crossing; and we must take it that the legislature saw there was no mischief in allowing a footway to be crossed on a level by the railway at that point. Then there does not appear to me to be anything in the circumstances and the occasion to make it incumbent on the defendants to have a watchman on the spot, or to take any other special precaution, and I therefore think there is no evidence of negligence, and that the rule ought to be made absolute to enter a nonsuit.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is very easy to sue general expressions, and to impute "negligence" (which is the word commonly used) or "wrong" generally to the defendants, and to say that they ought to have had some person stationed for the purpose of actually detaining the deceased when there was imminent danger to her, as one should restrain a person from committing suicide. But let us look at the actual facts of the case, and see whether there is any reason why a person should be placed in danger from the circumstance of the gate being where it is. It is said, that a man standing at the gate (which is on a bank), he cannot see a train unless it is within 30 yards of the level crossing; well, but when at the gate the passenger has to go some yards further down the bank before he reaches the railway, and when he gets on a level with the line, he then, before stepping on the line, as I understand, sees 300 yards in each direction. That is a little more than the sixth of a mile, and a train running at 30 miles an hour would take twenty seconds to traverse the sixth of a mile. Now, having regard to the width of the line, is it necessary that there should have been anybody there to tell the deceased that she would be quite safe if she would only take common caution? Why warn people of that which they can see if they will only take the trouble to look about them? Then, it is said, here the trains are double, and they meet each other at this very point, and therefore there should be somebody to warn people. To warn people to do what? If they will not take the trouble to think, not only on railways, but on ordinary roads, that when on one side of the road they must have their eyes open to what is going on on the other side of the road—if people forget for the moment what they are about, are they to be warned? To me, it seems too much to say that the community at large can, by reason of their own folly and carelessness, impose such a duty on a company. It would be a very mischievous thing if they could do so. The consequence would be that at every part of a railway or a canal or a road, wherever people's improvidence might put them into danger, somebody ought to be stationed to say, "Exercise your common sense, and do not cross, or you will cross at your peril if you do!" I am very much inclined to think that all regulations and provisions framed for the purpose of taking care of people when they ought to take care of themselves, are mischievous.

(1) The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 47. refers to turnpike roads. See note (6) to the next case, page 9.

The deceased, supposing it was all safe when the first train had passed on one side, and without looking to see whether another train was coming on the other, stepped down, as though she believed there was no danger in the way. Now, it is manifest to me that the deceased brought this on herself: not only was there no negligence on the part of the company in this case—nothing wrong; not only was there not anything that they could reasonably have provided with a view of preventing the mischief; but, had the deceased used the ordinary caution that I have suggested, I doubt whether she would have been hurt. I am therefore of opinion that this rule should be made absolute.

I do not treat Bilbee v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) as an authority. I do not mean that it was not rightly decided; but it establishes no precedent, and lays down no principle. The learned Lord Chief Justice there seems to have intended to guard against its being cited as an authority. One can readily understand that if a railway is made with a curve so abrupt that a person cannot see the approach of a train, or if there be a tunnel in a curve, so that one could not see through the tunnel, in such a case a passenger might say, "No care on my part would warn me of the danger." He must stop there for ever unless there is somebody to tell him. That is all the case of Bilbee v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) seems to have decided.

Here it is manifest to me that if this woman would but have waited till the train on the one side had fully passed, she would have had ample opportunity of seeing the train on the other side; it was her own improvident act of stepping down, and, consequently, there was no negligence on the part of the defendants.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that this rule should be made absolute to enter a nonsuit. At the trial the learned Judge's attention was called to the recent case of Bilbee v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182; and the only doubt I have felt is whether our decision might not appear to clash with that authority; but it appears to me that, on the ground stated by my Brother Bramwell, it is not a decision which concludes this case: it does not lay down any distinct principle that we can apply to the present inquiry. I think the question really is this—Was there any evidence of negligence on the part of the company that ought to have been submitted to the jury? I place my judgment on the ground that there was no negligence on the part of the company, and I observe that the Judge (probably pressed with the authority of Bilbee v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182), some circumstances of which case no doubt resembled those in this case) considered it convenient to leave the question to the jury. But I observe the learned Judge most carefully laid down the general rule of law; and without going into more particulars he directs the jury to assume (guarding himself against giving a decided opinion), for the purposes of the case, that such and such might be the law, and then, after the answer of the jury he distinctly reserved the point which remains for our decision.

Now there was on one side of the railway a warning-board; and no complaint is made of the want of a whistle; nor is it suggested the train was going at an improper speed for an express train. It appears to me, under these circumstances, there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the point of negligence.

I take it that a passenger crossing a footpath on a level with the railway would be warned to exercise ordinary and reasonable care, or be expected to look up and down as far as he could, to see whether there was danger or not. If it had not been for the luggage train, I cannot doubt that this woman would have seen the express train coming up; but she crosses immediately the luggage train had passed. The only want of caution alleged is, that the company were wanting in caution in not having a watchman stationed at the place. Now, would a watchman have answered the purpose of preventing this woman going across the line? There was, what was equally useful for the purpose, viz. a person who was near called out to the woman twice, and who is of opinion that if she had heard him and stopped, the accident might have been avoided. If there had been a watchman, I do not see that he could have done any more than the passenger did to avert this calamity; and without at all doubting the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in the case of Bilbee v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182), I think there was not evidence to go to the jury in this case to establish the liability of the railway company.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. The learned Judge seems to have taken great care to sum this case up to the jury, and to leave the questions to them with great accuracy; and as they have found a verdict for the plaintiff, I should be sorry to disturb it if I could see any reasonable evidence on which it could be supported; but I can find none.

The case of Bilbee v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) depended on its own circumstances; and this is another case that must depend upon its own circumstances. Now the suggestion is, that there should have been a watchman in this case. I can only say if we look to what the watchman's duty would have been if he had been there he could not have done more than the only witness in the case for the plaintiff did, viz., call to the deceased twice. He could not have stopped her. She was a deaf woman, and stepped into the danger and met with her death. One cannot help saying that she put herself into the condition of taking her chance of what would happen. Under these circumstances it is perfectly clear that there was no negligence on the part of the company. I should be far from saying that in no case ought they to have a watchman; the circumstances must be exceptional to require it, and if it is a matter left rightly to the jury whether or not they ought to have a watchman, I do not know how that would be sufficient, unless the watchman had authority not only to call out to people, but to take hold of them and stop them; for in the case of a deaf person, calling out would be of no use. I give my judgment in favour of the defendants, because I cannot see a tittle of evidence to shew negligence on their part.

Rule absolute to enter a nonsuit

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 14, 25, 1865.

STAPLEY AND ANOTHER v. LONDON, BRIGHTON & SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Ex. 7; 4 H. & C. 93; L. R. 1 Ex. 21; 13 L. T. 406; 14 W. R. 132; 11 Jur. N.S. 954.

Discussed, Lunt v. London and North Western Railway, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Q.B. 105 (sub nom. Lunn); L. R. 1 Q.B. 277; 14 L. T. 225; 14 W. R. 497 (Q.B.). Distinguished, Skelton v. London and North Western Railway, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 249; L. R. 2 C.P. 631; 16 L. T. 563; 15 W. R. 925. (C.P.). Followed, Wanless v. North Eastern Railway, 1871, L. R. 6 Q.B. 481; 25 L. T. 103 (Ex. Ch.): affirmed, [1874] E. R. A.; 43 L. J. Q.B. 185; L. R. 7 H.L. 12; 30 L. T. 275; 22 W. R. 561 (H.L.).

Railway—Negligence—Level Crossing.

CARRIERS. NEGLIGENCE.—The defendants' railway crossed a highway on a level close to a station. On each side of the railway were gates across the carriageway, and swing gates or turnstiles for foot passengers. By the defendants' rules and regulations the carriage gates were always to be kept closed across the carriageway, except when opened to allow carriages to cross, and they were never to be opened until the gateman had satisfied himself that no train was due or in sight. A foot passenger crossing the railway was killed by an express train which passed through the station without stopping. There was no servant of the defendants at the gate or on the platform of the station. The carriage gate on the side from which the deceased came was seen, after the accident, to be partly open. It had been shut half an hour previously, and there was no evidence of how it came to be open, or whether the deceased came through the carriage gate or through the turnstile. The train was four minutes overdue. There was a curve in the line at the spot, and the train would not be visible to a person standing at the gate till it came within 600 yards. The deceased was deaf. He was in the habit of coming to the station, and knew the times of the trains:—Held, in an action brought by the executors of the deceased, that a foot passenger who found the carriage gate open would be led to believe that no train was due, and that upon the whole case there was some evidence of negligence to be left to the jury.

Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) supported.

In this case the declaration,—after stating the incorporation of the defendants by an act of the 9 & 10 Vict., entitled “An act to consolidate and unite the London and Brighton and the London and Croydon Railway Companies, and the undertakings belonging to them,”—averred that the defendants' railway crossed a certain highway on a level at a place near the Portslade station, to which station there was an approach from the said highway across the railway used by passengers with the knowledge and leave of the defendants. It then stated that the defendants were subject to the provisions relating to level crossings contained in the said act, and the acts incorporated therewith, and alleged neglect of duty on the defendants' part in the management of the railway and the gates erected, as required by the statute, at the crossing, and in not providing a safe access for passengers from the highway to the station, and also negligence in running a train across the highway without giving any notice or signal of its approach. It then alleged that John Stapley, whilst lawfully on his way from the highway through the gates and across the railway to the station, for the purpose of becoming a passenger, was killed by the train; and claimed damages for the plaintiff, as his executors, for the benefit of his widow and son.

The defendants pleaded the general issue, and that the said John Stapley was not lawfully on the railway as alleged.

At the trial, before Pollock, C.B., at the Sittings in London after last Trinity Term, the following facts were proved:

The Portslade station is on the South Coast Railway, between Brighton and Worthing. Close to the station, and on the Brighton side of it, a highway running north and south crosses the line on a level. There are swing gates across the carriage-way, and wicket gates for foot passengers, the wicket-gates being never fastened. The platform of the station, on the south side, slopes down to the level of the roadway, about a yard from the gate, and it is a common practice for persons coming to the station from the north to pass through the wicket gate on the north side of the rail, and cross the line diagonally to the south platform, instead of crossing the line directly and passing out through the wicket-gate on the south side, which involved re-entering the station from the outside. Mr. Stapley, the deceased, was a land agent. He lived at Worthing, and was in the habit of travelling along the line, and was familiar with the Portslade station. On the 3rd of January last, he went from Worthing to Portslade, taking a return ticket. Having transacted his business at Portslade he came back to the station, and was in the act of crossing the line from the north to the platform on the south in the diagonal manner mentioned above, when he was run over and killed by an express train from Brighton, which did not stop at the Portslade station. The deceased was deaf, and was in the habit of walking with his head bent down and his eyes fixed on the ground. The porter, who came on to the platform of the station just before the accident, shouted to him, but he did not hear him. Owing to a curve in the line, a train coming from Brighton was not visible to a person standing at the north gate till it emerged from a bridge about 600 yards distant. The time that it would take an express train to run that distance would be about twenty-eight seconds, about the same time that it would take a person to cross the line. The driver of the train put on the break directly he came through the bridge and saw the deceased, but he did not whistle till just before the buffer of the engine struck him—another step would have placed him in safety. There was no servant of the company at the gates to warn persons wishing to cross that the express train was expected. There was evidence that there had been a man kept at the gates till a few weeks previously, when one of the servants had been killed at the station and his place had not been filled up; and the gateman had been taken away to perform other duties at the station. No one was on the platform when the deceased commenced crossing the line. The swing gate on the north side was partly open, but there was no evidence as to how it came so. The express train left Brighton immediately before the stopping train which Mr. Stapley came to meet, and it was seven or eight minutes behind its time on this occasion.

The by-laws and regulations of the company for the guidance of their servants were called for by the plaintiff and produced at the trial. They contained the following rules:

" 219. Each gateman must look to the working of his own signals, and immediately report to the traffic manager any defect in their working.

" 220. The gate must be kept shut across the carriage road, except when required to be opened to permit of the railway being crossed.

" 225. Whenever it is required to cross the railway the gateman must satisfy himself before opening the gate that no train or engine be due or in sight. He must then shew his stop signals, which must remain exhibited until the line is clear."

The question of negligence was left to the jury, and they found a verdict for the plaintiffs. The amount of damages was by agreement left to be assessed by an arbitrator to be appointed by the parties.

Early in Michaelmas Term—

Bovill obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the learned Judge misdirected the jury, inasmuch as he ought to have told them that there was no evidence of any neglect of duty on the part of the company, and he had not sufficiently left the question of contributory negligence to the jury. Against this rule—

Manisty, Garth and Marshall Griffith shewed cause.—There was ample evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants. There was no man at the gates; the gates were partially open, so as to mislead foot passengers into a belief that it was safe for them to cross; and the engine-driver ought to have whistled on approaching the station. Although the company are by their act of parliament authorized to run trains across this highway on a level, they are not relieved from the common law duty to do all that is necessary to secure the safety of the public. The amount of precaution taken should vary with the danger of the legalized act. There was evidence that it was the custom to have some one on the platform at the station to prevent people from crossing the line when there was danger. In fact, there had been a man kept for that purpose, and it was only after the accidental death of one of the servants at the station that he had been taken off, the company choosing to work the station short-handed. After the accident to Mr. Stapley, a man was placed at the gates. The 225th by-law shews the view taken by the company of their statutory duty. Fawcett v. the York and North Midland Railway Company (16 Q.B. Rep. 610; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 222) confirms this view. There a railway company was held bound to make compensation for the loss of two horses which had strayed on to a high road and through an open gate on the railway where they had been killed, although the only statutory duty on the part of the company was to keep the gate closed so as to prevent horses and cattle "passing along the road" from getting on to the railway. Then, again, the engine-driver ought to have whistled. There was evidence that he did not whistle because it was not the custom to do so. It is no answer to say that the deceased would have heard the noise of the train if he had not been deaf, for all people whether young, thoughtless, old, decrepit or deaf, are entitled to protection.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—But a lame or deaf man ought not to place himself in a position of danger without making extra use of his eyes. This however cannot be a question of law; it is a question for a jury.]

But the company took no precautions. The plaintiffs are not bound to rely on any one particular piece of negligence, with respect to any one precaution which they say ought to have been adopted. It is sufficient for them to shew that the company did nothing at all to prevent accident.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Has not the doctrine laid down in The King v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30) been qualified?]

It has been observed on, but not qualified. It was upheld in the case of *Vaughan v. the Taff Vale Railway Company*¹ where the common law obligations of a railway company were much considered. Although the judgment in the Exchequer was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, and it was decided that there was no negligence on the part of the company, yet, as stated by Willes, J., there was no difference in opinion in point of law between the Court of Exchequer Chamber and the Court below, and the judgments in both Courts support my argument.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The precautions to be taken by the company must be continually increasing, for they are bound to use the latest improvements, whether it be in making their line or fishing the rails, or muffling the chimneys of their engines.]

Everything which is reasonable and practicable must be tried if it tends to the protection of human life. The recent case of Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) is strongly in the plaintiffs' favour, and the circumstances there were very similar to those in this case. The Court of Common Pleas there held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the railway company. [The case of Marfell v. the South Wales Railway Company (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 525; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 315) was also referred to.]

Bovill, Denman and Hannen supported the rule.—The only duty by law cast upon the defendants is their statutory duty.² The plaintiffs cannot point out any particular thing which they can say has been neglected. The fact that the gate was open is no evidence of negligence; and as the gates on the south side were closed the deceased ought to have been led to conclude that a train was expected instead of the reverse. There was no evidence that the company's servants had left the gate open, but only that it was partially open. These gates were never intended for the use of foot-passengers. The drivers of the engines were not in the habit of whistling when they approached the station, because the trains could be seen from the station for at least 600 yards. The company were not bound to have a man at every gate. The man who came on to the platform shouted to the deceased, but he did not hear him. A gate-keeper could have done no more. But the main defence to the action is, that there was contributory negligence on the part of the deceased—Wilkinson v. Farrie (1 Hurl. & C. 633; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 73). The remark made by Erle, C.J., in Cotton v. Wood (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 568; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 333), that it is as much the duty of foot passengers to look out for carriages as of drivers to look out for foot passengers, applies more strongly to railways than to ordinary roads. Bolch v. Smith (7 Hurl. & N. 736; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 201) and Cornman v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (4 Ibid. 781; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 94) are also in point.

(1) 3 Hurl. & N. 743; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 41; and in the Exchequer Chamber 5 Hurl. & N. 679; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 247.

(2) The statutory regulations concerning gates at level crossings are contained in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 45. s. 1, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 55 s. 9 and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 47. They enact that the gates shall be kept shut across the roadway, except when opened for the purpose of allowing horses, cattle, carts and carriages to cross the railway. They apply to gates across the carriage-way only, and make no mention of wicket-gates for persons on foot. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 48, it is enacted that where a railway crosses a turnpike road on a level near a station, trains shall not pass over them at a greater rate of speed than four miles an hour.

The Court reserved their judgment till the argument in the case of Stubley v. the London and North-Western Railway Company (35 L. J. Ex. p. 3) should have been heard; and on the 25th of November judgment was delivered by—

CHANNELL, B.—The application on the part of the company for a new trial in this case was made, first, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the deceased by his own want of care contributed to the accident; and, secondly, on the ground of misdirection, in that the Lord Chief Baron ought to have directed a verdict for the defendant. The rule having been granted, the case came on for argument before the Lord Chief Baron, my Brother Pigott, and myself. My Brother Bramwell was not present, and therefore takes no part in the judgment of the Court. The Lord Chief Baron, my Brother Pigott and myself are of opinion that the rule should be discharged. When the argument closed we took some time to consider, there being another case in the paper which in some respects resembled this.

Upon the points that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the plaintiff by his own negligence contributed to the cause of the accident, the Court entertained no doubt that, if there was any evidence of negligence on the defendants' part, the verdict ought not to be disturbed. But it was strongly argued that there was no evidence that ought to have been left to the jury, and that the Lord Chief Baron ought to have withdrawn the case from their consideration. We are not of that opinion. The case is that the deceased was run down by an express train at the Portslade station, and that the station was, as is very ordinarily the case, at a point where the railway intersected a public carriageway and a public footway. For any other purposes than the present case, I do not make a distinction between a footway and a carriageway, the latter involving the former. The railway crosses the carriageway on a level. On each side of the railway were gates across the carriageway, and it did not appear that these gates were kept fastened or locked. The deceased arrived at the station four minutes after the train was due; and he was crossing the railway at this place in a direct line, making rather towards the station. It was objected that he brought the accident on himself by his own negligence; that he was deaf, and that had he taken more care than a person in the possession of all his faculties would have been bound to do, perhaps the accident would not have happened. That is not, however, in our opinion, a ground for disturbing the verdict as against evidence. It appeared, further, that one of the carriage gates had been opened. It had been seen closed about half an hour before the train came up, but it was open at the time. By the side of the carriage gates on either side of the railway was a swing gate or turnstile, which served for foot passengers who might want to cross the railway at a time when no carriages were about to cross, and when, therefore, the carriage gates might be properly shut. It did not appear who opened the gate, or how it came to be open, nor did it appear exactly whether the deceased came through the open carriage gate, or whether he came through the turnstile. It was argued that any obligation which there might be by statute, or by the rules of the company, to have the gates kept shut, was for the protection of persons with cattle or carriages; and that neither the statute nor the rules had any application to the case of a foot passenger, who was bound to take care of himself. Now the 225th of the printed rules provides that the gate shall only be opened when no train is due or in sight. The gateman was not there. The gate was open. The train was due four minutes before the accident happened. The obligation imposed upon the defendants' servants was that they should keep the gate shut when the train was overdue and not allow carriages and passengers to cross. The view that the Court takes of this case is, that if the carriage gate was left open through the negligence of the company, and there was an implied invitation to cross held out to foot passengers, there was an act of negligence which was properly put before the jury.

The principle on which we desire to act is that laid down in Bilbee v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 584; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182), that although it is the duty of the Court not to impose on railway companies burthens larger than the legislature intended them to bear, and they may not be bound to place men at every gate along the line, yet it may be a duty incumbent on them to do so where there is an immense amount of traffic, or where there are other circumstances which require it. We are of opinion, that upon the whole case there was evidence which the Lord Chief Baron could not properly have withheld from the consideration of the jury, and we think we ought not to interfere with the verdict at which they have arrived.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I entirely concur in what has been said by my Brother Channell, as to his opinion of the question, and I wish merely to add that I ruled at the trial that I could not withdraw from the jury a piece of negligence on the part of the company with reference to the gates opening and shutting upon the carriageway. It seemed to be admitted that if this had been a case, not of a foot passenger, but of a carriage or vehicle which was endeavouring to cross, there would have been a just ground of complaint. But it was urged that the deceased was a foot passenger. The rules and regulations required that at the time of the passing of a train there should be a man at the gate. There was not a man at the gate. The reason of that was that a man had not been appointed specially for that purpose, and that in the absence of the station master, the same person performed the office of station master and gateman. The deceased coming to the spot, looking around him, and seeing no man attending the gate would conclude that no train was due; it was said that he was still bound to look about him, and not to expose himself to peril, but if there was that which amounted to a general direction to everybody, that no train was expected because, by the regulations of the company, if a train had been expected, a man ought to have been there, it cannot be fairly said that the railway company had been guilty of no negligence quoad the gates, and that that circumstance may not have deceived the deceased. I own I am not dissatisfied at the result at which the Court has arrived.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 23, 24, 25, 1865.

SMITH AND ANOTHER v. RIDGWAY.

35 L. J. Ex. 11; L. R. 1 Ex. 46; 4 H. & C. 37; 13 L. T. 561; 14 W. R. 207 (Ex.): affirmed, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Ex. 198; L. R. 1 Ex. 331; 4 H. & C. 577; 14 L. T. 632; 14 W. R. 868; 12 Jur. N.S. 742 (Ex. Ch.).

Referred to, Cuthbert v. Robinson, [1882] E. R. A.; 51 L. J. Ch. 238; 46 L. T. 57; 30 W. R. 366 (Ch. D.); King v. King, 1885, 13 L. R. Ir. 531 (V.C.). See Seal v. Taylor, [1894] E. R. A.; 63 L. J. Ch. 275; [1894] 1 Ch. 316; 70 L. T. 329 (C. A.).

Will, Construction of—Appurtenances—Description.

WILL.—A testator was possessed of buildings used for the manufacture of earthenware, situated partly on the west side and partly on the east side of a street. Originally the buildings on the two sides had formed separate manufactories, but for very many years they had been used together, and occupied by the same tenants, and it would have been necessary to build a chimney and do other repairs to the buildings on the east side, in order to render them available as a separate manufactory. The value of the buildings on the east side was about half that of those on the west. The testator, by a codicil to his will, devised his manufactory on the west side of the street, describing it as in the occupation of A. and B, with the outbuildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, to certain devisees. The buildings on the east side were not specifically mentioned either in the will or codicil, but there was in the will a general devise of all the real property to trustees for sale:—Held, that the buildings on the east side, although at the time forming part of the manufactory in the occupation of A. and B, did not pass under the words of the devise in the codicil, as appurtenant to the manufactory on the west side.

Declaration.—For that Joseph Mayer, since deceased, being seised in fee of and in a certain manufactory, land, buildings and premises, and also of a certain other manufactory, land, buildings and premises, demised the same to Leonard James Abington and the defendant, as tenants, to wit, from year to year, at the rent of 10l. per week, payable weekly by the said Leonard James Abington and the defendant to the said Joseph Mayer for the same; and that the said Leonard James Abington and the defendant thereupon became, and were and continued tenants of the said several manufactories, lands, buildings and premises, upon the terms and at the rent aforesaid; and Joseph Mayer afterwards and during the said tenancy, to wit, on the 28th of June, 1860, died, having, by his last will and testament, devised the first-mentioned manufactory, land, buildings and premises to the plaintiffs and the said Leonard James Abington, so being such tenant as aforesaid, and their heirs in fee; and the defendant and the said Leonard James Abington then, under and by virtue of the said demise and the said will, and not otherwise, continued tenants to the plaintiffs in respect of, that is to say, two undivided third parts of the first-mentioned manufactory, land, buildings and premises, and so continued until and at the time of the accruing of the rent hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 1st of June, 1865, when a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 266l. 13s. 4d., became and was due and owing to the plaintiffs for and in respect of, to wit, two-thirds of such portion of the rent aforesaid as ought to be apportioned to the plaintiffs as to the said first-mentioned manufactory, land, buildings and premises for, to wit, 102 weeks, which had elapsed since the death of the said Joseph Mayer, and before this suit, and whilst the plaintiffs were so seised as aforesaid. And the plaintiffs aver performance of all conditions precedent, and that all things have been done and happened, and that all times have elapsed before this suit necessary and proper to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain this action for the breaches hereinafter in this count mentioned, yet the defendant did not nor would pay the said sum so due as aforesaid to the plaintiffs or any part thereof, but therein wholly made default, and the same is still wholly due, in arrear and unpaid.

Second count—For money payable for the use of messuages, buildings and lands of the plaintiffs, and for money found to be due, on accounts stated.

The pleas traversed all the material allegations in the first count of the declaration and averred payment of the sum claimed. To the money counts there were pleas of never indebted and payment.

The plaintiffs, by their particulars of demand, claimed four-sixths of the weekly rent of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs, as devisees under the will of Joseph Mayer, deceased, for the use and occupation by the defendant of the plaintiffs' four-sixths of the manufactory, consisting of five hovels, slip-kilns, workshop, warehouse, cellars, marl-banks and pools on the east side of High Street, in Hanley, in the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, in the county of Stafford, in the occupation of the defendant for 102 weeks from the 11th of June, 1863, to the 28th of May, 1865, amounting to 226*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

It was proved at the trial, before Bramwell, B., at the Summer Assizes at Liverpool, that, in the year 1860, Joseph Mayer was the owner of buildings used for the manufacture of earthenware, situated partly on the west and partly on the east side of High Street, in the town of Hanley. They had been occupied since the year 1848 by the defendant and Leonard James Abington jointly, as tenants from year to year, under a verbal agreement, at an undivided rent of 520*l.* per annum, payable weekly.

Mayer, by his will, dated the 23rd of April, 1860, devised all his real estate to Leonard James Abington, Paul Smith and Thomas Goddard, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trusts for sale. By a codicil, dated the 26th of June, 1860, after bequeathing various legacies, the testator devised certain tenements to Leonard James Abington and Abner Wedgwood absolutely, as tenants in common. The devise included "My messuages, cottages, manufactory and land on the west side of High Street, in Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of Ridgway and Abington, and others; my messuage on the east side of High Street, in Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of Mrs. Ridgway; my messuage on the east side of High Street in Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of Mrs. Adams; and my five messuages or cottages at the corner of Broom Street, Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of William Chesters and others, all which said messuages, lands, hereditaments and premises are situate in the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent aforesaid, together with the stables, warehouses, outbuildings, yards, gardens and all other rights, members and appurtenances to the said messuages or tenements, lands and hereditaments belonging or appertaining."

The testator died on the 28th of June, 1860. At that time Abington was with the defendant, his partner, in the occupation of the manufactory buildings on both sides of the street in Hanley. He was devisee under the codicil, as tenant in common, with Wedgwood, of the manufactory on the west side of High Street. He was also, according to the contention of the plaintiffs in this action, devisee in trust under the will jointly with the plaintiffs of all the lands and hereditaments not specifically devised by the codicil, including the manufactory buildings on the east side of the High Street.

The defendant refused to pay any rent to the plaintiffs, and the present action was brought to recover a portion of the whole rent payable by the defendant as being due in respect of the buildings on the east side. The principle on which the declaration was framed was, apparently, that the total rent payable by the defendant was to be apportioned to the west and east side buildings, and that, with respect to the latter, the plaintiffs were entitled to two-thirds of the rent, Abington's interest as occupier merging in his reversion as devisee.

Evidence was given for the plaintiffs at the trial that the value of the premises on the east side was about half that of those on the west side. The contention of the defendant was, that although the buildings on the east and west sides of the street had at one time formed distinct manufactories, yet for very many years they had been used as one; that the more important portions of the factory were on the west side, so much so, that the buildings on the east side could not be used separately as a manufactory; and that the testator, when he specifically devised his manufactory on the west side, describing it as in the occupation of Abington and Ridgway, must be taken to have intended to include in that description the buildings on the east side, which, therefore, would be taken out of the general devise in the will to the plaintiffs and Abington as trustees for sale.

The plaintiffs maintained that the chief deficiency of the buildings on the east side consisted in the absence of a slip-house, which, during the period of the joint occupation of the two premises had been suffered to go to decay, the slip-house on the west side being found sufficient for both buildings. They proved, moreover, that the buildings on the east side could be put into working order by repairing the slip-house and building a new chimney.

It was also objected on the part of the defendant that Abington ought to have been joined as a co-plaintiff.

The only question left to the jury was the relative value of the premises on the east and west sides of the street, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for the amount of rent assessed by the jury, the points of law being reserved. A rule nisi having been obtained to enter a non-suit, on the ground that the property in question did not vest in the plaintiffs under the will and codicil of the testator, and that they were not entitled to maintain the action,—

Milward and Baylis shewed cause (Nov. 23, 24).—By a slight alteration the buildings on the east side could be made into a separate manufactory; and being in value one-third of the combined value of the east and west buildings, it cannot be said that they can pass as appurtenant to the other buildings. The appurtenances mentioned in the codicil are those to the messuages and tenements, and not those to the manufactory on the west side. This is a question of parcel or no parcel, and should have been left to the jury if the defendants wished to insist upon it. The only question left to the jury was as to the apportionment of the rent.

W. H. Terrell and Quain supported the rule.—The word “appurtenances” is a most flexible word, and will in a will carry everything used or enjoyed, or usually occupied, with the principal subject of demise—Ongley v. Chambers (1 Bing. 483). Boocher v. Samford (Cro. Eliz. 113) is precisely similar to this case. There a devise of a “tenement with the appurtenances in which H. B. dwelleth in Ebley,” was held to include lands not in Ebley, which for sixty years had been used with the tenement, and were in the occupation of H. B. With respect to description by words pointing to the tenant or occupier, the cases have gone so far that a devise of Blackacre, in the possession of A, will pass Whiteacre, in the possession of A, if an intention that it should pass can be made out. The question of parcel or no parcel is a mixed question of law and fact, and if the question should have been left to the jury in this case, the plaintiffs should have suggested it, as it lay on the plaintiffs to shew that the premises passed to them under the general devise in the will. It was shewn that the occupation of the east was essential to the proper enjoyment of the west. The words, “now in the occupation of Abington and Ridgway,” were applicable to both buildings, and the words “on the west side,” &c. are mere false demonstration. The case of Goodtitle v. Southern (1 M. & S. 299) is similar to this. Griffith v. Penson (9 Jur. N.S. 385) and Webber v. Stanley (16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 698; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 217) are also authorities in the defendant’s favour. Again, the plaintiffs ought to have been nonsuited because of the non-joinder of Abington as a co-plaintiff.—[The case of Badeley v. Vigurs (4 El. & B. 71; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 377) was, however, referred to as deciding this point in the plaintiff's favour, and no further argument took place upon it.]

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court¹ was delivered on the 25th of November by—

POLLOCK, C.B.—In this case the question was on the construction of a will. The testator had a manufactory on the west side and another on the east side of a street. They were two distinct manufactories and were capable of being occupied separately and used separately, but for many years past they had been occupied by the same tenant, who had suffered a chimney to go to decay, so that the smaller manufactory, on the east side, could not be used as a manufactory without being put into a state of repair by constructing a new chimney, or in some other way doing repairs. The manufactory on the east side was of about half the value of the manufactory on the west side, and the testator devised the manufactory on the west side to the claimants, together with all the appurtenances, saying nothing about land occupied with it. There was no necessary connexion between the two sets of buildings, nor was there any such actual connexion between them as there was in the case cited, where land had been purchased and used for a long series of years with the subject of the devise. We are of opinion that this is not a question of parcel or no parcel, but a pure question of construction. Nothing passed under what may be called the body or substance of the devise in the codicil, except the manufactory on the west side of the street, and we think that the manufactory which was situated on the east side cannot be considered to pass as appurtenant to it.

The verdict for the plaintiff must, therefore, stand. The point was reserved, and the parties have an opportunity of appealing, if necessary.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 15, Dec. 5, 1865.

JOHNSON v. BARRATT.

35 L. J. Ex. 15; 4 H. & C. 16; L. R. 1 Ex. 65; 13 L. T. 597; 14 W. R. 194;
11 Jur. N.S. 1028.

Principle applied, Poole v. Willats, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. Q.B. 255; L. R. 4 Q.B. 630; 20 L. T. 1006; 17 W. R. 1009 (Q.B.).

Debtor and Creditor—Deed of Assignment and Composition—Debtor continuing in Possession—Release—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 129, condition 7.

BANKRUPTCY.—By a deed expressed to be made between the defendant of the first part, E. G., on behalf and with the assent of the creditors of the defendant parties thereto, of the second part, and the several persons, &c. "who are creditors of the defendant," of the third part, the defendant covenanted with E. G. and all his said creditors to pay a composition of 5s. in the pound, by two instalments, and assigned all his estate and effects unto the said E. G., with a proviso that until default should be made in payment of the instalments, the defendant should hold and enjoy the estate and effects thereby assigned, and deal with the same without interruption from the said E. G. or any of the creditors; and with another proviso that the said E. G. might at any time enter on the defendant's premises and take an inventory of his effects. There was a further proviso, that in case of default in paying the instalments, the estate should be administered as if the defendant had been adjudicated a bankrupt. In consideration of this the creditors released the defendant from all debts, &c.:—Held, that it was no valid objection to this deed that while it professed to assign all the debtor's effects to the trustee, it at the same time provided for the debtor remaining in possession of his property and dealing with it as he liked. For the 7th condition of the 192nd section does not mean that the debtor's property must be given up; but that if there is property to be given up, it must be given up according to the deed in order that the non-assenting creditors may be bound.

(1) Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B.

Held, also, that the deed was not bad for not reserving the claims against sureties, as it did not appear that there were sureties; or for the release being in consideration of the debtor's covenant only; and that as the release was absolute, a plea setting up the deed was not bad for not averring a tender of the composition.

Declaration on the common indebitatus counts.

The plea, by way of equitable defence, set out a deed made, after the commencement of the action, between the defendant of the first part, Edward Wilson Genever, on behalf of and with the assent of the creditors of the defendant parties thereto, of the second part, and the several persons, companies and firms who were creditors of the defendant of the third part, whereby, after reciting that the defendant had proposed to pay to all his creditors, as well as those who should assent as those who should not assent to or execute the deed, a composition of 5s. in the pound, in satisfaction and discharge of their several debts, by two equal instalments of 2s. 6d. in the pound, in manner following, that is to say, 2s. 6d. in the pound upon or immediately after the date of the registration of the deed, and the remaining 2s. 6d. in the pound in three calendar months after the date of the said registration, the last of such said instalments to be secured by the promissory note of the defendant and of Henry Barratt, bearing date on the day of the registration as aforesaid, and also by the covenant and assignment of the defendant thereafter contained; it was witnessed that the defendant thereby, for himself, his executors and administrators, covenanted with the said Edward Wilson Genever, and to and with all his said creditors, and their and each of their executors, administrators and assigns, that he, the defendant, his executors and administrators, should and would pay to all his said creditors, as well as those who should assent as those who should not assent to or execute the deed, a composition of 5s. in the pound upon their several and respective debts, in the proportions, times and in manner thereafter mentioned, that is to say; 2s. 6d. in the pound upon or immediately after the day of the date of the registration of the deed, and the remaining 2s. 6d. in the pound at the expiration of three calendar months from the time of such registration; the last of such said instalments to be secured by the promissory note of the defendant and of the said Henry Barratt, bearing date and to be delivered to the said creditors on the day of the registration; and it was further witnessed that, for the further and better securing the payment of the said composition of 5s. in the pound as aforesaid, he, the defendant, thereby conveyed and assigned all his estate and effects, both real and personal, of whatsoever nature or kind and wheresoever situate, which then were or thereafter during the continuance of the said deed might come into his possession or to which he might become entitled, whether in possession or reversion, remainder or expectancy, unto the said Edward Wilson Genever absolutely; provided, nevertheless, that until default should be made in payment of the said composition or either of the instalments, in pursuance of the covenant of the defendant hereinbefore contained, it should be lawful for the defendant, his executors, administrators and assigns to hold and peaceably enjoy the real and personal estate and effects thereby conveyed and assigned, or intended so to be, and to use and deal with the same and also to carry on his trade as a tailor and draper without any interruption or disturbance of or from the said E. W. Genever, or by any of his creditors; and it was also agreed and declared that an inventory of all the estate and effects of which the defendant might be possessed at the time of the execution of the deed should be taken by the said E. W. Genever and kept by him, and that the said E. W. Genever should at any time during the continuance of the deed be at liberty to enter into and upon the dwelling-house and premises of the defendant, wherein the said estate and effects might be or be found, to view and compare the same with the said inventory, and to ascertain the decrease or otherwise of such estate and effects, and to report thereon to the creditors, notwithstanding defaults may not have been made in payment of either of the said instalments; but in case default should be made in payment of the said composition or either of the said instalments to either or any of his said creditors, according to the covenant of the defendant, it should be lawful for the said E. W. Genever, his executors, administrators and assigns, to apply and administer all the said estate and effects of the defendant for the benefit of the creditors in like manner as if the defendant had been duly adjudged bankrupt; and it was also witnessed, that in consideration of the said covenant and assignment, the said several and respective creditors of the defendant, by themselves, or by their agents or attornies, thereby for themselves severally and respectively, and for their several and respective heirs, executors and administrators, and their several and respective partner and partners, and not one of them for the acts and deeds of the other or others of them, but each of them for his own acts and his heirs, executors and administrators only, and for the acts and deeds of his partner or partners only, acquitted, released and discharged the defendant, his heirs, executors and administrators, from all debts due to the said creditors respectively, and from all actions and judgments, executions, claims and demands whatsoever in respect thereof.

The plea contained an averment of performance of all the conditions required by the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and alleged that the plaintiff was a creditor of the defendant in respect of the claim pleaded to within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that all conditions having been performed, and all things having happened necessary in in that behalf, the plaintiff became and was bound by the said deed as if he had been a party thereto and had duly executed the same. And that the defendant had always been ready and willing to pay the first instalment of 2s. 6d. in the pound on the amount of the plaintiff's debt and to give the plaintiff the promissory note of himself and the said Henry Barratt for the amount of the second of the said instalments, bearing date the day of the said registration and payable to the plaintiff three months after date, and that he now brought into court the sum of 5l. 18s. 6d., being the full amount of the said instalment, ready to be paid to the plaintiff; and before pleading this plea he tendered to the plaintiff the amount of the said instalment and the said promissory note:

Demurrer and joinder.

Macnamara, in support of the demurrer.—The deed is bad on several grounds. First, it is unreasonable, because it is altogether illusory, inasmuch as, while it purports to be an immediate assignment of all the debtor's property, it provides for the debtor remaining in possession of property until default in payment of the instalments (so that the security of the assignment comes practically to nothing), which is contrary to the 7th condition¹ in the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. No doubt it may be said that no cessio bonorum is necessary—Clapham v. Atkinson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49); but that was the case of a mere deed of composition, and there was there no property comprised in the deed. If the debtor was to have such a power as this deed gives him over his goods, the deed should have been one of inspection, or a mere composition-deed; but when, as here, the deed comprises property, and is a deed of assignment as well as of composition, the trustees cannot evade the statute, which means that bonâ fide and real possession and control are to be given up by the debtor. A colourable possession is no compliance with the statute. Secondly, the deed contains an absolute release without any reservation as against sureties, and it need not appear that there are sureties—Balden v. Pell (33 Ibid. 200) and Woods v. Foote (32 Ibid. Exch. 199). In Keyes v. Elkins (34 Ibid. Q.B. 25), where the deed contained a proviso that the release should not prevent any creditor suing any person other than the debtor, liable to the payment of any security, Crompton, J. said, "It is almost necessary that a deed of this kind must contain a clause reserving the rights against sureties;" and Mellor, J. said, that "if the remedies against sureties be not preserved, I cannot see how, with any degree of fairness, the majority who have claims on the debtor alone, could bind the minority who have also claims against the sureties." Thirdly, the release is in consideration merely of the debtor's covenant; and it is unreasonable that a creditor should release absolutely, without anything in return but a covenant by the debtor to pay, his trustees not entering into any agreement. In deeds hitherto before the Court (as in Fessard v. Mugnier (33 Ibid. C.P. 125),) the release was conditional on the payment of the instalments. Either, therefore, the release here is unreasonable as being absolute, or it must be construed so as not to dispense with the obligation on the part of the debtor to tender the composition; and in the latter case there is a fourth objection to the plea, viz. that the composition has not been tendered according to the deed. There should have been an allegation that it was duly tendered on the day, instead of the averment that the defendant was always ready and willing, &c.—Hazard v. Mare (6 Hurl. & N. 434; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 97) and Fessard v. Mugnier (33 Ibid. C.P. 125). It makes no difference that the plea is pleaded as an equitable one, because relief would only be granted in equity on certain terms, and the plea must therefore be regarded as a legal plea.

(1) This condition is as follows: "Immediately on the execution of the deed by the debtor, possession of all the property comprised therein, of which the debtor can give or order possession, shall be given to the trustees."

Henry James, in support of the plea.—No cessio bonorum is necessary, and notwithstanding the 7th condition in the 192nd section of the act, the deed need not give up anything at all—Clapham v. Atkinson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49), so that the 7th condition is satisfied either without the deed at all in terms creating an assignment, or, if there be an assignment, by its being made in accordance with the deed. In either view the defendant is safe, because of his averment that everything has been done, &c. to render the deed binding on the plaintiff. In all these cases the reasonableness of the deed depends altogether on the absence of inequality between the assenting and the non-assenting creditors; and there is no inequality here. When once the debtor has assigned his property to the trustees, why should they not give it up to him if they think proper to do so? And if they may do so without any special provision in the deed to that effect, à fortiori they may do it when the creditors specially agree to it. Again, if the assignment be illusory on the face of the deed, treat it as a nullity, and then Clapham v. Atkinson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49) applies.—[He was not called upon to argue the other points.]

Macnamara, in reply.

BRAMWELL, B.—We are agreed on all but the first point, that our judgment should be for the defendant. As to there being no reservation as against sureties, it does not appear that there are any sureties; if there are, it should appear that such is the case. As to the release being unreasonable because absolute, it is for the creditors to determine that for themselves; there may be cases where such a release is advisable. The Court cannot say it is unreasonable in point of law. As to the point made on the absence of an allegation of tender of the composition, the answer is, that the release is absolute, so that we are not concerned with the question.

CHANNELL, B.—We cannot supply facts to make the deed appear unreasonable—e. g. that there are sureties against whom no remedies are reserved. There is no inequality shewn here such as makes it unreasonable. Again, the release here is absolute, so that the point as to tender does not arise as it did in Garrod v. Simpson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 70), where there was no actual release in terms in the deed.

PIGOTT, B.—A deed may be unreasonable because it contains imprudent conditions; that is a matter for the creditors themselves to look to; or it may be unreasonable in point of law. In the latter sense I see nothing unreasonable in this deed; and the question as to the tender cannot arise, unless the release is conditional.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I concur with the rest of the Court in the opinion expressed on the points on which they have given judgment.

On the first point—Cur. adv. vult.

BRAMWELL, B. (Dec. 5) delivered the judgment of the Court on the remaining point.—The objection taken to the deed by the plaintiff (as to which we reserved our judgment) was, that although it assigned all the debtor's property and effects to a trustee, yet by the terms of the deed it permitted the debtor to continue in possession of the property until he made a default in payment of the stipulated composition of 5s. in the pound; and it was said this was in direct violation of the 7th condition of the 192nd section of the act, which requires that all the debtor's property should be given up to the trustee. We have come to the conclusion, that the deed is a good one, notwithstanding this objection. It manifestly must be so when it is remembered that there is no occasion to make an assignment of the debtor's property at all. Then, if the debtor's property need not be assigned, the consequence is that none need be given up; and it cannot be that the deed is bad, simply because it gives the creditors a benefit they would not have had if there had been no assignment at all. Therefore, we think the reasonable meaning of the 7th condition of the 192nd section of the act is, that if property is to be given up, then, to make the deed binding upon the non-assenting creditors, it shall be given up in the manner directed; in other words, the debtor shall, in order to have the benefit of the arrangement he has made, keep to that arrangement. Therefore, it seems to us that the objection to this deed is not a good one, and consequently our judgment is for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Error from the Court of Exchequer.)

July 10, 1865.

SUTTON v. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY; AND SUTTON v. THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

35 L. J. Ch. 18; 3 H. & C. 800; 13 L. T. 221; 13 W. R. 1091; 11 Jur. N.S. 879:
affirmed, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. Ex. 177; L. R. 4 H.L. 226;
18 W. R. 92 (H.L.).

Carriers by Railway—Packed Parcels—Charging different Persons different Rates for Carriage—Action—Evidence.

CARRIERS.—The plaintiff, a carrier, was in the habit of collecting small

* Coram Cockburn, C.J., Erle, C.J., Blackburn, J., Byles, J., Keating, J., Mellor, J. and Shee, J.

parcels, putting them together in one large package, and sending them by the defendants' railway, declaring them to be packed parcels. The defendants charged different rates of carriage for different classes of goods, and charged highest for "packed parcels." The company made the plaintiff pay the packed parcel rate of charge. The plaintiff, finding that some other persons who sent packed parcels were charged for them at a less rate, sued the company, in an action for money received to his use, to recover the alleged excess. On the trial, after giving the above general evidence, the plaintiff proved that on a particular day he sent a specific parcel, for which he was charged the packed parcel rate. He also, gave evidence that certain firms were in the habit of sending packed parcels to a very large extent, and that they were not charged at the packed parcel rate, but at a lower rate for the carriage; and he shewed by a person conversant with the business of carriers, that the practice of sending packed parcels had been so general as to be notorious among carriers; and also that on the reference of an action against the company in 1849, evidence of the generality of the practice of sending packed parcels was given in the presence of the company's then solicitor and their traffic manager. The plaintiff further proved that the company required a declaration from him as to the description of his parcels; but asked for no such declaration, and received no such declaration from other firms:—Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Erle, C.J. dissentiente), on a bill of exceptions, that such evidence was admissible; and that there was evidence on which the jury might find that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and also on which they might find that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons.

Held, also, that as no exception had been taken to the form of the action, the jury, if they believed that the defendants had knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon a packed parcel of goods, ought to find a verdict for him.

SUTTON v. THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

In this case error was brought by the defendants, the railway company, on a bill of exceptions, to reverse the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in favour of the plaintiff.

The action was for money received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff, and on accounts stated.

The plea, except as to 50l., was Never indebted. On this the issue was joined.

The 50l. were paid into court, and accepted by the plaintiff in satisfaction of so much of his claim.

The case was tried, before Martin, B., in London, on the 16th of July, 1864. The plaintiff proved that he was a carrier; that his principal place of business was in Aldersgate Street; that he also had places of business at Bath, Gloucester, Bristol, and other places in the west of England, at all of which he had agents; that his principal business was to collect parcels from the wholesale houses, and to pack them together in one package, box or hamper; that he addressed the package to his country agents, and sent it, containing the parcels so packed, to be conveyed by the defendants' railway to his agents; that his agents, upon receiving such package so packed, took the same to their offices, and unpacked and distributed the several inclosed parcels to the various individuals to whom they were addressed; that the defendants did not know, and had nothing to do with the parties by whom, or to whom the inclosed parcels were addressed; that the plaintiff always did the carriage of the goods to the station; that the defendants had nothing to do with the receipt of the parcels in London, or their delivery at their places of consignment, but merely received the package, box, or hamper from the plaintiff at their station in London, and delivered the same entire to his agent to whom it was addressed; and that the plaintiff always paid the defendants for the carriage of the packages, and that his packages were sent by the luggage trains.

The plaintiff further proved that the defendants supplied him with printed forms of declaration for the description of the package and contents of the goods sent, with other particulars. On this form was the following notice:

"All parcels of goods and packages, the contents of which are not properly declared by the senders, will be charged with the highest class; and all such parcels of goods and packages, not exceeding 500 lb. in weight, will be considered as each containing different kinds of articles, and each such parcel of goods and package will accordingly be subject to the regulations relating to 'smalls,' and charged for accordingly."

The plaintiff further proved that when he sent any package containing several parcels of different kinds of goods, he entered the description of it in the declaration as "packed"; that his carman always took such form of declaration as to the nature of the goods so filled up, together with the goods, to the defendants' station, and left it with the defendants, who inserted the weight of the package and the amount to be paid.

The plaintiff further proved that the defendants were in the habit of charging for the carriage of goods according to the nature and description of the goods as classified in the tariff set out below.

Rates from London on Goods and Parcels above 1 cwt., and under 500 lb., by Luggage Trains.

	1.	2.	3.	4.	5.	Class—Packed Parcels.
	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
Bath	21 8	26 8	32 6	37 6	42 6	42 6 and 50 per cent.
Bristol	22 6	27 6	35 0	40 0	45 0	45 0 and 50 per cent.
Exeter	30 0	35 0	40 0	50 0	70 0	70 0 and 50 per cent.
Swansea	33 4	36 8	46 8	51 8	86 8	86 8 and 50 per cent.

Rates from London on Goods and Parcels under 1 cwt.

	28	56	112
	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
Bath	1 0	1 0	1 8
Bristol	—	1 3	2 6
Exeter	—	1 0	1 3
Swansea	1 6	2 0	2 6

Packed Parcels the above and 50 per cent.

The plaintiff further proved that, in the course of the business above described, on the 21st of December, 1861, he sent a hamper, containing various parcels, by the defendants' railway, from London to Bath, which was declared to be packed, and weighed 4 cwt. 1 qr. 20 lb.; that the defendant charged the plaintiff, and that he paid the sum of 14*s.* 2*d.* for the carriage of the above-mentioned hamper, being at the rate expressed in the tariff on packed parcels, viz., 42*s.* 6*d.* per ton and 50 per cent. added, and that the contents of the hamper were drapery and books. The plaintiff further proved that the other parcels sent by him by the defendants' railway to the places mentioned in the tariff, were charged in like manner at the rates set down for packed parcels in the tariff, and such charges were paid by the plaintiff under protest.

The plaintiff did not know the actual contents of any of the packages which he received; but from the business carried on by the parties who delivered them to him, and from the appearance of the packages themselves, he inferred, and the fact was, that the greater part of the goods were drapery goods. It was the plaintiff's habit to put indifferently into one packed parcel all or any of the packages which he received which were addressed to the same town and were of a suitable weight.

The plaintiff, to maintain the affirmation of the issue, called one Gailbard, who proved that he had for many years been manager in the service of a firm, Messrs. Morley & Co., of Wood Street, London, wholesale hosiers and general warehousemen; and the plaintiff then proposed to put to the witness the question,—“Have Messrs. Morley been in the habit of packing or inclosing packages of various descriptions of goods in one large package or hamper?” Whereupon the counsel for the defendants interposed and insisted that the question was inadmissible and irrelevant; but it was held admissible and relevant, and thereupon exception was made to that ruling. The witness then answered the question in the affirmative, and stated that he knew that such packages were made up and sent to Bath and all the large towns; that Messrs. Morley not only sent in one package parcels of various consignees in their due course of business, but also parcels from other tradesmen in London for the same consignees, and occasionally for more than one consignee in the same town; that Messrs. Morley also received inclosures for other tradesmen in London packed in the same way and distributed there; that Messrs. Morley were not paid for inclosing or distributing the parcels, and that the defendants' charges for carriage were the same whether there were inclosures in the parcel or not.

The witness stated, in cross-examination, that Messrs. Morley did not declare the contents of their packages on delivering them to the defendants, and that the defendants never asked the contents; that it was impossible to tell, from the outside of the package, whether they were packed or not; that Messrs. Morley daily sent in their own packages parcels belonging to other houses, sometimes a hundred a day, and produced a book in which they daily entered such parcels sent by them containing many thousands of such entries.

The plaintiff further called as a witness J. Copeland, who, subject to a similar exception, proved that he was in the habit of taking packages of the Messrs. Morley to the defendants' receiving offices in London; that the defendants' clerk then used to ask him what they contained; that he used to declare all goods belonging to Messrs. Morley as drapery; that drapery was the name for those parcels that were packed; that no other question was asked; that there was nothing on the outside by which it could be discovered whether a parcel was packed or not; that Messrs. Morley were always charged for their packages at the fourth-class rate, being the rate appropriated to drapery goods, and never the extra rate of 50 per cent. on any packed parcels; that the defendants were perfectly aware of the practice of Messrs. Morley's house as to packed parcels, and had been so for a long time; that they never charged him the packed parcel rate in his life, and that the plaintiff's packed parcels were exactly similar in appearance to the packages sent by the Messrs. Morley, and were packed alike, and that they sent many parcels by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then called one Hill, superintendent of packages for Messrs. Copestake & Moore, drapers, in London. He stated that he had lived with them thirty years; that they were constantly in the habit of forwarding goods to the extent of 150 to 200 parcels daily; that they received parcels from different houses in the drapery and book trades; that if any one sent them a parcel they took it in; that the defendants sent their cart two or three times a day for the parcels; that this had been the practice ever since he had been in Messrs. Copestake's establishment; that the defendants had never complained of it; that they did it now more than ever; that Messrs. Copestake put most of their parcels into boxes; that the defendants made no inquiries as to whose inclosures were in the boxes, and never complained of having to send inclosures in Messrs. Copestake's boxes. The witness produced vouchers from the defendants, from which it appeared that Messrs. Copestake were charged for their boxes of packed parcels from London to Bath 37s. 6d., being the fourth class in the tariff set forth above, and that the fourth-class rate was also charged them for their packed parcels to the other towns mentioned in the tariff.

The witness further proved that Messrs. Copestake received parcels from their customers in the country containing parcels from different individuals, and that the defendants made no difference in their charges whether the parcels were packed or not. On cross-examination, the witness stated that they also sent out packages not packed, and also received such packages; that the defendants could not tell from the outside whether a package was packed or not; that they sent out from 700 to 1000 packages a day, and that from 50 to 100 of them were packed parcels.

The plaintiff also called one Stanley, who stated that he was in the employ of Messrs. Pawson & Co., of St. Paul's Churchyard, wholesale warehousemen, and had been in their house twenty-five years, and twenty years their manager; that they received parcels hourly to send into the country, 500 to 600 a week; that their practice was the same as had been stated by the previous witnesses, and that they sent all and everything that came, except glass or combustibles, and that they were never charged extra rates for packed parcels. On cross-examination, he stated that no one looking at the packages would know whether they were packed parcels or not.

The plaintiff further called one Goodfellow, who stated that he had been in the employ of Messrs. Morrison, Dillon & Co., of Fore Street, in their packing department, for twenty-eight years, and ever since he had been with them they had sent packed parcels by the defendants' railway a thousand a month.

The plaintiff then tendered evidence that in 1849 certain witnesses gave, in the presence of the then solicitor of the defendants, and of their traffic manager, similar evidence to that above mentioned, of the practice of houses in London packing parcels and sending them by the defendants' railway. After objection by the defendants' counsel that this evidence was inadmissible, it was held that it was good and admissible, and exceptions were made to that ruling.

Thereupon the plaintiff called a witness who proved, that on an arbitration of an action by one Parker, a carrier, against the defendants, evidence of many witnesses was given of similar sending of packed parcels by the defendants' railway, and that no extra charges were made for such packages by the defendants.

The plaintiff then called one Lavington, who had been a carrier and carrier's agent for forty years, and counsel proposed to put to him the question—"Has the practice of packing parcels been notorious during the whole time of your being in business?" After objection by the defendants' counsel that this question was inadmissible, and that it should not be put or answered, it was held and ruled that the question was admissible and the same was allowed to be put; and the said witness then proved that the practice of packing parcels had been for the last forty years notorious among carriers, and the counsel for the defendants then excepted to the said evidence as inadmissible and irrelevant.

The defendants offered no evidence.

The learned Judge (Martin, B.) thereupon directed the jury that the several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the plaintiff were evidence upon which they might find that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and also upon which they might find that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons; and that if the jury believed that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons upon a packed parcel of goods they ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff on the issue aforesaid. Whereupon the counsel for the defendants made their exceptions to the said direction, and further contended that the learned Judge ought to have directed the jury that there was no evidence that parcels were carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and that there was no evidence of the specific contents of any of the plaintiff's parcels from which the jury ought to infer a specific inequality upon any parcels between the rate charged to the plaintiff and to other persons; and that there was no evidence that the defendants knowingly or wilfully charged the plaintiffs more than other persons; and that the learned Judge ought also to have directed the jury that the defendants were at liberty to demand for parcels not exceeding 500 lb. in weight any prices they might think fit, and that there was no sufficient evidence before the jury on which they could find a verdict for the plaintiff. But the learned Judge then refused to alter his said ruling and direction so given as aforesaid, and with the direction aforesaid left the case to the jury; whereupon the jury found their verdict for the plaintiff on the circumstances aforesaid.

The case was argued (May 17 and 18)—

Karslake (Field and Raymond with him), for the plaintiffs in error, the defendants below.—The ruling and direction of the learned Judge are wrong and cannot be supported. The facts of this case are different from those in *Bazendale v. the Great Western Railway Company*¹ which were pressed against the company. By the statute, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. vii. ss. 167, 175, the defendants were empowered to make reasonable charges for the carriage of goods and passengers, and by section 171. to fix such sums to be charged in respect of small parcels not exceeding 500 lb. weight as to them should seem proper. Section 175. provides for charging the same rate per ton per mile equally, and prohibits raising or reducing the charge in favour of or against any particular person. The statute, 2 Vict. c. xxvii. contains a similar enactment respecting equality of charges. The most important statute is the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, which provides that the company, when acting as carriers, may charge such sum (not exceeding the sums, if any, limited by the recited acts), and that either per ton, or per mile, or by bulk, measure, number or admeasurement, or by fixed charges, as they shall think expedient, "provided always, that in whatever way the said charges are made, they shall be made equally to all passengers and to all persons in respect of all animals and of all goods, wares, merchandise, articles, matters and things of a like description and quantity, and conveyed in or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of and over the same distance along the said railways, or either of them, and under the like circumstances, and no reduction or advance in any of such charges shall be made partially, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person." The statute, 10 & 11 Vict. c. cxxvi. s. 53, enacts, that "for the carriage of small parcels (that is to say, parcels not exceeding 500 lb. weight each), the company may demand any sum which they think fit, provided always, that articles sent in large aggregate quantities, although made up of separate parcels, such as bags of sugar, coffee, meal and the like, shall not be deemed small parcels; but such terms shall apply only to single parcels in separate packages." Under this last enactment the company are empowered to charge what sum they please for the carriage of small parcels, unless they are affected by the equality clause of the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, which prohibits the company from charging the plaintiff more than other persons for the carriage of goods of a like description and quantity under the like circumstances. There is no evidence whatever in the case that the company have so acted. There is no proof offered that any parcel of the plaintiff's, for which the packet parcel price was charged, was of a like description with any parcel of any other person for which a less price was charged. Certainly, the goods were not sent under the like circumstances; the plaintiff invariably declared his to be packed parcels, the drapers either declared theirs as drapery or made no declaration at all. Again, there is no proof that the company knowingly made a different charge on the plaintiff from that imposed on other persons. The company would probably have charged all persons as for packed parcels had they been able to prove the fact; but they had no means of ascertaining whether the parcels sent by the great drapers' houses were packed parcels, though they might suspect it. The evidence of the course pursued by the drapers was therefore inadmissible. The company could not refuse to accept a parcel. Further, the evidence of the proceedings in 1849 was inadmissible. It has no bearing on the course of things nearly twenty years afterwards. Even if the plaintiff has been charged less in proportion than some two or three other persons, that would give him no right of action. It may be, as far as the case finds, that all the public but three or four persons are charged as the plaintiff is charged—Crouch v. the Great Northern Railway Company.² Garton v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (1 Best & S. 113; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 273) shews that no action for money had and received will lie in such a case as the present.

⁽¹⁾ 11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 1; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 225: affirmed in error, 16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 137; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197.

J. Brown (Marshall Griffith with him), for the defendant in error, the plaintiff below.—The ruling and direction is perfectly right on all the points. The case of *Bazendale v. the Great Western Railway Company*¹ decides the principle that the equality clause applies to the charging of small parcels. The question is in all cases whether the carrier has been charged more than others. If he has, an action lies; and as was stated in Parker v. the Great Western Railway Company (7 M. & G. 243; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 105: see another action, 11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57), and in Piddington v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 111; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 295), he may recover the exaction in an action for money had and received. Even if a doubt can exist as to the proper form of action, there is no exception touching that point. The equality clause of statute 7 & 8 Vict. applies here. The plaintiff's parcels for which the larger charge has been imposed are of the like description with those of the drapers' houses for which a lower rate of carriage is asked. Both classes of parcels are of the like description as packed parcels; both are delivered under the like circumstances—Edwards v. the Great Western Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 588; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 72). The facts of this case are similar to those in Garton v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (4 Hurl. & N. 33; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 169). In order to shew that the defendants made these different charges knowingly and wilfully, it was necessary to prove the practice of sending packed parcels, and that it was notorious that it was actually done to an immense extent; and that the company asked no questions and took no steps to prevent it, and made no charge as for packed parcels, except in the case of the carriers whose profit they wanted to obtain for themselves. The proof of the proceeding in 1849 was admissible in order to shew directly that the company knew of the practice, and as they have since taken no steps to prevent it, the inference may fairly be drawn that they knowingly permit it, in the case of all persons, except carriers.

Karslake replied.

[SUTTON v. THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.]

This was a writ of error by the railway company, on a bill of exceptions, in a similar action by the same plaintiff, raising similar points to those in the case of Sutton v. the Great Western Railway Company.

(2) 9 Exch. Rep. 556; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 148: see another action, 11 Exch. Rep. 742; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 137.

It was stated by counsel that the only difference between the two cases was that in this case the plaintiff had not declared his parcels to be packed parcels.

Field and F. M. White were for the plaintiffs in error, the railway company, the defendants below.

J. Brown and Marshall Griffith, for the defendant in error, the plaintiff below.

The case was not argued, for it was agreed that it should abide the decision of the case against the Great Western Railway.]

Cur adv. vult.

On the 10th of July the following judgment was delivered by—

ERLE, C.J.—I have the judgment of the Court on the one side and my judgment on the other, and I will read my own first.—In these two cases it appears by the record that the plaintiff employed the defendants as carrying carriers to carry for him on their respective railways packed parcels—a term which is hereafter explained. For each parcel he had been charged the price for the parcel and 50 per cent. extra on that price by the Great Western, and at the rate of 1*d.* per lb. by the South-Eastern, for packing. As between himself and the defendants, these charges were lawful and right; the plaintiff hired the service and had the benefit of it, and paid for it according to contract; but he brought his actions to recover back all that he had paid extra for packing, and he contended that those extra charges were rendered unlawful because the defendants had carried for other persons parcels containing inclosures which, as he alleged, were of like description, and delivered under like circumstances with his packed parcels, and had knowingly and purposely omitted to charge to those persons the extra charge for packing, and had so knowingly and purposely charged to the plaintiff a higher rate than they charged to other persons for goods of the like description and delivered under the like circumstances with his packed parcels.

The learned Judge ruled that the evidence adduced by the plaintiff in support of his affirmation was admissible, and was sufficient to authorize the jury to give their verdict for him, which was done. The defendants made the exceptions to these rulings which appear on the record, and which raise the question whether the verdict can stand according to law.

I am of opinion that it cannot for the following reasons: First, because the charge of 50 per cent. extra for packing is a parcel charge, under section 53. of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. cxxvi., authorizing charges for parcels at discretion, and is not within the operation of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, requiring equality of charge under certain conditions in respect of the charges authorized by that section, and therefore is not rendered unlawful by reason of the alleged inequality. Secondly, because there is no evidence that the defendants ever knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate for any specific parcel than they charged to some other person for some parcel of a like description and quantity delivered under like circumstances; and if there is no evidence that they ever did so in any specific instance, there is no evidence that they did so in a number of instances. Thirdly, because, if the charge for packing is assumed to be within the operation of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, there is no evidence that the conditions under which that section is made to operate have been fulfilled; that is to say, there is no evidence that a charge on the goods of the plaintiff of the like description and quantity with the goods of some other person was unequal to the charge on such goods of that other person in respect of the same carriage. Fourthly, because, if the same assumption be made as lastly mentioned, there is no evidence that such conditions have been fulfilled, that is to say, there is no evidence that the goods of the plaintiff were delivered under like circumstances with the goods of any of the other persons referred to for comparison by the witnesses. Fifthly, because no action lies to recover back part of a charge for carriage lawful in itself, by reason that the same service of carriage has been done for some other person at a lower charge. Sixthly, because inadmissible evidence was admitted, and there was a misdirection thereon.

Before considering these several reasons in their order, with the statutes and evidence relative to them, I would premise some observations on the nature of railway receipts, and in particular, of receipts on account of the carriage of parcels. The law relating to this matter has been so administered as to take away a large portion of their earnings from the companies who earned them, and to grant it to others. The notion that railway companies have a monopoly, and that the evil of this supposed monopoly is mitigated by taking away their earnings and granting them to carriers who had used, or might have used, horse-power, seems to me to underlie this administration. The portion of earnings which has been the main subject of this litigation has been that derived from the carriage of parcels; and the question now before this Court practically is, whether the railway companies shall be allowed by law to keep any share of that portion.

I assume, as a general principle, that the earnings of labour and capital belong to the capitalists and labourers who earn them. The earnings of railway companies depend on demand and supply. Demand for locomotion by steam superseded horses, and induced capitalists to subscribe capital and supply steam. It has been the demand of the public, not the supply of the companies, which is the cause of the transfer of carriage from horses to railways. The competition, which was at first limited by the amount of capital required, and by the necessity of resorting to parliament for a bill, has now become intense; and if this be not admitted, a question of fact is raised, which cannot be answered judicially. The series of cases resting on the imputation of monopoly were reviewed by me in the case of Baxendale v. the Great Western Railway Company,¹ to which case I refer for more detail.

As the amount at stake in the packed parcels question is large, and as the relation of the contending parties does not appear to have been quite understood, I repeat here a part of the remarks which I offered in *Baxendale v. the Great Western Railway Company*¹: "The nature of the business connected with the carriage of parcels may be described as follows: The company, as carriers, have to make the outlay required for the purpose of receiving, carrying and delivering all that may be consigned for each train; and this outlay includes interest on capital, and all the expense by which a train is moved. Profit begins only when the receipts exceed the outlay; and receipts are obtained by supplying the accommodation that is in demand. Receipts for tonnage rates depend on the weight of things classed as tonnage goods. Receipts for parcels depend mainly on the number of consignors, and very slightly on the weight of consignments. The tariff set out in Branley v. the South-Eastern Railway Company (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 63; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 286) exemplifies my meaning. The tariff for parcels there was: under 7 lb., 1s. 6d.; under 14 lb., 2s.; under 28 lb., 2s. 6d.; under 56 lb., 3s.; under 112 lb., 3s. 6d.; packed parcels, double the above amounts. Under this tariff, if two consignors of two parcels, each under 7 lb., consign at the company's office, the company receives 3s.; if they consign at the plaintiff's office, he receives 3s.; and if he ties the two together into one parcel, and consigns it to the company he pays 1s. 6d. to the company, and keeps 1s. 6d. for himself. If the parcels are of the same value, the interceptors will have had added double to the weight and the risk, and taken away half of the pay due to the company according to the tariff. By skilful aggregation, they may increase the weight and the risk to a very great extent, and diminish the pay to the company to a proportionate extent, and keep for themselves the difference between what the company so receives and what is due according to the tariff."

The facts now before the Court confirm the suggestions which were so offered. It appears by them that the plaintiff offers to carry parcels at a lower rate than the companies charge, and when his prices are known, according to ordinary principles, he will intercept all the parcels in respect of which his prices are lower than those of the company. The outlay of the Great Western before a train can start may be measured by millions of pounds for fixed capital, by hundreds of thousands for rolling stock, and by thousands per diem for expenses. There must be receipts enough to indemnify the expense before profit begins. The whole of the service for which the consignor, consigning through the plaintiff, pays money to him, namely, the transport of his parcel from station to station, is done by the Great Western; and although it is confessedly the most lucrative part of their business, yet the gain which they are entitled to under their tariff is taken away from them and given to the intercepting carrier, who has not moved the parcel on the rail one inch, and who may not have invested more capital than the price of a cart, in which he may receive parcels for interception.

Moreover, the railway companies are met by constant checks if they endeavour to get consignments to themselves direct; whereas the interceptors are at perfect liberty either to undersell the companies, or to give favours to consignors, or to obtain custom by any means that rivalry can suggest.

The companies have made various attempts to save some portion of this profit to themselves. In Pickford v. the Grand Junction Railway Company (10 Mee. & W. 399) the attempt was to charge the carrier the parcel price for each parcel in the package; but as the law did not allow the package to be opened for examination, nor compel an answer to questions, this attempt failed. Another attempt of the Grand Junction Railway Company was to charge 1d. per pound, which was there held unreasonable, but seems to be clearly reasonable, and is now adopted by the South-Eastern, as appears on this record, and is perhaps the best redress now practicable. Another attempt was, to charge 50 per cent. on the packed parcel, in addition to the price of a common parcel, which is the course pursued by the Great Western Railway Company now under judgment. This redress they were held to be deprived of in Parker's case (11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57), because they had not done something which it was supposed they ought to have done, whereby they might detect the parcels which have inclosures, and might make the proprietors of such inclosures, when detected, pay the extra price on packed parcels. The attempt of the present defendants so to keep a share of the parcel profit by charging for packed parcels extra is now resisted, on the ground last above mentioned. This is the matter for adjudication, in relation to which these exceptions raise, for the first time, as matter of law, the questions arising on these records.

I come now to the construction of the statutes on which the trial proceeded. The legal right to charge either 50 per cent. extra, or 1d. per pound, not being now in dispute, the objection is, that the right is subject to the condition contained in what has been called the "equality clause," in the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, and that the condition of equality imposed thereby has not been fulfilled. This objection makes the understanding of that statute necessary; and I proceed to inquire what is the true construction of it.

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 48. repeals the sections of two former acts, under which a power of making charges was given, subject to equality clauses, namely, the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. cvii. s. 175, which commanded equality of charge, provided the articles were of a like description, and forbade any reduction or advance partially upon any kind of article (thus raising a doubt whether "description" and "kind" had the same meaning—see Parker v. the Great Western Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57), and also the 2 Vict. c. xxvii. s. 24, which commanded equality of charge, provided the articles were of a like description.

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50. gives the power of charging for carriage of goods other than parcel goods, under which the company now acts. It enacts that it shall be lawful for the company, acting as carriers of goods or things, to charge for carriage either per ton or per mile, or by bulk, number or admeasurement, or by fixed charges, as they shall think expedient. This is the enacting clause; and it is made subject to a proviso for equality, which proviso has no other effect than that of restraining this enacting clause. The words are, " Provided always, that in whatever way the said charges are made, that is, whether per ton or per mile, or by bulk, number or admeasurement, or by fixed charges, they shall be made equally to all persons: first, in respect of all goods and things of a like description and quantity; secondly, conveyed by a like carriage; thirdly, passing along the same distance; and, fourthly, delivered under like circumstances, and no reduction or advance of any of such charges shall be made partially, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular person." The 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50. thus commands equality of charges provided, inter alia, the articles of a like description and quantity. The addition of " quantity " and " description " in the amended clause throws light on the construction of " description." The facts relied on to establish that there has been the inequality forbidden by the statute must shew that the goods in the two consignments are not only of a like description, but also of a like quantity. The effect of the section, then, is this: When the company use the power created thereby for charging for the carriage of goods, they break the condition on which that power is granted, if it is proved, first, that they have carried two consignments of goods from two persons respectively; secondly, that the goods consigned by each were of like description and quantity; thirdly, that they were carried the same distance, by a like engine; and, fourthly, that they were delivered under like circumstances. The case, at the trial, and the exceptions, relate only to the second and fourth conditions, and I pass by the part of the section relating to reduction and advance made partially, because it is irrelevant to these exceptions.

In construing this section, with reference to this case, I have to say what is the meaning of the word " description." When are the goods in two consignments of like description? when are they delivered under like circumstances? In my opinion the word " description " means a quantity of matter inherent in the goods to be ascertained by the senses, according to which the consignment is to be placed in a class, such as the mineral, the provision, or the drapery class. The quantity means number, weight or measure, also to be ascertained by the senses. Where the charge depends on description and quantity at the tonnage rate, ownership of goods is no element of charge. But carriers have always had two rates of charge: the tonnage rate and the parcel rate, as above explained. The legislature intended that railway companies should also have the same two rates of charges, and has constantly enacted that the company should have a discretionary power in charging for parcels; and, notably, as regards the Great Western, the 10 & 11 Vict. c. cxxvi. s. 53. enacted, that the company may demand any sum they may think fit for packages not exceeding 5 cwt. notwithstanding the rates for other articles.

As ownership of the goods is not cognizable by the senses of any examiner of the goods themselves, the right of the company to enforce payment on account of separate ownership has been constantly evaded, by two or more consignors combining for that purpose; and if they willed to deceive, detection was difficult. It was for this, among other reasons, that the legislature gave discretionary power to the company to charge for parcels as they should think fit. In the exercise of this discretion, I do not say that they would be justified in reducing or advancing charges partially in favour of or against any particular person. No such point arises here. When that shall be the alleged cause of action, and the evidence shall raise the question of the motive for the unequal charge, whether it was done out of partiality to a customer, or in the lawful protection of their own rights, the decision will turn on different considerations than those which are to govern in deciding on the exceptions now before us, relating first to likeness of description and quantity, and, secondly, to likeness of circumstances of delivery.

Upon this bill of exceptions it is very material to distinguish charges under the 50th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, subject to a condition, from parcel charges, under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. s. 58, whereby alone the extra charge for packing is made lawful, and which extra charge is not within that section authorizing charges to be made per ton or per mile, or by bulk, number, measure or fixed charge, and cannot be brought within the condition for equality of charge, in the 50th section, in respect of goods of like description and quantity. The parcel charge is in part, and may be entirely, irrespective both of the description of the goods and of their quantity.

The tariffs of all the railway companies charge for parcels under 1 cwt., without any reference whatever to the description of the goods contained in the parcel, and with very small reference to the weight of it. Above 1 cwt. and under 5 cwt. the parcel charge of the Great Western Railway on the first four classes of goods is compounded of separate ownership, description and quantity. Still, though the charge between 1 and 5 cwt. is thus compounded, it is clearly made under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. for parcels, and not under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. for tonnage. It is certain that the company have the same discretional power in respect of parcels over 1 cwt. as over parcels under 1 cwt., and might fix the charge either entirely on separate ownership, or on a compound of that with other elements of charge.

The charge on goods placed in the fifth class by reason of defect in the declaration made by the consignor, and the charge on goods called "packed parcels" by the Great Western, and "parcels tied together" or "packed in lump" by the South-Eastern, depend on the act of the consignor, either in omitting to declare, or in packing the goods. This charge depends in no degree on the charging per ton, or per mile, or in bulk, &c., nor on the description and quantity of the goods themselves.

The tariff making a charge either for packing or for improper declaration of description, cannot truly be said to create a "description" of goods to which the proviso in the 50th section (for equality) can be applied, both because the proviso only limits the charge authorized by that enactment, and the charge for parcels is not authorized thereby, and because the proviso against inequality can only be applied where the two consignments compared for inequality have all the four conditions above explained; and the notion that every parcel charged for packing becomes of a like description with every other parcel so charged is not sound; but the notion that it also becomes of like quantity for that reason, though one parcel may be 4 cwt. and the other 40 lb., is still more unfounded. The 50th section, limiting the power of charging by the proviso for equality, was intended to be so worded as to protect the company from vexation on account of vague suggestions of equality, and it has, therefore, defined the four conditions under which alone any apparent inequality in amount can be truly said to be an inequality contrary to the proviso.

The intention of the railway company to secure a portion of the parcel profit would be effected if the tariff was thus expressed: "Consignors who pack or lump parcels together, contrary to the regulations relating to parcels, will be charged either for the number of parcels combined, at the parcel rate for each, or, if the number is not known, then at either 1d. per pound or at 50 per cent. extra on the price of a single parcel at the option of the company."

These three forms of charging have existed as above mentioned. It seems to me wrong to say that such a tariff creates a description of goods, in respect of which description the company is bound to charge equally for goods of the like description and quantity. There may be two packages containing the same description and quantity of goods, say 2 cwt. of drapery parcels, and yet the charge may be unequal lawfully, if the consignor of one should not make and the other should make a proper declaration, or if the consignor of one should and the other should not pack smaller parcels of drapery, belonging to different owners, in one great parcel.

This mode of charging extra is in truth an attempted remedy against the evasion of the payment of the lawful charge for each separate consignment.

It is a remedy which the legislature intended to place at the discretion of the company when it granted to them discretionary power to charge for parcels, and this remedy they ought to be allowed to use at their discretion for the bona fide protection of their lawful interest.

The intention of the legislature to secure this remedy to the companies is further apparent in the 50th section, which does not command equality of charge unless the goods be delivered under the like circumstances. The likeness of the set of circumstances attending on two deliveries of two parcels depends on the circumstances of the conduct of the consignor in delivering, material for the interest of the carrier. If one consignor does not declare properly or makes inclosures to evade payment, and another consignor delivers without either of these circumstances, the two consignors have not delivered under like circumstances.

These considerations are entitled to more weight, if the vast difference to the interest of the company between a packed parcel of a professional interceptor, containing, perhaps, a hundred smaller parcels of all descriptions of goods, and a package with one inclosure for a neighbour, is considered. If it be a principle of law that goods in all inclosing parcels are necessarily of a like description and quantity with the goods in all packed parcels, and delivered under like circumstances, this principle must be carried out without respect of persons, and it is wrong to say that an inclosing parcel from a wholesale house carries with it any different legal incidents from the inclosing parcel of a single individual; and yet to me it seems unreasonable to hold that the packed parcel of the carriers and the package inclosing things for two neighbours are of like description and delivered under like circumstances in relation to the carrier's interest, within the statute, and that the railway company forfeit their right to charge extra for the packed parcel, unless they charge also for the inclosure. I think that it would be wrong so to hold.

Furthermore, as to two such deliveries being under like circumstances, I say that the company are to be the sole Judges whether the circumstances materially differ in their effect on their interest as carriers; and if they judge bona fide that the circumstances differ, and there is reason for that judgment, the circumstances are not like. The railway company ought not to be compelled to detect and notice the package of things of a trifling nature and charge a few pence extra, upon pain, in case of failure so to do, to forfeit parcel profits, amounting, it may be, to thousands of pounds, to intercepting carriers who do as they like in this respect.

In this discussion of the effect of the two statutes, 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi, I have brought forward all the arguments on which I rely to maintain my first point, namely, that the charge of 50 per cent. extra for packing is lawful under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. s. 53, authorizing a discretionary charge for parcels, and is not within the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, requiring equality of charge under certain conditions relating to the charges authorized by that section, and is not rendered unlawful by reason of the alleged inequality. If this point is good, there was no evidence of any cause of action, and the exception to the direction of the Judge must prevail.

The second question is, was there any evidence that the defendants ever in any specific instance knowingly and intentionally charged the plaintiff at a higher rate for his parcel than they charged to any other person for a parcel of a like description delivered under like circumstances? My answer is in the negative; and if it is assumed, while discussing this question, that the parcels of the wholesale houses containing inclosures are of the same description, and delivered under the like circumstances with the packed parcels of the plaintiff,—which I think I shall disprove,—still I say there was no evidence to support the verdict that the defendants knowingly and purposely made unequal charges contrary to the statute. The whole of the evidence consists of a general description of a course and practice of business running over many years, without a single instance of a comparison between a parcel of the plaintiff with a parcel of any other person shewing an overcharge to have been made. There is no evidence that the defendants knew or had the means of knowing, in respect of any specific parcel, that it had an inclosure, and so was liable to extra charge. The plaintiff's demand against the Great Western was said to be 1,000*l.* paid for the extra charge for packing. The only specific instance in evidence is, on the 21st of December, 1861, of 14*s.* 2*d.* on a hamper, whereof about 2*s.* appeared to be charged for packing; and taking that for an average sample the plaintiff would have sent 10,000 packed parcels between that day and the commencement of the action to make up his 1,000*l.* I gather from the record that not one of these consignments was from the plaintiff of his own goods; but all were from consignors consigning through him to the railway for carriage thereon small parcels, which the plaintiff made into aggregates by hampers and the like, without knowing anything of their contents. Upon each of these parcels he calls on the defendants to refund the extra charge, though he knew their terms, and declared the packing, and had the service performed which he contracted for.

Then, what is the evidence that the defendants knowingly charged any other customer less than the plaintiff for a packed parcel?

Witnesses stated that the wholesale houses in general, and Morley's, Copestake's, Morrison's and Pawson's in particular, are in the habit of saving carriage for each other, and for other persons, by inclosing packages, when any two or more of them are sending from London to the same station. These firms are said to be of the highest respectability, and I therefore limit my language to saying that this is a wrong to the railway companies. The railway company charges for separate ownership, as above explained, that is, for the accommodation offered to each owner to carry his parcel for him at the time he requires; and the combination of two customers to represent a parcel as belonging to one owner, which really belongs to many, and so to get service without paying for it at the stipulated price, would be thought unfair, at least towards anybody but the railway companies. Against them it is done, and deposed to, and boasted of, seemingly, as a great accommodation.

The evidence shews that the parcels from Messrs. Morley's must be counted by hundreds of thousands per annum. Of these, some had inclosures, but in what proportion did not appear. The company, it was said, were aware of the practice and made no charge. But there is no evidence that the company ever were enabled to distinguish a parcel with inclosures from one without it. The assumption that the company had any knowledge within the meaning of the direction to the jury is unfounded. Also, the assumption that the company omitted inquiry which they lawfully might or, by law, ought to have made is, as I read the evidence, unfounded. I am aware that one of the witnesses from Morley's (Gaillard) said the company never asked a question; but the other (Copeland) said the clerk at the railway always asked what the goods were, and that he always declared them "drapery." No other witnesses that I notice speaks of inquiry either affirmatively or negatively; but the declaration must have been made either expressly or impliedly, because the charge of class must be according to declaration. The rest of the evidence is of the same description, except that the witness from Copestake's gave the important addition of stating the proportion of parcels with inclosures from other owners to parcels containing their own goods simply. He stated that the number of their parcels per diem was between 700 and 1,000, and that of these the proportion of parcels with inclosures was from 50 to 100. He also said that the company could not tell from the outside whether a parcel had an inclosure or not.

Each of these four houses appear to have sent from 50,000 to 100,000 consignments in a year; countless parcels were also proved to have been sent from other houses, of which some contained inclosures. The railway company knew of the practice, and there was no instance of their demanding payment for it. I think this is no evidence that the defendants ever knowingly charged more for any specific parcel of the plaintiff's than for any specific parcel for any other person having an inclosure, because it was impossible to distinguish the parcels with inclosures from those that were without any; and the defendants are not allowed by law to take any effective steps for ascertaining which have inclosures and which have none. They may not open any package, and they have no right to compel an answer beyond requiring a declaration. It cannot be laid down, as matter of law, that they have a duty to inquire after inclosures or any other source of loss. If it is proposed, as a matter of prudence, that they should inquire, it seems to me to be not well founded. If they attempted to inquire, are they to make inquiries of the porters of all wholesale houses that offer parcels? If so, why not of other houses, and of everybody? Is the carman of the collecting clerk to inquire of the porter who delivers the parcels, or are the companies to search out witnesses to betray the packing carried on by their employers? None of these courses are, in my opinion, consistent with prudence, none are a practicable remedy; some would bring censure, each would cause loss.

The wholesale houses and the other witnesses avow, without compunction or misgiving, that they get as much carriage for as little money as can be managed. It may be that there are no means in the law to prevent this practice; but it is wrong to say that the companies knowingly charged less to Messrs. Morley and the three other houses than to the plaintiff, because, out of hundreds of thousands of parcels conveyed by them in a year, the company did not, by some unknown intuitive process, detect the 10,000 or 20,000 which had inclosures and make an extra charge thereon. No one has suggested any method by which the charge could have been put on any specific parcel. If the company stopped them, all their business would be ruined, and they would fail in numberless actions; and if they stopped some parcels by hazard, it would be culpable imprudence; and the omission to resort to such attempts is no evidence of what may be called the scienter in the overcharge.

The importance of requiring evidence of inequality in respect of specific parcels, and the danger of deception from relying on general evidence of habit and practice, is, to my mind, made more apparent from the direction to the jury. The direction was that there was evidence for the jury that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description and under like circumstances at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons, and, if they knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon a packed parcel of goods, they should find for the plaintiff. I say that the liability to deception from dealing in generals is exemplified in this direction. The defendants know of the increasing prevalence of the practice of inclosing and packing, and that in every goods train there probably are hundreds of parcels with inclosures for which they have not made an extra charge, and that they have made an extra charge for all the packed parcels which were declared. In this way they have knowingly charged the plaintiff more than other persons for packed parcels. But, though they knowingly did this, they never knowingly made an unequal charge in respect of any specific parcels when they had the means of knowing which were packed. The parcels of the plaintiff are declared; the parcels of others are, some packed and some not; and the distinction is purposely concealed. The company cannot distinguish which are liable, and charge none, though they know that some ought to be charged if they found them out.

The jury, in answer to that direction, might take the parcels of the plaintiff to be parcels of one person, and the parcels of other persons, as a class, to be the parcels of another person, and might find that the defendants knew that among the parcels of the other persons some were packed and not charged. But in so doing, they do not find that the defendants knew of any specific parcel on which they could make the charge. Upon this examination of the evidence, I am of opinion that there was no evidence that the defendants knowingly made an unequal charge in respect of any specific parcels, and that the knowledge of the inequality in the general way, without knowledge of the specific parcels, was no knowledge of an unequal charge, and that the direction founded on that evidence was wrong.

The third question is, was there any evidence that a charge on goods of the plaintiff of a like description and quantity with the goods of some other person was unequal to the charge on such goods of that other person, in respect of the same carriage? My answer is in the negative. There is no attempt to shew a comparison between the description and quantity of the goods in the plaintiff's parcels, and of the goods in the parcels of the other persons referred to, further than a loose general suggestion that the prevailing commodity in the parcels of the wholesale houses was drapery, and that a majority of the parcels sent to the plaintiff by unknown persons, containing unknown goods, did contain a large proportion of drapery. The evidence of quantity is vague in the same degree. It is perhaps true that each party had to pay for weight according to the tariff, and that, if no extra charge had been made for packing, the charges would have been on an equal scale. In my opinion, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. was intended, as above suggested, to protect the railway companies from liability in respect of vague suggestions of inequality of charge, and it therefore required that the party complaining should prove two specific packages of comparison, and should shew likeness of description of the goods in each, and in the quantity of goods, and that the charges were unequal. No such evidence was given. That which was given does not relate to the description or quantity of the goods, but shews that a charge was made for packing to the plaintiff, and was not made for inclosing to the other persons; and that the packing process is imagined to have a similarity to the inclosing process, and that imaginary similarity between the two processes is laid down to be evidence that the goods were of like description and quantity; it would not be more contrary to the statute to hold, that all goods covered with the same material for wrapper were therefore of a like description and quantity. I think, further, that there was evidence to shew that the extra charge which created the supposed inequality was a charge on the act of the consignor in packing, and was a charge entirely irrespective of the description and quantity of the goods packed, and was a charge which was lawful by the statute authorizing charge on parcels as above explained. If the construction of the statute above set forth is correct, the defendants had a right to charge for packing or lumping together, and were not bound to charge for inclosing provided that, in the exercise of a fair discretion for the purpose of protecting their lawful rights, they chose not to do so. I further say, that the question of partiality is not raised on this trial, but that the case proceeded on the allegation that the goods of the two parties were of like description and quantity, and that the charge for the same service was unequal.

The learned Judge assumed in his summing up, that every parcel with an inclosure is, by law, of a like description with a packed parcel. He assumed it to be law, that if two parcels have this quality in common, that each contained an inclosure, they were of like description. Probably he relied on the decision to that effect in the case of Parker v. the Great Western Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57). It was there decided that the intercepting carrier was not liable to the charge of 50 per cent. on account of packing; the case stating that the general practice of sending inclosures was known to the defendants, and that they had not taken any measures to prevent it or discover individual instances of it. The ground of the decision is given by Mr. Justice Maule, at page 571. "It seems," says that learned Judge, "unreasonable to say, that, if a man sends in one parcel goods belonging to A, B. and C, the company shall be permitted to charge more for the carriage than if the whole were carried for one person. The real object, no doubt, was, to overcharge the carrier, in order to absorb all the carrying business to themselves. They had no right to do this. They are bound to do the same work at the same price for carriers as for other people." The reasoning so put forward has been adopted in subsequent cases in Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction. In a Court of Error I am at liberty to deny its soundness, in so far as it is founded on the notion either that the company cannot lawfully charge more than a sum proportioned to the weight of the article and their labour in carrying it, or that they cannot charge more for many separate parcels than for one aggregate, the weights of the many and the one parcel being the same. Upon this point I have already fully explained my meaning.

The other reason assigned by the learned Judge for deciding against the company, namely, the imputation of a purpose to absorb all the carrying business to themselves, by overcharging carriers, seems to me equally unsatisfactory. It is, in a manner, certain, and the companies must do all the carrying, and, in that sense, must absorb all the carriage. But the carriage is not their object, unless they are to be paid for it. If truth were spoken, ought it not to have been said that the real object of the intercepting carrier is, to absorb so much of the earnings for carriage as he can intercept; and that the contest is, whether the companies should be allowed to keep the small portion of those earnings denoted by a charge of 50 per cent. on packed parcels?

The decisions adverted to were all pronounced when railway companies were a new institution, and their nature was not understood, and when they were regarded with much jealousy. They are now absolutely subjected to the control of the law more than any other company investing capital in trade for profit. If they kept their own earnings, their profits would go, first, in increasing accommodation, because in so doing they would probably increase their own profits; then in increasing dividends for themselves; and, lastly, in reducing fares. Such use would be better for the community than giving to others what is earned by the railways.

The decision in Parker's case (11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57) turned upon the particular facts stated in the special case, and did not relate to the meaning of "description" and "quantity" in the equality clause; and in this Court, I submit, it ought not to be followed.

For these reasons I am of opinion that there was no evidence that the parcels charged unequally contained goods of "a like description," and certainly none that the goods were of "like quantity," which is quite as material, if the statute has the meaning above attributed to it; and that the exception to the ruling on this point ought to prevail.

The fourth question is, whether there is any evidence that either of the parcels of the plaintiff was delivered under like circumstances with either of the parcels of the other persons referred to by the witnesses, and supposed by them to be overcharged? I think not. The circumstances must be like for carrying purposes. The difference of the circumstances of the two deliveries is, that the plaintiff's parcels were always declared to be packed; the parcels of the other consignors were never declared to be so. The plaintiff admits his liability to the charge. The other consignors intend to evade the charge, and do not disclose which of their parcels have inclosures and which have not. In the one case the charge of 2s. is offered; in the other case an attempt to enforce payment of it would probably lead to the loss of hundreds of pounds in litigation, and drive away consignments to the rival railways, or to the interceptors.

The question whether a delivery of a packed parcel by an intercepting carrier was under the "like circumstances" with a delivery of a parcel with inclosures, was before the Court of Common Pleas in Edwards v. the Great Western Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 588; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 72), and decided in the affirmative; but it was decided by reference to the interest of the carrier in respect of the scale-bills there in evidence. The point whether the delivery of a parcel, with a declaration of its being packed, is not, under circumstances differing in a very important degree for carrying parcels from the delivery without any such declaration, was not before the Court, and was not there considered.

The remarks upon Parker's case (11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57), last above mentioned, are applicable to The case of Edwards (11 Com. B. Rep. 588; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 72), the assignee in his bankruptcy; and I refer to them, instead of repeating them. For these reasons, I submit, that there is no evidence for the jury that the circumstances of the delivery of any two parcels were like, within the statute; and none which authorized the direction to the jury thereon which was excepted to.

I think no action lies to recover back part of a charge for carriage lawful in itself, by reason that the same service of carriage has been done for some other person at a lower charge. If the plaintiff has received the service he contracted for, and has paid the contract price, and no more, he has no cause of action in respect of his contract, either in form ex contractu or ex delicto,—not on the contract, for it has been performed on both sides; not for the breach of duty towards himself, for every such duty has been fulfilled. If the plaintiff pays no more than is right, I cannot see how he is damnified because some stranger has paid less than was the right of the defendants, according to law. If the company chose to carry for nothing goods going to or from a national exhibition—as in 1851—other customers sending goods for their own purposes do not thereby acquire a right to have their goods carried for nothing. If the company chose to carry free all reporters going to a horse-race, as in Harrison v. the Great Northern Railway Company (10 Exch. Rep. 376; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 308), none of the passengers going by the same train would thereby acquire a right to the return of their fares, in whole or in part, by reason of this exemption of the reporters.

Before deciding that undercharge is an actionable wrong towards those who have paid the fair charge, the Court should be able to define when it occurs, in respect of what train, under what circumstances, and what is the form of action which is supposed to lie. It seems to me clear, that no action for money had and received could lie. The plaintiff has had the consideration according to contract. It is not money unlawfully exacted; for, at the time, it was lawfully demanded.

The decision in *Baxendale v. the Great Western Railway Company*¹ was on a different ground. There, the action was adjudged to lie for money paid for cartage, which the Court decided had not been performed for the plaintiff; it was, therefore, money paid on a consideration which had failed. This action is for an alleged breach of duty, in charging less to some other persons than to the plaintiff for services supposed to be rendered under the four conditions in the equality clause (7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50). It seems to me to have no analogy to a claim for money to be returned because the consideration has failed. It seems to me that there is no cause for action at all, without making allegations for which there is no foundation, such as an obstruction of the plaintiff's rights; and the Court, assuming to make an amendment in the pleadings, cannot assume any facts not in evidence, to create a cause of action to which the summing-up did not apply. The opinion of Mr. Justice Hill, Mr. Justice Crompton and Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in Garton v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (4 Hurl. & N. 33; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 169), is sound in law and in point to prove that no action will lie merely because some other customer has had the same service as the plaintiff, at a less price. The plaintiff is not overcharged because some stranger is undercharged; and this opinion is not overruled in Baxendale v. the Great Western Railway Company,¹ which is not relevant to the point, for the reason above mentioned. I think that evidence was admitted which was not admissible, assuming that the proper question was, whether the defendants had knowingly and purposely charged more to the plaintiff in respect of any of the parcels comprised within his complaint than they had charged to some other person for a parcel of like description and quantity, under like circumstances. The general practice of others, and knowledge of such general practice, was no evidence of knowledge in respect of any specific parcels, for the reasons before alleged. The reception of such evidence was the ground of exception; and I think that the evidence ought to have been rejected, or that the jury ought to have been told that it was not sufficient for them to found their verdict on. Still less was the evidence of the practice in 1849, and also evidence of the notoriety of the practice among carriers, admissible, to shew knowledge in 1863 and 1864.

It is probably certain from the evidence that carriers have been deprived of their lawful charges, by packing, inclosing, and other such contrivances, as far back as carriers' memory can go, universally by the unscrupulous: but that is no evidence that they have charged unequally in any specific instance; and, unless there was evidence of an actionable overcharge in one instance, there was none to prove many. For these reasons, my judgment is for the appellants in each case.

It now devolves upon me to read the judgment of the rest of my Brethren. This is the judgment of my Brothers Blackburn, Byles, Keating, Mellor and Shee. The Lord Chief Justice has not signed it; but as it was sent to him, I take it he concurs in it.

In this case the questions we have to determine are raised on a bill of exceptions. The exceptions are four. The three first are exceptions to the reception of evidence; the last is an exception to the Judge's direction that there was evidence on which the jury might find "that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons, containing goods of a like description and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff; and also on which they find that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons; and that if the jury believed that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon a packed parcel of goods they ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff on the issue aforesaid." The first part of this direction tells the jury what facts they might reasonably find from the evidence before them; the second part was a direction, in point of law, as to what their verdict should be if they found these facts.

The exception to the direction raises two questions; it being contended by the defendants' counsel, first, that the Judge ought to have directed the jury that there was no evidence on which they could reasonably find these facts; and, secondly, that he should have directed them, even if they found these facts proved, not to find for the plaintiff.

It will be convenient to consider the first branch of this exception, viz. that relating to the effect of the evidence admitted along with the specific exceptions to the reception of evidence, before considering the last branch of the exception, and for this purpose it is necessary to see what is the evidence appearing on the bill of exceptions. The plaintiff proved that he was a person pursuing the trade of collecting small parcels for the same place, putting them together in one large parcel, and sending that packed parcel containing inclosures by the railway. He also proved that the defendants published a tariff, which, so far as is material to the present case, is set out in the bill of exceptions. By this tariff parcels between 1 cwt. and 5 cwt. were divided into five classes, according to the kinds of goods which they contained, and charged at five different rates; but packed parcels were, according to this tariff, to be charged at the highest rate and 50 per cent. additional. It is to be observed that, according to this tariff, the charge on packed parcels is always to be the same, whatever be the nature of the contents of the inclosures; so that if a packed parcel contains several packages all of one kind which would be comprised in the first or lowest class, nevertheless the highest charge and 50 per cent. more is to be charged, and if it contains packages all of the fifth or highest class the charge is to be no more. The company hold forth to the public that they make one uniform charge on all packed parcels, that is to say, on all parcels the contents of which come within the description of inclosures. This is, in our view of the case, material in considering whether the evidence was such as to justify the Judge's direction as to what the jury might find. The plaintiff then proceeded to prove that his packed parcels were always charged according to the profession of the company, as packed parcels at the highest rate with 50 per cent. added, and without any reference to the contents of the inclosures, which were generally unknown both to him and to the company, though their contents might be guessed at. The plaintiff then called witnesses for the purpose of proving that other persons sent packed parcels which were not charged at the same rate. The first exception is to the reception of this class of evidence; but the plaintiff could not prove what he alleged to be his cause of action in any other way, so that this exception to the reception of the evidence is merely a premature attempt to raise the objection that the facts, if proved, afforded no cause of action, which is afterwards properly raised by the last exception; the evidence of this class was, therefore, properly received. It amounted in effect to this: that four wholesale houses, Morley & Company, Copestake & Moore, Pawson, and Morrison & Dillon, who were in the habit of sending large quantities of their own goods by the defendants' railway, also habitually received inclosures for others, which they sent in packed parcels; that they did this daily and on a great scale, and without any disguise on their part; and that they were never charged according to the company's tariff as for packed parcels. No evidence was given that the company were ever directly informed that any one specific parcel was a packed parcel; but the evidence was, that no questions were ever asked by the company. No attempt was made by cross-examination or otherwise to shew that these wholesale houses deceived the company as to the contents of those packed parcels; indeed, one of the witnesses in the employment of Morley & Co. gave evidence "that the defendants were perfectly aware of the practice of Messrs. Morley's house as to packed parcels, and had been so for a long time, and that they had never charged him the packed parcels rate, and that the plaintiff's packed parcels were exactly similar in appearance to the packages sent by Messrs. Morley, and were packed alike;" and this evidence was not contradicted or explained away, but passed without cross-examination as an unqualified statement.

The next piece of evidence offered was to the effect, that at a reference in 1849 evidence was given, in the presence of the then solicitor and the then traffic-manager of the company, of the practice of wholesale houses in London to pack parcels in the way the witnesses proved that these four houses still did. It seems to us that this evidence was admissible for the purpose of proving notice to the company of the practice, and thus strengthening the inference, which the plaintiff asked the jury to draw, that the company abstained from asking questions of those four houses, not in ignorance that they sent packed parcels, but because they wished not to charge them at the same rate as the plaintiff. The traffic manager was the authorized agent of the company in all matters relating to the traffic, and his knowledge was that of the company. The facts were, it is true, brought to his notice in 1849, and the lapse of time diminished the weight of this evidence, but does not affect its admissibility. It seems to us that this evidence could not be rejected unless we were prepared to say that, supposing the wholesale houses and the defendants to pursue the same course since this trial that they did before, the proceedings in this trial would not be evidence tending to prove notice to the company subsequent to 1864, a proposition to which we cannot assent. We think, therefore, that this exception cannot be maintained.

The third exception is to the reception of evidence by a person conversant with the business of carriers, that the practice of sending packed parcels in the way described, had for many years, been so general as to be notorious amongst carriers. No objection is taken to the form of the question asked, which could easily have been altered; but it is contended that the substance of the answer is inadmissible. We do not think much weight ought to be given to such evidence, but we cannot agree that it is inadmissible: the fact that the practice had for many years been general and without disguise might properly be taken into account by the jury when considering whether from the absence of inquiry on the part of the company as to whether the parcels were packed, they would draw the plaintiff's inference that the company abstained from making inquiry because they wished not to be affected with express notice, or the defendants' view that they really did not know. We think therefore this exception also cannot prevail.

Then comes the question whether the Judge was right in telling the jury that, taking the whole evidence together, it was such that they might find that parcels had been carried for other persons "containing goods of a like description and under like circumstances," at a less rate than that for the plaintiff; in other words, whether there was evidence that the defendants had, with respect to the plaintiff, acted contrary to the proviso in section 50. of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. The objection stated on the record, and relied on in the argument, was, that there was no evidence of the specific nature of the contents of any of the plaintiff's packed parcels, and that in the absence of such evidence it could not be proved that they were of a like description and quantity with the contents of the packed parcels carried for the wholesale houses.

We quite agree that a case may exist in which the contents of the inclosures in packed parcels may be so different in their description as to justify a different rate of charge; but we do not think that any such case arose on the evidence in this case. The company by their tariff profess to charge all packed parcels at the same rate, whatever be the nature of their contents, that being the highest rate they charged, and the evidence shewed that they charged this rate on every packed parcel of the plaintiff's without inquiry as to its contents, and that they carried every packed parcel belonging to the wholesale houses at a rate lower than they professed to charge on all packed parcels, and also without any inquiry as to their contents. In brief, they state as one description of goods contained in a parcel "inclosures," without any reference to what the inclosures contain. Had there been anything in the specific nature of the contents occasioning this difference of charge, it might have been shewn by evidence. In the absence of such evidence, we think the jury might reasonably conclude that the difference in the charge was not on account of any difference in the description of the goods or their quantity, or the circumstances under which they were carried, but on account of a difference in the persons charged; in short, that it was within the meaning of the last lines of sect. 50. of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, a reduction made directly or indirectly in favour of the wholesale houses and against the plaintiff who carries on a trade not favoured by railway companies. We think, therefore, that the Judge was right in saying that on the evidence the jury might find the facts as they did. The only remaining question is that raised by the second branch of the last exception, viz., whether the Judge was right in directing the jury, if they did so find the facts, to find the verdict for the plaintiff.

It is necessary here to observe what the exception is. It has always been required on a bill of exceptions that the exceptions should be tendered before the verdict is found, so that the Judge may have an opportunity to alter his direction, if he has inadvertently made a mistake, or the opposite party to supply any defect in the evidence, if they have overlooked something which they can supply on the defect being pointed out; and, therefore, on the argument in a Court of error, the Court is confined to the exception actually taken. The issue joined here is never indebted to a count for money had and received. Now, it was quite open to the defendants at the trial to submit that the form of the action was misconceived; but that objection, if taken and thought well founded, could have been cured by an amendment. It was not taken, as we learn, for that very reason; and it is not now open, on this record, to raise any objection, not actually taken, especially not one which could have been cured by an amendment. It was urged that there was a substantial difference between an action for money had and received and any special count that might have been framed, inasmuch as the rule as to the measure of the damages would not be identical; and though the jury might, and probably would, give the overcharge as the damages, that was not done; but the same answer applies. If any objection had been made at the trial as to the measure of the damages, a proper direction might have been given to the jury. No such objection appears on this bill of exceptions; and, indeed, we are left in complete ignorance, not only as to what direction was given as to the damages, but as to what damages were assessed. The only point open on this exception is, whether, if the jury believed that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon a packed parcel, there was a cause of action established.

This is a question of considerable importance; but we cannot think it open in the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

There is nothing either illegal or immoral in the trade which the plaintiff pursues, though it necessarily makes him compete with the railway companies in one of the most lucrative branches of their business; neither is there anything either illegal or immoral in the railway companies desiring to obtain the whole of this lucrative business for themselves, so long as they do not infringe any law in the attempt to do so. And if the defendants were correct in their contention, that the legislature has given them unqualified power to charge what they pleased for parcels under 500 lb. weight, they might lawfully make use of that power for the purpose. But it has been decided by this Court in *Baxendale v. the Great Western Railway Company*¹ that their power to do so is subject to the equality clause; and it has been decided in the same case that if the equality clauses are infringed to the prejudice of a person pursuing the trade of this plaintiff, he may maintain an action for this infringement. The defendants, if so advised, may in the House of Lords question that case, and those on the authority of which it was decided. We, in the Exchequer Chamber, are bound by it; and, as we think, for the reasons already given, that the jury were justified in finding, as they have done, that the equality clause was infringed as against this plaintiff, we think that the verdict was properly directed to be for the plaintiff.

For these reasons, we think that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

[In Sutton v. the South-Eastern Railway Company it was admitted that, in substance, the case was the same as Sutton v. the Great Western Railway Company; and it was agreed that the judgment should, without argument, follow that in the other cases.]

In this case also, therefore, we think that the judgment should be affirmed.]

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 21, 1865.

SUTTON v. THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Ex. 38; L. R. 1 Ex. 32; 4 H. & C. 325; 13 L. T. 498; 14 W. R. 130;
11 Jur. N.S. 935.

Referred to, London Association of Shipowners v. London and India Docks Committee, [1893] E. R. A.; 62 L. J. Ch. 294; [1892] 3 Ch. 242; 67 L. T. 238 (C. A.).

Section 79 of the Common Law Procedure, Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, was repealed by 46 & 47 Vict. c. 49. s. 3.

Carriers by Railway—Packed Parcels—Equality Clauses—Injunction—Repetition of Injury—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 79.

PRACTICE.—The plaintiff was a carrier, and was in the habit of sending packed parcels by the defendants' railway. The defendants charged him for the carriage at a packed-parcels rate, which was considerably higher than the ordinary rate for parcels which were not packed. They carried packed parcels for other persons—who were not common carriers but were in the habit of making up packed parcels of their own goods and those of other persons, intended for the same places—at the ordinary or lower rate of charge, although it was notorious that such parcels were, in fact, packed, and although the practice had been brought to the defendants' knowledge. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendants to recover the overcharge which he had paid, and he succeeded in the action; and the ruling of the Judge at the trial that he was entitled to recover was upheld in the Exchequer Chamber. The defendants made no change in their system of charges, and the plaintiff commenced another action against the defendants, indorsing the writ with notice that he should apply for a writ of injunction. He accordingly moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from charging him for the carriage of his goods otherwise than equally with all other persons, and at the same rate as all other goods of like description under the like circumstances:—Held, that as the plaintiff had an adequate remedy by action, and as there would be no appeal from the decision of the Court if an injunction were granted, and as an injunction might be applied for in a Court of Equity, or under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. (the Railway and Canal Traffic Act), in the Court of Common Pleas, this Court would not grant the injunction, even if it had the power to do so.

And, semble, that the grievance complained of by the plaintiff was not a "repetition or continuance of a breach of contract or other injury," within the meaning of section 79. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

The plaintiff in this action was a carrier, and the same person who was plaintiff in the like actions of Sutton v. the Great Western Railway Company and Sutton v. the South Eastern Railway Company, a report of the argument and judgment on the bills of exception in which cases has already been given (35 L. J. Ex. 18).

It will sufficient to state here that the plaintiff was in the habit in the course of his business of sending packed parcels by those and other railways for the carriage of which he was charged, at the packed-parcel rate, considerably in excess of the rate charged for parcels which were not packed. Many wholesale houses in the drapery and other trades were notoriously in the habit of making up parcels of their own goods and those of any other persons who chose to send them, and sending the parcels so packed by rail to places in the country, declaring them as drapery, and paying the ordinary or lower rate. The plaintiff was aggrieved at this, and claimed to have his parcels carried at the lower rate. He accordingly brought the above-mentioned actions against the Great Western Railway Company and the South-Eastern Railway Company, to recover the overcharge as money had and received by those companies to his use. Bills of exception were tendered to the ruling of Martin, B. at the trials; and the evidence adduced, and the statutes governing the cases were stated in the judgments of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber and the separate judgment of Erle, C.J.¹ The judgment of that Court was in favour of the plaintiff, but the defendants and other railway companies made no change in their practice, continuing to charge the plaintiff at the packed-parcel rate and the wholesale houses at the lower rate. The plaintiff thereupon commenced the present action to recover the overcharge in respect of certain goods sent by him on the defendants' railway, subsequently to the judgment in his favour; and he indorsed the writ with notice that he should apply for a writ of injunction under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

Section 79. of that act is as follows: "In all cases of breach of contract or other injury, where the party injured is entitled to maintain and has brought an action, he may, in like case and in like manner as hereinbefore provided with regard to mandamus, claim a writ of injunction against the repetition or continuance of such breach of contract, or other injury of a like kind arising out of the same contract, or relating to the same property or right; and he may also in the same action include a claim for damages or other redress."

(1) The equality clauses of the defendants' acts are 2 Vict. c. xlii. s. 17. and 6 & 7 Vict. c. lii. s. 30.

A rule nisi for an injunction was accordingly moved for and obtained on behalf of the plaintiff, and it was drawn up in the form of an injunction "to restrain the defendants from charging the plaintiff for the carriage of his goods otherwise than equally with all other persons, and at the same rate as all other goods of the like description, under the like circumstances."

Field, Phear and F. M. White shewed cause.—This application is made under section 79. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, but the case does not fall within it. There is no "repetition or continuance" of a "breach of contract or other injury" within the meaning of that section. It is a repetition not of the same injury, but of the same kind of injury. The plaintiff does not even claim to have his parcels carried at a fixed rate, but he claims that those of other persons shall not be carried at a less rate. It is the same, in effect, as if he were asking the Court to issue a mandamus to the company to carry the parcels of the other persons at the higher rate. As to the words in the statute, "breach of contract or injury of a like kind," they are restricted to breaches and injuries arising out of the same contract. The grievances complained of by Mr. Sutton in this and the former action do not arise out of the same contract.

POLLOCK, C.B.—With respect to this matter being a breach of contract on the defendants' part, it is true that the Court of Common Pleas decided in effect that an action for money had and received would lie in these cases, but that portion of their judgment has been a good deal questioned. If instead of a breach of contract there was here a breach of duty on the part of the railway company, they have been guilty of a repetition of the breach of duty. Your argument is that the statute does not apply to a repetition of a breach of duty. An injunction may be obtained in equity in respect of repeated trespasses to the same property, or where trespasses are committed time after time by a person in support of a claim to property, but you cannot get an injunction where there is a succession of trespasses of a different character.]

Besides, the case is provided for by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, s. 3, under which an injunction might have been obtained from the Court of Common Pleas. The Common Law Procedure Act conferred the power of granting an injunction on the common law Courts for the purpose of assimilating the powers of giving redress possessed by the Courts of equity and common law. Now a Court of equity grants an injunction in three different cases: first, where there is a breach of trust or confidence; secondly, where there is a breach of contract; and, thirdly, where there has been an infringement of a legal right. This case does not fall under either of the two first heads, nor under the third, for the legal right must be an existing and also a continuing right.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—It is not certain that there ever will be another packed parcel sent.]

The nature of the private legal rights, in respect of which a Court of equity will interfere by injunction, was elaborately considered in the case of The Emperor of Austria v. Day (3 De Gex, F. & J. 217; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 690). It is clearly laid down there that a Court of equity will not interfere simply because there has been an infringement of a legal right, but there must be a legal right of property.

[BRAMWELL, B.—But an injunction lies to restrain the use of a trade-mark.]

The right to a trade-mark is a legal right of property—Hall v. Barrows (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 548; on appeal, 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 204), The Leather Cloth Company v. the American Leather Cloth Company (1 Hem. & M. 271; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 721; on appeal, 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 199, and in the House of Lords, 35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 58). Finally, the Court will only interfere where the redress obtained in a Court of law is inadequate—The Attorney General v. the Sheffield Gas Consumers' Company (3 De Gex, M. & G. 304; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 811).

J. Brown (Philbrick, with him), in support of the rule.—It will be a great misfortune if the objections raised to this rule prevail. The law has been settled, but the railway companies refuse to obey it, and the plaintiff is driven to litigation, which lasts for years, during which the money which has been overpaid is kept from him, and repaid to him eventually without any interest—Crouch v. the Great Northern Railway Company (11 Exch. Rep. 742; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 137).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—If, instead of suing for money had and received, you declared against the defendants for refusing to deliver you your goods until you paid money which ought not to have been charged to you, the jury could give you damages for the detention of your money.]

The first case of the kind, Pickford v. the Grand Junction Railway Company (10 Mee. & W. 399), was an action on the case. That was in the year 1841. The next case, of Parker v. the Great Western Railway Company (11 Com. B. Rep. 545; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 57), in 1844, was the first case of an action for money had and received. From that time to the present there has been a succession of cases in all the Courts, invariably in the plaintiff's favour, and yet the companies refuse to submit. The plaintiff in this case now comes to the Court and says, that if he has not an effectual remedy at law, he is driven to seek a remedy in equity.

[BRAMWELL, B.—I take it that if you prove that a Court of equity would grant an injunction, we should grant you one. POLLOCK, C.B.—But how does it appear that the defendants will continue the same mode of conducting their business? There may never be another packed parcel sent. There is nothing on which an injunction can be founded.]

There is as much ground for interference here as in the case of an infringement of a trade-mark or the continuance of an offensive trade. It might be said in those cases that the defendant might desist from his conduct. As to the objection made to the form of the injunction, it follows the form settled by the Court of Common Pleas under the Railway Traffic Act—Bazendale v. the Great Western Railway Company (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 309, 356; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 69, 81).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—This Court is not within the provisions of that act, which gives the Court of Common Pleas an exclusive power of regulating railway traffic.]

But that act expressly enacts that no remedies already possessed by individuals shall be affected by it.

[CHANNELL, B.—On the other hand, the fact that such an act was found necessary after the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, goes to shew that relief could not be had under the latter.]

The Railway Traffic Act contains manifold provisions as to accommodation, &c., which were new. However, this case comes within the Common Law Procedure Act, for it is a case of a tort, and not merely of a breach of contract. It is a common law right, qualified by statute. We are claiming to prevent a repetition of the injury complained of, or one of like kind. The case falls within the principle on which Courts of equity have granted injunctions. They have expressly decided that it is politic and expedient to keep these great railway companies within bounds—Hodges on Railways, p. 757, 3rd edit. (see 4th edit. part 3, c. 3).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There is a vast difference between asking for an injunction to prevent a company from exceeding its powers, and asking for an injunction to prevent it from violating the law. Can you find any case where a Court of equity or a Court of common law, under its statutory power, has granted an injunction where there has not been a continuing contract or property of a permanent character which has been injured and is likely to be injured again?]

The case of The River Dun Navigation Company v. the North Midland Railway Company (1 Rail. Cas. 135) is cited in Hodges on Railways, and the observations of Lord Cottenham are in the plaintiff's favour, although the injunction was refused.

[CHANNELL, B.—The authorities referred to in Hodges on Railways do not seem to bear out the statement of the text.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am very clearly of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. I think we ought to be extremely cautious how we deal with a power, which, it is alleged, has been given to us, in a case where there is no appeal; and where it is said that if we do not grant the injunction, it may be sought elsewhere. No case can be instanced in which the Court has interfered under circumstances similar to the present. The opinion of the learned Chief Justice of the Cape of Good Hope has been given to us, but in the variety of cases which have been cited the injunction has been invariably refused. We are asked to make a precedent; but where there is no appeal from our decision, and where the matter is one of some novelty, we ought to take care to act clearly within the limits of our jurisdiction, for we are not here to administer what we think ought to be the law, but what we find upon the authorities to be the law. Looking at this case upon the merits presented to us, it is not true that the plaintiff has no other remedy; he has a remedy which will give him back all the money which he has overpaid, with interest from the time of its being detained. The inconvenience would be very considerable if we were to interfere, and there would in reality be no advantage to the plaintiff; for if this Court were asked to issue an attachment for a breach of the injunction, we should have affidavits, on the one side, and on the other, shewing that the injunction had or had not been disobeyed. Such a question could not be decided on affidavits, nor properly referred to the Master, and the Court would be bound to direct an issue to be tried by a jury. It is far better, in my judgment, that the plaintiff should bring his action directly, complaining of a breach of the law, than that we should send an issue to a jury to decide whether the law had or had not been violated.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Supposing that all the other difficulties were got over, it seems to me that the rule ought to be discharged, on the ground adverted to, namely, that we are asked to affirm, in the first place, a doubtful proposition in law, in saying that this is a case in which an injunction could issue; and, in the next place, a doubtful proposition of fact, in saying that the facts bring this case within any rule by which an injunction is granted; and that from those two decisions of ours there is no appeal. It would be much better, if there is any reasonable doubt about it, that the application should be made to the Court whose decisions could be appealed from.

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that the rule ought to be discharged. The application made to the Court is founded upon the 79th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. I do not doubt that that section was intended to give this Court jurisdiction to grant an injunction in a great variety of cases, in order to save the delay and expense of applying to the Court of Chancery, and I, for one, am not at all disposed to restrain or restrict, by any decision of this Court, the power of the Courts to act under that section. But I am very clearly of opinion that it does not give us such a power as will enable us to comply with the plaintiff's application on this occasion. It appears to me that it was intended to provide for quite a different class of cases from that which has been brought under our consideration to-day, and I am the more unwilling to place a construction upon this section, which I am not satisfied is the right one, from the inconvenience that would arise on an application to the Court to enforce the injunction by attachment, and from the fact that it may be that the Court of Common Pleas, under the Railway Traffic Act, may have a larger power of giving relief than we have;

and that, if the plaintiff's argument be well founded, there is ground for an application to the Court of Chancery, so as to bring the question under the consideration of the House of Lords.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that the language of this section of the act of parliament clearly applies to this case. It seems to me rather to point to other matters. If the plaintiff's argument is well founded, there is a remedy in the Court of Common Pleas in this matter; and if we were to exercise the jurisdiction which we are asked to do, we might be doing great injustice, and there might be no means of relief. We should certainly very much embarrass the defendants' trade, and I think that we ought to be very careful in putting the construction wished for by the plaintiff upon this act of parliament.

Rule discharged.

Nov. 8, 1865.

FINNEY v. FORWARD AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. Ex. 42; L. R. 1 Ex. 6; 4 H. & C. 33; 13 L. T. 296; 13 W. R. 85; 11 Jur. N.S. 877.

Facts distinguished but principle applied, Derby Commercial Bank v. Lumsden, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. C.P. 72; L. R. 5 C.P. 107; 21 L. T. 673; 18 W. R. 526 (C.P.). Referred to, Wallen v. Forrest, [1872] E. R. A.; 41 L. J. Q.B. 96; L. R. 7 Q.B. 239; 26 L. T. 290 (Bail Court).

Practice—Interrogatories—Trover—17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. s. 51.

DISCOVERY.—The defendant, in an action of trover, will not be allowed to deliver interrogatories to the plaintiff respecting the grounds of his claim, unless some prima facie foundation for the application is laid by him, admitting the plaintiff's original title, or connecting him in some way with the person from whom the defendant received the goods; and the practice in cases of ejectment, according to which persons in possession of land have been allowed to deliver interrogatories to persons seeking to disturb them, will not be extended to actions of trover brought against persons in possession of goods.

In this case Martin, B., had refused to allow interrogatories to be delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff, and the present application was for a rule to shew cause why the defendants should not be at liberty to deliver them to the plaintiff. The action was for the conversion of 133 bales of cotton, and for money had and received. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and that the goods were not the plaintiff's.

The affidavit of the defendants, on which the application was based, stated as follows:

1. That this action is brought to recover the value of 133 bales of cotton, or the entire proceeds thereof, less any proper charges thereon, and that the plaintiff's claim, as stated in the declaration, is 5,000*l.*

2. That in the month of March, 1865, Messrs. Saunders & Son, of Nassau, consigned to us 133 bales of cotton, accompanying the same with their draft on William Frederick De La Rue, of London, for 2,488*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, payable at thirty days after sight.

3. That on receipt of such draft we caused the same to be presented to the said W. F. De La Rue & Co. for acceptance, who refused to accept the same. That we also caused the said draft to be presented for payment at maturity to the said W. F. De La Rue & Co.; but they also refused to pay it, and thereupon we caused the said cotton to be sold in the usual way for the best prices that could be obtained for the same.

4. That it was not until some time after the said cotton had been sold as aforesaid that we had any knowledge whatever that the present plaintiff claimed to have any interest in the same, and that we are now in entire ignorance in what way or manner he has any right or title thereto, his name not having been used or referred to by Messrs. Saunders & Son on the occasion of their consigning the cotton as before stated.

There were further affidavits by the defendants and their attorney that they believed that there was a good defence on the merits, that the application was not for the purpose of delay, and that they believed that the defendants would derive material advantage from the discovery.

The interrogatories were in the following form:

1. How and when did you become possessed of or entitled to the cotton, the subject of this action, and where and in whose hands was the said cotton when you first became possessed of it?

2. When did you part with the possession of the said cotton, and for what purpose, and under what circumstances, and to whom? Into whose possession did the said cotton come after you parted with it? Did you sell or pledge or otherwise deal with the said cotton, and if so, to whom and how?

3. Do you know William Frederick De La Rue? What is he, and what is his business, and how and where carried on? Have you not had dealings with him, and if so, of what kind? Was not the said cotton in his possession, or in the possession of some persons there on his behalf, at Nassau, in March, 1865, or about that time? How and when did it get into his or their possession, and for what purpose and with what object? Was it not intrusted to him by you, or by some person who acted by your authority or derived or claimed title to it from or through you, in order that it might be sent to Liverpool, or to some other port for sale?

4. Has the said William Frederick De La Rue, or any other and what person or persons, advanced you money upon the security of the said cotton? Were you indebted to him or them, whilst the said cotton was in his or their possession, for the money so advanced, or for any other money in respect of which he or they claimed to hold the said cotton?

5. If your dealings above referred to were with the house of Frederick De La Rue & Co., or with some member of that firm, or with some person of the name of De La Rue & Co., other than the said William Frederick De La Rue, answer the above questions with respect to him or them.

6. Do you know B. F. Fecklin? Has he any, and, if so, what interest in or title to the said cotton, the subject of this action?

Crompton Hutton, in support of the application.—This is the first case of trover in which leave to administer interrogatories to the plaintiff has been applied for. The object is to discover under what circumstances the plaintiff parted with the goods.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—That would be reasonable enough if you admitted the plaintiff's original title to the goods. You do not lay a foundation for your application by connecting the plaintiff in any way with Saunders, from whom you received the cotton. If you admitted the plaintiff's title, you might interrogate him as to the authority which he gave to Saunders to deal with the goods; but you are now in effect simply seeking to interrogate the plaintiff as to his title, which, according to the ordinary rule of discovery, you cannot do.]

Interrogatories are allowed in cases of ejectment, as appears by two recent cases in the Common Pleas.¹

[MARTIN, B.—No doubt claimants in ejectment have been forced to

(1) "These would seem to be Stoate v. Rew, 14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 209; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) 160; and Pearson v. Turner, 16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 157; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 224."

answer interrogatories respecting the pedigree of persons under whom they claimed, but the practice has always been considered an anomaly.]

What difference can there be in principle between the case of a man who has been for some years in quiet possession of lands which are suddenly claimed by a perfect stranger, and the case of a man who has been for some months in quiet possession of goods which are suddenly claimed by a perfect stranger? In Flitcroft v. Fletcher (11 Exch. Rep. 543; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 94) this Court said that where a person seeks to disturb the quiet possession of another, he may be required to say by what right he does so. The defendants have been in possession of the cotton since March, 1865, and a possession of goods for months gives as good a title as a possession of land for years.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—My Brother Martin has pointed out the distinction between the cases. The proceedings in ejectment are anomalous. The answer of the Court will be, that we do not think it necessary to extend the rule in ejectment to other actions.]

[PIGOTT, B.—The ground of my decision is, that the affidavit on which this application is made is insufficient. There is nothing stated in it which shews that interrogatories ought to be delivered.]

Per Curiam (Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B., and Pigott, B.).—There will be no rule.

Rule refused.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

Nov. 30, 1865.

WHITTAKER AND ANOTHER v. LOWE.*

35 L. J. Ex. 44; 4 H. & C. 109; L. R. 1 Ex. 74; 13 L. T. 469; 14 W. R. 197;
12 Jur. N.S. 375.

Followed, In re Stark, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Bkcy. 15; L. R. 1 Ch. 150;
13 L. T. 573; 12 Jur. N.S. 40; 14 W. R. 255 (L.C.).

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, section 192, Condition 1, "Three-fourths of the Creditors in Number and Value"—Secured Creditors.

BANKRUPTCY.—In estimating the majority in value of creditors who are required under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, to assent to a deed made between a debtor and his creditors, the debts of creditors holding security are to be taken into account.

Turquand v. Moss (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 355; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 15) followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer.

This action was brought to recover the sum of 346l. 19s., the balance due from the defendant in respect of work done as millwrights by the plaintiffs. The only defence relied upon by the defendant was, that after action brought a deed of arrangement, such as is provided for by the 192nd section of the

* Coram, Willes, J., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Montague Smith, J. and Lush, J.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, had been entered into between the defendant and his creditors. This deed was not executed or assented to by the plaintiffs, and it was denied by them that three-fourths in value of the creditors had assented; but it was proved at the trial that, if the amounts for which certain assenting creditors were secured, ought by law not to be deducted from the gross amount of the debts in estimating the required majority in value, a number representing three-fourths in value had executed the deed or assented in writing to its provisions.

Mellor, J., who tried the case, ruled, on the authority of Turquand v. Moss (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 355; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 15), that the value of the securities held by creditors was not to be deducted in order to arrive at the value of their debts, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, reserving leave, however, to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for 346l. 19s.

The Court of Exchequer, in Easter Term, 1865, granted a rule nisi on the ground that the value of securities held by secured creditors should have been deducted in estimating the value of their debts. This rule was afterwards discharged, the Court intimating that they did so solely on the ground that they deemed themselves bound by the authority of Turquand v. Moss (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 355; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 15).

The question for the Court of Appeal was, whether, in estimating the value of debts of creditors who under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, are required to assent to a deed made between a debtor and his creditors, the value of the securities held by such creditors ought to be deducted.

Holker, for the plaintiffs, the appellants.—As to the cases on which the defendant relies: in Ex parte Godden (1 De Gex, J. & S. 260; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 37) this point was not necessary for the decision, because, as Turner, L.J., said, the deed was bad according to the rule in Ex parte Rawlings (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 27). The question was rather, whether secured creditors were to be reckoned at all.

[BLACKBURN, J., referred to the words of Knight Bruce, L.J., who said that perfectly or imperfectly secured creditors must all be reckoned alike.]

That is to say, in reckoning the number of the creditors, but not the value of their debts. The value of the securities must be ascertained as it would be before a Commissioner in Bankruptcy. The words in the 97th section,¹ "after deducting the value" of the security, shew that this must be a question of fact, just as in any other case. In Turquand v. Moss (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 355; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 15) Byles, J., said that he merely followed Ex parte Godden (1 De Gex, J. & S. 260; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 37).

[MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—In the judgment there, Erle, C.J., seems to rely on the act of 1861 not containing any proviso similar to the 224th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849.²]

The new act is clear without it. In Ex parte Spyer (32 Law J. Rep.

(1) The section defining what shall be reckoned as debts for the purposes of a petition under the act.

(2) Section 224. enacts, "That every deed or memorandum of arrangement now or hereafter entered into between any such trader and his creditors, and signed by or on behalf of six-sevenths in number and value of those creditors whose debts amount to 10l. and upwards, touching such trader's liabilities, and his release therefrom, and the distribution, inspection, conduct, management, and mode of winding-up of his estate, or all or any of such matters, or any matters having reference thereto, shall (subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned) be as effectual and obligatory in all respects upon all the creditors who shall not have signed such deed or memorandum of arrangement as if they had duly signed the same; and such deed or memorandum, when so signed, shall not be or be liable to be disturbed or impeached by reason of any prior or subsequent act of bankruptcy: Provided always, that every creditor shall be accounted a creditor in value in respect of such amount only as, upon an account fairly stated, after allowing the value of mortgaged property and other such available securities or liens from such trader, shall appear to be the balance due to him."

(N.S.) Bankr. 62, 64) the Lord Chancellor said obiter that "secured creditors rank under a deed of trust for the amount remaining, after deducting the value of their securities"; and Ex parte Smith re Smith (10 Law Times, 803) is also in the plaintiff's favour, although it was not decided expressly on this point. The matter is still res integra. The object of the legislature clearly was to give creditors a control over the estate proportioned to their respective stakes therein; otherwise, it would be in the power of the secured creditors, who are the parties least interested, to dictate to the unsecured, and to hold them completely at their mercy. "Value" is not merely "amount." The 97th section shews the real meaning of its value; and the 197th points out that it is to be estimated "according to the law and practice in Bankruptcy."

[MELLOR, J.—"Such deed" in that section implies a valid deed. WILLES, J.—Section 116.³ seems to contemplate the realization of the security before proof. "Value" must mean "amount" in that section.]

In that particular case there can be no question. In other cases, the act points out the means of ascertaining the value by referring to the "law and practice in Bankruptcy." A creditor may prove before he can ascertain the value of his security.

[LUSH, J.—The creditor has no locus standi till his debt is proved. The Court takes no notice of him till then.]

For this purpose it does. Proof is only essential for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the dividend. Applying the law and practice of bankruptcy, a man is not a creditor till the value of his security is deducted. If "creditors" means "creditors who have proved," that is sufficient for the plaintiffs; if not, the 197th section governs the case.

R. G. Williams appeared for the defendant, but was not called upon to argue.

WILLES, J.—We are all of opinion that this judgment should be affirmed. The question turns upon the true construction of the first condition of the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the words of which are, "a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value, of the creditors of such debtor, whose debts shall respectively amount to 10l. and upwards, shall, before or after the execution thereof by the debtor, in writing assent to or approve of such deed or instrument."

The question is, whether, in estimating the "three-fourths in value of the creditors of such debtor," securities held by creditors are to be taken into account.

Three answers may be suggested. First of all, that we must apply the same test in estimating the majority in number as in estimating the three-fourths in value; and that in both cases we are to exclude the fully-secured creditors and their debts.

Secondly, it is said that because it is impossible that a person holding security for his debt is thereby rendered not a creditor; therefore as we cannot exclude him from the majority in number, so this section (dealing with the same class of persons for both purposes) must mean that he should also be reckoned in respect of the debt presently due to him in estimating the three-fourths in value. This was the answer given, by the Lords Justices, in Ex parte Godden (1 De Gex, J. & S. 260; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 37), and by the Court of Common Pleas, in Turquand v. Moss (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 355; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 15), upon which case this appeal is virtually brought. In Turquand v. Moss (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 355; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 15) my Brother Byles appears to have considered that, but for the decision in Ex parte Godden (1 De Gex, J. & S. 260; 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 37), the question might have admitted of a different answer; but he did not suggest that different methods should be applied in ascertaining the majority in number and the three-fourths in value. It appears to have occurred to him, that, as it might be unjust to count the secured debts, so persons whose debts were entirely secured, ought to be excluded altogether.

(3) Sect. 116. enacts, "At the first meeting of creditors, or any adjournment thereof, it shall be competent to the majority in value of creditors who have proved debts to choose an assignee or assignees of the bankrupt's estate and effects, and to be called the creditors' assignee; provided that the Court shall have power to reject any person so chosen who shall appear to such Court unfit to be such assignee, and upon such rejection a new choice of creditors' assignee shall be made."

The third answer is that suggested by the Lord Chancellor, in Ex parte Smith (10 Law Times, 803), viz. that a person who has security for his debt is nevertheless a creditor, even though it may appear that it is possible (and after all it is but a possibility) that upon a sale of the security an amount equal to the debt would be realized; but, that, inasmuch as his debt is practically reduced to nothing, in the peculiar case of his being at no risk, it is not to be taken into account at its full amount in determining whether three-fourths in value of the creditors have assented. That is to say, the Lord Chancellor suggested that different methods ought to be applied in estimating the majority in number, and the three-fourths in value.

It is quite obvious that the question turns upon the construction to be put on the word "value." The weight of authority, and one would think of reasoning, seems to be upon the side of reckoning as a creditor a person whose debt is fully secured, so that he must be included in the majority in number. Then with regard to taking the securities into account in determining the three-fourths in value great difficulty arises, because one cannot think it likely that the legislature would have left it to the sense of policy or convenience existing in the mind of the Court to decide whether a person whose debt is secured is to be treated as a creditor in value to the whole amount of his debt, or only to the extent of the possible or probable balance of his debt, which will remain due when the security is realized. A man of business and good sense might fairly say, "My security may never be realized, it may be lost, it may fall or rise in value. I do not choose to realize at present, because I might have to answer to my debtor for having unfairly dealt with property in which he had an interest to the extent of what might remain, after satisfying my debt." He might think that, where there is no judicial person to determine for the time what the value should be taken to be, it would be better at once to let all the creditors come in in respect of their entire debts, by reason of the difficulties arising as to the test of value. Another man might not think much of these difficulties, and might consider it sufficient if the probable value of the secured creditor's debt was ascertained at the time of signing the deed. Arguments may be advanced on both sides of the question, but we have nothing to do but to adhere to the language of the act.

The real question, therefore, is, what does this "value" mean, taken with its context in the first condition? "The value of the creditors" is of course a loose expression, or rather a figure of speech for "the value of the debts owing to the creditors of such debtor." The sense contended for by the plaintiffs is, the value of the debts in money's worth after the securities are realized; and another meaning might be suggested, of the value which the debts would fetch in the market. Primâ facie, taking debts all round, and finding that they are dealt with here as a genus, I should have thought that "the value" was the amount of the debt itself; and I find that that is adopted by the legislature in the 116th section, relating to the choice of assignees: "At the first meeting of creditors, or any adjournment thereof, it shall be competent to the majority in value of the creditors who have proved debts to choose an assignee or assignees of the bankrupt's estate and effects." "Value" there clearly means "amount," because it is only the creditors who have proved that are dealt with. I find a confirmation of that being the true construction of the statute in the 97th section, which deals with the petition and the petitioning creditor's debt, and it expressly provides "In the computation of debts for the purposes of any petition under this act there shall be reckoned as debts, viz., sums due to creditors holding mortgages or other available securities or liens, after deducting the value of the property comprised in such mortgages, securities or liens." We have here the express provision that persons are creditors though they hold mortgages or other available securities, and, secondly, the express enactment, that, for the purposes of any petition under this act (which is not this case), the debts are to be reckoned or computed after deducting the value of the property comprised in such mortgages, &c.; so where an uncertainty exists as to the real value, we have a provision for it. Then there is another provision in the 97th section, which appears to be very material: "such interest and costs as shall be due in respect of any of the debts" are to be reckoned as debts; there is, therefore, an intention expressed in the 97th section to provide expressly for the mode of ascertaining the amount of certain particular debts, and a special provision introduced with respect to the question of value in a class of cases different from this.

But there is not only the rule expressio unius est exclusio alterius to be applied to the construction of the several sections, but there is another act to be considered which is in pari materia, and forms part of the history of the new act,—the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and which in dealing with the subject-matter, expressly introduced the provision which it is said we ought to introduce in the present act. That provision is to be found at the end of the 224th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, one of the sections repealed by the act of 1861; and the 192nd section of the new act, amongst others, has been substituted for the repealed section. The 224th section of the old act provides that "every creditor shall be accounted a creditor in respect of such amount only as upon an account fairly stated, after allowing the value of the mortgage property and other such available securities or liens from such trader, shall appear to be the balance due to him." The omission of the word "such" from the 97th section of the new act (which is in terms limited to the case of a petition), in my opinion makes no difference. It would seem as if those who framed the 224th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. felt this very difficulty as to who is to settle what is the amount due after deducting the value of the mortgage or securities, and met it by introducing the words "upon an account fairly stated."

The whole proviso is omitted from the 192nd section of the new act. I feel almost inclined to say, that the legislature by the express language of the act to which I have referred has, as it were, ostentatiously shewn an intention that the proviso so repealed should not be reintroduced, except in part, and in that part should be made applicable only to a particular subject-matter, differing from this. Putting the best construction one can upon the language of the act, and putting aside all reasons of mere policy or convenience, which ought not to sway us here, it would seem that the just conclusion is that at which the Court of Exchequer has arrived.

BLACKBURN, J.—The question entirely depends upon the construction of the statute. It is plain that a creditor who has got security for his debt is nevertheless a creditor—he may sue and recover judgment in every respect as long as bankruptcy does not intervene. He only differs from other creditors in that he has the means of making available the property for which he has security, but till that security is realized, he is a creditor for the amount due, so that under the bankrupt law he still remains a petitioning creditor. So stood the law in 1849, and when the Bankrupt Act of 1849 was passed, the law was left untouched as to the rights of a petitioning creditor. Then, in the 224th section of that act, for the first time was introduced this power of making deeds of arrangement. Without the proviso at the end of that section, I think the plain meaning of the previous words would have been, "the number and value of those creditors whose debts amount to 10*l.* and upwards." I think that is the fair grammatical construction, and the proviso shews clearly that those who drew the section thought it was so, and put in the proviso pointedly, saying, "notwithstanding what has previously been said, in reckoning the value you shall deduct the fair value of the securities." It seems to me, that if we find the legislature deliberately repealing an enactment, we certainly ought to understand that the legislature did not mean that to continue in force which they had formerly said, but that they mean that only which they now say.

The weight of authorities is also, in my opinion, strongly in favour of this construction, but in a Court of error we are not bound by the authorities below. I entirely agree with my Brother Willes in thinking that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer ought to be affirmed.

MELLOR, J., MONTAGUE SMITH, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 13, 1865.

STANGER AND ANOTHER v. MILLER.

35 L. J. Ex. 49; L. R. 1 Ex. 58; 4 H. & C. 1; 13 L. T. 831.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192. —Mutual Credit—Set-off of Rent accruing due after Execution but before Registration of Deed.

BANKRUPTCY.—In an action by trustees under a deed executed in accordance with the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the defendant may set off rent accruing due to him from the assigning debtor after the execution and before the registration of the deed; the registration, and not the execution, being the dividing line between the title of the trustees and that of the debtor.

Declaration by the trustees of John Bowles, a debtor, under a deed executed in accordance with the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

In the fifth count the plaintiffs sued, as such trustees, for money payable to the said John Bowles at the time of executing the deed, for goods bargained and sold, &c.

The defendant pleaded, inter alia, as a defence, on equitable grounds, to parcel of the money claimed in the fifth count, that by an indenture, dated the 25th of March, 1861, the defendant and one George Edward Miller respectively demised and leased to the said John Bowles their respective undivided moieties of a certain messuage, to hold from the 25th of March, 1861, for the term of twenty-one years, at the yearly rent of 150*l.*, payable by equal quarterly payments upon the usual quarterly days of payment; and that the said John Bowles did thereby covenant with his lessors to pay the said yearly rent of 150*l.* upon the several days and in the manner before mentioned; "by virtue of which demise the said John Bowles entered into and upon the demised premises, &c.; and afterwards, during the continuance of the said term, G. E. Miller died, having devised his reversion to the defendant; and after the death of G. E. Miller, and during the continuance of the said term, the sum of 37*l.* 10*s.*, for one quarter's rent of the said demised premises for the quarter of a year ending on the 24th of December, 1864, became and was due and payable by the said John Bowles to the defendant, who then was entitled to the reversions as aforesaid; and the defendant further says, that the said John Bowles, before and at the time of the registration of the said deed in the declaration mentioned, and before the defendant had any notice of the said deed, or of any act of bankruptcy committed by the said John Bowles, and until and at the commencement of this suit, was and still is indebted to the defendant in an amount equal to that part of the plaintiffs' claim to which this plea is pleaded for the rent which became due and payable as aforesaid on the said 24th of December, 1864, which amount the defendant is willing to set off," &c.

Demurrer to this plea, and joinder in demurrer.

Putchett, in support of the demurrer.—Upon the execution of the deed the rights of Bowles, as against his debtors, passed to the trustees—Symons v. George,¹ per Crompton, J.; and they might have a cause of action against the debtors before registration. Now it does not appear on the face of the plea how the debt attempted to be set off became due in any other way than that it was for the rent due before registration. It might have been that the assignees did not think the lease of value, or that some arrangement had been made by virtue of which Bowles continued in possession, and liable to his landlord for the rent, notwithstanding the transfer of the estate to the trustees. The set-off is for a new debt personal to Bowles, and cannot be the subject of a set-off in an action by trustees under a deed executed before the new debt arose. It is not a mutual debt between the plaintiffs and the defendant within the meaning of the Statutes of Set-off—Isberg v. Bowden (8 Exch. Rep. 852, 858; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 322), per Martin, B. Notwithstanding the Bankruptcy Act, the landlord might distrain if the bankrupt were in possession up to the time of the rent being due.

[CHANNELL, B.—If the plaintiffs had been assignees under a bankruptcy, would not this have been a good mutual credit—a credit terminating in a debt? and does not the 197th section put the assignees here on the same footing as after an adjudication?]

Rent payable quarterly by the terms of a demise is not within the 171st section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. If it were a mutual credit within that section, the 150th section² of the act of 1861 would not have been required. There is no credit between landlord and tenant.

[CHANNELL, B.—The landlord credits the bankrupt to the use and occupation of the house.—His Lordship referred to the notes to Rose v. Hart (2 Smith's Lead. Cas. (5th edit.) 251).

No portion of the rent made available in the plea was due or payable before the execution of the deed, and the 194th section³ shews that the execution is the dividing line, and not the registration.

Keane, in support of the plea.—Registration, and not execution, is the dividing line. This appears from the form of deed given by schedule D, and also from the 200th section of the act. Until the registration the title of the trustees was incomplete. "The day and hour" mentioned in the 196th section would not be important if the registration were the turning-point. The 199th section⁴ gives still greater efficacy to the registration. The execution is the debtor's own act, and there is no such official notice given of it as of the registration. If the plaintiffs had been assignees in bankruptcy, the defendant might have set off mutual debts or credits. The 197th section of

(1) 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 187. See page 189 for the dictum referred to.

(2) The 150th section is as follows: "In all cases in which the bankrupt is liable to pay any rent or other payment falling due at fixed or stated periods, and the adjudication of bankruptcy shall happen at any time other than one of such fixed or stated periods, it shall be lawful for the person entitled to such rent or other payment to prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the day of the adjudication of bankruptcy, in such manner as if the said rent or payment grew due from day to day, and not at such fixed or stated periods as aforesaid."

(3) This section enacts that every such deed shall, within twenty-eight days from and after the execution thereof by such debtor, or within such further time as the Court in London shall allow, be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy; and in default thereof shall not be received in evidence.

(4) This section enacts, that in case any petition for an adjudication after the execution and pending the time allowed for the registration of the deed, all proceedings may be stayed if the Court think fit; and in case the deed be duly registered the petition shall be dismissed.

the act makes registration equivalent to adjudication; and the right to sue, taken under this section, is therefore subject to the defendant's right of set-off, just as in bankruptcy. Again, from Buck v. Lee (1 Ad. & E. 804; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 206) it would appear that what would enable a plaintiff who had assigned to reply that he sued as trustee for the assignee, would be that he had given notice of the assignment. The plea here shews that no such notice was given before this set-off accrued. If the debtor had assigned at common law, and notice was given, no debt being then due, it would have been a perfectly good replication to say that the deed was executed and the defendant had notice thereof. [He also cited Gibson v. Bell,⁵ per Tindal, C.J., and Ex parte Harrison (26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 30), per Turner, L.J.]

Patchett, in reply.—The registration is only for the purpose of giving the assignees rights against the non-assenting creditors. It is immediately after execution that possession of the debtor's property is to be given up (according to the 7th condition of the 192nd section) to the trustees. They might commence an action for debt before registration. Such an action appears to have been contemplated in section 194. Transactions between execution and registration are not within the deed, and the estate is not liable for debts incurred in respect of such transactions. In what position is the assigning debtor during the twenty-eight days' interval? By the act, he has assigned, and therefore the assignees must sue; but if registration be the test, then for twenty-eight days the power of suing lapses altogether! The inference is, that the time of execution, and not of registration, is the real dividing line.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the plea is good. The title of the assignees here to claim this debt does not arise by virtue of the execution of the deed, nor does the right to sue pass to them till the registration of the deed, when powers similar to those that exist in Bankruptcy are created by the express provision in the act of 1861. The rent, under the demise, may not have accrued till after the execution; but the 150th section has provided that, in a case of this kind, the person entitled may prove as if the rent or payment grew due from day to day, and therefore the landlord is entitled to prove up to the very moment when the adjudication takes place. Now, the registration of the deed appears to me, for the purposes of this argument, to be assimilated (by virtue of the 197th section) to an adjudication in bankruptcy, and therefore the plea appears to be a good plea, for it says that, before the registration of the deed some rent had accrued under the demise, and that the defendant is ready to set off the amount against the plaintiff's claim. Upon these grounds, I think the defendant entitled to judgment.

BRAMWELL, B.—I also think the plea is good. In the first place, I think it would have been a good plea of mutual credit under the old Bankrupt Act. It is well known that, under the 171st section of the old act, (as a general rule) what could be proved could be made the subject of a set-off; and I think that this rent might have been provable as a liability upon a contingency, under the 178th section of the old act; and being a good mutual credit, it would be the subject of a set-off in bankruptcy. And if that be so, it is clear to my mind it must be the subject of a set-off under the new statute, whether execution or registration be the dividing line, for I cannot for a moment think that these trustees have got a better title than they would have had if they had been assignees in bankruptcy.

Secondly, I think the plea is good, on the ground that we must look to the registration as the date with reference to which everything is to be considered. Section 194, which applies to all deeds of arrangement, says that they are to be registered within twenty-eight days after execution by the debtor, without reference to any of the provisions of the 192nd section; and we must therefore take the 194th section to be applicable to deeds which are binding only upon the parties to them, as well as to deeds which are binding on creditors not parties to them. The deed may be registered "within such further time as the Court shall allow"; so that it might not be registered for six months afterwards. It is not conceivable that a deed which may be kept a month in the debtor's pocket shall have an operation while in that condition, and before it is announced to the world by public registration. It only becomes what one may call an official document affecting the rights of others when the official sanction is given to it by registration. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that the date of the registration must be the time we are to consider; and if that be so, this debt was due at the time, and consequently the defendant is entitled to judgment.

(5) 1 Bing. N.C. 753; s. c. 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 242. See also 2 Smith's Lead. Cas. (5th edit.) 266.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the plea is good. It is pleaded as an equitable plea; and upon the facts disclosed I conceive that the trustees under the deed must be taken to be in the same position as assignees under a bankruptcy; and it appears to me that the rent having become due before registration entitles the defendant to rely upon his set-off. If any portion of the rent under the terms of the demise was payable at the execution of the deed, it was only payable by virtue of the 150th section of the act of 1861, which gives the right to prove as if the rent accrued de die in diem; but the whole of the rent which was sought to be set off was not only due by contract, but payable in point of time before the registration of the deed. The plaintiffs being thus in the same position as assignees in bankruptcy, whether we look at it as a case of mutual debt or mutual credit, the plea discloses a good answer to the action. For as the plea is pleaded as an equitable defence, it would have been quite sufficient that there was a mutual credit. But the rent was actually due so as to constitute a mutual debt before the date of the registration, which, I conceive, is the dividing line in point of time.

The plaintiffs contend, that the 7th condition in the 192nd section interferes with this view, and goes to shew that the date of execution is to be taken to be the time. But the statute has made a marked distinction between execution and registration of a deed. It is the registration which is to give effect to the deed, and to place the proceedings to be taken on the footing of proceedings in Bankruptcy. It is said again, that, though the deed might not be perfect and complete till registration, it would have for some purposes an inchoate operation upon its execution. It does not appear to me that the concluding words in the 194th section, "that the deed shall not be received in evidence without registration," can support this contention. In a great variety of cases the deed would have to be given in evidence in order to support the rights which the trustees would acquire under the deed; and it is provided that it shall not be given in evidence so as to be read as a valid deed until registration has taken place. Upon these grounds it is tolerably clear that the defendant is entitled to judgment.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 15, 1865.

SAVIN v. THE HOYLAKÉ RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Ex. 52; L. R. 1 Ex. 9; 4 H. & C. 67; 13 L. T. 374; 14 W. R. 109;
11 Jur. N.S. 934.

Principle applied, Burden v. River Fergus Navigation Co., 1868, I. R. 2 C.P. 13 (C.P.). Distinguished, In re Brampton and Longtown Railway, [1875] E. R. A.; 44 L. J. Ch. 670; L. R. 10 Ch. 177; 33 L. T. 5; 23 W. R. 813 (L.C. & L. J.). Observations approved, Corbett v. S.E. and Chatham Railway [1905] E. R. A.; 74 L. J. Ch. 659; [1905] 2 Ch. 280; 93 L. T. 41 (Ch. D.): affirmed, [1906] E. R. A.; 75 L. J. Ch. 489; [1906] 2 Ch. 12; 94 L. T. 748 (C. A.).

Contract—Expenses of obtaining Private Act of Parliament—Agreement with Promoters of Railway Company—Clause in Act for Payment of Expenses—Pleading.

COMPANY.—The usual clause in a private act of parliament, directing the charges incident to procuring the act to be paid by the company incorporated by the act, does not render the company liable to pay for work done under an agreement made for good consideration between the plaintiff and the promoters, by which it was agreed that he should pay all the costs, &c., and that the company should not be liable to pay him any of the expenses incident to obtaining the act.

Declaration—That before the passing of a certain act of parliament of the 26 & 27 Vict., intituled 'An Act for making and maintaining Railways from Birkenhead and Poulton-cum-Leacombe to Hoylake, in the county of Chester,' the plaintiff bestowed his work and labour of great value, to wit, of the value of 5,000*l.*, and expended divers sums of money amounting in the whole to 3,000*l.*, in and about the applying for, and obtaining and passing of the said act, and in and about divers other matters and things and expenses preparatory and relating thereto; and it was in the said act provided that all the costs and charges and expenses of and incident to the obtaining and passing of the said act, or otherwise in relation thereto, should be paid by the defendants. And the plaintiff says that all things have been done, &c., to entitle him to be paid the said costs, charges and expenses by the defendants, but the defendants have not paid the same.

Second plea—on equitable grounds—that the plaintiff, before the passing of the said act, was desirous of obtaining the passing of the said act and of constructing the railway thereby authorized and empowered to be made, in order that certain other railways, in which the plaintiff was then interested, might be connected with the Birkenhead Docks, which said connexion would be effected by the passing of the said act and the construction of the said railway. And the defendants further say that the plaintiff, before the application to parliament for the said act, and before any part of the plaintiff's claim was incurred, induced certain other persons to become the promoters of the company by the said act incorporated, and to co-operate with the plaintiff in the applying for and obtaining the passing of the said act, upon the faith of an express agreement between the plaintiff and the said persons, that he the plaintiff would bear and pay all the costs, charges and expenses of applying for, and obtaining and passing the said act and in relation thereto, and that neither the said persons, nor the said company when incorporated, nor any other persons, should be liable to the plaintiff for the payment to him of the same or any part thereof.

Replications to this plea—First, that after the alleged agreement, and before any breach thereof, and before the passing of the said act, the said persons exonerated and discharged the plaintiff from his said agreement and from the performance thereof; secondly, that after the said alleged agreement, and before any breach thereof, and before the passing of the said act, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the said persons that the said contract should be rescinded, and they then rescinded the same accordingly.

Demurrer to the plea, and joinder in demurrer.

Demurrer to the replications, and joinder in demurrer.

Littler, in support of the demurrer to the plea.—The defendants cannot be allowed after the passing of the act to say that there was a prior agreement existing, to which they were not parties, by virtue of which they are to disobey the act. No guarantee could be enforced by the company which was given when there was no company in existence.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—That is, when the consideration is impeached on the ground of public policy. You should have replied that the consideration for this agreement was bad.]

The very passing of the act to which the company were parties prevents them from setting up this defence. They cannot say the clause crept in by mistake. It was submitted to the legislature by the very persons who are now trying to evade it.

[PIGOTT, B.—The clause amounts to nothing more than an authority to lay out part of the funds of the company in paying the preliminary expenses. It is contained in almost every act.]

In 4 Cruise's Dig. tit. 33, 'Private Act,' it is said that a private act was formerly considered an assurance of so high a nature that, although it had been obtained by fraud, it could not be relieved against by any Court of law or equity. Besides, the plea does not shew that the company comprises the promoters. It is really an irregular plea of never indebted.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—If the plaintiff had agreed to do all that was necessary for 1,000*l.*, he could not have sued for more, merely by virtue of the clause in the act. The act does not create a debt where there was no debt before.]

There was express knowledge on the part of the persons who allowed the clause to be inserted; and the clause can mean nothing if the plaintiff's contention be wrong.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The words in the act are "costs and charges, &c." The plaintiff has no right to be paid any costs and charges.]

He has paid everybody.

[PIGOTT, B.—Then, according to your contention, everybody would have a right to be paid over again.]

Wyatt v. the Metropolitan Board of Works (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 217) shews that the company can only be sued for the charges once for all.

[The Earl of Oxford's case (2 White & Tudor's Lead. Cases in Equity, 504, 2nd edit.) and Preston v. the Company of Proprietors of the Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle-upon-Tyne Junction Railway (5 H.L. Cas. 605; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 421) were also cited.]

R. E. Turner was not called upon to argue in support of the plea.¹

Per Curiam.²—The plea is a good one.

Judgment for the defendants on the demurrer to the plea.

(1) The argument on the demurrer to the replications resulted in the plaintiff obtaining leave to amend the replications, so as to shew exoneration and rescission, before the work was done or the charges, &c. incurred.

(2) Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B. and Pigott, B.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 22, 1865.

PARKER, devisee of BARROW, deceased, v. TOOTAL.

35 L. J. Ex. 53; L. R. 1 Ex. 41; 13 L. T. 378; 14 W. R. 183.

Error—24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. ss. 137, 148, 163.—Suggestion of Death of Plaintiff after Error brought—Liability of Devisee to Costs.

COSTS.—The plaintiff in an action of ejectment died after bringing error. His devisee entered a suggestion of the death under section 163. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and continued the proceedings in error. The judgment of the Court below was subsequently affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords:—Held, that the devisee was not liable to any costs incurred prior to the entry of the suggestion,—the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, being intended only to simplify proceedings in error, and not to impose any liability to costs where it did not previously exist.

Barrow v. Tootal was an action of ejectment tried at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1859, when a verdict was found for the defendant, subject to a special case. The special case was argued in this court in May, 1860, when judgment was given "that the verdict found for the defendant shall stand, &c., and that the defendant do recover against the claimant 400*l.* for his costs of defence."

On the 24th of July, 1860, the plaintiff Barrow entered a suggestion of error upon the roll, and in November, 1861, died, having devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to the present plaintiff Parker (and two others who renounced).

On the 30th of November, 1861, Parker entered a suggestion of Barrow's death, announcing that he was the "legal representative" of the deceased, and as such entitled to continue the proceedings in error.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber, in February, 1862, gave judgment that the decision of the Court below should be affirmed, and "that the said defendant do recover against the said now claimant 400*l.* for his costs of defence in this behalf by the Court of error now here adjudged to the said defendant," &c.

The case was subsequently taken up to the House of Lords, who, in 1864, affirmed the previous decisions, and dismissed the appeal with costs.

The defendant's attorney then delivered a bill of costs to the plaintiff Parker, commencing with the original instructions to defend in 1858. On the parties appearing before him, the Master taxed the costs pro formâ at 400*l.*, in order that an application might be made for an order to review the taxation; and Martin, B. having heard the matter at chambers referred it to the Court.

The following are the sections of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, bearing on the case:

Section 137. "In case of the death of a sole plaintiff or sole surviving plaintiff, the legal representative of such plaintiff may, by leave of the Court or a Judge, enter a suggestion of the death, and that he is such legal representative, and the action shall thereupon proceed; and if such suggestion be made before the trial, the truth of the suggestion shall be tried thereat, together with the title of deceased plaintiff, and such judgment shall follow upon the verdict in favour of or against the person making such suggestion, as if such person were originally the plaintiff."

Section 148. "A writ of error shall not be necessary or used in any cause, and the proceeding to error shall be a step in the cause, and shall be taken in manner hereinafter mentioned; but nothing in this act contained shall invalidate any proceedings already taken or to be taken by reason of any writ of error issued before the commencement of this act."

Section 163. "In case of the death of a sole plaintiff, or of several plaintiffs in error, the legal representative of such plaintiff, or of the surviving plaintiff, may, by leave of the Court or a Judge, enter a suggestion of the death, and that he is such legal representative, which suggestion shall not be traversable, but shall only be subject to be set aside if untrue, and the proceedings may thereupon be continued at the suit of, and against such legal representative as the plaintiff in error; and if no such suggestion shall be made, the defendant in error may proceed to an affirmance of the judgment according to the practice of the Court, or take such other proceedings thereupon as he may be entitled to."

Gray now moved for a rule calling on the defendant to shew cause why the Master should not review his taxation.—Barrow's executors are liable to the costs in the Court below, and Parker, who was no party to the judgment there, is not to pay more than his own costs. There is no statute giving costs against a devisee. The 8 & 9 Will. 3. c. 11. s. 2. gives costs against a plaintiff or demandant;¹ but Parker is neither plaintiff nor demandant.

[Pigott, B.—The question arises only by virtue of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.]

That statute does not impose any liability to pay costs which did not exist before; it merely renders unnecessary certain proceedings which were requisite before the passing of the act. Fisher v. Bridges (4 El. & B. 666; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 165) and Marshall v. Jackson (Ibid. 669, note; Ibid. 166, note) shew that the 148th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, making error a step in the cause, does not affect the costs, but that it merely alters the form of proceeding in error, without touching its effect. Besides, the cause was at an end by reason of the judgment below.—[He also cited James v. Cochrane (9 Exch. Rep. 552; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 126), which was decided on the 151st section.]

Cleasby shewed cause in the first instance.—In both the cases cited for the plaintiff, the judgment of the Court below was reversed, and the ground of the decisions was that costs in error should be taxed as costs in the cause, and that there was nothing in the 148th section of the Common Law Procedure Act to do away with the practice. If the devisee suggests the death of the original plaintiff under this act, he stands in his place; and it is clear from section 137. that, if he had done so at any stage in the Court below, he would have made himself liable to all the costs. The proceedings cannot be divided at the moment when Parker suggested the death of the original plaintiff. In Benge v. Swaine (15 Com. B. Rep. 784; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) it was held, that the 138th section put the administratrix of a defendant, who died after issue joined, in the same position as the original defendant, and ordered the plaintiff to pay her full costs on discontinuing the action.

[Pollock, C.B.—That is a very different matter; if a man discontinue his suit, he should of course pay all costs.]

Then, again, the fact of the suit being in error makes no difference. The successful party might be compelled to account to the executors of the deceased for the costs; but still he would have been entitled to recover them all.

[Channell, B.—To make out your case the words in the 163rd section should be as strong as those in the 137th.]

The effect of the 137th, 148th and 163rd sections taken together is, that the person continuing the action becomes a party, and stands exactly in the same position as the original plaintiff.—[He also referred to Chitty's Archbold,

(1) This section enacts, that if any person or persons shall commence or prosecute in any court of record any action, plaint or suit, whereon, upon any demurrer either by plaintiff or defendant, demandant or tenant, judgment shall be given by the Court against such plaintiff or defendant, or if at any time after judgment given for the defendant in any such action, plaint or suit, the plaintiff or demandant shall sue any writ or writs of error to annul the said judgment, and the said judgment shall be afterwards affirmed to be good, or the said writ of error shall be discontinued, or the plaintiff shall be nonsuit therein, the defendant or tenant in every such action, plaint, suit or writ of error, shall have judgment to recover his costs against every such plaintiff or plaintiffs, demandant or demandants, and have execution for the same by ca. sa., ff. ja. or elegit.

11th edit. 577, and the forms of judgment in error in Chitty's Forms, 9th edit. 282 et seqq.]

Gray, in support of the rule, was stopped by the Court.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The Common Law Procedure Act does not expressly give the costs, and if the devisee were to pay these costs, I do not see how he could recover them from the executors. He would certainly have no legal claim, though he might have a good equitable or moral claim. The devisee made himself a party to the writ of error after the writ of error had been allowed; he had nothing to do with taking the step, but joined in the writ of error after the step was taken; and he is therefore not liable to any costs before the suggestion. I therefore think the rule should be made absolute.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion, with the Lord Chief Baron, that the rule should be absolute, calling upon the Master to review his taxation. It seems to me important to bear in mind that costs can only be claimed by a litigant party pursuant to some statute, either that of Gloucester or some other act passed since. How, then, would the case have stood before the Common Law Procedure Act? The authorities are collected in *Wms. Saund.*²; and it is quite clear that the defendant, who succeeded in the Court below, would not have been deprived of his costs on the death of the plaintiff, but he must have got them from the executors by a scire facias quare executionem non.³ Therefore the defendant had a right to his costs on the judgment of the Court below being preserved, but he must have got them from the executors.

Now, the Common Law Procedure Act was intended to simplify the proceedings in error, and thereby to diminish the costs and expenses in error; and it permits a party to come in, not only before verdict, but to come in after verdict and judgment, and pending the writ of error.

I take it to be clear by the 137th section that if, before verdict, Parker had come in and made himself, by suggestion, a party to the suit, then the cause would have gone on as if Parker had been originally the plaintiff; and, in point of law, as regards the question of costs, we should have taken no notice of the substitution of one name for another. But here Parker has not been from the very beginning the plaintiff.

Now, it being conceded that the defendant's right to the costs must be one given by the statute, this question turns upon the 163rd section, the language of which differs remarkably from that of the 137th. The words are, not that the proceedings in error are to be carried on as the action in the other case,—“as if such person had been originally the plaintiff”; but “the proceedings may thereupon be continued at the suit of and against such legal representative as the plaintiff in error”; that is, to prevent the suit abating, and to permit its continuance, but not pointing to any liability as regards the costs of the action below.

And it has been decided in Fisher v. Bridges (4 El. & B. 666; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 165), which appears to be very much in point,—and in another case, which, though not directly in point, appears to have a strong bearing upon the subject,—that the object of the act was to render unnecessary certain proceedings that were requisite before, and, with relation to those proceedings, to reduce the amount of costs; but it does not entail any new liability that did not exist before; so that, where a party was not liable to costs in error before, he is not liable by the act. So, in James v. Cochrane (9 Exch. Rep. 552; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 126), it was held that where a party was not before liable to give bail, he is not now liable to give bail. Now, by way of accounting for the omission of the words found in the 137th section from the 163rd, we are told that when the act provided that the allowance of a writ of error should be “a step in the cause,” it had the effect of preventing error being, as it were, a new proceeding, and bound it up and blended it with the old proceedings. I am, however, unable to adopt this view, and for the reasons which I have already given.

(2) In vol. 2, part 1, notes to Jaques v. Cesar.

(3) See Tidd's Practice, 9th edit. 1163.

PIGOTT, B.—The case is not a very satisfactory one, for there is some difficulty in determining exactly the meaning of the words used by the legislature. The defendant argues from the 148th section that, inasmuch as error is to be “a step in the cause,” it is to be a step in the cause for all purposes, including the question of costs.

Now, in the case of Fisher v. Bridges (4 El. & B. 666; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 165), the Court of Queen’s Bench determined that the 148th section really had no operation as regards liability to costs. It is true in that case there was a reversal; whereas in the present case the judgment of the Court below was affirmed; but, in the result, I agree with my Brother Channell in the conclusion he has drawn from the several sections, and I think that we cannot infer from the 148th section that a new liability is to attach to a person becoming a party by suggestion of a death, as in the present case. If the legislature had intended to alter the law in reference to costs in that respect, they would have said so, and not have left it to be found out by drawing inferences from several other sections. I therefore think that the taxation must be reviewed.⁴

Rule absolute to review the taxation by disallowing the defendant’s costs of the action and of the proceedings in error prior to the entry of the suggestion of the death of the deceased claimant.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 25, 1865.

BOOTH, BART. v. TAYLOR.

35 L. J. Ex. 56; 4 H. & C. 70; 13 L. T. 408; 14 W. R. 131; 11 Jur. N.S. 981.

Practice—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. ss. 79, 81.—Declaration claiming Writ of Injunction—Pleading.

PRACTICE.—A defendant cannot plead to so much of a declaration as claims a writ of injunction,—the claim being in the nature of a notice only that the plaintiff intends subsequently to ask for the writ.

The declaration was for obstructing the light and air from entering a warehouse, of which the plaintiff was the reversioner, and concluded with a claim for a writ of injunction to restrain the defendant from the continuance and repetition of the injuries complained of, and the committal of other injuries of a like kind relating to the same right.

The defendant pleaded, inter alia, a plea upon equitable grounds to the claim for a writ of injunction (except so far as the same referred to the committal of other injuries of a like kind relating to the same right),—“that the said alleged obstruction of light and air was originally caused by the erection, by the defendant, of certain buildings upon certain lands next adjoining the said warehouse; and that after the defendant had so erected the said buildings, and before any complaint had been made by the plaintiff in respect thereof, the defendant lawfully demised certain portions of the said buildings to certain persons, for certain terms therein respectively, which said demises respectively had not, nor had any or either of them respectively, expired or been otherwise determined at the commencement of this suit, or from thence hitherto; and that by reason of the premises, the defendant is, and from the commencement of this action always has been, unable to prevent a continuance and repetition of the said injuries, and will be unable to obey the said writ of injunction so far as relates to the alleged obstruction caused by the portions of the said buildings so demised as aforesaid, without being guilty of a trespass against his tenants respectively in so doing; and the defendant further says, that he has already put an end to the said obstruction caused by the residue of the said buildings other than the portions so demised as aforesaid."

(4) Martin, B. entered the court during the argument, and intimated that his opinion was in favour of the plaintiff’s contention.

Martin, B. refused to strike out this plea at chambers; and the plaintiff thereupon appealed from his decision to the Court.

The following sections of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, refer to the claim:

Section 79. "In all cases of breach of contract or other injury, where the party injured is entitled to maintain and has brought an action, he may, in like case and manner as hereinbefore provided with respect to mandamus, claim a writ of injunction against the repetition or continuance of such breach of contract, or other injury, or the committal of any breach of contract or injury of a like kind, arising out of the same contract, or relating to the same property or right; and he may also in the same action include a claim for damages or other redress."

Section 81.—"The proceedings in such action shall be the same, as nearly as may be, and subject to the like control, as the proceedings in an action to obtain a mandamus under the provisions hereinbefore contained; and, in such action, judgment may be given that the writ of injunction do or do not issue, as justice may require; and, in case of disobedience, such writ of injunction may be enforced by attachment by the Court, or, when such Courts shall not be sitting, by a Judge."

T. I. Barstow having obtained a rule, calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plea should not be struck out, Kemplay shewed cause accordingly, contending that there was no reason why a demand for an injunction should not be pleaded to. In Bilke v. the London, Chatham and Dover Railway (3 H. & C. 95; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 206) a demurrer to a claim for an injunction was not allowed, but it is to be implied from the judgment that a case might occur in which such a claim would be properly dealt with by a demurrer; and if so, why not also by plea? There must exist cases which would require facts to be brought before the Court, and under which, therefore, a plea would be the proper mode of treating the claim. If the defendant can state facts shewing that there should be no judgment for a writ of injunction, then the plea would be open to a demurrer according to the opinion of Mr. Baron Bramwell in Bilke's case (3 H. & C. 95; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 206).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—How can the question whether the writ should issue or not be the subject of pleading?]

If it cannot be, it may be asked, what is the meaning of the 81st section? The 69th and 70th sections¹ shew that, in the case of a mandamus, there may be pleadings. If the question may be raised by demurrer, why may it not be raised by plea? If the case were to go to trial without this plea, the plaintiff would get his injunction at once; the 81st section shews this.

Barstow was not called upon to support his rule.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The plea must be struck out. The plaintiff's claim for

(1) The 70th section enacts: that "The pleadings and other proceedings in any action in which a writ of mandamus is claimed, shall be the same in all respects, as nearly as may be, and costs shall be recoverable by either party, as in an ordinary action for the recovery of damages."

the writ of injunction is merely preliminary to his asking for it; it is in the nature of a notice, and does not call for a plea at all.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that anything said by me in Bilke's case (3 H. & C. 95; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 206) supports the defendant's view of the case.

CHANNELL, B.—This plea must not be allowed. The matter is not ripe for pleading at its present stage. The statute was intended to enable the plaintiff to entitle himself to an injunction after the trial of the issues. To be in a position to ask for his injunction, the plaintiff must give notice of his intention to do so in his declaration. But the two proceedings are quite distinct and divisible from each other.

PIGOTT, B.—The plea might raise an expensive and useless issue, which need not be disposed of till the injunction is actually asked for.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 20, 1865.

BOULNOIS AND ANOTHER v. MANN.

35 L. J. Ex. 58; 4 H. & C. 9; L. R. 1 Ex. 28; 13 L. T. 531; 14 W. R. 181; 11 Jur. N.S. 1006.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134.—Unreasonable Clause—Certificate of Trustee as to Statutory Majority of Creditors.

BANKRUPTCY.—A provision in a composition deed that the debtor shall pay the composition agreed on "as soon as the trustee shall certify that the deed has been executed or assented to by the statutory majority of the creditors," is unreasonable, as it renders necessary for the acquirement of the non-assenting creditor's rights under the deed another condition, in addition to those on which his obligations arise under the statute.

Declaration on the common indebitatus counts, and on a bill of exchange accepted by the defendant.

The first plea—which was pleaded to the count on the bill, and to so much of the other causes of action as accrued up to the 15th of August, 1863—set out a deed of composition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, dated on the 15th of August, 1863, and made between the defendant of the first part, a surety of the second part, a trustee of the third part, and the several persons who had assented thereto, or whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed and affixed, being respectively creditors, either in their own right or in co-partnership, or attornies or agents of creditors of the defendant, of the fourth part. The clauses material to this case were as follows:

Clause 4. "As soon as the trustee shall, in writing, under his hand and seal, certify that these presents have been executed, or in writing assented to, or approved of by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the now existing creditors of the debtor whose debts respectively amount to 10*l.* and upwards, the debtor shall pay to each of his now existing creditors such a sum or composition dividend as shall be equal to the amount of 5*s.* in the pound upon the whole debt now due to such creditors respectively."

Clause 10. "Unless and until these presents shall become void under the proviso hereinafter contained, the creditors of the debtor who shall have executed, or otherwise acceded to, or become bound by these presents, shall not, nor shall any of them, nor shall their respective heirs, executors, or administrators, or partners, or assignees, at any time (except so far as may be necessary in order to enforce any mortgage, lien, or security, or any rights or remedies against any persons other than the debtor) commence or prosecute any action or suit at law or in equity, or other proceeding, or obtain, or endeavour to obtain, any adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor or his heirs, &c., or make or sue out any attachment or sequestration of or upon him or them, or his or their property, credits or effects, for or on account of all or any part of the debts now due from the debtor to the said creditors who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to or be bound by these presents, or any of them, or for or on account of any claim of such creditor, provable under these presents; and if any of the last-mentioned creditors or their heirs, executors, administrators, partners or assigns shall, in any respect, fail to observe this agreement, then, and in every such case, this present agreement shall operate and enure, and may be pleaded in bar as an effectual release of such debts or claims, and all demands in respect thereof."

Clause 12. "In case, and as soon as, the trustee shall, at any time hereafter, certify by writing, under his hand, that a sufficient proportion, in his judgment, in number and value of the creditors of the debtor has not executed, or in writing assented to, or approved of these presents, or the provisions hereof, or in case the debtor shall fail to pay the amounts hereinbefore covenanted to be paid by him, or any, or any one of them, or any part thereof, to the creditors or creditor to whom the same are or is respectively due upon the same being demanded by such creditors or creditor, then and in either of such cases, these presents and everything herein contained shall, except as to any acts or things heretofore done in pursuance hereof, and without prejudice to any right of action theretofore accrued hereunder, cease and be void."

The plea averred that all the conditions required by the statute had been complied with, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was bound by the deed.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Holl, in support of the demurrer.—The 4th clause, taken in connexion with the 12th, is unreasonable. The debtor is to pay, not upon the event of the requisite number of creditors having assented, but on the trustee certifying to that effect. By the 10th clause the creditors are precluded from suing until the deed is void under the 12th clause by reason of the trustee certifying that the deed has not been executed by a sufficient number of the creditors, or till default in payment by the debtor. The two clauses together shew that the debtor can make no default until the trustee has certified. The trustee has an absolute discretion in the matter; he may wait for years, or may die, and never certify that the requisite number have assented. Even if this were reasonable with respect to the assenting creditors, it cannot be so as to the non-assenting. The right of action is barred before it is known whether the deed will be operative or not; and there is no provision against the contingency of the trustee making a wrong decision. Again, the plea contains no allegation that the trustee has certified, nor that the composition has been paid or tendered.

Harington, contra.—As to the 4th clause it is not to be assumed that the trustee, who is appointed for the protection of the creditors, will act negligently. If he do so act, they have a remedy against him in equity. His intervention only supplies a convenient machinery for ascertaining when the composition should be paid. It would be hard upon the debtor if he were to pay too soon. When once the deed has been signed by the required majority, the clause is not unreasonable. The 12th clause must refer to assenting creditors only; as if a sufficient number have not executed the deed, the dissentients would never be bound, whether the trustee certified or not. Some such provision was necessary for the executing or assenting creditors. If the trustee had certified, the plaintiff should have replied to that effect, and so have shewn the deed to be void.

[BRAMWELL, B.—Where is the right of action between the time of execution by the requisite number of creditors and the granting of the trustee's certificate,—in gremio legis or in nubibus?]

It is as if there were a covenant to pay the composition on a fixed day—a day to be fixed by the trustee.

HOLL, in reply.—Though the 12th clause per se may not affect the validity of the deed, yet, taken with the 4th clause, on which the question turns, it is unreasonable. As a matter of fact, trustees are generally creditors chosen as being favourable to the debtor. Payment ought not to be dependent on anything but the event which makes the deed binding on the dissentient creditors.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. One rule we have to go by is, that a deed of this sort is not valid if it contain any unreasonable condition, or if it do not put all creditors upon the same footing. Perhaps in this case they would all be on the same footing if the deed were valid; but it contains the provision, that the money is not to be paid till a certain person appointed by the deed has certified that it has been assented to by the requisite number of creditors. This seems to me to be a perfectly novel condition, and wholly unwarranted by the act of parliament. Those who contract in these matters have no right to put in a clause of that sort. It is quite obvious it may create great difficulty; for if the certificate be not obtained, the estate is not to be administered. I think that the legislature intended that when once the requisite number of creditors had assented, then the deed should be valid, and that its validity should not depend on something more being done than the statute requires. I think, therefore, that this deed is not within the act so as to be binding on the creditors who have not assented to it.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that this 4th clause is unreasonable in point of law, as well as inexpedient in point of policy. It is very nearly a violation of the rule that the power and authority given to one person cannot be delegated by him to another. According to the act, the non-assenting creditor is not bound till a certain event has happened; when that event has happened, he is bound. If that be so, why should anything further have to be done in the way of ascertaining that fact before his rights are given to him under the deed, when his liabilities are already forced upon him? If it had been that nobody should be bound if the certificate were not given, that would have been more reasonable. But here the dissentient creditor is to be bound, and yet is to have no rights. Upon that ground, therefore, and not on the supposition that the trustee might not do his duty, my judgment is for the plaintiff.

CHANNELL, B.—I agree that the judgment of the Court should be for the plaintiff. It is not necessary to hold that this requisition is inexpedient, or to assume that the trustee might not do his duty; but, taking it for granted that the provision would be fairly and properly worked out, still the deed does not disclose a legal answer to the action. I must take it upon this plea that the deed itself has been executed by the requisite number of creditors; and therefore the question is, what is its operation as against the plaintiffs? If the 4th clause were struck out altogether, it seems it would be impossible to contend that this is a good plea. I take it that, if the 4th clause provided for the payment of composition on execution of the deed by three-fourths of the creditors, that would have been a good contract for composition; but the introductory words in that clause make the composition payable only in the event of the trustee giving a certificate, and there is no other time specified for payment. I do not think that that is a reasonable condition. If it be struck out or disregarded, there is nothing in the deed to bar the plaintiff's right of action; and I think when the statute has provided that a deed executed by three-fourths in number and value shall be a good deed, provided certain other conditions be complied with, one of which is, that an affidavit shall be filed stating that the requisite number in writing have assented, I see no reason for resorting to any other mode of ascertaining the fact that it is so.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 25, 1865.

In the matter of THE SHEFFIELD WATERWORKS ACT, 1864, and in the claims of GEORGE WRAITHBY AND GEORGE COLLISS.

35 L. J. Ex. 60; L. R. 1 Ex. 54; 13 L. T. 440; 14 W. R. 143; 4 H. & C. 74; 11 Jur. N.S. 954.

Observed upon, Owen v. London and North Western Railway, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Q.B. 35; L. R. 3 Q.B. 54; 17 L. T. 210; 16 W. R. 125 (Q.B.).

Local Act—Taxation by Master of Superior Court of Costs under the Sheffield Waterworks Act, 1864—Review of Taxation by the Court.

COSTS.—The 67th section of the Sheffield Waterworks Act, 1864, provided for the costs, payable in respect of claims under the act, being taxed and settled by a Master of a superior Court of law at Westminster, on the principles and according to the rules and on payment of the fees observed and paid on the taxation and settlement of costs in actions at law. The Court refused to review the taxation of these costs by one of its Masters, on the ground that the costs were in no sense given by an award of the Court, and that the Master did not tax the costs in his capacity of officer of the Court, but merely as one of a class of persons named in the act of parliament.

The Sheffield Waterworks Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. cccxxiv.), was passed for the purposes of facilitating and expediting the settlement of the amounts to be paid in respect of damages incurred by reason of the bursting of the reservoir of the Sheffield Waterworks Company, on the night of the 11th of March, 1864.

For the purpose of assessing and settling the amounts to be paid in respect of such damages, three Commissioners were appointed under the act, styled the Sheffield Inundation Commissioners. The assessment of damages was completed within the time prescribed by the act, being nine months after the passing thereof; and the Commissioners granted their certificate under the act on the 26th of May, 1865, the total number of claims being 4,589; and the total amount of damages 276,909*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*

The 66th section of the act contained rules to be observed as to the burden of costs being borne according to the result of the claim. Then the 67th section provided that "all such costs as aforesaid shall be due and payable from and by the company and any claimant respectively, at the expiration of six months after the making of the general certificate: provided, that all such costs shall, in case of difference, be taxed and settled, on production of a certificate of the Commissioners, by a Master of a superior Court of law at Westminster on the principles, and according to the rules, and on payment of the fees observed and paid on the taxation and settlement of costs in actions at law, if application for such taxation and settlement is made by either party within the last-mentioned period of six months; but in case of difference, any such costs shall not be payable at any time unless they are so taxed and settled."

The 68th section provided that, "if any costs payable under this act by the company or a claimant are not paid within twenty-eight days after demand in writing, the certificate of the Commissioners respecting such costs shall have the effect as against the company or claimant of a judgment recovered for the amount of such costs against the company or the claimant in one of the superior Courts of law at Westminster, as on the day of the date of the general certificate, and afterwards duly registered; but payment of such amount shall have the effect of satisfaction duly entered upon such judgment: provided, that all mortgages, terminable annuities and debenture stock, granted or created by the company under this act or any former act, and all stock and shares created by the company under this act or any former act, for the redemption or in lieu of mortgage or bond debt, shall have priority over all monies payable by the company in respect of costs under this act."

The bills of costs of the claimants Wraithby and Colliss were, among several hundred others, taxed by a Master of the Court of Exchequer, with whose taxation the company were dissatisfied for several reasons.

Pickering accordingly obtained a rule to shew cause why the taxation should not be reviewed, and Manisty (Shepherd with him) now appeared to shew cause, contending that as the costs were not payable by virtue of a judgment of this Court, the Court had no jurisdiction to review the taxation.

Pickering, Mellish and Quain, being called upon to support the rule, contended that the Master acted as an officer of the Court, and not as an independent arbitrator. The judgment must be entered up in the court where the costs are taxed, and the words, "on the principles and according to the rules, &c. in actions at law," must mean that he is to do it under the surveillance of the Court of which he is an officer.

[CHANNELL, B.—The claimants get their costs by the judgment of the Commissioners. Sections 67. and 68. must be taken together.]

Either party may apply to any Master. Suppose different views taken by different Masters. There must be somebody to decide. If the taxing is to be done on the principles of the Courts of law, the guardians of those principles must preside over the taxation. The Commissioners cannot decide the question, for they are functi officio. The act says, that their proceedings shall not be interfered with, but makes no such provision as to the Master's taxation. Suppose he has exceeded his duty, is his taxation to be looked at in the light of an award? or is there to be a prerogative writ of mandamus to compel him to do his duty, e. g. a writ of mandamus from the Court of Queen's Bench to a Master of this court to review his taxation?

[They admitted that there was one case against their view—In re Ross and the York, Newcastle and Berwick Railway Company (5 Rail. Cas. 516; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 199), decided on the 52nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It appears to me that if it were intended that we should review this taxation (which is a matter wholly out of our jurisdiction), the legislature would have taken care specially to say so. The legislature has not so done, and therefore I think that if we were to interfere we should be taking upon ourselves a jurisdiction not intended to be given to us.

BRAMWELL, B.—Those who seek to shew that we have the power and authority which they call upon us to exercise should give a reason for our doing so. Now, I think there can be two reasons given to the contrary. One of them is, that, as to the costs of an ordinary action, it is the Court that awards them, and it is the Master or an officer of the Court who fixes them, and his award is, in truth, the award of the Court; and therefore inevitably there is an appeal from the officer to whom the Court has delegated the inquiry. On turning to this particular act of parliament, no such reasoning as that would apply. These costs are in no sense given by the award of the Court. Again, by section 67, in case of difference, the costs are to be taxed and settled by the Master of a superior Court of law at Westminster. Now, that does not mean a Master of any particular Court, but any one of all the Masters of all the three Courts. And I take it to be clear upon that, that any Master to whom application has been made might say, that he had not time to attend to the matter, and that the parties must go somewhere else. If his objection were not made bonâ fide, he would be liable to an indictment for not performing his duty. But for all that it is not as a mere officer of the Court, but as one of a certain number of designated persons, that the Master has this duty put upon him, so that no appeal lies from him to us. It no more lies because the Master who taxes happens to be a Master of this Court, than it would lie if he happened to be a Master of any other Court. It seems, therefore, that there is no authority in this case for granting what is asked.

CHANNELL, B. and PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

Nov. 30, 1865.

ROBERTS AND ANOTHER v. ROSE.*

35 L. J. Ex. 62; 4 H. & C. 103; L. R. 1 Ex 82; 13 L. T. 471; 14 W. R. 225;
12 Jur. N.S. 78.

Watercourse—Right to obstruct—Abatement of Nuisance—Damage to Innocent Person.

NUISANCE. WATER.—In abating a nuisance to his property, a man may be justified in interfering (so far as is necessary) with the property of the wrongdoer, but not in interfering with the property of innocent third persons; and, consequently, where there are alternative modes of abating the nuisance, he is bound to choose that mode which may inflict damage, however great, on the wrongdoer, rather than that which would be productive of mischief, however small, to innocent third persons or to the public.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, against the decision of the Court of Exchequer (May 4, 1864), making absolute a rule to enter a nonsuit.

The pleadings and the facts, which were stated for the Court of appeal in the form of a special case, are set out at length in the report below—33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 241.¹

The facts were shortly as follow.—The plaintiffs, who were the lessees of a colliery under Sir Horace St. Paul, obtained his consent to make a watercourse on his land (then in the occupation of William Lowe) to carry off the water pumped from their colliery. Lowe consented also, and in fact used a considerable quantity of water for his own purposes, the remainder running down an old mineshaft on Sir Horace St. Paul's land. Sir Horace St. Paul subsequently required the plaintiffs to extend their watercourse so as to convey their water to a canal-basin in the neighbourhood. They accordingly made a watercourse for this purpose. The defendant shortly afterwards obtained a lease from Sir Horace St. Paul of the coal in and under the land over which the water now ran; and finding that some of the water still escaped down the old mine-shaft into his colliery works, he, in January, 1863, gave the plaintiffs notice that he would not allow the water to continue to come that way, and that if they did not provide another channel for it, it would be stopped. And accordingly he did subsequently stop it on the surface of the land occupied by Lowe, at a point close to the plaintiffs' land; and their colliery was subsequently flooded. It was in evidence that the water could not have been stopped elsewhere on Lowe's land without causing damage to him and to a public road.

* Coram, Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Montague Smith, J. and Lush J.

(1) See also 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 1.

The main issues were, whether the plaintiffs had a continuing or a revocable licence only to carry the water over the defendant's land; and whether, the defendant having the right to stop the water, it was reasonable that he should have stopped it where he did, supposing that it could have been stopped elsewhere on Lowe's land, causing comparatively little damage to Lowe and to a public road, and far less damage to the plaintiffs than was actually caused.

The argument of Mellish (with whom was H. Matthews), for the appellant, was substantially the same as that for the plaintiffs in the Court below.

Gray and Macnamara appeared for the defendant, but were not called upon to argue.

BLACKBURN, J.—We are all agreed that the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed. Where a person seeks to justify his having interfered with the property of another for the purpose of abating a nuisance, he may be justified if the other be a wrongdoer, but only in so far as his interference was necessary for the purpose. And we agree with the Court below, that, in abating a nuisance, if there be two ways of doing it, that way must be chosen by which the lesser mischief will be done.

We are also agreed, that where, in the alternative way of abating the nuisance, there may be some wrong done to the property of an innocent person or to the public, that mode cannot be adopted. No interference with property can be justified, unless it be the property of the wrongdoer. Applying this to the present case, we think, first, that the licence originally given to the plaintiffs, with Lowe's consent, by the defendant's lessor (he being at the time owner of the three adjoining pieces of property), was that the plaintiffs might pump their water into Lowe's watercourse, whence it would flow across Lowe's land, and then across the defendant's into the canal. And the effect of the arrangement between the three parties was, that this was merely a revocable licence, to be in force so long only as Lowe permitted the water to flow over his own land, and the defendant also authorized the flowing across his land. Then, when the defendant revoked his licence, and said the water should no longer come on to his land, I think the plaintiffs, having notice of the revocation, were wrongdoers in continuing to pump the water into Lowe's watercourse. Lowe had authorized them to do it, so long as it could run off on to the defendant's land, but so long only. Now, if the defendant had come to Lowe and said to him, "I can no longer allow this water to flow on to my land, therefore you must take care of yourself," Lowe would doubtless have said to the plaintiffs, "Stop the water coming to me, unless you can make some arrangement to take it away from me." There can be no question that the plaintiffs after that would have had no right to complain if Lowe had stopped the water coming on to his land; if that had been done, the very same mischief would have been done against the plaintiffs as has now been done, only it would have been done through Lowe and at Lowe's instance.

Now, could the defendant, without giving Lowe notice, have lawfully built a dam lower down, and so have turned Lowe's land into a pond? It seems to me he could not; it would have been a wrong against Lowe, and there is nothing to justify an interference with his property; the cause of action which Lowe would have had would not have been the defendant's building a dam on his own land, but the doing it when the effect of it would have been, without excuse, to cause the water to flow over Lowe's land,—not the obstructing of the watercourse, but the causing the water to flood Lowe's land. Therefore, if the defendant had stopped it in the way in which the plaintiffs say he ought to have stopped it, he would have done a wrong to Lowe, and to the public road.

That being so, I think we must take into account all that I have already said in considering what was a reasonable way of abating the nuisance, so as to cause the least mischief. If we look to the mischief actually done to the wrongdoer's property, and consider at the same time that mischief would have been done to an innocent person if the water had been stopped in any other way, the fair and the reasonable way to stop the water would certainly seem to be to stop it in such a way as not to injure the innocent person.

There is one smaller point, arising from the fact that the defendant, in stopping the water as he did, necessarily committed a trespass against Lowe in crossing his land, and in filling up the watercourse where he did; and my Brother Montague Smith has some doubt whether or not the fact of the obstruction, involving thus either way a wrong against Lowe, did not raise a question for the jury. The point was not put at the trial, and the majority of the Court think that though the balance of these two wrongs might raise a question for the jury, the slightness of one wrong compared with the other brings it within the rule on which the Courts constantly act, viz. not to disturb a nonsuit merely because of there having been a scintilla of evidence for the jury, which, if it had been put to them, would not have warranted a verdict for the plaintiff.

MELLOR, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I entirely agree in the principles of my Brother Blackburn's decision. I only doubt if it was not for the jury, upon the evidence, to say whether, having regard to the position of Lowe, the defendant had stopped this watercourse in a manner which would create the least mischief under all the circumstances of the case. Now, I think that if the defendant could have entered on Lowe's land without committing a trespass on Lowe, or if he could have stopped the water at a point lower down, and so have thrown the water upon the land of Lowe without subjecting himself to an action on the case by Lowe, then the defendant would have been open to this action on the part of the plaintiffs, because in that case, having two methods open to him, he chose that which did the greater injury to the plaintiffs. It appears clearly, however, upon the evidence, that the defendant could not have stopped the water lower down without flooding Lowe's land; and if the facts had remained there, then no doubt the nonsuit would have been right. But it appears to me that, stopping the water at the point where he did, the defendant was, in fact committing a wrong against Lowe, for which Lowe might have brought an action against him; so that the question of greater or less mischief to Lowe does, as it appears to me, arise, and that seems rather a matter for the jury. But, upon the whole of the facts, I think that the jury were not right in coming to the conclusion to which they did; and I only wish to express the doubt I feel whether we are not taking the province of a jury too much upon us in deciding that there was no evidence for their consideration. Upon the rest of the case, I entirely agree with my learned Brothers; substantial justice has been done, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

June 21, 22; Dec. 1, 1865.

WOODS AND ANOTHER v. DE MATTOS.*

35 L. J. Ex. 64; L. R. 1 Ex. 91; 14 W. R. 226; 12 Jur. N.S. 78.

Distinguished, Hoggarth v. Taylor, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 61; L. R. 2 Ex. 105; 15 L. T. 588 (Ex.). Referred to, Robertson v. Goss, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 251; L. R. 2 Ex. 396; 16 L. T. 566; 15 W. R. 965 (Ex.). Approved but distinguished, Sharland v. Spence, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 230; L. R. 2 C.P. 456; 16 L. T. 355; 15 W. R. 767 (C.P.). Commented on and not applied, In re Thompson; Ex parte Wilmot, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Bk. 17; L. R. 2 Ch. 795; 16 L. T. 650; 15 W. R. 969 (L.C. & L. JJ.). Applied, Hooper v. Marshall, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. C.P. 14; L. R. 5 C.P. 4; 21 L. T. 639 (C.P.). See, Bailey v. Bowen, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Q.B. 61; L. R. 3 Q.B. 133; 17 L. T. 470; 16 W. R. 396 (Q.B.). Not applied, Solomon v. Isaacs, 1873, 27 L. T. 624 (Ex. Ch.).

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192.—Deed of Inspectorship—Meaning of "Creditors"—Reasonable Provisions.

BANKRUPTCY.—Throughout the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, the word "creditor" is used in the sense of a person having a claim which can be proved under the bankruptcy, whether upon a debt or not; and in the 192nd section of the act, the word "creditors" means all persons who at the time of the execution of the deed had claims which would have been provable against the estate if the debtor had then become bankrupt. So held, by Crompton, J., Blackburn, J. and Byles, J.,—Willes, J. dubitante.

The validity of the deed in Strick v. De Mattos (3 Hurl. & C. 22; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 276) established.

This case arose out of a deed of inspectorship under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and was in substance an appeal from the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Strick v. De Mattos (3 Hurl. & C. 22; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 276), where the same deed was held to be valid.

The deed was expressed to be made between the debtor of the first part, his inspectors of the second part, and "the several persons, companies and co-partnership firms who at the date hereof are respectively creditors of the said debtor, or who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication in bankruptcy against the said debtor founded on a petition filed on the day of the date of these presents, hereinafter called the said creditors," of the third part.

In addition to the clauses objected to in the Court below as being unreasonable—which are set out at length in the report of Strick v. De Mattos (3 Hurl. & C. 22; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 276)—the 23rd clause was now called in question.

This clause of the deed was as follows: "That if and when the estate shall have been fully administered according to the provisions hereof to the satisfaction of the said inspectors, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the inspectors or inspector for the time being, they or he may certify the fact in writing under their or his hands or hand, such writing to be indorsed upon or to refer to these presents; and thereupon and in case of such certificate being given, such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the truth of the matters to be therein alleged as aforesaid; or in case of such conveyance, assurance or assignment of all the estate and effects of the said debtor being made by him as in a previous article hereinbefore contained, and the same being in like manner certified, then and thenceforth such certificate (except only for the purpose and to the extent in this present clause hereinafter provided for, and without prejudice to the rights of the said creditors to or over the property so thereinbefore conveyed or assigned, or to or over any dividends or fund for dividends then provided but not actually paid to the said creditors) shall operate and be a release and discharge to the said debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators, as fully and effectually and in like manner as an order of discharge under an adjudication of bankruptcy, and may be pleaded accordingly to all actions, suits and proceedings in respect of any of the debts, claims and demands of all or any of the said creditors. Provided, nevertheless, that in case at any time after such conveyance and assignment the said debtor shall become or be made or declared bankrupt, and the arrangement hereby made or the property comprised in any such conveyance and assignment shall thereby be in any way prejudiced or affected, then such release and discharge as aforesaid shall not prevent the said creditors respectively from coming in under such bankruptcy for any purposes which they would but for such release and discharge have been entitled to come in."

* Coram, Crompton, J., Blackburn, J., Willes, J. and Byles, J. Keating, J. was present during the argument on all the points, except that which the Court took time to consider of.

Joseph Brown (Day with him), for the plaintiffs.—The 31st clause (containing an absolute release) ought to be struck out by reason of the 32nd clause, for it is inconsistent with the principles of the Bankrupt Laws. In a deed of inspectorship like this such a release is unreasonable, for it prejudices the non-assenting creditor's right to dividends. He could not after plea and judgment founded thereon verify his claim under the 13th clause. And its unreasonableness appears more obvious on comparing the 31st clause with the 23rd, where the release which follows the certificate is so far qualified as to save the right to dividends, whereas the 31st contains no such qualifying provision—Dell v. King (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 47), Hidson v. Barclay (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 217), and the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 161. If the 31st clause be rejected under the 32nd, then the deed cannot be pleaded in bar—Ipstones Park Iron Ore Company v. Pattinson (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 193).

The 23rd clause itself is unreasonable, for it makes an ex parte certificate conclusive, although the estate may not have been administered and some creditors may not have received dividends. It is hard against foreign creditors. Its provisions and consequences are very different from the provisions with regard to an order of discharge in Bankruptcy—see sections 140, 141, 159, 168. and 171. of the Bankruptcy Act.

[CROMPTON, J.—This is a deed of inspectorship, and puts the parties in a position to avoid administration in Bankruptcy. Unreasonableness must be considered secundum subjectam materiem.]

The 13th clause in this deed is analogous to the clause which was held unreasonable in Coles v. Turner (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 198). The concluding part of the 30th clause is also objectionable as dividing the estate among the assenting creditors only, in case the deed be invalid. The 14th clause, too, is bad, as it allows a creditor to prove for part of his debt only, and may mislead other creditors—Holmes v. Viner (1 Esp. 134), Britton v. Hughes (5 Bing. 460; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 188), Forsyth on Composition Deeds, 51, 52.

Again, the deed professes to bind not only all creditors properly so called, but also all persons who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication founded upon a petition at the date of the deed. This is a larger sense than that given to the word "creditors" in the interpretation clause—the 229th section.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The 192nd section provides for debts and liabilities, and in the 144th and 145th sections the word "creditors" is used in a larger sense than in the 229th.]

The process in the case of liabilities is specially provided for by the 172nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, and partially also by the 150th section of the act of 1861; but no such provision has been made with respect to deeds under section 192. The protection given by the 198th section, also, is only applicable in available cases of debt. Such provisions as those of section 154. (which relates to the proof for premiums on policies of insurance) cannot be applied here, for the creditor could not go to the Court till after registration. Mare v. Underhill (4 Best & S. 566) is in the plaintiffs' favour. The 19th clause, taken in connexion with the 30th, enables the inspectors to put a pressure upon non-assenting creditors by the threat of withholding their dividends—Hernulewicz v. Jay (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 201).—[He also cited Woods v. Foote (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 199), Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 172), and Balden v. Pell (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 200).]

Beresford (with whom was Mellish), for the defendant.—As to the 19th clause, before any assenting creditor gets a dividend, there must be a sum set aside for the non-assenting creditor, who can get it when he applies for it; it is clearly dependent on himself. There must be proof in either case.

[The COURT intimated that they were satisfied on all but the last point.]

The creditors referred to in the 197th section must mean creditors who have proved, for all rights under a deed are there assimilated to rights in Bankruptcy, and therefore in the 192nd section also the word means all who can prove. If it applies only to those who are creditors in respect of liquidated debts, then the 192nd section does not carry out the intention of the legislature, which was to prevent the estate being wasted. In Ex parte Mendel (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 14) it was assumed that a contract broken before the execution of a deed could have been proved under the deed.

Brown, in reply.—It is unjust that claimants for unliquidated debts, who could not make an affidavit of debt, should be bound without having a voice in framing the deed. It is something quite novel that creditors for liquidated sums should have it in their power to bind those who are creditors in respect of broken contracts or other liabilities, the amount of whose claims in many cases exceeds the amount of the debts properly so called.

Cur adv. vult. as to the last point.

BLACKBURN, J. (Dec. 1) delivered the judgment of the Court.—The question in this case was, whether a composition deed was binding on the plaintiffs, who had not assented to it. The same deed had been previously held good by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Strick v. De Mattos (3 Hurl. & C. 22; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 276), and the present case was in substance an appeal from that decision.

A great many objections were raised before us, all of which were disposed of in the course of the argument, except the following one: The deed is expressed to be made between the debtor, his inspectors, and the persons "who at the date hereof are respectively creditors of the said De Mattos, or who would be entitled to prove under an adjudication of bankruptcy against the said De Mattos on a petition filed on the day of the date of these presents, hereinafter called the creditors." And the different provisions of the deed are in favour of the creditors thus defined. It was objected, that many claims can be proved in Bankruptcy which are not strictly debts, and it was contended that the persons who were entitled to prove such claims were not creditors within the meaning of the 192nd section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. My Brother Willes entertained some doubts whether this objection was not well founded, and in deference to him we took time to consider. His doubts, I believe, are not yet altogether dispelled, though he does not dissent from our judgment. The other members of the Court including the late Mr. Justice Crompton (whose opinion on the point was very decided), were of opinion,—and on consideration my Brother Byles and myself still are of opinion,—that throughout the Bankruptcy Act the word “creditor” is used in the sense of a person having a claim which can be proved under the bankruptcy, whether it is upon a debt or not; and we think that in the 192nd section “creditors” must be understood to mean all persons who had at the time of the execution of the deed a claim against the debtor, provable against his estate if he then became bankrupt.

We therefore think that this objection also fails, and consequently that the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment for the defendant; thus virtually affirming the judgment in Strick v. De Mattos.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 11, 1886.

JOURDAIN v. PALMER.

35 L. J. Ex. 69; L. R. 1 Ex. 102; 4 H. & C. 171; 13 L. T. 600; 14 W. R. 283;
12 Jur. N.S. 214.

Not applied, Dobson v. Richardson, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Q.B. 261;
L. R. 3 Q.B. 778; 16 W. R. 1010 (Q.B.).

Interrogatories—Breach of Contract—Reduction of Damages.

DISCOVERY.—A defendant who admits that he has committed the breach of contract alleged in the declaration will not, except under very special circumstances, be allowed to interrogate the plaintiff respecting the amount of damage which he has sustained, with a view to paying money into Court.

Wright v. Goodlake (3 H. & C. 540; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 82) commented upon.

This was an application for a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why he should not answer certain interrogatories.

The declaration set out a memorandum of agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, which, after reciting that the plaintiff was possessed of an invention for deodorizing oleaginous animal, mineral and vegetable matter, provided, amongst other things, that the plaintiff should forthwith, at the costs of the defendant, take all necessary steps to obtain provisional protection and letters patent for the invention; that the letters patent, when obtained, should be assigned to the defendant; that the defendant should use his best endeavours to promote the adoption of the invention by using it in his own manufactory and granting licences at fixed royalties; that the defendant should receive all monies to become due in respect of the invention, and keep full accounts of all such monies and all royalties; the monies, after payment of the expenses of obtaining the patent and keeping it in force by payment of future duties to be equally divided between the plaintiff and the defendant. Either party had power to determine the agreement and abandon his interest in the invention on giving certain notice. The declaration then alleged that provisional protection was obtained for the invention, and that the defendant did not give notice of any wish to relinquish his interest in it, and that a stamp duty of 50*l.* became payable on the 10th of July, 1865, under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 5, which the defendant omitted to pay, whereby the letters patent became void, and the plaintiff lost the profits which he would have derived from the patent.

The defendant after declaration and before pleading, applied at chambers for leave to administer the following interrogatories.

1. Have you ever made or caused to be made any and what quantity of material under the patent the subject of this action? If yea, state the several quantities, and the dates of such manufacture and the places at which it was manufactured.

2. What quantity of such material is now in your possession? If you have disposed of any of it, state in detail what quantity you have disposed of, and to whom, stating the present address, and when, and for what consideration, and how much of such consideration has been received by you, and when.

3. Have you in your power or possession any and what diaries, documents, or books containing memorandums and entries of the quantities manufactured by you, the dates or other particulars of its disposal, or the prices received for the same, as in last interrogatory particularly mentioned? If yea, give the name and description of each of such diaries, documents, or books.

4. Did you receive any and what samples of material manufactured by the defendant under the said patent, and when? What has become of the same or any of them? and if yea, how many are at present in your possession or power?

5. Did you continually exert yourself to the most of your ability from the 10th of April, 1862, till the commencement of this action to obtain orders for material manufactured by the said process?

6. Have you been able to obtain a single order? and if yea, state the name and address of the person or persons from whom you obtained such order, and the date and amount of it.

The application was supported by an affidavit, stating that certain samples produced by the invention had been supplied by the defendant to the plaintiff for which he had never accounted.

Channell, B. refused to make the order.

The defendant afterwards pleaded to the action, and paid 50*l.* into court.

J. P. Murphy, in support of the application.—The defendant had committed a nominal breach of his contract, and he desires to administer these interrogatories with a view to estimating the sum which he ought to pay into court. The affidavit shews that for a long time the invention has been treated both by the plaintiff and the defendant as valueless, and that samples have been delivered to the plaintiff which have not been accounted for. If they have been disposed of by the plaintiff, the defendant is entitled to an account of the proceeds. If they have not, the defendant is fairly entitled to use the fact as strong evidence that the invention was valueless. The case of Wright v. Goodlake (3 H. & C. 540; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 82) shews that the defendant is entitled to the rule. There, the plaintiff had published a pamphlet, portions of which had been copied verbatim into the Times, and the action was brought against the printer and publisher of the Times for an infringement of copyright. The defendant was allowed to interrogate the plaintiff as to the number of copies of his pamphlet which he had sold in certain months preceding the infringement complained of. The marginal note to the report of that case is, "A defendant may interrogate a plaintiff for the purpose of ascertaining the damage which he has sustained, so as to enable the defendant to pay the real amount into court."

[MARTIN, B.—The discovery was there limited to the question, how many copies of the pamphlet had been printed? If Wright v. Goodlake (3 H. & C. 540; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 82) is understood to decide that a plaintiff may be called upon to limit the amount of his own damages, the sooner it is overruled the better. I remember that I was once much pressed at chambers to allow a railway company to interrogate a person who had been injured by them, and who was suing them for compensation, as to his age, profession, income, his movements after the accident, the doctors whom he had consulted, and the places to which he had gone. I thought it monstrous, and refused to sanction it.]

The distinction between such a case and the present is, that here the defendant would be entitled to discovery in equity. A person injured in a railway accident can get no assistance in equity.

[CHANNELL, B.—I doubt whether a Court of equity would assist the defendant in the discovery which he seeks, unless he were able to aver that he had strictly performed his portion of the contract. But, however much you might be entitled to administer these interrogatories if you were pressing for an account in a Court of equity, they are not ad rem in the present action. There is a further distinction between this case and Wright v. Goodlake (3 H. & C. 540; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 82), that that was a case of tort, this of contract.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think that my Brother Channell was right. I am rather disposed to agree with my Brother Martin, and to doubt whether the case of Wright v. Goodlake (3 H. & C. 540; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 82) can be followed up on every occasion to which it may appear to be applicable. But that case is distinguishable from the present. The criterion of damages there was, no doubt, the value of the pamphlet which had been pirated, and the questions put in that case were put to shew that so few copies of the original pamphlet had been sold that the damage which the author had sustained was very small. Here the defendant's contention seems to be that, because a Court of equity would for some purposes allow the proposed questions to be put, we ought to allow them in this action. Now I do not think that these questions would be allowed in a Court of equity, except for the purpose of taking an account between the parties so as to ascertain their separate rights. That cannot be done in an action of this sort. Neither the rule to be collected from Wright v. Goodlake (3 H. & C. 540; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 82), nor those to be collected from the practice of the Courts of equity, seem to me to apply to this case.

MARTIN, B.—I am inclined to think that to allow these interrogatories would be contrary to the usual rule, that a party is entitled to a discovery as to all matters which establish his own case, but not as to matters which relate to the plaintiff's case. This is an action for a breach of contract, with a plea of payment of 50*l.* into court. The interrogatories seem really intended to discover whether or not certain goods have been sold, which cannot properly and fairly be the criterion of damages. A case may arise where interrogatories ought to be allowed respecting the damages which have been sustained, but I have heard nothing in this case to induce me to think that my Brother Channell was wrong in his decision.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

CHANNELL, B.—I also think, upon consideration, that I was right in refusing to allow these interrogatories to be put. A plaintiff may be called on to disclose his case where the matters to which the interrogatories relate are common to his case and to the defendant's. That is the common law rule. There may be some cases in which a discovery may be obtained in equity, although not in law, and I am far from saying that if an account were being taken between these parties, the defendant would not have been entitled to call upon the plaintiff for an account of the monies which he has received. But on the question whether a Judge at chambers is bound to admit interrogatories upon the ground that the discovery might be obtained in a Court of equity, I am of opinion that they must be ad rem, with reference to the action in which it is intended to exhibit them, and not with reference to matters not raised by the pleadings. The defendant has now paid money into court. The replication, no doubt, will be that the plaintiff has sustained damage beyond the 50l. That goes to shew, to my mind, that this is an application to exhibit interrogatories, in order to ascertain the damage which the plaintiff says that he has sustained. It would be a very cumbrous and expensive proceeding to allow that to be done through the medium of interrogatories.

Rule refused.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 16, 1866.

ROE v. BRADSHAW.

35 L. J. Ex. 71; 4 H. & C. 178; L. R. 1 Ex. 106; 13 L. T. 641;
14 W. R. 284; 12 Jur. N.S. 29.

See now Bills of Sales Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 31, s. 10 (2).

Bills of Sales Act, 1854, (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), s. 1.—Form of Oath—"To the Best of my Belief."

BILLS OF SALE.—The Bills of Sales Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36) requires that with every bill of sale shall be filed an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being made or given, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving it:—Held, that an affidavit which swears positively as to the time of the making of the bill of sale, but qualifies the description of the residence and occupation of the person making it by stating them to the best of the belief of the deponent, is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the act.

This was an action against a sheriff for making a false return to a writ of fi. fa.

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at the Sittings in London after Michaelmas Term, evidence was given on behalf of the defendant that, previously to the delivery of the writ to the sheriff for execution, the judgment debtor had assigned certain of his goods by a bill of sale. In the affidavit filed with the bill of sale, the time of the giving of the bill of sale was stated positively, but the residence and occupation of the person making it were only stated by the deponent to the best of his belief. It was objected that the bill of sale was void as against judgment creditors, because the requirements of the Bills of Sales Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36. s. 1, which enacts that every bill of sale of personal chattels made after the passing of the act, shall be filed, "together with an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being made or given, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving the same" had not been complied with.

BRAMWELL, B. thought that the act was sufficiently complied with, and directed a verdict for the defendant, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter a verdict for him.

Montagu Chambers (H. James with him) moved accordingly.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The question is, whether an affidavit made by a person stating that at the time of the execution of the bill of sale, to the best of his belief, the residence and occupation was as stated in the bill of sale, is a sufficient compliance with the statute. I think that it is. A man who in court or out of court states that such and such is his belief, imports that he has an acquaintance of the subject, and has formed a belief upon it. He ought not to be subjected to the quibble that he may have no belief at all in the matter, and therefore that the best of his belief may be nothing at all. A Court of justice would vindicate its authority and the law and the dignity of its proceedings, if ever such a case came before it; and I would warn and caution all persons not to rely on the least laxity in such a form of oath.

MARTIN, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is a clear case. The question is, whether the act of parliament is complied with; and if it be, we ought not to seek more. Now, what the act of parliament requires is, that an affidavit shall be made of the time of a bill of sale being made, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making it. This does contain a description of the residence of the party making it, and a true description. It is said that under this act of parliament the person who is to make the affidavit should have knowledge, such as would not, on cross-examination, turn out to be heresay; but that would be more than the act requires. In my judgment, there is nothing whatever in the objection.

CHANNELL, B.—I also think that this affidavit is sufficient, though I cannot, I confess, think the matter so clear as it seems to my Brother Martin. The act requires an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being made, and something more which is clearly defined, namely, a description of the residence and occupation of the person making the same. The act does not say, "an affidavit of the description, residence and occupation of the person"; but the phraseology is changed. I think that it may be read as requiring that the affidavit shall swear positively to the time when the bill of sale was made; but when that has been done, the affidavit may contain a description of the residence and occupation, so as to comply with the act of parliament, although the description be qualified by being to the best of the belief of the person who makes the affidavit.

BRAMWELL, B.—I reserved the point because this is really the first time that I remember any affidavit in this form. I think the matter not quite so plain as my Brother Martin thinks it, and that the way to deal with it is as the Lord Chief Baron has done. When a man swears to the best of his belief he substantially swears that he has a belief, and that it is what he states. I am not sure that this may not introduce a little laxity in affidavits, which are already loose enough. People say, "I have been informed and verily believe"; and it may be that some whose consciences are not hard enough to swear to that, will swear "to the best of my belief,"—hoping to escape on a quibble. I think that it was a right question to reserve; but I am of the same opinion as I was at the trial, that the objection is not valid.

Rule refused

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 17, 1866.

SPENCER AND ANOTHER v. DEMETT.

35 L. J. Ex. 73; 4 H. & C. 127; L. R. 1 Ex. 123; 13 L. T. 677; 14 W. R. 310;
12 Jur. N.S. 194.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy—Creditor's Election to prove—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 182.—Equitable Plea.

BANKRUPTCY.—An equitable plea to an action for debt, that after the accruing of the plaintiffs' claim, and before suit, the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt, and after the commencement of the suit, but before declaration, one of the plaintiffs was appointed assignee of the defendant's estate, and the plaintiffs proved their debt under the bankruptcy and elected to take the benefit of the petition:—Held, bad.

Harley v. Greenwood (5 B. & Ald. 95) extended to equitable pleas.

Declaration—For goods sold and delivered, and on an account stated.

Equitable plea—That after the accruing of the plaintiffs' claim, and after the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and before this suit, the defendant committed an act of bankruptcy, and became bankrupt within the meaning of the statutes in force concerning bankrupts, and thereupon a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against herself, the defendant, was duly filed, by the defendant, in the Court of Bankruptcy, Basinghall Street, London, according to the said statutes, and such proceedings were had in the matter of the said petition that the defendant was by the said Court duly adjudged bankrupt; and thereupon, and after the commencement of this suit, but before the plaintiffs declared therein, at a certain sitting duly appointed by the said Court of Bankruptcy in that behalf, the plaintiff, Edwin Hewitt, was duly appointed by the said Court to be and became the assignee of the estate and effects of the defendant under her said bankruptcy, and the plaintiffs then and there duly proved the debt and claim for which this action is brought under the said petition, and elected to take the benefit of such petition with respect to such debt and claim, whereby the defendant was and is in equity discharged from the said debt and claim of the plaintiffs, and their said proof of their said debt is still in force and effect. Demurrer.

Holl, in support of the demurrer.—The defendants will rely in support of their plea on section 182. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), which enacts as follows: "No creditor who has brought any action or instituted any suit against any bankrupt in respect of a demand prior to the bankruptcy, or which might have been proved as a debt under the bankruptcy, shall prove a debt under such bankruptcy, or have any claim entered upon the proceedings without relinquishing such action or suit, and the proving or claiming a debt under a fiat or petition for adjudication of bankruptcy by any creditor shall be deemed an election by such creditor to take the benefit of such fiat or petition with respect to the debt so proved or claimed: provided also, that any creditor who shall have so proved or claimed, if the fiat or petition for adjudication be afterwards superseded or dismissed, may proceed in the action as if he had not so proved or claimed." This section is similar in its terms to 49 Geo. 3. c. 121. s. 14, on which there is a decision in Harley v. Greenwood (5 B. & Ald. 95), where a plea similar to this was held to be bad, and no distinction can be made from this plea being pleaded on equitable grounds. The reasons given for the judgments in that case apply equally to legal and equitable pleas. The bankruptcy may be superseded, so that it is clear that, proving under the bankruptcy cannot act as an extinguishment of the debt. The other side will rely on Elder v. Beaumont (8 El. & B. 353; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 25); but that case is distinguishable, for the defendant had obtained his certificate, and the Court held that where the principal debt was barred the covenant to keep up the securities could not be sued on. The proper course for the defendants to have pursued would have been to have applied for an order to stay proceedings, or they should have pleaded to the further maintenance of the action. Ex parte Dyack (2 Mont. & Ayr. 675) shews that a Court of equity would not, in such a case as this, grant a perpetual injunction.

J. Brown, in support of the plea.—The case stands on a different footing from similar cases which were decided before equitable pleas were allowed. It is admitted that Harley v. Greenwood (5 B. & Ald. 95) decides that the plea would be bad at law, but the defendant would be entitled to relief in equity, as in fact appears from Ex parte Dyack (2 Mont. & Ayr. 675).

[Pigott, B.—But would the relief be final and perpetual?]

Possibly, if the bankruptcy proceedings were annulled, the plaintiffs might go to the Court of Chancery and get the injunction dissolved.

[Pollock, C.B.—But why should the plaintiffs be compelled to do that? If the Court of Chancery would only give you relief quousque, you cannot plead this plea in bar. You ought to shew not only that the plaintiffs are not now entitled to maintain the action, but that they never will be. You should have applied to stay proceedings.]

The COURT (Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B.) being of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment on the demurrer, it was arranged that judgment in the plaintiffs' favour should be given, but that the defendant should have leave to apply at chambers on affidavits to set the judgment aside and enter a stay of proceedings, the plaintiffs undertaking not to oppose the application on payment of the costs of the demurrer.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 17, 18, 1866.

GRESTY v. GIBSON.

35 L. J. Ex. 74; L. R. 1 Ex. 112; 13 L. T. 676; 14 W. R. 284; 4 H. & C. 28; 12 Jur. N.S. 319.

Approved and followed, Reeves v. Watts, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Q.B. 171; L. R. 1 Q.B. 412; 12 Jur. N.S. 565; 14 L. T. 478; 14 W. R. 672 (Q.B.). Referred to, Brooks v. Jennings, 1866, L. R. 1 C.P. 476; 14 L. T. 19; 14 W. R. 440 (C.P.); Isaacs v. Green, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 253; L. R. 2 Ex. 352; 16 L. T. 633 (Ex.); M'Laren v. Baxter, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. C.P. 247; L. R. 2 C.P. 559; 16 L. T. 521; 15 W. R. 1017 (C.P.).

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. s. 192.
—Composition-Deed—Covenant with Creditors.

BANKRUPTCY.—A composition-deed was expressed to be made between the debtor of the one part and all his creditors of the other, and after reciting that the debtor had agreed to pay a certain composition by instalments, which the creditors had agreed to accept, it contained a covenant by the debtor with his said several creditors and each of them to pay the composition, in consideration of which the creditors released him from all actions, debts, contracts, agreements, &c., reserving the rights which individual creditors might have against other persons:—Held, upon the authority of Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 419; s. c. 12 Jur. N.S. 6), that this was a good deed under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

Semble—A creditor could sue on the covenant, although not named in the deed.

Declaration on a promissory note, with money counts.

Third plea—That after action an indenture was made between the defendant and divers of his creditors, which was set out at length. It was expressed to be made between the defendant of the one part, and all his creditors of the other part, and after reciting that the creditors had agreed to accept a composition of 5s. in the pound upon the amount of their several debts, payable in three instalments, contained a covenant on the part of the defendant with his said creditors and each of them to pay the composition, and a release by the creditors in consideration of the premises from all "actions, suits, debts, accounts, contracts, agreements, bills, notes, &c.," with a reservation of remedies against other persons liable with the defendant, concluding with a statement that the deed was intended to take effect under section 192. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and to be for the benefit of all the creditors equally. The plea then averred that all the conditions necessary under the statute to render the deed binding on non-assenting creditors had been performed, and that the defendant was thereby released from the claim in the declaration mentioned.

Demurrer.

M'Intyre, in support of the demurrer.—In the first place this composition-deed, having been executed after action brought, should have been pleaded formally to the further maintenance of the action—Oppenheimer v. Grieves (7 Hurl. & N. 533; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 375), Morgan v. Harding (11 W. Rep. 65).

[The Court having intimated that the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, rendered formal commencements and conclusions of pleas unnecessary, and that Oppenheimer v. Grieves (7 Hurl. & N. 533; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 375) differed from the present case, inasmuch as the release there was only conditional on the plaintiff's taking a further step in the cause, the objection was withdrawn.]

This deed professes to be made with all the creditors, but non-assenting creditors could not sue upon the covenant in it. This is distinctly stated, by Lord Westbury, C., in Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17). And the decision in The Chesterfield and Midland Silkstone Colliery Company v. Hawkins (3 H. & C. 677; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 121) is to the same effect. Again, the deed is unreasonable, because the release is in consideration not of the payment of the composition, but of the bare promise to pay it. And it is too general, for it applies not only to debts but to contracts, to the discharge of which the composition would not be applicable.

Holker, in support of the plea.—In this case the non-assenting creditors could sue on the covenant, which is not made with the executing and non-assenting creditors only, as in The Chesterfield and Midland Silkstone Colliery Company v. Hawkins (3 H. & C. 677; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 121), but with all the creditors, of whom the plaintiff is stated in the plea to be one. What was said by Lord Westbury, C., in Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 17) was not necessary to the decision. The plaintiff could sue on this covenant because he is one of a class which is distinctly described. There is no uncertainty here, for id est certum quod certum reddi potest. The Sunderland Marine Insurance Company v. Kearney (16 Q.B. Rep. 925; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 417) is a direct authority in my favour. There, by a policy of insurance under seal, in which Kearney was stated to be the owner of the ship insured, the defendants covenanted to make good all loss sustained; and it was held that a person who was not named in the policy, but was, in fact, jointly interested with Kearney, might be joined with him as co-plaintiff in an action on the covenant.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The only question is, whether the description of the persons with whom the covenant is made is not too vague. If a man covenants severally with the members of a firm, no doubt they would be sufficiently named in the deed to enable each of them to sue.—MARTIN, B.—Debts may be disputed; and in order to ascertain whether a particular person is named in this deed, it might be necessary to try an action to decide whether he was a creditor or not.]

The creditors can easily be ascertained. Whittaker v. Lowe (35 L. J. Ex. 44; s. c. 1 Law Rep. Ex. 74) shews what creditors are to be included. The judgment of Blackburn, J., in Dingwell v. Edwards (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 161) is an authority that the creditors could sue, and so is that of Bramwell, B., in Dewhurst v. Jones (3 H. & C. 60; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 294). The objection was not allowed to invalidate the deed in Stone v. Jellicoe (3 H. & C. 263; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 11). As to the objection respecting the inadequacy of the consideration, Johnson v. Barratt (35 L. J. Ex. 15; s. c. 1 Law Rep. Ex. 65) shews that it is groundless; and Hazelgrove v. House (35 L. J. Q.B. 1; s. c. 1 Law Rep. Q.B. 101) shews that the words of the release are not too wide, as their effect must be restrained by the words of the whole instrument so as to apply only to debts and claims which had accrued at the time of execution.

M'Intyre replied.—The deed in The Sunderland Marine Insurance Company v. Kearney (16 Q.B. Rep. 925; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 417) was a deed-poll. In the other cases cited this point was not raised.

Cur. adv. vult.

POLLOCK, C.B. (Jan. 18.)—In this case, which was argued yesterday, the argument turned upon the point raised in Ex parte Cockburn (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 17), before Lord Chancellor Westbury. We have found a case, lately decided in the Court of Common Pleas—Lay v. Mottram (19 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 419; s. c. 12 Jur. N.S. 6)—which we cannot distinguish from this. There the Court held a plea similar to that pleaded here to be good. We think that we are bound by that decision, and on the authority of that case we give judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 23, 1866.

COOK v. JAGGARD AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Ex. 76; L. R. 1 Ex. 125; 13 L. T. 717; 14 W. R. 373.

Referred to, Hamilton v. Buckmaster, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ch. 58; 15 L. T. 177; 15 W. R. 149 (V.C.). Discussed and distinguished, Evans v. Jones, [1877] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. Ex. 280; 36 L. T. 218 (Ex. D.).

Will—Construction—Residuary Clause—Ejectment.

WILL.—A testator, in his will, after directing that his debts and funeral expenses should be paid out of his personal estates, proceeded as follows: "All the rest of my worldly estate, both real and personal, I give, devise and bequeath as follows." He then gave and devised to his natural daughter an estate tail in certain copyhold hereditaments, and also an estate tail in certain other copyhold hereditaments. Then followed the residuary clause: "And all the rest, residue and remainder of my personal estate and effects wheresoever and whatsoever, and of what nature, kind or quality soever the same may be, monies, securities for money, or whatever I may be possessed of or entitled to at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the same to my said daughter to and for her own sole use and benefit absolutely"—Held, that the reversions in fee expectant on the determination of the daughter's estates tail in the copyhold hereditaments did not pass to her under the residuary clause.

Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197) commented upon.

Ejectment brought to recover possession of a messuage and tenements at Chick St. Osyth, in the county of Essex, copyhold of the manor of Chick St. Osyth.

The plaintiff claimed as customary heir-at-law of Nathaniel Cook, who died in 1808, having made his will in the following terms:

"In the name of God, Amen. I, Nathaniel Cook, of the parish of Chick St. Osyth, in the county of Essex, farmer, being weak in body, but of sound and disposing mind, memory and understanding, but mindful of my mortality, do make, publish and declare this my last will and testament in manner and form following, that is to say: first, I desire that all my just debts, funeral expenses, and the expense of proving this my last will and testament, be paid out of my personal estate and effects, and all the rest of my worldly estate, both real and personal, I give, devise and bequeath as follows: I give and devise to my daughter Susannah Cook Westbroom, spinster, natural child of my late housekeeper Elizabeth Westbroom, deceased, all that my copyhold messuage, hereditaments, lands and premises, with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging, situate, lying, and being in the parish of Chick St. Osyth aforesaid, now in the occupation of John Bird, to have and to hold the said copyhold messuage, hereditaments, lands and premises, to my said daughter Susannah Cook Westbroom, and to the heirs of her body lawfully to be begotten, according to the custom of the manor in which the same is holden. Also I give and devise to my said daughter Susannah Cook Westbroom all that my copyhold messuage or tenement, hereditaments, land and premises thereunto belonging, situate, lying and being on the west side of Row Heath, in the parish of Chick St. Osyth aforesaid, and now in my own occupation, to have and to hold the said copyhold messuage or tenement, hereditaments, land and premises to my said daughter Susannah Cook Westbroom, and to the heirs of her body lawfully to be begotten, according to the custom of the manor in which the same is holden. And all the rest, residue and remainder of my personal estate and effects, wheresoever and whatsoever, and of what nature, kind or quality soever the same may be, monies, securities for money, or whatever I may be possessed of or entitled to at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the same to my said daughter Susannah Cook Westbroom, to and for her own sole use and benefit absolutely. And I do hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint Mr. Thomas Sadler, of Chick St. Osyth aforesaid, farmer, and Mr. James Fisk, of the same place, farmer, to be executors of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former and other wills by me at any time heretofore made, and do declare this to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof I have hereunto set and subscribed my hand and seal this 13th of October 1808.

"Signed, Natl. x Cook, his mark.

"Signed, sealed and declared, &c.

"John x Bird, his mark.

"Judith x Carter, her mark.

"John Nightingale."

Susannah Cook Westbroom, the testator's natural daughter mentioned in this will, married Benjamin Jaggard, and died in 1817, leaving two children, both of whom died infants and unmarried. Benjamin Jaggard was, according to the custom of the manor of the copyholds, admitted tenant by the curtesy on his wife's death, and died in 1864.

The contention for the plaintiff was, that on the determination of the estate tail given by the will to Susannah Cook Westbroom, the premises reverted to the plaintiff, as customary heir-at-law to the testator, and that on the death of the tenant by the curtesy, the plaintiff was entitled to possession.

The contention for the defendants who claimed under Benjamin Jaggard was, that although an estate tail was specifically given to Susannah Cook Westbroom by the will, the residuary clause included the reversion in fee, so that the whole of the testator's estate passed to the devisee.

At the trial, before Pigott, B., at the Summer Assizes for Essex, a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, the defendant having leave to move to enter a nonsuit.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,

Montagu Chambers and A. L. Smith shewed cause.—Although the preliminary part of a will may express an intention on the part of a testator to dispose of the whole of his property, yet unless words are subsequently used sufficient for the purpose, real estate will not pass—Jarman on Wills, p. 681, 3rd edit., and Doe d. Bunny v. Rout (7 Taunt. 79). In Monk v. Mawdsley (1 Sim. 286) and Woollam v. Kenworthy (9 Ves. 137), which resembled this case, the real estate was held not to pass. Besides, this will was made in 1808, before the enactment of the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, and, therefore, even if the residuary clause did apply to real estate, Susannah Cook Westbroom took only a life estate under it, there being no words of limitation. It is absurd to say that the testator having specifically given her an estate tail in the earlier part of the will, intended to give her a life estate in the residuary clause.

Philbrick supported the rule.—If the residuary clause stood alone, there is no doubt that the reversion in fee would not be included in it; but the testator has expressed his intention of disposing of the whole of his property. In Monk v. Mawdsley (1 Sim. 286) there were no words shewing that the testator intended not to die intestate as to part of his property. Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197) is precisely in point. There the testator said, "As touching such worldly property wherewithal it has pleased God to bless me in this world, I give, devise, and dispose of the same in the following manner and form," and after several specific dispositions of lands and goods he proceeded, "All the rest of worldly goods, bills, bonds, notes, book-debts, and ready money, and everything else I die possessed of, I give to my son George, whom I make my whole and sole executor." It was held there, that certain real estate not included in the specific devise passed to George, and that he took the fee.

[CHANNELL, B.—But there was no specific devise there of property, the reversion of which was held to be included in the residuary clause.]

That makes no difference. It is admitted that apt words must be used, but that has been done here. Although the residuary clause has the words "I give and bequeath," instead of "I give and devise," which are used elsewhere in the will, yet the word "give" is the old word of the law applicable to real estate. Hogan v. Jackson (Cowp. 299) and Doe d. Andrew v. Lainchbury (11 East, 290) are in point. As to the absence of words of limitation, even before the passing of 1 Vict. c. 26, if the intention of the testator that the fee simple should be given was clear, the fee was held to pass, without any words of limitation. The same case of Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197) shews this to be so.

[MARTIN, B.—That case, when it comes to be looked at carefully, will not decide that an estate in fee simple passed under the residuary clause in the will. It merely decided that the clause did apply to real estate not previously disposed of, but whether it passed an estate in fee, or only a life interest, was immaterial.]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. It is true that the testator in the early part of the will has manifested an intention of disposing of the whole of his property, but he has not used language which will give effect to such an intention. After the specific devises of copyhold estate to his daughter comes the residuary clause. It is expressed to relate to "personal estates and effects." The kinds of property which it more specifically mentions, monies and securities for money, are in their nature personal. Then follow the words, "or whatever I may be possessed of, or entitled to at the time of my decease," and in my opinion they must be confined to property ejusdem generis with the personal property previously mentioned. It must be observed that the testator uses in this clause the word "bequeath," whereas in the clauses relating to the copyhold estates he uses the appropriate word "devise"; and that the general words are coupled to those which precede them by the word "or," as if they were intended to be only a further description of the property already mentioned, while in the case of Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197), which was pointed out as being parallel to this, the general words were coupled to the preceding by the word "and," as if the testator in that case, after disposing of the property specifically mentioned, intended to pass to an entirely new kind of property. But apart from this distinction between the two cases, the decision in Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197) is merely that some real estate passed under the residuary clause, not that a fee simple passed. This case is rather governed by that of Monk v. Mawsdley (1 Sim. 286), where real estate was held not to pass under the residuary clause. The whole tenor of the will shews that this residuary clause is entirely applicable to personal property.

MARTIN, B. concurred.

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that the construction put upon this will by my Brother Pigott at the trial was correct. It is admitted that the rule cannot be made absolute unless the residuary clause is sufficient not only to act on the testator's real estate, but to pass an estate in fee simple. I am of opinion that it is not, and but for the case of Wilce v. Wilce (7 Bing. 664; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197), which has been cited, I should have thought this case a tolerably clear one. At first that case seemed to conflict with the contention of the defendant; but my Brother Martin has drawn our attention to the fact that on the case there stated for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, it was not necessary to decide whether the son George there mentioned took an estate in fee simple, or whether he took only an estate for life. We are only bound by that decision to this extent, that some such words as are found in this will might be made effectual to apply to real estate, and that some estate in reality might pass under them. No doubt, in the earlier part of the will, the testator manifests an intention to dispose of the whole of his property, and this might assist us in construing the residuary clause; but it will not justify us in putting on it the defendants' construction. I think with the Lord Chief Baron, that the case falls rather within the decision in Monk v. Mawsdley (1 Sim. 286).

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 30, 31, 1865.

ALEXANDER v. JONES.

35 L. J. Ex. 78; 4 H. & C. 204; L. R. 1 Ex. 133; 13 L. T. 719; 14 W. R. 400;
12 Jur. N.S. 125.

Practice—Costs—County Court—Concurrent Jurisdiction—Dwelling-place
—9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4.

COUNTY COURT.—For the purpose of determining whether the superior Courts have concurrent jurisdiction within the meaning of the County Court Acts, a defendant, who has no permanent dwelling-place at the time of the action brought, must be taken to dwell at the place where he is temporarily residing at the time.

The plaintiff in this case sued the defendant for money payable for work and services and commission. The defendant paid into court 15l. 7s. 6d., which the plaintiff accepted in satisfaction of his claim. The plaintiff then applied at chambers for an order for his costs, on the ground that the superior Court had concurrent jurisdiction within the County Court. Affidavits were filed by the plaintiff and the defendant, and Baron Martin declined to make the order. A rule nisi was subsequently obtained on further affidavits, from which the following facts appeared. The plaintiff dwelt and carried on his business at Bristol. At the time when the cause of action arose the defendant kept the Royal Hotel, at Clevedon, about thirteen miles from Bristol, within the jurisdiction of the County Court of Gloucestershire, holden at Bristol. On the 10th of October, 1864, he disposed of the business and premises to his brother, and left Clevedon. He stayed for a few days at an hotel at Bristol, and on the 22nd of October went to Garbeibio, in Montgomeryshire, on a visit to his brother-in-law, and he remained there as a guest till the 6th of December. Garbeibio was within the jurisdiction of the County Court of Montgomeryshire, and more than twenty miles from Bristol. The action was commenced on the 29th of November, and the defendant was served with the writ at Garbeibio.

The plaintiff's affidavit, on which the application was made at chambers, was in the ordinary form, stating that the defendant dwelt at Garbeibio, more than twenty miles from Bristol, where the plaintiff resided and carried on his business, and that the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction of the County Court within which the defendant dwelt at the time of the commencement of the action.

The defendant's affidavit in reply stated the above facts; denied that the defendant dwelt at Garbeibio, or resided there otherwise than temporarily as a guest; alleged that his last place of abode previous to the commencement of the action was at Clevedon; and that the cause of action arose at Bristol.

None of the affidavits filed by the defendant stated that he had any fixed place of residence at the time when the action was commenced, or that he intended to return to reside permanently at Bristol, though it was alleged that he was returning to Bristol with a view of staying there for some weeks when he was served with the writ.

By the County Courts Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128, it is enacted, that "all actions and proceedings which before the passing of this act might have been brought in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record, where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant, or where the cause of action did not arise wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the court within which the defendant dwells or carries on his business at the time of the action brought, . . . may be brought and determined in any such superior court, at the election of the party suing or proceeding, as if this act had not been passed."

By the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54. s. 4, it is enacted, amongst other things, that if the plaintiff shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the Court in which the action is brought, or to the satisfaction of a Judge at chambers upon summons, that the action was brought for a cause in which concurrent jurisdiction is given to the superior Courts, by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 128, or for which no plaint could have been entered in any County Court, the Court or Judge shall direct that the plaintiff recover his costs.

H. Matthews shewed cause.—The superior Court had no concurrent jurisdiction in this case. The defendant was not dwelling in Garbeibio at the time of action brought. In Macdougall v. Paterson (11 Com. B. Rep. 755; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 27) it was held that a man who resided at Inverness, but came to London for some months in each summer for the purpose of carrying on his business, did not dwell in London within the meaning of the act, although he was residing there in fact at the time of action brought.

[CHANNELL, B.—But there the plaintiff had a permanent residence besides his temporary one. Here he does not seem to have had any fixed residence at the time of action brought.]

In cases of double residence there has been a conflict between the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Common Pleas, the former deciding, in Bailey v. Bryant (1 El. & El. 340; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 86), that the superior Court had not concurrent jurisdiction, and the latter, in Butler v. Ablewhite (6 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 740; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. C.P. 292) and Pigrim v. Knatchbull (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 798; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 257), maintaining the reverse. Here the onus lay on the plaintiff of proving affirmatively that the defendant dwelt at some place more than twenty miles from the plaintiff's dwelling-place.

Lumley Smith supported the rule.—The superior Courts have concurrent jurisdiction where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant, and it is said that the plaintiff must prove this affirmatively to enable him to recover his costs; but there is also concurrent jurisdiction if the cause of action did not arise wholly or in some material point within the jurisdiction of the Court within which the defendant dwells or carries on his business at the time of the action brought, and as to this the onus lies on the defendant of shewing that he had a dwelling-place within the County Court jurisdiction within which the cause of action arose. Here the cause of action arose in Bristol, and if the defendant did not dwell at Bristol at the time of action brought, the cause of action did not arise within the jurisdiction of the Court within which he dwelt. Numerous cases are cited in 1 Chitty's Archbold's Practice, 482, which shew that the County Court has no jurisdiction unless the defendant has a fixed permanent residence. In Rolfe v. Learmonth (14 Q.B. Rep. 196; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 10), Coleridge, J. distinctly says, that the statute contemplates some fixed place at which the party's business is carried on. If the defendant had in fact no permanent dwelling-place, he must be taken to dwell where he was temporarily abiding. The plaintiff could not have sued in the County Court of Montgomeryshire, nor except by leave of the Judge in the County Court of Bristol.

Cur. adv. vult.

MARTIN, B. delivered the judgment of the Court (Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B.)—In this case we said that we would allow the matter to stand over until we had an opportunity of speaking to the Judges of some of the other Courts. We are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the proceedings. The facts were, that a person who had resided in the jurisdiction of the County Court of Bristol left that place, and was so far living at a distance that it was considered that he had not an intention of returning to it. He went on a visit to his brother, and it is clear that he went there as a guest. It appears from the affidavits that he had no dwelling-place except his brother's, if that can be called a dwelling-place. He had left the hotel where he dwelt, and had gone away without acquiring any permanent dwelling. Whilst he was living in Montgomeryshire a writ issued against him. The question is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to costs? On the best consideration that we can give to the case, we think that he is. It is to be observed that jurisdiction is given to the County Court by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. s. 60, which enacts, that "a summons may issue in any district in which the defendant dwells or carries on his business at the time of the action brought, or by leave of the Court for the district in which the defendant has dwelt or carried on his business at some time within six calendar months next before the time of the action brought, or in which the cause of action has arisen, the summons may issue in either of such last-mentioned courts;" so that the jurisdiction of the County Court is regulated by the defendant's dwelling. Then comes the 128th section, upon which this question turns. If the defendant had clearly no dwelling-place in the ordinary acceptation of the term, then, except he be taken to have been dwelling in Montgomeryshire, there would be no County Court with jurisdiction at all. We think that, for the purposes of these acts, a man in the position of the defendant must be taken to dwell at the place where he is living and abiding, though it may not be his dwelling-place in one sense of the term, and that the plaintiff has brought himself within the meaning of the 128th section, so as to be entitled to the costs of his action. The rule will therefore be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 18, 21, 1865. Jan. 12, 1866.

NOBLE v. WARD AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Ex. 81; 4 H. & C. 149; L. R. 1 Ex. 117; 13 L. T. 639; 14 W. R. 397; 12 Jur. N.S. 167: affirmed, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 91; L. R. 2 Ex. 135; 15 L. T. 672; 15 W. R. 520 (Ex. Ch.).

Sale of Goods—Statute of Frauds, section 17.—Parol Alteration of Written Contract—Rescission.

CONTRACT. SALE OF GOODS.—A contract for the sale of goods exceeding 10l. in value, being reduced to writing as required by the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, it was subsequently agreed verbally between the parties that the times for commencing and concluding delivery should be each a fortnight later than the times for commencing and concluding delivery respectively fixed in the written contract:—Held, that by the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, this latter agreement not being in writing could not be "allowed to be good" for any purpose, and therefore that the previous contract remained unaffected by it, and could be enforced in all its terms.

The declaration stated, that whereas it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the plaintiff should sell and deliver to the defendants, and that the defendants should accept from the plaintiff within a certain agreed period, which elapsed before suit, a large quantity of cloth at certain prices to be therefore paid by the defendants, and then agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendants, yet the defendants refused to accept or pay for the said cloth, although afterwards and before suit all things were done and happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said goods accepted and paid for by the defendants, whereby the plaintiff lost the difference between the agreed price and the lower price to which the said goods fell. There was also an indebitatus count. The defendants pleaded a denial of the agreement, a denial of the plaintiff's readiness and willingness to deliver, that the cloth was not according to sample, that the contract had been rescinded, and to the second count the general issue.

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at the Summer Assizes for Manchester, the following facts were proved.

On the 12th of August, 1864, the agent of the defendants ordered of the plaintiff through his agent, 1,500 pieces of cloth, equal to sample, at an agreed price. A memorandum of the contract was signed on behalf of the defendants. It contained the clause, "To be delivered, commence in three weeks, complete in eight to nine weeks."

On the 18th of August a further order was given for 1,500 pieces, and a memorandum was signed on behalf of the defendants. The delivery clause was, "To follow on after order given 12th instant, and complete in ten to twelve weeks."

The plaintiff delivered a portion of the cloth; but the defendants objected to the quality, and refused to receive it. After considerable discussion, a verbal agreement was come to between the parties, on the 23rd of September, that the cloth delivered should be taken back, that the first contract should be cancelled, and that the times for the commencement and completion of the delivery under the second contract should be respectively postponed for a fortnight; it being further stipulated that the first instalment should consist of not less than 150 pieces. On the 14th of October the plaintiff delivered 130 pieces, which the defendants rejected, as being neither equal to sample nor the proper quantity; and on the 15th of October the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff that they cancelled the order.

The plaintiff wrote in reply that the time for commencing delivery was the 21st of October. On the 21st of October he tendered 220 more pieces, which the defendants refused to accept. A further tender of a sufficient number of pieces to make up the number ordered was made before the 17th of November.

Bramwell, B. nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that the first two contracts had been rescinded, and that the third contract could not be enforced, as there was no memorandum of it in writing sufficient to satisfy the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds.

The plaintiff subsequently obtained a rule nisi, calling on the defendants to shew cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the old contract.

Holker and Baylis shewed cause.—The direction of the Judge was perfectly right. A contract which is required by the Statute of Frauds to be in writing, and is reduced to writing accordingly, can be rescinded by parol, though it cannot be varied in its terms by parol—Goss v. Lord Nugent (5 B. & Ad. 58), Stead v. Dawber (10 Ad. & E. 57; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 101). It will be said that Moore v. Campbell (10 Exch. Rep. 323; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 310) is an authority to the contrary; but it is not so in fact. There goods in a ship were sold under a written contract, one of the terms of which was that they should be delivered from the quay. It was subsequently agreed by parol that the goods should be warehoused. It was held, that the parol agreement did not rescind the written agreement, but the reason was that the parties did not intend to rescind it absolutely, and no material alteration was made. Here the intention was that the contract of the 18th of August should be abandoned, and that of the 27th of September substituted; but the letter was not reduced into writing, nor was there any delivery and acceptance of goods under it so as to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Besides, the plaintiff cannot recover on the contract of the 18th of August, because delivery under it was to follow on after the delivery under the contract of the 12th of August; therefore it ought to have commenced immediately after the cancelling of that order on the 27th of September; and the tender on the 14th of October was too late; so that the plaintiff fails to prove the allegation in his declaration of readiness and willingness to deliver.

Mellish supported the rule.—The delivery under the contract of the 12th of August need not have been completed for eleven or twelve weeks from that date, and therefore the delivery on the 14th of October was in time under the contract of the 18th of August, as following directly after the full time allowed by the first contract. But this point was not taken at the trial, and the nonsuit ought not to be sustained on that ground, because the difficulty might perhaps have been got over if inquired into.

[BRAMWELL, B.—I agree that to justify a nonsuit on a ground not taken at the trial an irresistible case ought to be made out.]

I contend that the contract of the 18th of August was not rescinded by the parol agreement of the 27th of September. In the first place the parties had no intention to rescind it, but merely to alter it in one particular, and in the next place the words of the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds are, that no contract for the sale of goods for the price of 10*l.* or upwards "shall be allowed to be good," without a memorandum in writing or part delivery. It cannot be good for any purpose, and therefore cannot rescind a previous contract. Smith v. Hudson (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 145) supports this view. In Goss v. Lord Nugent (5 B. & Ad. 58) and Stead v. Dawber (10 Ad. & E. 57; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 101), the plaintiffs were suing on the amended contracts, which of course they could not do. Moore v. Campbell (10 Exch. Rep. 323;

s. c. Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 310) is strongly in the plaintiff's favour. There it was held that the plea that the contract had been rescinded was not proved under circumstances resembling these.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, B. (Jan. 12).—In the case of Noble v. Ward, I have to read the judgment of my Brother Bramwell.

This case was tried before me at Manchester, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. The case comes before us on a rule to set aside that nonsuit. I think it was wrong, at least on the ground on which it proceeded. The action was for not accepting goods on a sale by the plaintiff to the defendants. The defendants pleaded, among other things, that the contract had been rescinded, and that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to deliver. The facts were, that a contract for the sale and delivery of goods from the plaintiff to the defendants, at a future day, was entered into on the 12th of August, which may be called contract A; that another contract for sale and delivery by the plaintiff to the defendants, also at a future day, was entered into on the 18th of August, say contract B; that before any of the days of delivery had arrived, the plaintiff and the defendants agreed verbally to rescind or do away with contract A, and to extend for a fortnight the time for the performance of contract B, that is to say, the plaintiff had a fortnight longer to deliver, and the defendants a fortnight longer to take and pay for those goods. This, on principle and authority, was a third contract, call it C. It was a contract in which all that was to be done and permitted on one side was the consideration for all that was to be done and permitted on the other—see per Parke, B., in Marshall v. Lynn (6 Mee. & W. 117). It remains to add, that the declaration would fit either contract B. or contract C, and that goods were tendered by the plaintiff to the defendants in time for either of those contracts. My note and my recollection of my ruling are, that contract B. was rescinded and contract C. not enforceable, not being in writing. I think that was wrong. Either contract C. was within the Statute of Frauds, or not. If not, there was no need for a writing. If yes, it was because it was a contract for the sale of goods, and so within the 17th section of the statute. That says, that no contract for the sale of goods for the price of 10*l.* or upwards shall be allowed to be good, except there is an acceptance, payment or writing. The expression "allowed to be good" is not a very happy one; but, whatever its meaning may be, it includes this at least, that it shall not be held valid nor enforced. But this is what the defendant was attempting to do. He was setting up this contract C. as a valid contract. He was asking that it should be "allowed to be good" to rescind contract B. It is attempted to say that what took place when contract C. was made was twofold. First, the old contracts were given up; secondly, a new one was made. But that is not so. What was done was all done at once, was all one transaction, one bargain; and had the plaintiff asked for a writing at the time and the defendants refused it, it would all have been undone, and the parties remitted to their original contracts. I think, therefore, that on principle it was wrong to hold that the old contract was gone. Moore v. Campbell (10 Exch. Rep. 323; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 310) is an authority to the same effect. It is true that case may be distinguished on the facts, namely, that there what was to be done under the new arrangement in lieu of the old was to be done at the same time; so that it might well be the parties meant, not that the new thing should be done, but if done it should be in lieu of the old. Such an argument could not be used in this case. But it was not the ground of the judgment there, which is, that the new agreement was void. The cases of Goss v. Lord Nugent (5 B. & Ad. 58), Stead v. Dawber (10 Ad. & E. 57; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 101), and others, only shew that the new contract C. cannot be enforced, not that the old contract B. is gone. I think it was not. Inconvenience and absurdity may arise from this. For instance, if the defendants signed the new contract and not the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs would be bound to the old and the defendants to the new; or if in the course of the cause a writing turned up signed by the plaintiff, then they would first rely on the old and afterwards on the new contract. But this is no more than may happen in any case within the 17th section, where there has been one contract only. But then it was said before us, that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to deliver under contract B. Probably not, and he supposed contract C. was in force. In answer to this, the plaintiff contended before us that this point was not made at the trial; to which the defendant replied, neither was the point that the old contract was in force. My recollection is so; that the case was opened and maintained as on the new contract; but I agree with Mr. Mellish, that a nonsuit ought to be maintained on a point not taken at the trial, only when it is beyond all doubt. I cannot say this is. Consequently, I think the rule should be absolute; but, under the circumstances, the costs of both parties of the first trial ought to abide the event of the second.

The case, in my Brother Bramwell's opinion, turning on what was his own impression, he was desirous that this judgment should be read as his own judgment. But I am authorized by the Lord Chief Baron and by my Brother Pigott to say, that, although I have read it as the judgment of my Brother Bramwell, it is a judgment in which we all agree.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 3, 1865.*

COUSINS v. EMMA PHILLIPS, executrix, &c. of THOMAS PHILLIPS
(deceased).

35 L. J. Ex. 85; 3 H. & C. 892.

Landlord and Tenant—Renewal of Lease without Surrender of Agreement for Underlease—4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—The 6th section of 4 Geo. 2. c. 28, while it gives a lessee the right to surrender notwithstanding his contracts with his underlessee, leaves untouched the sub-interest, though it be merely an agreement for an underlease; and the effect of a new demise after the surrender for the residue of the original term is to make the new lessee the assignee of the reversion of the term created by the surrenderor.

S. surrendered his lease to W, his lessor, after making an agreement (containing a stipulation to pay rent and repair) for an underlease to F, who entered and afterwards assigned his interest to the plaintiff, and who gave an indemnification to him, and assigned it over to the defendant's testator, who covenanted to indemnify the plaintiff; after the surrender W. granted a new lease for the remainder of S.'s term to H:—Held, that H. was in exactly the same position as S, and that F. having had to pay to H. money for rent and non-repair, in consequence of the default of the defendant's testator, and the plaintiff having repaid F, F. was entitled to recover such monies from the defendant.

The declaration stated that in the lifetime of the defendant's testator, on the 10th of October, 1862, by an indenture then made between the plaintiff and the said testator—reciting an agreement between William Solomon Smith and Jephthah Fawsitt for a lease from the said Smith to the said Fawsitt of a certain messuage, for a term of twenty-one years from Michaelmas day, 1857, determinable as therein mentioned, at the yearly rent of 36*l.* 15*s.*, payable quarterly, and subject to the several clauses and stipulations therein contained, and reciting an indenture of assignment from Fawsitt to the plaintiff of his interest in the said agreement,—the plaintiff did assign to the testator all his estate and interest in the said agreement, subject to the payment of rent, &c., therein contained, and the testator Phillips did thereby, for himself, his executors, &c., covenant with the plaintiff, his executors, &c., that he, the testator, his executors, administrators or assigns, would from time to time pay the rent reserved as and when the same should become due and payable, and also duly observe and perform the several clauses and stipulations in the said agreement contained, and which on the tenant's part ought to be paid, &c., and also should and would from time to time and at all times thereafter, keep harmless and indemnified the plaintiff, his executors, &c., from all actions, suits, or other proceedings which might be brought or prosecuted against the plaintiff, his executors, &c., and all damages and costs incidental thereto by reason of the non-payment of the rent or non-observance or non-performance of the clauses in the said agreement contained, or any of them, or in relation thereto. And that the testator from the time of the said indenture became and was tenant of the said messuage, upon and subject to the terms of the agreement, and that the plaintiff did all things, &c. to entitle him to have the said covenants observed by the testator, and to sue the defendant for the matters hereinafter mentioned, and that all necessary times in that behalf elapsed; yet the testator did not pay the said rent as and when the same became due, and that after the said assignment to the testator, and after he became tenant of the said house under and by virtue thereof (to wit), on the 29th of September, 1863, two quarters of the said rent became due and payable, which the testator wholly failed to pay, nor did the testator, after the said assignment, duly observe the several clauses in the said agreement contained, and which on the tenant's part ought to have been observed, but therein wholly failed, and wholly failed to observe a certain clause and stipulation in the said agreement by which the tenant was bound to keep the said house in repair and do certain repairs thereto, and by reason of the non-payment and of the non-observance of the said agreement, certain actions, &c. were brought and prosecuted against the plaintiff, and he thereby and incidental thereto sustained certain damages and costs; yet the testator did not, nor did the defendant as executrix as aforesaid, keep harmless or indemnify the plaintiff against the said action, suits, proceedings, damages and costs. And the plaintiff has been called upon and obliged to pay and has paid the said damages and costs, and has been and is by means of the premises otherwise damaged.

* Decided in Trinity Term, 1865.

Pleas—Non est factum; denial of the breaches alleged; and, lastly, plene administravit.

As to the last plea, replication and interlocutory judgment of future assets quando acciderint.

Issue on the other pleas.

At the trial, before Channell, B., at the Sittings in Middlesex after Easter Term, 1865, the following deeds were put in evidence:

The agreement between Smith and Fawsitt dated the 26th of October, 1857, referred to in the declaration.

An indenture dated the 21st of January, 1860, by which Smith and one Hyland joined in surrendering Smith's lease to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

An indenture of lease dated the 23rd of January, 1860, from the Dean and Chapter to Hyland for thirty-four years (the remainder of Smith's term).

An indenture of assignment dated the 1st of January, 1862, whereby all the interest of Fawsitt in the agreement of the 26th of October, 1857, was assigned to the plaintiff.

The indenture of assignment dated the 10th of October, 1862, between the plaintiff and the defendant's testator (set out in the declaration).

It was proved that a quarter's rent of the premises being due at Midsummer, 1863, Hyland (claiming under his lease from the Dean and Chapter) brought ejectment against Fawsitt, and obtained possession (judgment being signed for want of appearance) before the rent of the Michaelmas quarter was due. It was proved also that Fawsitt had paid 59*l.*, including 25*l.* for repairs, 18*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for half a year's rent, and 13*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* for the costs of the action Hyland v. Fawsitt; and that the plaintiff applied to had given Fawsitt's attorney a bill for 59*l.* on account of debt, and 7*l.* for his costs, and that Fawsitt's attorney afterwards sued the plaintiff on the note and took 40*l.* in satisfaction of the claim. The plaintiff now sought to recover what he had so paid.

CHANNELL, B. directed a nonsuit, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for such sum as the Court should think fit; and T. B. Holland having obtained a rule accordingly,—

W. C. Beasley appeared to shew cause; but

G. R. Clarke (with whom was T. E. Holland), being called on by the Court, stated the plaintiff's case.—The statute 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6.¹ provides that where a lease is surrendered for the purpose of a renewal, old underleases shall stand on the same footing with respect to the new lessee as they did before to the original lessee. By the surrender Hyland agreed to purchase of Smith a portion of the premises originally demised to Smith, and instead of taking a mere assignment of that part from Smith, he got a new lease of the residue of Smith's term from the Dean and Chapter; so that he did not take under Smith at all. It is a question of privity of contract, not of estate. The testator's covenant remained. In Doe d. Palk v. Marchetti (1 B. & Ad. 715-721) Tenterden, C.J. said he had no doubt the intention of the legislature in framing the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6. was to place all parties as to every matter in the same situation as if no surrender had taken place. If the 2 Geo. 4. c. 28. s. 6. has not the effect contended for, that effect is produced by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 9.² Hyland is in the same situation as if he had taken an absolute assignment from Smith. When he brought ejectment in August, 1863, Fawsitt had no defence to the claim for the quarter's rent due at Midsummer, 1863, being liable on his covenant with Smith; Fawsitt's remedy was against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had no remedy but on the testator's covenant with him. The covenant is sufficient without entering on the question of rights at all.

Beasley then shewed cause against the rule.—All payments made by Fawsitt in consequence of the action of ejectment, notice of which was not given to the defendant, were purely voluntary.

[G. R. Clarke intimated that he gave up his claim to the costs of the defence, and held merely to the repairs and the rent.]

Fawsitt was well defended by title (as was also the plaintiff), if he had

(1) This section enacts, "That in case any lease shall be duly surrendered in order to be renewed, and a new lease made and executed by the chief landlord or landlords, the same new lease shall, without a surrender of all or any of the underleases, be as good and valid to all intents and purposes as if all the underleases derived thereout had been likewise surrendered at or before the taking of such new lease; and all and every person and persons in whom any estate for life or lives, or for years, shall from time to time be vested by virtue of such new lease, and his, her and their executors and administrators shall be entitled to the rents, covenants and duties, and have like remedy for recovery thereof, and the underlessees shall hold and enjoy the messuages, lands and tenements in the respective underleases comprised, as if the original leases, out of which the respective underleases are derived, had been still kept on foot and continued; and the chief landlord and landlords shall have and be entitled to such and the same remedy by distress or entry in and upon the messuages, &c. for the rents and duties reserved by such new lease, so far as the same exceed not the rents and duties reserved in the lease out of which such underlease was derived, as they would have had in case such former lease had been still continued, or as they would have had in case the respective underleases had been renewed under such new principal lease."

(2) This section enacts, that when the reversion expectant on a lease shall, after the 1st of October, 1845, be surrendered or merged, the estate which shall for the time being confer as against the tenant under the same lease the next vested right, shall to the extent and for the purpose of preserving such incidents to and obligations on the same reversion as, but for the surrender or merger thereof, would have subsisted, be deemed the reversion expectant on the same lease.

chosen to defend himself properly. The re-entry was under the new lease, not under the agreement; and the agreement itself is no underlease, so that the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6. does not apply. The covenant of the defendant's testator contains nothing about indemnity in reference to the rent. It does not appear whether the covenants in Hyland's new lease are the same as those in the agreement, and the estimate for repairs, &c. has been made on the footing of the new lease.

[CHANNELL, B.—The effect of the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6. was clearly to treat Hyland as the legal assignee of the reversion.]

Still the defendant ought to have had notice.

MARTIN, B.—I think this is a clear case. Smith, (who held under a lease from the Dean and Chapter of Westminster) in October, 1857, entered into an agreement for a lease with one Fawsitt, in which were contained certain covenants for repair and for payment of rent. Fawsitt entered and paid rent, and in construction of law thereby became tenant from year to year to Smith, subject to the conditions contained in the agreement. The next matter to be considered is what took place between Smith and Hyland; and it seems to me that the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6. put those parties exactly on the same footing, and in the same condition, so far as the defendant's testator was concerned, as if Smith had been owner in fee simple, and had, after creating this tenancy from year to year, assigned the reversion to Hyland. Then upon the 1st of January, 1862, Fawsitt sells his interest to the plaintiff, and takes from him a covenant to pay the rent, and to perform the other conditions in the agreement of 1857, and in the event of the plaintiff not performing the covenants, Fawsitt would have had a right to sue him for not doing so; and that is the point on which the question arises. Then the rent is not paid and Fawsitt is called upon to pay it, and he calls upon the plaintiff to pay; and the plaintiff, who has sold his interest to the defendant's testator, taking a similar covenant from him, has thereupon a right to come down on the defendant for payment of what the plaintiff has been compelled to pay. It seems to me that the act of parliament is to have the construction contended for by the plaintiff, and that the testator was liable by the deed of the 10th of October, 1862, to indemnify the plaintiff against a quarter's rent that became payable in June, 1863, and against the consequences of the premises being allowed to go out of repair. Therefore the verdict ought to be for the plaintiff for the rent and other expenses due under the covenant.

CHANNELL, B.—The first sum claimed by the plaintiff is 25*l.*, for costs of repairs, and 9*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* for one quarter's rent, due at Midsummer, 1863, and to that extent I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute. I do not say that, if the argument had been pressed beyond that, the plaintiff might not have recovered a larger amount. Now it should be borne in mind that the plaintiff's claim is founded on a contract entered into between the defendant's testator and himself. If there had been no surrender to the Dean and Chapter and no new lease granted by them, then, I apprehend, the case would have stood thus: on the 10th of October, 1862, the deed now declared on was signed by the defendant's testator, and it recited an instrument of the 26th of October, 1857, by which Smith made over his interest to Fawsitt; and it further recited the indenture of the 1st of January, 1862, by which Fawsitt made over his interest to the plaintiff, who, as he had been the covenantor, now became covenantee of the defendant's testator. And the question arises, by reason of the surrender by Smith to the Dean and Chapter and their new lease to Hyland for the residue of the term originally granted by them to Smith. It was necessary, on the part of the plaintiff, at the trial, to prove that Hyland had some interest in the matter; otherwise, he might have left the case in a very clear point of view, as he might have relied on the instrument of the 10th of October, 1862, the assignment to the defendant's testator, in which nothing was said about Hyland; but inasmuch as Hyland had put in force his claim against Fawsitt, which Fawsitt, in his turn, enforced against the plaintiff, it became necessary for the plaintiff to shew what Hyland's interest was, and it now appears that Hyland had agreed with Smith for the purchase of a portion of the premises originally demised to Smith, and before he completed his purchase and became the legal assignee of this portion, it was agreed that there should be a surrender to the Dean and Chapter, and a new demise back to Hyland of the portion he contracted to buy. Now, I am of opinion that, by virtue of the 4 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 6, the effect was to leave untouched the sub-interest that had been created before the surrender, but to give Smith the right to surrender (notwithstanding the previous contract creating the sub-tenancy); and the effect of the surrender was to make Hyland, as it were, assignee of the reversion; and then Hyland was entitled to proceed, as he did, by way of ejectment for the forfeiture, against Fawsitt; and Fawsitt, in his turn, was entitled to hold the plaintiff responsible to him for the rent that he contracted to pay, and for the performance of the other covenants. If, as was pressed upon us, the plaintiff's payment was a voluntary payment, it would make all the difference; but I take it that he only paid that which he was liable to pay, and I think that, not only upon the broad merits of the case, but on the pleadings in this particular case for these two sums of 25*l.* and 9*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.*, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.

BRAMWELL, B. was of the same opinion.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Error from the Court of Exchequer.)

Feb. 7, 1866.

OAKLEY v. MONCK.

35 L. J. Ex. 87; 4 H. & C. 251; L. R. 1 Ex. 159; 14 L. T. 20; 14 W. R. 406;
12 Jur. N.S. 253.

Distinguished, Wyatt v. Cole, 1879, 36 L. T. 613 (C.P. D.). Referred to, Keith v. R. Gancia & Co. [1904] 1 Ch. 774; 90 L. T. 395 (Ch. D.): affirmed, [1904] E. R. A.; 73 L. J. Ch. 411; [1904] 1 Ch. 787; 90 L. T. 397; 52 W. R. 580 (C. A.).

Landlord and Tenant—Expiration of Lease—Holding over—Tenancy from Year to Year—Acceptance of Rent by a Remainderman ignorant of the Conditions of the Old Lease.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.—Where a tenant for life granted a lease to a nurseryman containing (among others) a covenant that the lessor should, at the expiration of the term, pay for all fruit-trees upon the premises planted by the lessee at a fair valuation, and at the expiration of the term the lessee held over as tenant from year to year, and on the death of the tenant for life the tenant from year to year continued the occupation of the land, paying the same rent as the remainderman, the latter being ignorant of the existence of the covenant:—Held, that the receipt of rent by the remainderman, under the circumstances, was no evidence of a holding over under the terms of the lease so as to render it incumbent on the remainderman to take the fruit-trees at a valuation on the termination of the tenancy from year to year by notice to quit.

In this case a verdict was found, at the trial, for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court of Exchequer upon a special case. That Court gave judgment in favour of the defendant, and against that decision the plaintiff now appealed. The pleadings and case will be found fully set out in the report of the argument and judgment in the Court below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 137).

It will be sufficient to state here, that the plaintiff was the administrator of Henry Oakley. Henry Oakley, in the year 1826, entered into the occupation of certain premises under a lease for twenty-one years, granted to him by W. Stephens the younger, who was the tenant for life in possession under the limitations contained in the will of Richard Stephens, deceased. At Michaelmas, 1847, the lease expired, and Henry Oakley continued in possession as a tenant from year to year, nothing being said by him or his lessor about terms.

W. Stephens the younger died in April, 1856, and the defendant then became tenant for life in possession under the limitations in the will. Henry Oakley remained in the occupation of the premises till his death in 1859, and the plaintiff, his personal representative, continued in the occupation till it was determined at Michaelmas, 1862, by notice to quit given in the previous March.

Henry Oakley was a nurseryman, and one of the terms of his original lease was, that the lessor should at the expiration of the lease take all fruit-trees and shrubs planted by Henry Oakley at a valuation. There was no proof that this was ever made known to the defendant. The plaintiff maintained that the defendant was bound to take the fruit-trees and shrubs at a valuation, on the ground that the terms of the tenancies from year to year under W. Stephens the younger and the defendant, must be taken to be the same as those of the original lease.

O'Malley (Merewether with him), for the plaintiff, the appellant, repeated the arguments urged in the Court below, citing Wardall v. Usher (3 Scott, N.R. 508; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 316), Hyatt v. Griffiths (17 Q.B. Rep. 505), Roe v. Ward (1 H. Black. 97), Doe d. Martin v. Watts (7 Term Rep. 83), and Roe v. Prideaux (10 East, 158).

Keane (Douglas Brown with him), for the defendant, the respondent, was not heard.

WILLES, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed. It is impossible to read the case, and especially the 12th paragraph of it, without feeling that there may have been a hardship imposed on the plaintiff, inasmuch as the property, which he might have removed under the ordinary rule respecting fixtures, may have been lost to him in consequence of his not having pursued the proper course with respect to fixtures. If the equity of the case should turn out to be as it seems to be at present, it will be for the consideration of Mrs. Monck, whether the value of the trees ought not to be given to the plaintiff; but this is a matter of good conscience, and does not affect the legal question, which has been raised by the conduct of the plaintiff himself in insisting that the defendant was bound to take them and pay for them at a valuation. The question of law is whether the covenant to take the fruit trees at a valuation, which was contained in the original lease, was binding on the defendant. When the lease expired, the tenancy continued on all the terms of the lease which were not inconsistent with a yearly tenancy, and, probably, though it is not necessary for us to give a decided opinion on that point, if the tenant had been turned out then by a notice to quit, he would have been entitled to insist on payment of the value of the fruit trees. The lessor died, and the tenant might then have called on the lessor's executors, the tenancy from year to year having been determined by the death, to take the trees at a valuation, assuming that covenant not to have been, as I think it was not, inconsistent with a yearly tenancy. But the tenant, instead of removing within a reasonable time the property which was in the nature of fixtures, preferred holding on, and he did remain till his death, paying rent to the defendant. With the exception of the payment of rent, there is nothing in the case to prove that the defendant took on himself the burden of the covenants in the original lease. The old covenant expired with the lease. The subsequent tenancy was, in point of law, a new contract and a new demise. There was nothing to shew that it was a part of the terms of that contract that there should be a valuation of the trees except the payment and receipt of rent. The strong improbability that the tenant for life should have entered into such a contract is pointed out in the judgment of my Brother Bramwell in the Court below, and it is expressly found in the case that nothing passed to shew that the defendant had any knowledge of the covenants of the original lease, or even of the existence of that lease. In the absence of express stipulation between the parties, we are bound to assume that a tenancy from year to year is, on the usual terms, according to the custom of the country. We are asked to superadd in this case a special provision, either because it was a term of the original tenancy, though in point of law the tenancy under the defendant is a new one, or because all parties consented to it, which they did not in fact do. No special condition can be assumed which is not according to the use and custom of the place where the premises lie. I do not rely on the improbability of the tenant for life assenting to such a condition; but it is satisfactory that, in deciding according to the common sense view, we are deciding according to the legal view also. It is suggested as a difficulty, that unless the lessor were bound by this special term, although he did not know of its existence, the tenant would hold on one set of terms and the lessor would hold on another, which would be a solecism. In answer, another case might be put, which would present a solecism equally great of an opposite description. Assume the first lessor to have survived Oakley, and that the plaintiff, the representative of Oakley, had continued to hold on, the lease which had expired having been given up to the lessor, or for some reason not having come to the knowledge of Oakley's representative; assume further, that the tenant for life had died during the tenancy of the present plaintiff after Oakley's death; then neither the tenant nor the landlord would be aware of the terms of the old lease. If we are to put one solecism against the other, it would be an infinitely greater absurdity that one should be bound by one set of conditions, and the other by another, than that the contract should be void for want of mutuality. It is in every case a question of fact, easy of solution in practice. A tenant enters and stipulates, as he supposes, that the landlord is to repair a particular fence. After paying rent for years, the landlord's agent insists that there was no such stipulation, and the jury find that there was an honest mistake as to the terms of the agreement. Is the contract to be void, or is it not the rational conclusion that, the principal object of the contract having been the letting of the land, the tenancy has been created and the landlord may recover rent? A case arose some time ago, in which the decision of the Court of Exchequer was supported by that of the Exchequer Chamber, where an indenture having been put in the fire by consent, a tenancy was nevertheless held to have been created. The case as decided below seems so clear that I am almost ashamed to have said so much upon it.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears from this case that the plaintiff was the representative of the tenant who was in the occupation of land, paying rent when the defendant came into possession. All that the defendant knew was, that a certain rent had been paid, which she continued to receive. The tenancy from year to year so created would be on the ordinary terms of such a tenancy, unless other terms are shewn to have been agreed upon. If both sides had known of the terms upon which the premises were previously held, it would be reasonable evidence for a jury, or for us drawing inferences of fact, to conclude that the holding was to be on those terms. But it is impossible to incorporate those terms into the agreement unless they were known. If they were known, it does not follow that all of them would be incorporated, but only such as were applicable to a tenancy from year to year. It is a question of fact; and, no doubt, there may be a case, such as was suggested by the plaintiff's counsel, where the remainderman may have said to the tenant, "I have no doubt that the terms of your holding were reasonable. I accede to them whatever they were." In this case I do not see that our decision imposes much hardship on the plaintiff.

A nurseryman has a right to remove his shrubs, but not to cut down trees which have got root. The covenant in the lease had nothing to do with trade stock; but it was intended to encourage an improving tenant to plant orchard trees. A jury might conclude that Oakley and Stephens agreed at the termination of the lease that the same terms should go on. But when Stephens died, Mrs. Monck succeeded him, in utter ignorance of those terms. It is, as pointed out in the judgment below, improbable that she would have agreed to such a condition as this if she had known of it; but as she did not know of it, she cannot be taken to have agreed to it.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, on the simple ground that the case finds, as a fact, that the defendant was ignorant of the terms of the original lease.

MELLOR, J., MONTAGUE SMITH, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 17, 1886.

THE RAMSGATE VICTORIA HOTEL COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
MONTEFIORE. THE SAME v. GOLDSMID. MONTEFIORE v. THE RAMSGATE VICTORIA HOTEL COMPANY (LIMITED).

35 L. J. Ex. 90; L. R. 1 Ex. 109; 4 H. & C. 164; 13 L. T. 715; 14 W. R. 335;
12 Jur. N.S. 455.

See Baily's Case, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Ch. 255; L. R. 5 Eq. 428; 16 W. R. 571 (V.C.): affirmed, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Ch. 670; L. R. 3 Ch. 592; 19 L. T. 58; 16 W. R. 1093 (L.C.); Boyle's Case, [1885] E. R. A.; 54 L. J. Ch. 550; 52 L. T. 501; 33 W. R. 450 (Ch. D.); Portugese Consolidated Copper Mines, 1890, 45 Ch. D. 16; 63 L. T. 423; 39 W. R. 25 (C. A.).

Joint-Stock Company—Allotment of Shares—Reasonable Time—Action for Calls—Repayment of Deposits.

COMPANY.—Where shares in a joint-stock company are applied for, they must be allotted by the directors within a reasonable time, otherwise the applicant may refuse to receive them, and may recover back the deposit paid on application.

Where shares were applied for on the 8th of June and allotted on the 23rd of November,—Held, that this was not an allotment within a reasonable time.

The Ramsgate Victoria Hotel Company (Limited) commenced actions against several persons for calls, and cross-actions were brought by those persons against the company for recovery of deposits paid on applications for shares. By consent and an order of Martin, B., a special case for the opinion of the Court was stated respecting all of them.

The special case set out the pleadings in the action by the company against Montefiore. The declaration contained a count for non-acceptance of shares duly allotted, and non-payment of deposit and calls thereon, and an indebitatus count for deposit and calls. The defendant traversed the material allegations in the declaration, and pleaded, in addition, to the first count, fifthly, that before allotment he had withdrawn his application; sixthly, that after the lapse of a reasonable time without allotment he had withdrawn his application; and, seventhly, that after the lapse of a reasonable time without notice of allotment given to him he had withdrawn his application.

The substantial facts stated by the case respecting this action were as follows:

The company was completely registered on the 6th of June, 1864, on which day the articles of association were duly registered. By the 2nd of such articles, it was provided that the company should continue incorporated notwithstanding that the whole number of shares in the capital might not be subscribed for or issued, and might commence and carry on business when in the judgment of the board a sufficient number of shares had been subscribed to justify them in so doing.

Prior to the 8th of June, 1864, the defendant had received one of the company's prospectuses containing this statement: "Deposit on application, 1*l.* per share, and 4*l.* on allotment." On the 8th of June the defendant paid to the company's bankers the sum of 50*l.*, taking the printed receipt in the form attached to the prospectus for "50*l.*, being the deposit paid in accordance with the terms of the prospectus on an application for an allotment of fifty shares." On the same day he filled up and forwarded to the directors the printed application for shares, also attached to the prospectus, in the following form:

"To the directors of the Ramsgate Victoria Hotel Company (Limited).

"Gentlemen,—Having paid to your bankers the sum of 50*l.*, I hereby request you will allot me fifty shares of 20*l.* each in the Ramsgate Victoria Hotel Company (Limited), and I hereby agree to accept such shares or any smaller number that may be allotted to me, to pay the deposit and calls thereon, and to sign the articles of association of the company, at such times and in such manner as you may appoint. I am," &c.

The directors met for the first time after the complete registration on the 13th of June, and they had in all seventeen meetings, the last being on the 30th of November. The minutes of the meetings were to be referred to as part of the case.

At a meeting of the directors on the 17th of August the secretary submitted to the board a list of applicants for shares up to that time. The defendant's name appeared as a subscriber for fifty shares. Afterwards, and before the 23rd of November, the secretary prepared another list, which was attached to the case. This list shewed opposite the defendant's name fifty shares in the column of shares applied for, and fifty shares in the column of shares allotted. The minute of the meeting of directors held on the 2nd of November contained the following entry: "The secretary submitted the list of subscribers, but it was not deemed advisable to proceed to an immediate allotment."

Between the month of June and the 23rd of November the defendant received no direct communication from the directors or their secretary, and on the 8th of November he wrote to the directors stating that "the allotment of shares not having been made, he withdrew his application and requested a return of the deposit, and should decline to accept any shares if allotted."

On the 18th of November his solicitors wrote demanding a return of the deposit.

On the 23rd of November the directors passed the following resolution:

"Resolved that notice be given to all shareholders that the directors do hereby make the first call of 4*l.* already due on the allotment of their shares, and further, that the secretary inform them that in case any shareholder shall choose to pay up the whole amount due on his shares, he shall be allowed 7*l.* 10*s.* per cent. on the amount, being at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. for eighteen months, the time which it is calculated will elapse before the hotel is opened."

On the same day the secretary prepared a third list of shareholders, including the defendant's name as a holder of fifty shares, and notice of it was sent to him in the following letter from the secretary:

"I am instructed by the directors to acquaint you, that in compliance with your application, they have allotted to you fifty shares in this company, and have entered your name in the register of shareholders for the same, and I have to request that you will pay the balance of first call as noted below, on or before the 15th of December, to the London and County Bank, 21, Lombard Street.

"No. of shares, 50.

"Deposit £ 50

"Further payment on allotment 200

£250 "

The defendant's solicitor wrote declining the shares, and requiring the removal of the defendant's name from the list of shareholders, and a return of the deposit.

The secretary wrote in reply, that shortly after the incorporation of the company a list of shareholders had been made, which constituted an allotment of shares.

Cross-actions were then commenced; the company suing for the amount of the call and damages for not accepting the shares, the defendant suing for a return of the deposit.

In the action by the company against Goldsmid, the facts were stated to be the same, except that he had not withdrawn his application or given notice of any intention to do so.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the above circumstances, the company or the other parties were entitled to maintain their actions.

Mellish (Digby with him), for the company.—The prepared lists of shareholders' names amounted to an allotment. It was not necessary to send notice of allotment to the shareholders. No doubt, in the case of ordinary contracts, the communication of an assent to a proposal within a reasonable time is essential, but that rule does not apply to a case like the present. From June to November may well be a reasonable time within which to make the communication. Directors have to wait to see what applications they have for shares, and if it is prudent to commence business. There may be a valid allotment without any communication of it to the shareholders, as appears from Ex parte Cookney (3 De Gex. & J. 170; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 12; 26 Beav. 6) and Ex parte Blozam (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 519, 574).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—In those cases it was a question of putting the allottee on the list of contributories, which is very different from holding him liable for calls. This appears from the judgment of Lord Justice Turner, in the latter case.]

Montagu Chambers (Cohen with him), contra, was not called on.

THE COURT¹ gave judgment against the company in all the actions on the ground that there had been no allotment of shares till the 23rd of November, which was not an allotment within a reasonable time after the applications for shares.

Judgment accordingly.

(1) Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B., and Pigott, B.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 29, 1866.

CRAGG v. TAYLOR.

35 L. J. Ex. 92; 4 H. & C. 158; L. R. 1 Ex. 148; 12 Jur. N.S. 320;
13 L. T. 756; 14 W. R. 399.

Distinguished, Dixon v. Wrench, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. Ex. 113; L. R. 4 Ex. 154; 20 L. T. 492; 17 W. R. 591 (Ex.). Not followed, Coates's Case, [1877] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. Ch. 367; 35 L. T. 617; 25 W. R. 111 (V.C.). See South Western Loan Co. v. Robertson, [1882] E. R. A.; 51 L. J. Q.B. 79; L. R. 8 Q.B. D. 17; 46 L. T. 427; 30 W. R. 102 (Q.B.D. Div.). Distinguished, Cooper v. Griffin, [1892] E. R. A.; 61 L. J. Q.B. 563; [1892] 1 Q.B. 740; 66 L. T. 660; 40 W. R. 420 (Q.B.D. Div.).

1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14.—Companies' Act, 1862, section 30.—Charging Order on Shares in Limited Company—Trustee.

EXECUTION.—The 30th section of the Companies' Act, 1862, enacts; that no notice of any trust shall be entered on the register of a company incorporated under the act; and, therefore, the Court will not set aside an order, made under the 14th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, charging shares in a limited company, standing in the name of a judgment debtor, although he be owner of the shares as trustee only, and have no beneficial interest whatever therein.

On the 31st of August, 1865, judgment was signed in this action against the defendant for 198l. 1s. 1d. damages and costs.

On the 4th of November Martin, B. made an order at chambers, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14,¹ that fifty shares in the Glynrhonwy Slate Company (Limited), registered in the name of the defendant, should stand charged with the payment of the said sum.

The order was made on an affidavit shewing that the company was incorporated in March, 1860, under the Joint-Stock Companies' Act, 1856, and that by a deed of transfer dated the 12th of July, 1865, and left at the office of the company on that day for registration, Vernon Pearce Taylor, the defendant's brother and a shareholder in the company, in consideration of 10s., bargained, sold, assigned and transferred to the defendant fifty shares in the company; and that on the 11th of September the directors of the company ordered that the transfer should be registered, and that it was duly registered accordingly in the company's books.

H. T. Cole obtained a rule to rescind the order, on affidavits of the defendant, his brother and his attorney, stating that the shares were transferred to the defendant merely as trustee for his brother, and that the defendant had at the time acknowledged in a letter to his brother that he held the shares as trustee for him; and that the transfer was so made in order that the defendant might be a director of the company for the support of his brother's interests; and that the defendant had not any beneficial interest whatever in the said shares.

(1) This section is as follows: "That if any person against whom any judgment shall have been entered up in any of Her Majesty's superior Courts at Westminster shall have any Government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares of or in any public company in England (whether incorporated or not), standing in his name in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, it shall be lawful for a Judge of one of the superior Courts, on the application of any judgment creditor, to order that such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or such of them or such part thereof respectively as he shall think fit, shall stand charged with the payment of the amount for which judgment shall have been so recovered, and interest thereon, and such order shall entitle the judgment creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor; provided that no proceedings shall be taken to have the benefit of such charge until after the expiration of six calendar months from the date of such order."

M'Intyre shewed cause.—The transfer is clear on the face of the defendant's own affidavits. His name is inserted as a member in the company's register; and by the Companies' Act, 1862, the shareholder is the person in whose name the shares are registered. He it is who is liable to calls, and it is with him alone that the act deals, for the act does not recognize trusts at all—25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. s. 30.² The words "in his own right," in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14, are equivalent to "in his own legal right," and are meant to exclude property standing in the debtor's name as executor, &c. But if the defendant has any interest at all in these shares, we are entitled to the order.—He cited Fuller v. Earle (7 Exch. Rep. 796; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314) and Baker v. Tynte (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 233).

Cole, contra.—Shares in these companies are made the subject-matter of marriage settlements every day now. It cannot be that such shares—say in the London and Westminster Bank—are to be subject to the judgment debts of the trustee. The words "in his own right," in the 14th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, must be meant to exclude the case of a trustee holding shares for others, and to prevent the mischief arising of being sent to Equity for relief.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The defendant could not defend in an action for calls by saying he was a trustee.]

That is a different matter. The question here is, has he any beneficial interest as against a judgment creditor? In Fuller v. Earle (7 Exch. Rep. 796; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314), the point is left open by Martin, B. The effect of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. is, that you can charge a beneficial interest in stock or shares standing in the name of a trustee, but not a trustee who has no beneficial interest himself in the stock or shares. The date of the registration of the transfer—after judgment—shews the bona fides of the transaction.

He cited Whitworth v. Gaugain.³

POLLOCK, C.B.—This order must stand. In the case of Rogers v. Holloway (5 Man. & G. 292; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182) the Court of Common Pleas refused to interfere with a charging order on stock standing in the names of trustees for a defendant, Lord Chief Justice Tindal saying that the Court of Chancery was the proper tribunal to afford a remedy; and a fortiori we should not interfere in a case of this sort, referring to a new species of partnership property created by the Limited Liability Acts. Thus far on general principles. But the act of 1862 requires the shareholders' names to be entered on the register; and while the 43rd section provides for notice being taken of mortgages, the 30th section makes an express provision to the contrary with regard to trusts; and as there can be no such thing in an ordinary partnership, so neither can there be, as it seems to me, in a limited liability company.

MARTIN, B.—The order was right. The object of the act of 1862 was, that the members' names should appear on the company's register, informing the public who are the partners in the company; and by the 30th section no trust is to be recognized or taken into consideration at all. The charging order is to be made on shares standing in the judgment debtor's name in his own right, that is, as I apprehend, not in his right as executor. The 14th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. entitles the creditor to the remedies he would have had if the charge had been made by the debtor, and so all that the act does here is to give the plaintiff a right of shewing in equity that he is entitled to such interest as the debtor had. By discharging the order we should be preventing the plaintiff from insisting on this right in a Court of equity.

(2) This section is as follows: "No notice of any trust, expressed, implied or constructive, shall be entered on the register or be receivable by the Registrar in the case of companies under this act, and registered in England or Ireland."

(3) 3 Hare, 416; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 288; 1 Cr. & Ph. 325; 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 317.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, on the ground that the shares are standing in the defendant's own name upon the register of the company. This makes a prima facie case in favour of the order. Then comes the question whether the defendant can say that the transfer merely created a trust. I do not say the transfer was made mala fide; but I think a Court of equity is the place where the question ought to be raised.

PIGOTT, B.—The question is not free from difficulty. The relation of trustee and cestui que trust may possibly be created; but it is for a Court of equity to determine whether the relation exists here or not; and I am assisted in coming to this conclusion by the case of Rogers v. Holloway (5 Man. & G. 292; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 182). It would be an act of injustice if we, by discharging the order, precluded the parties from trying the question in equity.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 31, Feb. 7, 1866.

WILSON v. JONES.

35 L. J. 1 Ex. 94; L. R. 1 Ex. 193; 14 L. T. 65; 14 W. R. 499: affirmed, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 78; L. R. 2 Ex. 139; 15 L. T. 669; 15 W. R. 435 (Ex. Ch.).

Marine Insurance—Laying Submarine Cable—Construction of Policy—Insurance of the Entire Adventure—Total Loss.

MARINE INSURANCE.—The owner of shares in a company formed for the purpose of laying down a submarine telegraph cable between I. and N. caused himself to be insured by a policy framed on the common form of a marine policy, but containing in addition the following clauses, viz.: "The risk to commence at, from and including the time of lading of the cable on board the G. E., and to continue till the cable be laid in one continuous length between I. and N., and until 100 words shall have been transmitted from I. to N., and vice versa;" and "It is hereby understood and agreed that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from, and including its lading on board the G. E. until 100 words be transmitted from I. to N., and vice versa; and it is distinctly declared and agreed that the transmission of the 100 words from I. to N., and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of the policy":—Held, that this was an insurance on the entire undertaking of laying down the cable successfully, and that, on the cable breaking when half of it was laid down, the underwriter was liable as for a total loss, although the other half of the cable was saved and ready for use in a subsequent attempt to carry out the undertaking.

Declaration—That the plaintiff, by J. H. Joyce his agent, by a policy of insurance bearing date the 21st of July, 1865, caused himself to be insured in the words and figures following, that is to say: "J. H. Joyce, in the name of God, amen, as well in his own name as for, &c., doth make assurance, and cause himself and them, and every of them, to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Ireland to Newfoundland, the risk to commence at and from and including the lading of the cable on board of the Great Eastern, and to continue until the said cable be laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until 100 words shall have been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, the risk of this policy then to cease and determine,¹ upon any kind of goods and merchandises, and also upon the body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munition, artillery, boat and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel called the Great Eastern, whereof is master for this present voyage — or whosoever else, &c.; beginning the adventure, upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship as above, upon the said ship, &c., including risk of craft, and shall so continue and endure during her abode there upon the said ship, &c., and further, until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c. and goods and merchandises whatsoever shall be arrived, &c. until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed; and it shall be lawful for the said ship, &c. in this voyage to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever without prejudice to this insurance. The said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c. for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between assured and assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 200*l*. On the Atlantic cable, value say on twenty shares valued at 10*l*. per share; *it is hereby understood and agreed that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from, and including its lading on board the Great Eastern, until one hundred words be transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa; and it is distinctly declared and agreed that the transmission of the said one hundred words from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of the policy.*¹ Touching the adventures and perils which we, the assurers, are contented to bear, and do take upon us in this voyage, they are of the seas—men of war, &c.”—[The rest of the policy was in the common form of a marine policy. The premium was 25 guineas per cent.; and all goods (other than those usually excepted) and the ship and freight were warranted free from average under 3*l*. per cent., unless general, or the ship be stranded. The defendant underwrote for 200*l*.]—Averments that the defendant for a certain premium paid to him by the plaintiff, subscribed the said policy for 200*l*., and became an insurer, &c.; and the said cable was shipped on the said ship to be carried thereon, and to be laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and the plaintiff was then and thence, &c., interested in the said cable to the amount, &c.; and that the said ship with the cable on board thereof sailed on the said voyage, and afterwards, and whilst the said ship with the said cable on board thereof was proceeding on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risk, and before the said Atlantic cable was laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and before one hundred words had been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, the said Atlantic cable was by perils so insured against as aforesaid wholly lost, and all conditions were fulfilled, &c. to entitle the plaintiff to be paid the said 200*l*. by the defendant; yet the defendant has not paid the same.

Second plea, that the plaintiff was not interested in the said cable, as alleged. Third, that the said cable was not lost by the perils insured against, or any of them, as alleged. Fourth, that the alleged loss of the said cable was an average loss under 3*l*. per cent. within the meaning of the policy, and was not a general average loss, and the said ship during the said voyage was not stranded. Issue thereon.

This case was tried, before Martin, B., at the Liverpool Winter Assize, 1865, when evidence was given of the following facts. The Atlantic Telegraph Company were about to lay a submarine cable between Ireland and Newfoundland; and 2,200 miles of the cable were put on board the Great Eastern, from which it was to be paid out, as the ship went along. The Great Eastern left Valentia, Ireland, on the 23rd of July. On the 2nd of August, after about 1,100 miles of the cable had been laid down, some of it had to be hauled back in consequence of a defect in the insulation; and whilst this was being done, the cable broke on board the Great Eastern, and the broken end fell into the sea, where it was about two miles deep. After some fruitless endeavours to raise the submerged portion, the Great Eastern returned to Sheerness with the remainder of the cable (nearly 1,200 miles in length) on board, where it remained up to the time of the action; and the directors of the company still hoped that the part saved might be made available for another attempt.

(1) The two clauses in italics were written in the margin of the policy, the body of which was the common printed form of a marine policy.

The plaintiff was the owner of twenty shares of 10*l.* each, in the company. The defendant underwrote the policy for 200*l.* on the 29th of July, the premium paid being 25 guineas per cent.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 200*l.*, and the Judge reserved leave to move to enter the verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the loss was not by the perils insured against, or if it were, that it was only an average loss, and there was no evidence that it was higher than 3 per cent.; or to reduce the damages on the ground that the loss was an average loss.

Brett having obtained a rule accordingly,

S. Temple and Leofric Temple shewed cause, contending that the policy was clearly on the face of it a policy on the entire undertaking, and not merely on the cable. The words in the margin would be useless if they did not mean perils other than the "perils of the seas."

Brett and Quain supported the rule.—The difficulty arises from a common marine policy having been used.

[MARTIN, B.—This contract is not a marine policy just because it begins with "In the name of God, Amen."]

A written document is to be interpreted according to the plain and ordinary meaning of the words used, and not according to what the parties to the instrument might probably have meant. Secondly, it is to be construed so as to give effect to all the words used, and not merely to isolated portions of the document; and, thirdly, if the written document has a general similarity to other documents which have been construed judicially by the Court, it must also be construed, as far as possible, according to the decisions of the Court. If this document can be made out to be a marine policy, the Court must not regard it as a wager. By its very terms it is a valued policy on the cable. If it had been a policy on the shares, it would have said in terms, "on the Atlantic cable, that is, on certain shares therein." Again, if it be a policy on shares, it is an insurance on an uninsurable subject-matter; for they are not within Lawrence, J.'s, definition of insurable interest—see 1 Arnould, 281 (2nd edit.), and Lucena v. Crawford (2 Bos. & P. N.R. 302). The policy could not have attached till the cable was on board the Great Eastern: the shares were never put on board. Again, if the cable had been laid successfully, and then a slight flaw had stopped the transmission of messages temporarily, the shares would have increased in value instead of becoming deteriorated. In Paterson v. Harris (1 Best & S. 336; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 354), where the policy contained a memorandum that the insurance should "cover and include the successful working of the cable when laid down," it was held that the insurance was on the plaintiff's interest in the cable itself, and that the warranty clause applied. The marginal addition here does not alter the subject-matter of insurance; it only increases the risks and lengthens the time of risk. And if this were a policy on the shares, we must still come back to the question—what were the perils insured against? The words in the margin must be read after those in the body of the policy; and they must relate to risks ejusdem generis as those there specified. They do not cover any peril in the ordinary course of an ordinary voyage, or arising from an inherent defect in the cable itself—Paterson v. Harris (1 Best & S. 336; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 354), per Cockburn, C.J. The accident here occurred from hauling in the cable where the sea was two miles deep, after a defect had been discovered in the insulation. Again, the loss cannot be considered total; for nearly 1,200 miles of cable have been brought home, and are within the power of the assured. It is declared by the company to be of use again, and is therefore of value. Even if the policy be on the shares, still the loss is not total; for the shares are still of some value by reason of the cable saved. They are not the subject-matter of abandonment, and therefore cannot be abandoned.

Cur. adv. vult.

MARTIN, B. (Feb. 7) delivered the judgment of the Court.²—after reading the material parts of the policy and stating the facts as they are given above, his Lordship said—The contract is partly written and partly printed, and the agreement between the parties is to be ascertained by the words of it. The circumstance that it is upon the printed form, which is usually adopted for a common marine policy, is wholly immaterial if the language used and adopted by the parties shews that the insurance extends further than marine policies ordinarily do. In the present policy the risk of the insurance is declared to commence from the lading of the cable on board, and to continue until it be laid down in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until 100 words shall have been transmitted to and fro, when the risk is to cease and determine. Now, so far as these words go, they express that the subject-matter of insurance was the cable; but in the subsequent part of the policy it was declared to be agreed, that in addition to the ordinary perils and casualties insured against in the common marine policy, the insurance is to cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying down of the cable. It seems to us that words cannot be used more apt and fit to express that the underwriter contracted to insure against the risk and contingency which has happened, namely, the unsuccessful attempt to convey and lay down the cable. It seems to us that what has occurred is within the words of the contract; it was a risk and contingency which attended the conveyance of the cable, and the unsuccessful attempt to lay it down. In truth, the policy is not merely on the cable, but on the adventure.

The second question is, whether the loss be total or partial. We think it total. The adventure in respect of which the insurance was effected was the successful laying down of the cable, which was shipped on board the Great Eastern, in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland. This has wholly failed, and in our opinion the circumstance that one-half of the cable has been saved is immaterial. The assurance was upon the adventure; and even if it had been merely on the cable, it was upon the entire continuous cable, and not on a portion of it. Paterson v. Harris (1 Best & S. 336; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 354), which was cited for the defendant, really has no bearing whatever on the subject. It was an action upon a policy in the common form, and the Court "held that the loss there was not a loss by perils of the sea." So, too, it may possibly be, that the loss in the present case is not a loss by the perils of the seas; but upon this it is unnecessary to give an opinion, as we think the misfortune which has occurred is distinctly and plainly within the words of the policy, and that it was a risk and contingency against which the defendant contracted to insure. The rule will, therefore, be discharged.

Rule discharged.

(2) Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 20, Feb. 9, 1866.

WILSON v. THE NEWPORT DOCK COMPANY.

35 L. J. Ex. 97; 4 H. & C. 232; L. R. 1 Ex. 177; 14 L. T. 230; 14 W. R. 558;
12 Jur. N.S. 233.

Damages—Breach of Contract—Consequential Damage.

DAMAGES. SHIPPING.—The declaration stated that, in consideration that the plaintiff would bring his ship to the defendants' dock at a certain time, the defendants promised to dock her therein, and that the plaintiff brought her to the dock at the time appointed, but that the defendants refused to admit her into the dock, by reason whereof she grounded outside the dock when the tide ebbed, and was damaged.

Evidence was given that the dock-gate could not be opened because a chain had broken, and that the plaintiff was informed of this immediately on the arrival of his ship opposite the dock. There was conflicting evidence as to the reason for the ship remaining in the river opposite to the dock-gate till she grounded.

The jury were asked, first, whether there was a place of safety to which the ship could have been taken before the tide ebbed; and, secondly, whose fault it was that she was not taken there—the captain's or the pilot's. They returned no answer to the first question, and replied to the second, that neither the captain nor the pilot was to blame.

Held, by Martin, B., that the damages consequent upon the ship taking the ground were not too remote to be recovered by the plaintiff.

Held, by Pollock, C.B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B., that without more assistance from the jury, the case was not ripe for the decision of the Court.

Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179) discussed.

Declaration—That the defendants were proprietors of a certain dock communicating with a certain tidal river, to wit, the River Usk, which dock was used for the reception and docking of ships and vessels therein, for reward to the defendants in that behalf. And the plaintiff was the owner of a ship or vessel, and was desirous of having the same received and docked in the said dock, for reward to the defendants in that behalf as aforesaid, whereof the defendants had notice; and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiff would cause the said ship to be brought at a certain time on a certain day towards and to the said dock, for the purpose of being so received and docked therein as aforesaid, the defendants promised him so to receive and dock the said ship therein as aforesaid. And the plaintiff says that he, relying on the defendants' promise, did cause the said ship to be brought at the time and on the day aforesaid towards, and the same was being brought towards and to the said dock for the purpose of being so received and docked therein as aforesaid, and all things were done, &c. to entitle the plaintiff to have had his said ship then so received and docked as aforesaid; yet the defendants, whilst the said ship was then being so brought towards and to the said dock, for the purpose aforesaid, then wholly refused to and did not nor would then receive and dock the said ship in the said dock. And the said ship, being by reason thereof left in the said river, at the ebbing of the tide there, grounded and took the ground there, and was thereby greatly damaged and injured, and the plaintiff incurred great expenses in and about having such damage and injury repaired.

Plea of payment into court of 15*l*.

Replication, that the sum paid into court was not enough to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

The case came on to be tried, before Byles, J., at the last Monmouth Assizes, and the facts proved were as follows. On the 17th of November, 1863, the ship Lord Elgin was in dry dock at Newport, and upon the morning of that day, by the direction of the dock-master of the defendants' dock, she proceeded towards their dock for the purpose of entering it, being in ballast at the time. It was a very short distance from the dry dock to the defendants' dock, and the ship was towed down the river by a steam-tug, and arrived at the defendants' dock-gate about high water, when, in consequence of the chain of the dock gate being broken, or out of order, she could not be admitted. The captain of Lord Elgin was unacquainted with the river and its navigation, and he directed the ship to be anchored where she was. In about three hours afterwards, upon the ebb, she took the ground and was "hogged," in consequence of which about 2,000*l*. had to be expended on her in repairs, and the present question was in respect of this damage. The 15*l*. was paid into court to cover the expense of bringing the ship down to the dock. There does not seem to have been any application made to the learned Judge at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case to nonsuit, or direct a verdict for the defendants, upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury; and witnesses were called for the defendants. It was contended, that upon the evidence the captain acted improperly; that he ought not to have anchored where he did; that he ought to have done one of several things; that he ought to have gone back towards the dry dock, or have gone down to a place called "West Point," where it was said the ship could have safely grounded, or have gone into deep water and there anchored. The captain stated reasons why, in his opinion, none of these ought to have been done. It was also alleged that the ship was not sufficiently ballasted.

According to the Judge's note, it was contended, on behalf of the defendants, that the damage was too remote, and was unconnected with the cause of action; and upon this point he gave leave to move. He then proposed two questions to the jury. First, whether there was, in fact, any place of safety to which the vessel might have been taken. Upon this question the jury could not agree. Secondly, whether both the captain and the pilot did the best they could under the circumstances, and whether either of them was guilty of any negligence? To this the jury answered, that they both did the best they could, and that neither of them was guilty of negligence. Upon this finding the learned Judge directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, (the amount of damages having been agreed to be referred); and he gave the defendants leave to move, with power to the Court to draw any inferences from the facts consistent with the finding of the jury, adding that he did not disapprove of the finding.

The defendants afterwards obtained a rule to set the verdict aside, on the ground that the sum paid into court was sufficient to cover the damages legally recoverable, and the damages claimed for injury by the "hogging" of the ship were too remote,—the Court to draw inferences of fact not inconsistent with the finding of the jury; or for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection by the Judge and miscarriage in the finding of the jury.

Huddleston having, in Michaelmas Term, obtained a rule accordingly—

Mellish, W. H. Cooke and Dowdeswell now shewed cause.—Damages arising from a breach of contract must, no doubt, be direct, and not merely consequential, to be recoverable, according to the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179). And if the declaration had stated that, by reason of the injury to the ship, the plaintiff had had to pay damages to the charterer, that would have been consequential damage. But here the damage was direct.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—One test of liability is, did the defendants' misconduct operate as causa causans, or as causa sine qua non? If only as the latter, then the mischief would amount to consequential damage only.]

The non-opening of the gates was the causa causans, though not the causa proxima. It was evident to everybody that the ship, if left outside, must inevitably take the ground and be injured. Smeed v. Foord (1 El. & El. 602; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 178) shews that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. In Collen v. Wright (8 El. & B. 647; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 215) the damage was infinitely more remote than here. So also in Gibbs v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (3 Hurl. & N. 164; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 321), Randall v. Roper (1 El. B. & El. 84; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 266), and Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716). The grounding of the ship must be considered under the circumstances to have been the natural and reasonable consequence of the defendants' act; for the finding of the jury is, that neither the captain nor the pilot was to blame; and that is of itself enough to support a verdict for the plaintiff.

[CHANNELL, B.—The defendants cannot be worse off than if the jury had found the question against them.]

Huddleston, Gray and H. James supported the rule.—The accident was beyond the defendant's control, and the ship had several hours within which she might have been taken to a place of safety. The damages are too remote, according to the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 179) and Fletcher v. Tayleur (17 Com. B. Rep. 21; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 65). They were not within the contemplation of the parties. If a lodger is refused entrance to his lodging, and lies down on the pavement and gets run over, can he say the injury arose from the door being shut? If the ship had been injured by collision while at anchor opposite the dock, or had been capsized while there by a hurricane, the defendants would not have been liable. The immediate cause of the damage here was that there was a gale blowing at the time, and that the ship was not sufficiently ballasted to face it. It may be that she ought not to have left the dry dock at all.

[MARTIN, B.—The proximate cause was the ship remaining opposite the dock and grounding there. The defendants broke their contract in not opening the gate.]

The non-removal of the vessel was not the act of the defendants. The whole question is discussed in Sedgwick on Damages, chap. 3, and by Lord Campbell, C.J., in Smeed v. Foord (1 El. & El. 602; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 178). The possibility of the gate being immovable, and of a gale blowing at the time, was not in the contemplation of the parties to the contract. The non-entry into the dock was merely causa sine qua non.

[POLLOCK, C.B. cited Gee v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (6 Hurl. & N. 211; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 11).]

In Gibbs v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Dock (3 Hurl. & N. 164; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 321) everything was found for the plaintiff, and negligence was proved in the defendants' manner of keeping their docks. In Collen v. Wright (8 El. & B. 647; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 215) the defendant represented he had authority when he had not. The principle there was, that notice was given of the Chancery suit, the costs of which were held to be recoverable as damages; and in Randall v. Roper (1 El. B. & El. 84; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 266) the damage arose from a breach of warranty as to the quality of the barley sold, and was clearly within the contemplation of the parties.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 9th of February—

The Judges, differing in opinion, delivered their judgments as follows:

MARTIN, B., after stating the pleadings and the facts as they are given above proceeded as follows—I think that the direction of the learned Judge that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff was right in point of law.

The question of damages is of constant occurrence; it occurs in almost every action of contract, except contracts for the payment of a certain fixed sum of money, and necessarily in every action for a wrong. Ordinary cases on contracts are actions for the non-delivery or non-acceptance of goods agreed to be sold, on agreements for the sale of land, for breaches of promise to marry, for non-acceptance or non-delivery of stock or shares; and an infinite variety of others might be named. So also, in actions for wrongs, it occurs every day; for instance, in actions for injuries sustained by accidents on railways and by collision, which now constitute a very considerable number of the causes tried at Nisi Prius; in actions for libel and slander, for assault and false imprisonment, and in numberless other cases. In some instances the measure of damages is fixed and ascertained by long-established usage; for instance, for the non-delivery of goods which are the subject of common sale in the market, I apprehend that a Judge is bound to tell the jury that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price; and that, if he does not, his summing up would be liable to objection. And there are other cases in which the like long usage has fixed the measure of damages. So also in some cases the matter of damages has been the subject of decision in the superior Courts; and I apprehend that when this has been so, the decision is a binding authority upon the same and other Courts in like manner and to the same extent as other decisions. For instance, the case of Hadley v. Bazendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179) is a decision of this kind. The plaintiffs, who were millers, had delivered to the defendants, common carriers of goods at Gloucester, a broken iron shaft, to be carried by them to Greenwich and delivered to an engineer there, in order to enable him to use it as a model for making a new shaft. The defendants were told that the mill was stopped in consequence of the shaft being broken, and they promised that, if the shaft was sent before a certain hour, it would be delivered at Greenwich on the following morning. The delivery of the shaft was delayed by some neglect, and the plaintiffs did not receive the new shaft till some days after the time they otherwise would have done, and they claimed damages for the loss of profit which they would have made had the new shaft been delivered earlier. Crompton, J. left the case generally to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiffs. A rule was granted by the Court of Exchequer for a new trial for misdirection, because they were of opinion that the learned Judge ought to have told the jury to exclude the loss of profit in estimating the damages. This case is, therefore, an authority that in a similar case such loss of profit cannot be made an element of damages, and must be excluded; but it is an authority no further, and anything said by the Court in delivering judgment, is to be judged by its being consonant to law and reason.

The decision in Hadley v. Bazendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179) is, therefore, no authority whatever in the present case, for no loss of profits is claimed; nor is it an authority that loss of profits is not a legitimate element of damages in many other cases, for instance, in a railway accident, whereby a tradesman or workman is prevented from attending to his business by the injuries he has sustained, the loss of profit in such cases is a constant element of damage; and in a case tried the other day at Liverpool, where so large a sum as 7,000*l.* was given in a case under Lord Campbell's Act, the sole element of damage was the loss of profit of the deceased in his profession of surgeon, and no objection was made on this ground; and I have no doubt whatever that, if the Judge had told the jury to exclude it, there would have been misdirection. In regard to the present case, there is no established rule and no decision, and the general rule is to be applied. This rule is, that the damage to be compensated for ought to be proximate to, and not remote from, the breach of contract or the wrong, and ought fairly and reasonably and naturally to arise from them. I do not adopt the qualifications mentioned by Alderson, B., in the judgment in Hadley v. Bazendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179) as applicable to every case.

They may have been perfectly right there, but they are not of universal application. "Naturally," he says, means "according to the usual course of things." Contracts, however, are infinite in variety, and suppose, as in this case, no such claim for damage had ever been known to have been made, then no usual course of things exists; but still the damages to be recovered by the plaintiff are not, in my opinion, therefore to be nominal. He then proceeds to say "or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it." Now this may properly enough be taken into consideration in the case of carriers and their customers; but in the bulk of broken contracts it has no application whatever. Parties entering into contracts contemplate that they will be performed, and not broken; and in the infinite majority of instances the damages which may arise from the breach never enter into their contemplation at all. As to Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179), I was a party to it, and have no desire to depreciate it; but in Boyd v. Fitt (14 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 43) the Court of Exchequer in Ireland dissented from it, and approved of the views of Crompton, J. in Smeed v. Foord, and of Wilde, B. in the case of Gee v. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (6 Hurl. & N. 211; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 11) as being sounder expositions of the law as to remoteness of damages. The general rule is therefore to be applied to the present case, and ought, as all other general rules, to be fairly, candidly and impartially applied. It has been said that the damage sustained here has been very great. Now I am clearly of opinion that this ought to be no element whatever in the application of the rule, and whether the damages be 10*l.* or 10,000*l.* is immaterial.

The circumstances are these: In pursuance of the defendants' contract to admit the ship into the dock at a certain time upon a certain day, the ship was brought to the entrance of the dock; the defendants could not admit her in consequence of a defect in a chain of the dock-gate, and their contract is admitted to have been broken. No blame attaches to them; it was their misfortune that the chain had been broken. The ship was then left in the river, which is one emptying itself into the Bristol Channel, where the tide ebbs and flows to a very great height. The captain had to decide what was to be done under the circumstances in which he was placed. Four courses have been suggested as open to him: one, that he should have remained and anchored where he was; secondly, that he should have gone up the river to the place from whence he came; thirdly, that he should have gone down to West Point, where it was said that the ship, upon the ebb, would have settled upon soft mud; and, fourthly, that he should have gone into deep water, where the ship would always have been afloat. Now, I think that the defendants had a right to a bona fide and reasonably sound judgment being exercised upon this matter. The captain decided upon remaining where he was. The tide was ebbing, and the weather threatening. If either of the other courses had been adopted, it might have been that the ship would have sustained no damage, but it might have been that the ship would have been totally lost. But I think this was a question for the jury, and that they have decided it; they have found that the captain did the best he could under the circumstances, and was not guilty of any negligence. The consequence was, that when the tide ebbed the ship took the ground and sustained damage; and the question argued before us is, that this damage is too remote and so unconnected with the cause of action that it must, as a matter of law, be borne by the plaintiff, and that the defendants cannot be responsible for it. I do not concur in this view: there has been damage; it must be borne by some one; neither the plaintiff nor his captain is in the slightest default. If the defendants had performed their contract, no damage would have occurred; in consequence of their default the captain was compelled to exercise his judgment and discretion, and the jury have found that he did the best he could, and was guilty of no negligence: by which I understand that in deciding to remain where he was he exercised such judgment and discretion as became a reasonable and prudent man. His doing so was, no doubt, the immediate cause of the damage; but in my opinion his remaining there was, in contemplation of law, the same as if the ship had been compelled to remain there by a vis major. The rule is, that the damage must be proximate (not immediate), and fairly and reasonably connected with the breach of contract or wrong. As to what is so, different minds will differ, but many instances could be mentioned in which damages much more remote than the present were held to be the subject of compensation,—as in Towne v. Salisbury (2 You. & J. 391 and Powell v. Wilson (15 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 332). There is a case of constant occurrence at Guildhall: a barge is injured by collision in the Thames; she is taken to the nearest convenient fitting place upon the shore; with the ebbing of the tide she comes down upon a pile and sustains further damage. My own belief is, that compensation for such damage has been recovered over and over again without objection, and upon referring to some gentlemen at the bar, whose experience upon this subject is the greatest in the profession, I have been informed that it has uniformly been so. Such damage is precisely analogous to the present.

Some possible cases were mentioned in the argument, and it was asked whether the defendants would there have been responsible. One was, if the ship had been run down by another ship whilst at anchor. I think the liability in such a case would depend upon the circumstances, and a material one would be whether the running down ship was in the wrong. Another case put was, if the ship had been upset when she was anchored by a hurricane. I think that this would raise a question for the jury, whether in all human probability the same misfortune would not have happened to the ship wherever in the river she happened to have been. In my opinion, the discussion of instances like these is of little bearing or weight, when the facts of the case to be adjudicated upon are clear and well defined. In questions of damages, each case must be determined upon its own circumstances.

But I think the point is decided by Jones v. Boyce (2 Starkie's Law of Evidence, 3rd edit. 296, and 1 Starkie's R. 493). The plaintiff there was a passenger by a stage-coach, and a rein broke; the coachman drove the coach to the side of the road and one of the wheels was stopped by a post; the plaintiff jumped off and his leg was broken, and he brought an action against the coach-proprietor for damages. Lord Ellenborough said there were two questions for the jury. First, as to the defendant's default in regard to the rein, which is immaterial to the present case; the second was, whether the defendant's default was conducive to the injury the plaintiff had sustained: for if it was not so far conducive as to create such reasonable apprehension in the mind of the plaintiff as rendered it necessary for him to jump down from the coach in order to avoid immediate danger, the action was not maintainable. Amongst the observations on the peculiar circumstances of the case, he said that it was for the consideration of the jury whether the plaintiff's act was such as a reasonable and prudent mind would have adopted; and he added, "If I place a man in such a situation that he must adopt a perilous alternative, I am responsible for the circumstances."

I think the present case is analogous. The defendants did not perform their contract to admit the ship into their dock; they thereby imposed on the captain four perilous alternatives; he adopted one. The jury found that he did the best he could, and was guilty of no negligence, and damage ensued to the ship. In my opinion, the defendants' default directly conduced to this damage; and they are responsible for it upon the principle enunciated by Lord Ellenborough in Jones v. Boyce (2 Starkie's Law of Evidence, 3rd edit. 296, and 1 Starkie's R. 493), which in my opinion is equally good law and good sense. For these reasons, I think the damage is not too remote, and that the learned Judge submitted the right questions to the jury; and I concur with him that the verdict is unobjectionable; the rule should therefore be discharged.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I have to state the opinion of my learned Brothers Channell and Pigott, and my own. The questions for our decision seem to be—first, ought the verdict to stand (a verdict not found by the jury, but entered for the plaintiff by the learned Judge on the jury answering one question, and being unable to agree upon another question, which we think the more important and decisive of the two); or, secondly, ought we to enter the verdict for the defendants; or, thirdly, ought we to direct a new trial?

In deciding these questions, it is necessary to ascertain the facts of the case as found by the jury, for with evidence so contradictory and repugnant we cannot find any verdict ourselves. It is not our province. If the facts can be ascertained, then what is the law applicable to them? We apprehend, when the facts are known, it is the province of the Court to say for what matters damages are to be given. But the amount of damages is a question for the jury quite as much as the credit due to the witnesses. When the result of the evidence is uncertain, it is for the jury to find the facts, and therefore they will often have to find whether facts fall within the rule of law to be laid down on the subject. The case of Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179) was cited at the trial, and much commented on during the argument. That case was very much considered. The argument took place several weeks before the judgment was given, and I know that great pains were bestowed upon it. Lord Wensleydale, the late Baron Alderson and my Brother Martin were parties to it, and it is due to Lord Wensleydale and the late Baron Alderson to say that a more extensive and accurate knowledge of decisions in our law books, and a more acute power of analyzing and discussing them, and, as far as my Brother Martin is concerned, a larger acquaintance with the exigencies of commerce and the business of life, never combined to assist at the formation of any decision. And, certainly, it does not lessen the authority of that case that Lord Campbell, in Smeed v. Foord (1 El. & El. 602; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 178), said, that it merely affirmed what was to be found in Pothier,—in 2 Kent's Com. 665,—in the French Code, and in all the other authorities; and it may be added, that Justice Crompton (against whose summing up it was directed), in that same case, said he agreed with it as far as it went,—which we consider to be agreeing with it altogether. That decision was not presented as any new discovery in jurisprudence; but we think it put in a clearer and more distinct light a principle which had been previously recognized in prior cases, and the want of which, in the English law, had been pointed out. The authorities are all collected in a note to Vicars v. Wilcocks (2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 5th ed. 461). It is quite true, as remarked by Wilde, B., in the case referred to by my Brother Martin, that that case is not applicable to, and does not decide every case. No rule, no formula could do that. Cases of damage differ as much as the leaves of a tree differ from each other, or rather, as the leaves of different trees. No two are exactly alike, and one description cannot be applicable to all. No precise positive rule can embrace all cases; and, notwithstanding any rule of law that may be laid down, it must be admitted, after all, that the question of the amount of damages is one for the jury and the jury only; and, provided the law on the subject be properly laid down by the presiding Judge, and then the amount of damages be left at large to the jury, we apprehend a Court would not interfere with their verdict because the jury had, apparently, come to some compromise among themselves, and had not strictly observed the supposed rule of law. We think that the decision of twelve jurymen, instructed from the Bench in the rules of law, but exercising their own judgment on a subject connected with the business of life with which they are familiar, would, practically, lead to a result often more just and equitable than any mere rule of law would arrive at. And, that there may be no mistake as to our meaning, we may add, that should this case go to a second trial, some of the jury might think the plaintiff entitled to recover the whole damage; others might think it the height of imprudence on the part of the master to attempt to remove a vessel from a dry dock to a wet dock about the time when the wind was blowing a hurricane, (which from his evidence seems to have been the case),—from which charge of imprudence the verdict of the jury has not relieved him. The result might be a compromise, which we are confident the Court would not, and which we think they ought not to disturb. We think we are not able to determine from the materials before us, whether or no the loss was occasioned by circumstances which, according to the case of Hadley v. Bazendale (9 Exch. Rep. 341; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 179) and the other authorities, would make the dock company liable for the damage the ship sustained.

If the state of the weather was the efficient cause of the loss, we think the defendants are not liable. Now, as to the state of the wind: the evidence of the mate is, "Not much wind; blowing pretty stiff; a fresh breeze." The evidence of the captain was, "It was only a few hours before a perfect hurricane." James Dunster, the master rigger, says, "It was blowing so hard, it would not have been safe to take her into deep water." If the weather was such that on being excluded from the dock she had no alternative but to perish on account of the gale or hurricane,—which seems to me to have been the opinion of the master,—then it may be doubted whether she ought to have been taken to the dock-gates at all in such a state of the weather. And the opinion of the jury, by a verdict, should have been obtained on these and other circumstances; and the verdict ought to have been found by them on a larger issue than whether the master and the pilot did their best after they found the vessel could not be received into the dock,—which I take to be the only finding of the jury. It is clear that the pilot thought the master was obstinate, and determined to do nothing to save the ship. We cannot find the defendants liable for this damage, because the jury were disposed to relieve the captain and the pilot from the odium of a charge of negligence. The verdict of the jury ought to have gone more into the merits, in order to fix the defendants with these damages. What the jury did not find, and could not agree upon, was quite as important as what they did find; and the result of their verdict seems to be, "We cannot agree as to the liability of the defendants; but we desire to throw no blame on the captain or the pilot."

We are therefore of the opinion that the jury have not found enough, in point of fact, to enable us to decide that the verdict entered for the plaintiff is what would have been, or (referring to the evidence actually given) what ought to have been their verdict, if the entire case had been left to them to find a verdict for the plaintiff or for the defendants.

Looking at the evidence and the finding of the jury, we cannot come to any conclusion that would make the defendants responsible for the damage done to the vessel. If there was any place of safety to which the vessel might have been taken, and could have been taken (which, we think, is included in the learned Judge's question), we think the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The jury could not agree on an answer to this question. If they had found this question in the affirmative, we think the plaintiff was clearly not entitled to recover; and we presume the Judge would have directed a verdict for the defendants. But after many hours they could not agree, and it is plain that some of the jury were of opinion in the affirmative,—others might have been in the negative. It is true, they found, that neither the captain nor the pilot were guilty of negligence, but we think it very uncertain what they meant by that finding. They certainly did not mean, by that finding, inferentially to decide the other question, or they would have found it, and, not ultimately have disagreed about it. If there was a safe place to which the vessel might and ought to have been taken, a verdict for the plaintiff would be a great act of injustice; and we are invited to find this for the jury by a process of reasoning, when the jury would not, and apparently could not, and certainly did not, find it for themselves.

As to entering a verdict for the defendants, there is a similar difficulty (though, perhaps, not so great, because, if the plaintiff does not establish his case, the defendants are entitled to a verdict). But we think we cannot be certain what would have been the verdict of the jury, if they had gone into, and had decided upon the whole case for themselves. We think, therefore, there ought to be a new trial.

CHANNELL, B.—I entirely agree in the opinion his Lordship has expressed in the judgment he has just read. If no new light should be thrown upon the case by the finding of the jury before whom the case will be tried again, then it is possible that the legal result may be that at which my Brother Martin has arrived. But the question now is, whether the present verdict for the plaintiff is to stand; and I wish merely to say, that I think the case is not at present ripe for decision.

PICOTT, B.—That is my view, and that is why I concur in the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron. I do not think the case is concluded by the finding of the jury upon the one question that was submitted to them. It seems to me, that they could not agree upon one of the questions, and they did agree upon the other. That is inconsistent in my view of the matter, and, in that state of things, I do not think the plaintiff is entitled to recover the large damages which he seeks.

Rule absolute for a new trial.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 16, 18, 19, 20, 1866.

DYER v. BEST.

35 L. J. Ex. 105; 4 H. & C. 189; L. R. 1 Ex. 152; 18 L. T. 758; 14 W. R. 886; 12 Jur. N.S. 142.

See Robinson v. Curry, [1881] E. R. A.; 50 L. J. Q.B. 561; L. R. 7 Q.B. D. 465; 45 L. T. 368; 30 W. R. 39 (C. A.).

Action for Penalties—Statutes of Limitation—31 Eliz. c. 5.

LIMITATIONS (STATUTES OF). PENALTY.—The period of limitation fixed by 31 Eliz. c. 5, within which an action must be brought for a penalty which may be sued for by the Crown or an informer, applies to cases where the penalty can be sued for by the informer only; and such actions must therefore be brought within one year after the commission of the offence.

Culliford v. Blandford (Carthew, 232; Comberbach, 195; Shower, 353; Holt, 522; 4 Mod. Rep. 129), if an authority to the contrary, overruled.

Action for penalties. The declaration stated, that the defendant was one of the Commissioners appointed under the Town of Burton-upon-Trent Act, 1853, and became disqualified to act in his said office by reason of his having, while such Commissioner, participated in a contract made between the Commissioners of the one part, and the defendant and another of the other part, for work to be done under the authority of the act. It then averred that, after so becoming disqualified, the defendant acted as Commissioner on six specified occasions in the year 1863, and four specified occasions in the year 1864, contrary to the form of the said statute, whereby he became liable to pay the plaintiff, who sued under the said statute, the sum of 50*l.* for each time of his so acting and offending.

The defendant pleaded, first, not guilty, by statute 21 Jac. 1. c. 4. s. 4; secondly, that the cause of action did not accrue within one year before action.

The Town of Burton-upon-Trent Act, 1853, incorporates the Commissioners Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847, (10 & 11 Vict. c. 16,) section 9. of which enacts, "That any person who after his appointment or election as a Commissioner is concerned or participates in any manner in any contract, or in the profit thereof, or of any work to be done under the authority of such act, shall thenceforth cease to be a Commissioner." Section 15. of the same act imposes a penalty of 50*l.* on the offence of acting as a Commissioner after having become disqualified, and enacts, that such penalty may be recovered by any person, with full costs of suit, in any of the superior Courts.

At the trial, before Channell, B., at the Summer Assizes at Stafford, it was proved that the defendant was elected Town Commissioner in 1856, being at the time in partnership with one Bowler, as a builder. Small jobs of work were done by the defendant and Bowler at the gas-works, which were under the control of the Commissioners during each of the years from 1856 to 1863, payment being made by the Commissioners in the early part of each of the years following the work done, after the accounts had been sent in to be examined by the plaintiff, who was manager of the gas-works. The jury found by their verdict that the defendant, after becoming disqualified in the manner above mentioned, acted four times as Commissioner, and that one occasion of his so acting was within one year of the commencement of this action; but they did not fix the dates either of the acts of disqualification or of the acts done by the defendant as Commissioner after becoming disqualified.

On this finding of the jury, the plaintiff claimed to have a verdict entered for him for 200*l.*, being the amount of four penalties. The defendant objected that by the 31 Eliz. c. 5. s. 5. an action for penalties must be brought by any person other than the Queen within one year after the offence committed, and therefore that only one penalty could be recovered in this case. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 200*l.*, the defendant having leave to move to reduce it to 50*l.*

A rule nisi was obtained for this purpose, and also for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. No judgment was given respecting the latter part of the rule; and the arguments upon it are therefore not reported.

Huddleston and H. Matthews shewed cause.—The 31 Eliz. c. 5. s. 5.¹ applies only to actions of two kinds: first, where the penalty can be sued for by the Queen alone; secondly, where it can be sued for by the Queen or a private individual. The present action is of a third kind, namely, for a penalty which can be sued for by a private individual only, without any limitation in favour of the Queen, and it is a casus omissus in the statute. There is an old case of Culliford v. Blandford (Carthew, 232; Comberbach, 195;

(1) 31 Eliz. c. 5. s. 5. is as follows: And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that all actions, suits, bills, indictments or informations which, after twenty days next after the end of this session of parliament, shall be had, brought, sued or exhibited for any forfeiture upon any statute penal made, or to be made, whereby the forfeiture is or shall be limited to the Queen, her heirs or successors only, shall be had, brought, sued or exhibited within two years next after the offence committed or to be committed against such act penal, and not after two years. 2. And that all actions, suits, bills or informations which after the said twenty days shall be had, brought, sued or commenced for any forfeiture upon any penal statute made or to be made, except the statute of tillage, the benefit whereof is or shall be by the said statute limited to the Queen, her heirs or successors, and to any other which shall prosecute in that behalf, shall be had, brought, sued or commenced by any person that may lawfully pursue for the same as aforesaid, within one year next after the offence committed or to be commenced against the said statute. 3. And in default of such pursuit, that then the same shall be had, sued and exhibited or brought for the Queen's majesty, her heirs or successors, at any time within two years after that time ended. 4. And if any action, suit, bill, indictment or information for any offence against any penal statute made or to be made, except the statute of tillage, shall be brought after the time in that behalf before limited, that then the same shall be void and of none effect, any act or statute made to the contrary notwithstanding."

Shower, 253; Holt, 522; 4 Mod. Rep. 129) which expressly decides this. It is variously reported by the different reporters, and in Carthew it is said to have been a qui tam action, but that must have been a mistake. In that report it is expressly said by Mr. Justice Eyre to be a casus omissus in the statute. The case went into a court of error, as appears from a note to the report in Shower and from a note to the report of the case of Lookup v. Frederick (4 Burr. 2018), and it was there affirmed by a majority of the Judges against the opinion of Treby, C.J. and Powell, J.

[MARTIN, B.—Culliford v. Blandford (Carthew, 232; Comberbach, 195; Shower, 253; Holt, 522; 4 Mod. Rep. 129) does not seem to be cited in Williams Saunders (See 2 Wms. Saund. 63, n. 6), and its omission from such a book throws, in my opinion, great doubt upon its authority.]

It was followed in Chance v. Adams (1 Ld. Raym. 77), and is recognized as law in Comyns's Digest, tit. 'Information,' (A. 3). There is a contrary decision in Lookup v. Frederick (4 Burr. 2018), but it is not clear that the judgment was really on the point.

Gray and Staveley Hill supported the rule.—The periods of limitation of penal actions were first fixed by 7 Hen. 8. c. 3, and by that statute actions for penalties to be recovered by the informer alone were to be brought within one year, while four years were allowed where they were to be recovered by the king alone, and two years where by the king or the informer. The 31 Eliz. c. 5. was passed for the purpose of restricting still further those periods, and it repealed the former statute. It is absurd to say that while it restricted the sovereign to a period of two years it enlarged the time which the common informer previously had. The case cited of Culliford v. Blandford (Carthew, 232; Comberbach, 195; Shower, 253; Holt, 522; 4 Mod. Rep. 129) seems, from some of the reports, to have been decided on the point that as a latitat had been sued out within the year the requirements of the statute had been satisfied. It is mentioned in Buller's Nisi Prius, 195, where, it would seem that judgment was eventually given for the defendant. In 1 Tidd's Practice, 13, it is said that the more reasonable opinion is that as the informer is restricted to one year when the King is joined with him, much more should he be bound when he sues by himself.

[MARTIN, B.—Mr. Tidd was the Lord Coke of practice.]

The case was argued on the 16th and 17th of January, and on the 19th the following judgments were delivered—

POLLOCK, C.B.—With respect to the question about the Statute of Limitations, I am of opinion, and no person acquainted with the history of our law can entertain any doubt whatever, that a penal action brought by a common informer must be brought within a year after the commission of the offence. It is supposed that the question turns entirely upon the 31 Eliz. c. 5, and perhaps, strictly speaking, it does so. But in order to come to a conclusion in favour of the plaintiff, we must suppose that the legislature, which in the 7 Hen. 8. c. 3. had strictly limited informers to one year, and in the 18 Eliz. c. 5. had taken especial care and pains to direct that every writ of that nature should have indorsed on it the day when it was issued (and both the one statute and the other expressly say it is to prevent the vexation arising from penal actions by common informers), afterwards, in the 31 Eliz. c. 5, when the statute of 7 Hen. 8. c. 3. was repealed, but that of 18 Eliz. c. 5. was left unrepealed, committed this extraordinary blunder, that while limiting the Queen to two years instead of four, and the informer qui tam to one year, they set free the informer pro se ipso altogether and allowed him to bring his action when he liked. That is the conclusion to which we are invited to come by the argument in this case. I am clearly of opinion that the latter part of the section may be read so as to include every species of penal action. To limit the Queen and the informer to one year and to leave the informer alone without any limitation, is to come to a conclusion so very absurd and to impute such carelessness and folly to the legislature, that we ought not to do so, particularly after the thorough understanding which has existed in the profession, to my certain knowledge, for more than fifty years, as to the state of the law. Mr. Tidd's experience carries it back some thirty or forty years at least prior to that. And when we come to the authorities cited in favour of a contrary view, they appear to me to be so questionable, and are reported in such different ways that, the "authorities," meaning by that the actual decisions of the Courts, seem to be in favour of the construction which this Court is disposed to put upon the statute, and in accordance with the opinions entertained by the members of the profession whose recorded opinions we have. We have, in addition, the opinion of Chief Baron Comyns in his work; we have the opinion of Mr. Justice Buller in his work on Nisi Prius; we have the opinion of the learned editor of Williams Saunders; and greater authorities, so far as names are concerned, cannot be cited. With the reverence which is due to the legislature, we must not impute to them the folly which some of the older reports would seem to indicate, if indeed they correctly state what passed. But they seem to me to omit all the arguments, and all mention of the statute of 7 Hen. 8. c. 3, which I think an extremely important statute, and which seems to my mind to reconcile the whole course of legislation. I must therefore express my strong opinion that the statute passed in the 31 Eliz. applies to the present case. I am of opinion, also, that if the action is well founded and the verdict is to stand, the plaintiff can recover but one penalty only.

But I am further of opinion that there ought to be a new trial. In an action upon a penal statute, unless the legislature expressly directs that certain proof shall be sufficient, it is not sufficient to give evidence which is consistent with the guilt of the person charged, but you must go further, and prove that the defendant has incurred the penalty with reasonable certainty; and I think that that has not been done in this case. It is not desirable, where a new trial is to be granted, that either party should know more than that the Court considers the case not to have been sufficiently made out. I do not think it is the duty of the Court to point out how it can be made out; and certainly if there be any case in which I should be sorry to point out to the plaintiff in what way he might succeed, it would be the present. Upon the point upon which alone it is necessary for the Court to give an opinion, I am clearly of opinion that the penalty can only be recovered within a year after the commission of the offence.

MARTIN, B.—I am quite of the same opinion. With respect to the first point, on which, in my judgment, the whole thing depends, that is, whether the limitation of one year is imposed on this action. I own that I entertain no doubt. It is a notorious matter of history that these actions existed to an enormous extent in the reign of Henry the Seventh; and it is one of the reproaches cast upon his memory that he encouraged informers to bring actions, which, no doubt, caused him a great deal of unpopularity, continuing possibly to the present time. It appears that there were at that time three species of these actions; there were proceedings directly by the Crown, there were proceedings directly by the Crown and another person, and there were proceedings directly by an individual himself—the common informer. Mr. Matthews stated that he had made research, but was unable to find that prior to this statute of Elizabeth there was any statute which gave the entire penalty to the informer. It is quite clear that he is in error, for the statute of Henry the Eighth shews clearly that at that time such actions did exist, and it specially enacts that they must be brought within the year. The matter went on, and in the 31st year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, which was, I expect, when she was so exceedingly unpopular in consequence of monopolies, a step was taken for the purpose of still further discouraging these actions.

By a not unreasonable construction of that act, it may be taken to comprise all that the act of Henry the Eighth comprised. Being made in aid of that act, it would be a monstrous construction to hold, that a limitation having been put upon two sets of these actions, no limitation at all should be put on the third. I need not say more than that it seems to me that if we had to decide this case upon the statutes of Henry the Eighth and Elizabeth alone, the construction I have mentioned would be the proper and correct one. But the case is decided by the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas on the special case in Lookup v. Frederick (4 Burr. 2018). The very point is stated by Mr. Justice Buller to have been decided there; and Mr. Tidd, in his Practice, relies upon it as an authority to that effect, and he says that there was an opinion held to the contrary; but that it was an unreasonable one. Therefore I think that no doubt can exist that the statute of Elizabeth prescribes one year for the bringing of those actions. [The rest of the judgment was upon the evidence given at the trial, and to the effect that a new trial must be had.]

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with what has fallen from the Lord Chief Baron and my Brother Martin with reference to the statute of Elizabeth, and if anything were wanting to shew the true construction it would be found in 21 Jac. 1. c. 4. s. 3, which, without distinguishing between an action brought by the common informer and a qui tam action, requires the plaintiff to make an affidavit that the penal act was done within the twelve months. [The remainder of the judgment was upon the evidence, and was in favour of a new trial.]

CHANNELL, B.—I agree with the rest of the Court, that if the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict it can, by force of the statute, be for one penalty only. Upon that point I feel it to be quite unnecessary to add anything to the observations made by the other members of the Court. [The remainder of the judgment was to the effect that the judgment should stand for one penalty.]

On the following day (Jan. 20),—

POLLOCK, C.B. said—I wish to add to the judgment which we delivered yesterday that there is a case in the Exchequer of Pleas in Ireland, in which the Court expressed a strong opinion that the statute applied to all penal actions, although the point was not expressly decided, and some time afterwards, in another case, where the action was brought by the common informer, the Court acted on that opinion, and pronounced precisely the judgment that this Court did yesterday in this case. The case in Ireland was Johnson v. Barratt (2 Jones, Ir. Ex. 197), and all the authorities cited before us were cited there. I mention this because the argument on the part of the plaintiff was conducted with considerable ability and research, and with a very large proportion of zeal and apparent confidence, and we originally met the case by stating what had been the opinion of the profession for, as I could certify, half a century, and, as I believe, for thirty or forty years before; but we had no case in our Courts such as that which I now mention in the Courts of Ireland. The reason probably is, that the point has been considered so thoroughly settled that it was useless to raise the question.

Rule absolute for a new trial.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 22, 31, 1866.

BAXENDALE AND OTHERS v. THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

35 L. J. Ex. 108; L. R. 1 Ex. 137; 4 H. & C. 130; 14 L. T. 26; 14 W. R. 458; 12 Jur. N.S. 274.

Referred to, Attorney General v. Mersey Railway Co., [1907] 1 Ch. 81; 96 L. T. 100 (C. A.): reversed, [1907] E. R. A.; 76 L. J. Ch. 568; [1907] A.C. 415; 97 L. T. 524 (H.L.). Explained, East and West India Dock Co. v. Shaw, [1888] E. R. A.; 57 L. J. Ch. 1038; 39 Ch. D. 524; 60 L. T. 142 (Ch. D.).

Railway—Equality of Charge—Separate Parcels in one Consignment—Carriage beyond the Limits of the Railway.

CARRIERS.—The defendants, a railway company, incorporated by a special act of parliament, containing an equality clause, in the ordinary form, requiring them to take the same rates and tolls from all persons under the same or similar circumstances, were in the habit of charging a tonnage-rate upon packages weighing more than 1 cwt., and a higher rate upon packages weighing less. When several parcels were delivered by the same person in one consignment, addressed to the same consignee, they were not weighed and charged for separately, but were weighed together, and a tonnage-rate charged for the whole consignment, if the gross weight exceeded 1 cwt. The plaintiffs were common carriers, trading under the name of "Pickford & Co.," and they were in the habit of collecting parcels in London and forwarding them to customers in the country. Each parcel was addressed to the person to whom it was ultimately to be delivered; but it was labelled with the name of "Pickford & Co." and that of the station to which it was to be sent; and all the parcels for the same station were delivered in one consignment consigned to the plaintiffs at that station. The defendants refused to charge the plaintiffs for the carriage of their parcels at a tonnage-rate upon the gross weight, and charged for each parcel separately according to its individual weight:—Held, that this created an inequality.

The defendants were in the habit of carrying goods from London to the Isle of Wight, by their own railway from London to Southampton, and thence by tramway and steamer. The plaintiffs also were in the habit of carrying goods from London to the Isle of Wight, using the defendants' line from London to Southampton, and thence conveying them by carts and steamer. The plaintiffs claimed to have their goods carried by the defendants from London to Southampton at a sum equivalent to the defendants' through-charge from London to the Isle of Wight, less a fair charge for collection in London, and for carrying from Southampton station to the Isle of Wight:—Held, that they were not entitled to this; the delivery by the defendants beyond the limits of their line not being a delivery auxiliary or subsidiary to their business as carriers on their own line, but to their general business as common carriers, and therefore differing from a case of delivery in the immediate neighbourhood of a station.

The declaration contained counts for work done, money paid, money had and received, and on accounts stated. The defendants paid 9l. into court, and pleaded never indebted as to the residue.

At the trial, before Martin, B., at the Sittings in London after Trinity Term, 1864, a verdict was entered by consent for the plaintiffs for the damages claimed in the declaration, subject to the opinion of the Court upon a special case. The following were the material facts stated by the case.

The plaintiffs are common carriers, and carry on business under the style of "Pickford & Co.," and they are in the habit of employing various railway companies as common carriers, for the carriage of goods, including the defendants. The defendants are incorporated by the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. lxxxviii., local and personal, which act has been amended by various subsequent acts. Their railway runs from their station at Nine Elms, London, to, amongst other places, Guildford and Southampton.

By section 149. of the first-mentioned act, the company are empowered to demand and receive for the tonnage of all articles conveyed along or upon the said railway rates or tolls not exceeding 3*d.* per mile for some, and 6*d.* per mile for other things specified in the section.

By section 155. it is enacted, "That it shall be lawful for the said company from time to time to make such orders for ascertaining and fixing the price or sum to be charged or taken by the said company in respect of small parcels (not exceeding 500*lb.* weight), specie and bullion, quicksilver, platina and cochineal, to be carried upon the said railway, and from time to time to repeal or vary the same, as to them shall seem proper. Provided always, that the provision hereinbefore contained as to goods, shall not extend to goods, articles, matters and things sent in large aggregate quantities, although made up of separate and distinct parcels, but only to single and undivided parcels."

By section 156. it is further enacted, "That it shall be lawful for the said company, and they are hereby authorized to carry and convey upon the said railway all such goods, articles, matters and things, and all such cattle and other animals as shall be offered to them for that purpose, and all such persons as shall apply to be carried and conveyed along the said railway or any part thereof, and to demand, receive and recover to and for the use and benefit of the said company, for such carriage and conveyance as aforesaid of all goods, articles, matters and things, cattle, animals and persons carried and conveyed upon the same, in addition to the usual rates and tolls hereinbefore authorized to be charged and received, such sum of money as the said company or the said directors may from time to time fix and require."

By section 158. it is further enacted, "That it shall be lawful for the said company from time to time, and so often as they shall think fit, to reduce all or any of the rates, tolls or sums by this act authorized to be taken, and afterwards, from time to time, again to raise the same or any of them, so that the same respectively shall not at any time exceed the amount by this act authorized. Provided always, that the said company shall not partially raise or lower the rates, tolls or sums payable under this act, but all such rates, tolls and sums shall be so fixed that the same shall be taken from all persons alike under the same or similar circumstances."

The defendants carry on the ordinary business of a railway company upon the said line of railway, and they also carry on the business of common carriers between the stations upon their line, and also between their several stations and places beyond the limits of their line.

The grounds of complaint alleged by the plaintiffs against the defendants, and in respect of which this action is brought, are three in number, namely :

First in respect of overcharges upon consignments of goods, by charging for their carriage rates according to the weight of packages contained in those consignments taken separately, instead of a tonnage-rate upon the whole of the consignments by the plaintiffs of the same class of goods.

Secondly, overcharges in not allowing to the plaintiffs a sufficient deduction or rebate for the collection, delivery and cartage of goods both in London and in the country, when those services were not performed by the defendants.

Thirdly, overcharges by charging upon goods carried for the plaintiffs by the defendants from Nine Elms to Southampton station, thence to be forwarded by the plaintiffs to the Isle of Wight, rates which are higher than those charged to other persons, under the same or similar circumstances.

The facts upon which the plaintiffs' first claim arises, are as follows. The defendants are in the habit of charging for goods carried by them upon their line according to two different rates, viz., a tonnage-rate upon goods over 1 cwt., and a small parcels' rate for articles under that weight. The small parcels' rate is considerably higher than the tonnage-rate.

When goods are delivered to the defendants by one person in a single consignment, at one and the same time, and are addressed to the same consignee, the defendants are in the habit of adding the weight of all such small packages under 1 cwt. together, and charging for them upon their aggregate weight a tonnage-rate, although such goods consist of a number of small packages, each singly weighing under 1 cwt.

The plaintiffs have been and are in the habit of sending by the defendants' railway from one station to another large consignments of goods, each consignment frequently consisting of a number of small parcels. In every such case the plaintiffs themselves delivered the goods to the defendants at the station whence they were to go, directed and consigned to the plaintiffs at the station to which they were to be carried, and where they were to be delivered to the plaintiffs, and at such last-mentioned station the plaintiffs themselves received them from the defendants. In such cases the plaintiffs delivered to the defendants with each consignment a declaration or ticking-off note, containing the name of the plaintiffs' firm as the consignors, and also as the consignees of the goods, the description but not the weight of the goods, and the name of the station to which they were to be carried.—[These declarations or ticking-off notes were all similar to one annexed to the case, containing a list of the names of the persons to whom the various small parcels were to be delivered, the whole consignment purporting to be "from P. & Co. on account of P. & Co., to Guildford station."]—Each package comprised in any consignment was labelled with a label, on which was printed in plain letters the name of "Pickford & Co.," and the station to which it was to be carried. Many of such packages had, in addition to such label, the names and addresses of the persons to whom the plaintiffs intended to deliver them, and had been desired by their customers so to deliver them, such addresses being conspicuously shewn on such packages. Where goods were delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants to be carried and delivered by the defendants for the plaintiffs to persons other than the plaintiffs themselves, the names of such other persons were inserted as consignees in the consignment-note or declaration, and the goods were addressed to them only, and no such label as before mentioned of "Pickford & Co." was affixed on the goods.

Down to the 29th of February, 1864, whenever consignments of goods were delivered to the defendants by the plaintiffs, and labelled, directed, and consigned to the plaintiffs themselves in the manner before described, the defendants charged the plaintiffs the tonnage-rate on the aggregate weight of each consignment, whatever the weight of the several packages of which it was composed might be, and whether the names of the persons to whom the plaintiffs intended to deliver the packages after they had received them at the defendants' station appeared upon the packages or not, and if they did appear, whether the same name appeared upon all the packages in any one consignment, or a different name appeared upon each package.

From and after the 1st of March, 1864, the defendants altered the system and rate of charge, and the only terms on which they would carry for the plaintiffs were then adopted by them as hereinafter mentioned; that is to say, they charged the plaintiffs separately for each package contained in each consignment sent by the plaintiffs by the defendants' railway, labelled and directed, and consigned by the plaintiffs to themselves in the manner before mentioned, at the tonnage-rate, or small parcels' rate, according to the weight of each package singly, whenever the names of the parties to whom the plaintiffs intended to deliver them after being received at the defendants' station appeared upon the packages in addition to the plaintiffs' label, except in those cases in which the same name appeared upon two or more packages in the same consignment, in which case the defendants lumped together the weight of the last-mentioned packages, and charged the tonnage-rate upon their aggregate weight. No difference was made by the defendants in thus charging the plaintiffs, and in charging any others of the public who sent goods under similar circumstances.

Between the 1st and 26th of March, 1864, the plaintiffs sent by the defendants' railway, labelled, directed and consigned to themselves at various stations in the manner already described, numerous consignments of goods, each consignment being in the aggregate of more than 1 cwt., though composed of a number of packages varying in size, some being under and some over 1 cwt., and upon these the defendants charged in the manner stated in the preceding paragraphs.

The plaintiffs before action paid the charges so made under protest, and they now seek to recover back the difference between the rate upon each package which they were actually charged, and the tonnage-rate upon each consignment which they allege they ought to have been charged, amounting in the whole to 50*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*

As to the second head of the plaintiffs' claim it is unnecessary to state the facts. It was admitted by the defendants that according to the law as settled by recent decisions the plaintiffs were entitled to some rebate or deduction for collection and delivery at the stations from and to which they were sent; and the case found that the money paid into court was insufficient.

As to the third claim of the plaintiffs, the facts are as follows: The plaintiffs, in the course of their business of carriers, have been in the habit of carrying goods for their customers from London to Cowes and Newport, both in the Isle of Wight, and in doing so have made use of the defendants' railway for the carriage of goods from the Nine Elms station to the Southampton station. All carriage and cartage of the goods off the line has been done by the plaintiffs themselves, and such goods have been consigned by the plaintiffs to themselves at Southampton only, and not at Cowes or Newport. For the carriage of these goods between Nine Elms and Southampton stations the defendants have charged the plaintiffs uniform rates of 11*s.* 8*d.*, 16*s.* 3*d.* and 19*s.* 7*d.* per ton, according to the classes of the goods, being the same rates as the defendants have charged the rest of the public for similar goods between Nine Elms and Southampton.

The defendants, by arrangements with owners of steam and sailing vessels, have also themselves, in their capacity of carriers, been in the habit of carrying goods to and from London to Cowes and Newport. For the carriage of goods from London to Cowes and Newport they have charged their customers' uniform rates of 20*s.* and 26*s.* 8*d.* per ton, according to the classes of the goods, which charges included collection in London and cartage to Nine Elms, carriage on the railway from Nine Elms to Southampton station, carriage by tramway from that station to the wharf, and wharf dues there, and carriage by boats from Southampton to Cowes and Newport, but did not include delivery beyond the quays at Cowes and Newport.

The actual cost, both to the plaintiffs and the defendants, of collection and cartage of such goods to Nine Elms station, being the fair market price of such collection and cartage, is not less than 5*s.* per ton. The actual cost to the plaintiffs and the fair market price of the conveyance of such goods from the Southampton station to Cowes and Newport, including cartage to the wharf at Southampton, dues there and boat-carriage thence to Cowes and Newport, is not less than 8*s.* per ton, of which sum the cost of cartage to the wharf at Southampton is not less than 1*s.* 6*d.*, and the residue consists of the charges for wharf-dues and the cost of boatage. The actual cost to the defendants of the conveyance of such goods from the Southampton station to

(1) An exception was made of goods conveyed for customers under certain special contracts which were set out in a schedule to the case: but nothing turned on this.

Cowes and Newport, including carriage by the defendants' tramway from the Southampton station to the wharf at Southampton, dues there and boat-carriage thence to Cowes and Newport, does not average more than 5s. 4d. per ton, of which sum 4d. is the cost of the carriage by tramway from the station to the wharf, and the residue consists of a lump sum paid by the defendants by arrangement to the owners of steamboats and sailing ships or vessels conveying the goods for wharf-dues and boatage.

The plaintiffs allege that under the circumstances herein set forth, the actual charge made by the defendants to their Cowes and Newport customers for the carriage of their goods from Nine Elms to Southampton is only at the rate of 7s. per ton, and the plaintiffs therefore claim to be entitled to have their goods carried at a corresponding rate.

Between the 1st of January and the 26th of March, 1864, the plaintiffs sent large quantities of goods consigned to themselves at Southampton, intended for Newport and Cowes respectively (but the actual destination was not declared to the defendants), by the defendants' railway from Nine Elms to Southampton station, where the plaintiffs received them, and paid for them, under protest, at the above-mentioned rates.

The plaintiffs now seek to recover back the difference between the amount so paid and the amount which they ought to have been charged for the same goods, and which is, as they contend, 7s. per ton.

[The particulars of the alleged overcharges in this respect were set out in a schedule to the case, and they amounted in the whole to 9l.]

The Court was to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact, and the question for their opinion was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the before-mentioned sums, or any part thereof.

Bovill (C. Pollock with him), for the plaintiffs.—As to the first point, the facts shew a state of circumstances similar to those shewn in "packed parcel" cases. The only distinction is, that there is here one consignment instead of one packed parcel. With respect to packed parcels, it has been settled that they must be treated as single parcels, and not as collections of small parcels. The consignment here is to Pickford's at, for example, Guildford station, and it makes no difference that in addition to Pickford's label on any parcel there is the name and address of another person. As between the plaintiffs and the defendants the only direction is to Pickford's.

[CHANNELL, B.—Would the defendants' contract have been performed if they had delivered to the other persons named on the parcels instead of to the plaintiffs' agent at Guildford?]

Certainly not. The first case on packed parcels was that of Pickford v. the Grand Junction Railway Company (10 Mee. & W. 399; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 342), which was followed by Crouch v. the Great Northern Railway Company (11 Exch. Rep. 742; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 137), and there have been a succession of cases down to Sutton v. the Great Western Railway Company (3 H. & C. 800; s. c. 35 L. J. Ex. 18).—(He was then stopped on this point.) As to the third point, the principle contended for by the plaintiffs is the same as that admitted to have been established in the cases bearing upon the second point. It has been settled that they must not collect and deliver gratuitously, and similarly they must not forward parcels from Southampton at rates which, if not gratuitous, are unreasonably low. Camden Town is as distinct a place from Southwark as Cowes from Southampton, and it has been settled that the defendants may not compete unfairly with the plaintiffs by carting gratuitously from or to a place like Camden Town. Would it make any difference if the goods were sent across the Thames in a boat, instead of being carted over Waterloo Bridge?

[MARTIN, B.—The case of delivery in the town in which the terminus is, however large that town may be, is quite different from the case of delivery at another place beyond the limits of the railway. Suppose Pickfords, having goods to deliver at Ringwood, choose to take them from the railway at

Southampton and forward them by cart to Ringwood, would they be entitled to deduct from the company's charge for carrying all the way from London to Ringwood the amount which would be a fair charge for carrying from Southampton to Ringwood?]

That is the plaintiffs' contention, and it is supported by the decisions in *Baxendale v. the Great Western Railway Company (Bristol case)*²; and Re Same v. Same (5 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 336; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 81). The plaintiffs claim to deduct from the rate of 20s. charged by the defendants for carrying from London to Cowes, 5s. for the collection in London, and 8s., which is what it costs us to carry from Southampton to Cowes; but in respect of the carriage from Southampton to Cowes, the plaintiffs are entitled at the very least, taking the defendants' own rate of expense, to deduct 5s. 4d. This would leave, at most, 9s. 8d. as the proper charge to be made to the plaintiffs, whereas the plaintiffs are charged 11s. 8d.

C. W. Wood (Mangles with him), for the defendants.—As to the last point, there is no inequality in any rate of conveyance from station to station such as to be illegal. The defendants have a perfect right to charge their Isle of Wight customers less in proportion than they do their Southampton customers. The company may charge less in proportion for a long distance along the line than for a short distance, or for carrying goods off the line than for carrying from station to station. The case is virtually decided by Jones v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (3 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 718), citing Hosier v. the Caledonian Railway Company (17 Sess. Cas. 2nd Series, 302 (Scotch)), and by Garton v. the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (1 Best & S. 112, 254; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 273, 291). But if any deduction is to be made it is at most only 4d., which is what it costs the defendants to carry from the station to the quay, and 5s. for carrying from Southampton quay to Newport. As to the first point, there is no similarity between the present case and that of packed parcels. The parcels are all separately addressed, and there is no inequality. The company are justified in their discretion in fixing reasonable charges for their carriages as separate parcels. He also cited Baxendale v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (4 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 63; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 137).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court³ was delivered, on the 31st of January, by—

CHANNELL, B.—This was an action, brought, by the plaintiffs, who are common carriers, to recover the amount of certain overcharges alleged to have been made by the defendants, paid by the plaintiffs under protest. At the trial it was agreed that a verdict should be taken for the plaintiffs, subject to a special case. That special case was afterwards stated and argued before us. My Brother Martin went to chambers before the argument was entirely completed; and therefore the judgment which I am now about to deliver is to be considered more particularly as the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, my Brother Pigott, and myself, but I believe that my Brother Martin concurs in our opinion.

The question that is stated for the opinion of the Court at the end of the case is very general, and it is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover anything beyond the sum of 9l. paid into court; but the facts of the case shew that there are three specific claims on the part of the plaintiffs, and we have to see whether, in respect of any one of them, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The case turns on certain sections—149, 155, 156 and 158—of the defendants' act, 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. lxxxviii.; the 158th section being what has been called, in some cases, the "equality" clause, and being similar in terms to sections which have been inserted in other acts of parliament incorporating railway companies, and in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, upon which there have been decisions.

(2) 14 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 1; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 225; and in Ex. Ch. 16 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 137; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 197.

(3) Pollock, C.B., Channell, B. and Pigott, B. Martin, B. only heard a portion of the argument.

Under the first head of claim, the plaintiffs claim to recover in respect of overcharges made by the defendants on consignments of goods, by charging for the separate packages, according to the weight of each, instead of for the whole consignment, at a tonnage rate upon the total weight. Without recapitulating the facts stated in the case, we content ourselves with saying that, having carefully considered them, we find that the case is brought within the range of the authorities cited, and known as the "packed parcel" cases; and we are clearly of opinion that, on the first head of claims, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

With reference to the second head, Mr. Wood very properly admitted that he could not support the company's claim; and we hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

As regards the third claim, it is in respect of the defendants having, as is alleged, charged the plaintiffs for goods carried for them by the defendants from Nine Elms to Southampton, thence to be forwarded by the plaintiffs to the Isle of Wight, higher rates than those charged to other persons, under the same or similar circumstances. It appears that the defendants collected parcels in London; took them by their line from London to their Southampton station; by a tramway to wharfs there, and by steamers to Cowes and Newport. It appears, further, that the defendants took goods for the plaintiffs from London to Southampton station, which goods the plaintiffs themselves delivered to their consignees at Southampton and in the Isle of Wight.

It is said that the costs incurred by the defendants in carrying goods from Southampton to the Isle of Wight by tramway and steamer was less than that necessarily incurred by the plaintiffs in carrying the goods for their different consignees from Southampton to the Isle of Wight; and the case calls upon us to institute an inquiry into the relative charges or costs of portions of the journey, and there is a statement made respecting the profit and other particulars in connexion with the entire charge, which, under one contract, was made by the defendants for receiving goods in London and delivering them at Newport, or other places in the Isle of Wight. We consider that the defendants were clearly entitled to do what they profess to do, and to carry on the business of common carriers from London, or any place in London to Newport in the Isle of Wight, and to use, as far as serviceable, their own line of railway; and that they are quite at liberty to act as common carriers beyond their Southampton terminus. Several cases have been pressed upon us with the view of shewing, that where a railway company collects goods in London from their ordinary customers, in the immediate neighbourhood, or at some little distance from their station, for which they make no charge, or at the other end, or near any station upon the railway, deliver them free of charge, the circumstance of collecting in the first instance and of delivering in the other, free of charge, has been held to constitute an inequality if the same rate is charged to parties who have the duty of collecting and delivering themselves. We entirely abide by those decisions; but the collection and delivery in those cases was a collection and delivery auxiliary to and subsidiary to their business, not merely as common carriers, but as carriers upon their own line of railway. When they choose to avail themselves of the opportunities which they have of chartering steamers for the purpose of delivering goods at Newport, they are not doing what is auxiliary, or rather subsidiary to the conduct of their business as carriers upon the line. Their real and true position is this, that they are common carriers from London to Newport, availing themselves of their line of railway as far as it serves them. We must look at this case upon the facts as stated, and take what has been done to have been done bona fide, there being no suggestion of any mala fides; and the question is, whether we can see upon the facts stated a necessary inequality. We cannot do so, and are therefore of opinion, that on the first and second claims, judgment must be for the plaintiffs, but on the third claim for the defendants.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for the amounts of their first and second claims, for the defendants as to the third claim.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 26, 1865.*

SAUNDERS AND WAINE v. MERRYWEATHER, KELLY AND ANNE HIS WIFE.

35 L. J. Ex. 115; 3 H. & C. 902; 13 W. R. 814; 11 Jur. N.S. 655.

Ejectment—Assignment without Licence—Covenant with Mortgagor—Estoppel.

ESTOPPEL. LANDLORD AND TENANT. MORTGAGE.—A demise by a mortgagor and mortgagee of leasehold premises contained a proviso for re-entry by either of them if the lessee should assign without the mortgagor's consent. After several mesne assignments with the mortgagor's consent, the premises were assigned to M. by a deed to which S. (assignee of the mortgage) and the mortgagor were parties, and which contained a proviso for re-entry by the mortgagor on M. assigning without his consent. M. paid rent to the mortgagor, and subsequently assigned without his consent, whereupon S. and the mortgagor brought ejectment:—Held, that M. was not estopped from shewing that the mortgagor was not the legal reversioner; and held, also, that neither the mortgagor nor S. could recover—the one having only an equitable title to the premises, and the other having no right of re-entry reserved to him.

This was an action of ejectment to recover possession of a public-house, on the ground of forfeiture for assigning without licence.

At the trial, at Liverpool, before Mellor, J., at the Spring Assizes, 1865, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendants to move for a nonsuit, under the following circumstances:

By an indenture of lease, dated the 26th of April, 1849, between one Tyrer, mortgagee of the premises, of the first part, the plaintiff Waine, the mortgagor, of the second part, and one Johnson, of the third part, after reciting the mortgage by Waine to Tyrer, the mortgagor and mortgagee jointly demised the premises to one Johnson for twenty-one years, from the 21st of May, 1849, with a proviso for re-entry by the mortgagor and mortgagee, or either of them, their executors, &c., on the lessee assigning, letting or under-letting the premises contrary to a proviso thereafter contained, by which it was agreed that Johnson might at any time during the term let the premises for the residue of the term, or any part thereof, to any good, respectable and responsible person, of whom Waine should approve in writing.

The mortgage was, after several mesne assignments assigned to the plaintiff Saunders on the 28th of November, 1859. There were also several assignments of the lease with Waine's consent; and at last, by indenture, dated the 7th of February, 1861, the term became vested in one Reid.

* Decided in Trinity Term, 1865.

By indenture, dated the 4th of October, 1864, and expressed to be made between Reid's executrix, of the first part, Waine, of the second part, and the defendant Merryweather, of the third part, reciting the lease of the 26th of April, 1849, and the subsequent assignments with Waine's consent, and that Reid was under a covenant not to assign without the consent of Waine, the executrix assigned the premises to the defendant for the residue of the term, the defendant in his turn covenanting not to assign without Waine's consent. There was a proviso for re-entry by Waine in that event.

The defendant Merryweather afterwards assigned without Waine's consent to Anne Snowdon, who afterwards married the defendant Kelly.

Mellish obtained a rule for a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no right of re-entry reserved to Saunders on an assignment by the assignee without Waine's consent; and that Waine could not recover because he had no legal title to the premises, and the alleged right reserved in the deed of 1864 was void.

Brett and Arthur Peel now shewed cause.—The indenture of 1864, on which the question turns, was executed after 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. s. 1, which altered the law as previously settled by Dumpor's case (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 28 (5th edit.); s. c. 4 Coke, 119). Besides, it expressly provides that the assignee is not to assign without Waine's consent. Taking from Waine, the defendants recognized his title, and therefore cannot now dispute it. By agreeing to accept a lease from Waine the lessee treats him as having power to grant the lease.

[MARTIN, B.—It does not appear from the recitals that Waine was the owner of the reversion.]

If the true construction of the deed shews that he has the reversion, it need not be so stated in express terms. A tenant who has paid rent cannot set up against his lessor the superior title of a third person—Doe d. Bristow v. Pegge (1 Term Rep. 758, 760, n.), per Lord Mansfield, C.J. And in respect of disputing title there is no difference between tenant and licensee—Doe d. Johnson v. Baytup (3 Ad. & E. 188). There is nothing on the face of the deed to shew that Waine was merely a mortgagor. The intention of the parties clearly was to secure a responsible tenant, and provisoes of this sort should not be construed with the strictness of conditions at common law, but just as other contracts—Doe d. Davis v. Elsam (1 Moody & M. 189), per Lord Tenterden; that is, according to the intention of the parties—Stadhard v. Lee (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 75), per Cockburn, C.J.

[CHANNELL, B.—The difficulty here is, that the law does not allow the parties to make this condition in favour of a stranger.]

The mortgagor was no stranger in the eye of the man who made the condition.

Mellish (with whom was C. Russell), for the defendant, said, that the original lease reserved the right of re-entry to Waine only, and not to the mortgagee; and therefore, while on the one hand Waine could not recover as he had only an equitable title, so on the other hand there was no covenant on which Saunders could sue.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the rule ought to be made absolute. It seems to me that the points made for the plaintiffs fail. It is said that the defendant Merryweather was estopped from shewing that Waine was not in reality the legal owner of the reversion, but was in point of fact a mortgagor only; I am clearly of opinion that he is not estopped from shewing that. If I were to read this deed of October, 1864, without knowing anything more of the matter, I might draw the conclusion that Waine was the reversioner; but it is clear by reference to the recital in this deed of the indenture of the 26th of April, 1849, that the legal owner of the reversion was Tyrer or Tyrer's assignee; and that Waine being the mortgagor, and having an interest in the house being occupied by a proper tenant, is only joined for the purpose of shewing that he was satisfied that the defendant Merryweather was a fit and proper person to become tenant of the house.

This indenture of October, 1864, contains a proviso, in the form of a condition, that if Merryweather, the assignee of the lease, should assign without Waine's consent, it should be lawful for Waine, his executors, administrators or assigns, to enter into and upon the premises, &c. The question then comes,—was Waine in a position to enable him to take advantage of this condition? It does not seem to be disputed that the condition must be made to the lessor; but it was argued that the terms of this proviso shew clearly that it was the meaning of these parties that the defendant should not be allowed to assign without Waine's consent. That is, no doubt, true; and if I could see my way to carrying out that intention, by putting any reasonable construction on the condition, I should be inclined to do so; but it is impossible to strain the rules of law so as to construe this proviso, not as a condition, but as a re-assignment to Waine, to take effect in futuro upon an assignment by Merryweather without licence. Waine's relation to the defendant is in reality that of a stranger, and he cannot avail himself of this condition.

POLLOCK, C.B., concurred.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. When we come to look at the term of the assignment to the defendant and to the recital therein, I think it clear that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply. Nor do I think that the language of the proviso can be held to operate as a kind of re-assignment to Waine without straining its language and giving an effect to it the reverse of its natural meaning. There is, therefore, no ground on which Waine can succeed in this ejectment. Saunders, again, who takes under the original mortgagee by conveyance to him of the legal reversion, has no right of re-entry reserved to him, and therefore cannot recover.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 22, 1865; Feb. 26, 1866.

HAUGHTON AND OTHERS v. THE EMPIRE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

85 L. J. Ex. 117; 4 H. & C. 44; L. R. 1 Ex. 206; 15 L. T. 80; 14 W. R. 645; 12 Jur. N.S. 376.

Marine Insurance—Construction of Policy—Meaning of “at and from.”

MARINE INSURANCE.—A ship was insured on a valued policy “lost or not lost at and from Havana to Greenock.” Upon arriving inside the harbour of Havana she proceeded up the harbour in charge of a pilot. When past the mass of the shipping lying off the city of Havana, and past the point where she was ultimately discharged, she began to stir up the mud, whereupon the pilot ordered her to be anchored. She sustained damage from settling down on the anchor of another ship:—Held, that the word “at” was to be construed in its ordinary and geographical sense, and that it was—according to the ruling of Lord Hardwicke, in Motteux v. the London Assurance Company (1 Atk. 545, 548)—equivalent to “at her first arrival at”; and that therefore the policy attached immediately the ship entered the natural boundaries of the harbour of Havana.

The declaration, which was on a valued policy of insurance on the ship

Urgent, "lost or not lost at and from Havana to Greenock," averred that the said ship when at Havana and after the commencement and during the continuance of the risk sustained injury by perils insured against, such injury being caused by grounding and by contact with some substances other than water, within the meaning of the policy, and thereby sustained an average loss exceeding 3l. per cent. There were also a count upon accounts stated.

Pleas—First, that the said ship did not, when at Havana, after the commencement and during the continuance of the said risk, sustain injury by the perils insured against as alleged; second, that the said ship was not, after the commencement and during the continuance of the said risk, stranded, sunk or burnt within the meaning of the said policy, and that the said loss and damage did not constitute a general average loss, and amounted to less than 3l. per cent.; third, a denial of the plaintiff's interest in the ship; and fourth, as to the second count, never indebted.

Issue on all the pleas.

The case was tried before Montague Smith, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1865, when it appeared that the Urgent arrived off the harbour of Havana on the 5th of May, 1864, and that her captain when inside the harbour engaged the services of a pilot and a steam-tug for the purpose of taking the ship to a clear anchorage. She was towed up the harbour, past the thick of the shipping above the city, and past the place where she ultimately discharged her cargo. When near the "Regla Shoal," at the head of the harbour, she began to stir up the mud, but she was not felt to take the ground. The anchor was then let go by order of the pilot, who immediately afterwards went ashore, leaving the ship anchored as she was. The next morning the captain attempted to get her head to wind, but could not; and later in the day he found that she had sustained damage from settling down on the anchor of another ship. She was afterwards moved to her place of discharge, which was pointed out by the purchaser of her cargo, and was nearer to the mouth of the harbour than the shoal was.

The sole question was whether the policy had attached at the time the damage was sustained.

The verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 353l. 3s. 1d., with leave to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit.

Edward James, in Michaelmas Term, 1865, obtained a rule to set aside the verdict, and to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the policy had not attached, the vessel not having arrived at Havana within the meaning of the policy when the damage was sustained.

Brett and Baylis shewed cause (Nov. 22).—Whether the injury took place before the ship was finally moored or after makes no difference. As it was, she was actually stopped and held at her own anchor, and the pilot had left her. The policy attached the moment she was inside the natural boundaries of the harbour, for she was then at Havana. She was clearly at Havana when the damage was sustained. A ship is at Liverpool when lying in the Sloyne; and at London when anchored at Gravesend, although her ultimate destination be the London Docks. When a ship is in Dover Roads she is off Dover; but the moment she is between the piers at the entrance of the outer harbour she is at Dover. It may be said that a homeward policy does not attach unless the ship is "at" the outward port in a seaworthy condition. But it is admitted here that the ship was seaworthy. If she had been insured for the outward voyage to Havana, the policy would have covered her till she had been moored for twenty-four hours—but that is by express words in the policy. According to the latest decisions the home policy attaches before the outward policy is at an end, so that the two policies overlap one another. It is clear here that something more is meant to be insured than the home voyage.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—It has been said that the vessel must be at her destination in safety, i.e. the dangers of the voyage out must be over.]

In Arnould on Marine Insurance (Vol. 1, pp. 388, 389, 3rd edit. by Maclachlan) it is certainly said: "If the ship be insured and the adventure made to commence upon her 'at and from' some foreign port at which the ship is expected to arrive, with the view of protecting her for her homeward voyage, it is now settled in this country that, in order to make the homeward policy attach on the ship, she must have once been at the outward port in good physical safety;" and Parmeter v. Cousins (2 Campb. 235) and Bell v. Bell (Ibid. 475) are cited as authorities; but in Parmeter v. Cousins (2 Campb. 235) Lord Ellenborough, C.J., held, that it was sufficient that the ship while in the foreign port should "be in such a condition as to enable her to lie there in reasonable security till properly repaired and equipped for her voyage." In Motteux v. the London Assurance Company (1 Atk. 545, 548), Lord Hardwicke laid it down that when a ship is thus insured, the words "first arrival" are always implied. So Palmer v. Marshall (8 Bing. 318; s. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 19, per Tindal, C.J.), and Smith v. Surridge (4 Esp. 25); but in none of these authorities is a satisfactory definition given of the word "at." Therefore the word "at" must be taken in its popular and geographical sense; and then the policy attached the moment the ship entered the natural harbour of Havana. Any artificial interpretation given to the word "at" would only create confusion in this as well as in other respects. Even if it be held that she must be anchored before the policy attached, the defendants are still liable, for the ship was anchored when she sustained the injury.—They also cited Patrick v. Ludlow (3 Johnson's Cases, 10) and Seamans v. Loring (1 Mason's Circuit Rep. 127, per Story, J.).

Potter (Edward James with him), for the defendants.—Granted that a moment of time exists when the outward and the homeward policies overlap each other, still the vessel could not be said to be at Havana unless she was there in such a sense that twenty-four hours afterwards the liability of the underwriters on an outward policy would cease. Now here that liability would have existed for twenty-four hours after the Urgent was at her point of discharge. It was not the intention of the pilot to anchor where he did: it was a mere temporary anchoring, rendered necessary by the emergency of the moment. The outward voyage must be concluded before the homeward voyage commences. In Samuel v. the Royal Exchange Assurance Company (8 B. & C. 119) Lord Tenterden, C.J. held, that as the ship in question had never been at the dock where she was to be discharged, she had not been moored at her place of destination twenty-four hours in good safety; virtually ruling that the word "London" may be restricted in meaning to a particular dock in London. So in the case cited in Phillips on Marine Insurance, s. 968; and, therefore, "at Havana" must mean "at the dock or place of discharge at" Havana to which the ship was required to proceed.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 25th of February the following judgments were delivered—

CHANNELL, B.—The question in this case is, whether or not the policy had attached at the time when the damage occurred to the Urgent. In my opinion, the ship was at that time at Havana, and consequently the risk under the policy had attached. The damage occurred "at Havana," geographically speaking; and there is nothing which, to my mind, shews that the parties, at the time this policy was underwritten, contemplated any other meaning of the word "at." All the limitation which the law appears ever to have imposed as to the time of the commencement of the risk in such a case is, that the ship should arrive at the port at which she is insured, in a state of sufficient repair or seaworthiness to be enabled to be there in safety—see Parmeter v. Cousins (2 Campb. 235) and Bell v. Bell (Ibid. 475), in the latter of which cases the ruling of Lord Ellenborough, C.J., at Nisi Prius was upheld by the Court in Banc. Here, however, there seems to be no doubt that the ship was really within the harbour in good safety, and the loss occurred from a peril of the harbour, and in no way from any injuries she had received before her arrival. The ship being insured while at Havana, is evidently (in the absence of any provision to the contrary) insured all the time she is there, and therefore the risk commences on her first arrival, as put by Lord Hardwicke in Motteux v. the London Assurance Company (1 Atk. 545, 548).

Unless, therefore, we can say that her first arrival at the port is when she casts anchor there, instead of when she enters the port, our judgment must be for the plaintiffs. In many cases, the nature of the port may be such that the two events may be identical. There may be nothing to shew the arrival till the vessel casts anchor. But here we have evidence as to the port of Havana which is sufficient, in my judgment, to shew that the arrival was before casting anchor. It has been argued that the first arrival, which must be no doubt in good safety, must be identical with the mooring in good safety usually named in outward policies. But I think we cannot construe the terms of our contract by reference to those of another not referred to in it. And it is clear that there is no usage that the durations of the outward and homeward policies should not overlap, because the outward policy usually extends to twenty-four hours after the vessel is moored in good safety. During those twenty-four hours there is no question that there is a double insurance, and therefore I see no ground for saying that the parties contracted subject to any usage that such a policy would not attach until the previous one had determined. If they had wished to make such a condition, it might easily have been done: or if, having in view any special dangers, as shoals or the like, within the port of Havana, they had chosen to make the risk date from the vessel being moored in safety, they would have done so; but as it stands it is from her first arrival, which, as a matter of fact, I think to be on her entering the port. My judgment is, therefore, for the plaintiffs, that the rule be discharged.

PIGOTT, B.—I also am of opinion that the policy had attached when the mischief occurred. I agree with the plaintiffs' counsel that the language used by the parties ought to have a plain construction put upon it, and that, as the ship had arrived, geographically speaking, within the harbour of Havana, and was in safety there before the injury was received, the risk had then commenced.

A policy of insurance is to be construed by the same rules as other contracts, the duty of the Court being to collect the meaning of the parties by taking the language employed in a plain and ordinary sense, and not to speculate on some supposed meaning which they have not expressed. For the defendants it was argued that, Havana being an outward port as regards this ship, the meaning of the words "at and from" such outward port was, that the risk should commence when the ship has so far performed her outward voyage that nothing remained to determine the outward policy but the effluxion of the twenty-four hours from her arrival, and that so understood this policy had not attached, inasmuch as the ship had not arrived at her place of discharge.

But it seems to me that this would be a very artificial construction to adopt, and we have no safe guide to conduct us to it.

It might with equal plausibility be argued that the risk "at and from" a port should not commence till the insurance "to" that port ceased, which is at the end of the twenty-four hours, and not at the commencement of them. The answer to both suggestions seems to be that the construction of this contract cannot depend upon the contents of another and distinct contract which is wholly unconnected with it, and that the Court is not called upon to know or assume that there is in fact any outward policy in existence.

This view is supported by the authority of Lord Hardwicke, who, in Motteux v. the London Assurance Company (1 Atk. 545, 548), mentions a case tried before him at Guildhall, in which he says, "It was debated whether the words at and from Bengal meant the first arrival of the ship at Bengal;" and he adds, "It was agreed the words 'first arrival' were implied, and always understood in policies." Now there can be no question about the sense in which Lord Hardwicke uses the words "first arrival," viz. in contradistinction to her being moored in a particular place, or discharging her cargo. In Parmeter v. Cousins (2 Campb. 235) Lord Hardwicke's report of the above case is mentioned, and the learned reporter adds, "there seems no doubt that the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke, qualified by the principal case (to which the note is appended), is to be considered as established law upon the subject." The qualification there alluded to is, that the ship shall be once in good safety at the port, a matter not in dispute in the present case.

This doctrine, and the authority for it, are to be found in several of the text-books on Insurance, and may be thus taken to have been long considered as the meaning of those who so word their policies. In Arnould on Insurance (Page 28, section 25, 2nd edit.) it is the form recommended to be adopted for the advantage of the assured in protecting the ship from the moment of her arrival.

I do not think it necessary to advert to the other question raised, viz.—Whether in fact this ship had not anchored in the harbour before the damage was sustained, and at a place even further within it than her place of ultimate discharge; and whether that would make any difference in the case.

In my judgment the plaintiffs are entitled to keep their verdict, and the rule should be discharged.¹

Rule discharged.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

Feb. 7, 8, 1866.

CARR v. LAMBERT, WOODHALL AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Ex. 121; L. R. 1 Ex. 168; 14 W. R. 405; 14 L. T. 255; 4 H. & C. 257; 12 Jur. N.S. 194.

Referred to, Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. Ch. 780; L. R. 6 Ch. 716; 25 L. T. 254; 19 W. R. 1098 (L.C.); Johnson v. Barnes, [1872] E. R. A.; 41 L. J. C.P. 250; L. R. 7 C.P. 592; 27 L. T. 152 (C.P.): affirmed, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. C.P. 259; L. R. 8 C.P. 527; 29 L. T. 65 (Ex. Ch.). Observation adopted, Robertson v. Hartopp, [1890] E. R. A.; 59 L. J. Ch. 553; 43 Ch. D. 484; 62 L. T. 585 (C. A.). Referred to, Att.-Gen. v. Reynolds, [1911] E. R. A.; 80 L. J. K.B. 1073; [1911] 2 K.B. 888; 104 L. T. 852 (K.B. D.).

Common—Levant and Couchant—Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71.

COMMON.—To a declaration in trespass, the defendant pleaded thirty years' enjoyment of a right of common of pasture over the locus in quo for cattle levant and couchant upon a certain toftstead belonging to him as appurtenant thereto:—Held, that it was not necessary for the support of the plea that the cattle should be actually fed upon the produce of the toftstead, they being housed thereon, and the condition of the toftstead not being so completely changed from its original arable state that it might not again be used for the production of food for cattle; and that there is no difference in this respect between a plea founded on the Prescription Act and a plea founded on prescription, properly so called.

(1) Channell, B. said that he had not been able to ascertain whether Pollock, C.B. concurred in this judgment or not; but that the judgment was at any rate that of the majority of the Court, as Martin, B., having only heard a portion of the argument, took no part in the judgment.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer, reported 3 H. & C. 499; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 66.

The declaration was in trespass. The fifth and sixth pleas are set out in the report of the case below. The defendants claimed under them a right of common of pasture over the locus in quo for cattle levant and couchant upon a certain toftstead of the defendant, John Woodhall, enjoyed for thirty years and sixty years respectively before suit.

It was proved at the trial that at the time of the alleged trespasses the defendant John Woodhall was possessed of a toftstead, consisting of a cottage and stable, with a garden and orchard of the extent of about two acres. Evidence was given that about fifty years before the commencement of the action this had been planted with fruit-trees; but that before that time it was swarth, and had been depastured with cattle. No direct evidence was given as to the number of cattle which it had then supported, or was capable of supporting; and no point was raised at the trial on either side as to the necessity of proof on this subject. After a great deal of evidence had been given, Blackburn, J. suggested that on the evidence the fact seemed clear that the owners of the toftstead had as of right turned the cattle housed on the toftstead, but not deriving their sustenance therefrom, on the locus in quo for more than thirty years, and that the only question was one of law, viz., whether such a right of common was legal, or, in other words, if such cattle were levant and couchant. Both sides assented to this suggestion, and no other question was required to be, or was, in fact, left to the jury, and thereupon the learned Judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them.

A rule nisi was accordingly obtained by the defendants, and, after argument, made absolute.

The plaintiff appealed from the decision.

Hayes, Serj. (Kemplay with him), for the plaintiff, the appellant.—The cattle levant and couchant, for which the right of common is claimed, must be connected with the land in some closer manner than by merely being housed upon it. If the character of the land is entirely changed, as by being built upon, or by having a reservoir dug upon it, it would be absurd that the right of common should remain. Even supposing that the cattle need not be fed upon the produce of the land, the land must be in such a condition that they might be fed upon its produce if necessary. In addition to the authorities cited in the Court below, he referred to 1 Wms. Saund. 28 c., note 4, Bennett v. Reeve (Willes, 227), and Com. Dig. tit. 'Common,' (B.) and (C).

Field (T. P. Thompson with him), for the defendants, the respondents.—The land was formerly in a condition to support cattle by its produce, and there is nothing to prevent it from being easily restored to that condition. Levancy and couchancy is merely a test of the number of the cattle in respect of which common of pasture may be claimed. If the cattle must be connected with the land, it is quite sufficient that they are housed upon it, or if the land is capable of their being housed upon it. This is the conclusion to be drawn from the authorities cited.

On the following day (Feb. 8) the judgment of the Court² was delivered by—

WILLES, J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of

(2) Willes, J., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Montague Smith, J. and Lush, J.

Exchequer should be affirmed. The argument, on the part of the appellant, consisted in this, that the character of the dominant tenement had been so altered from its original state of pasture-ground by having buildings placed upon it, and by being turned into orchard-ground, that a thirty years' user to put the cattle of the dominant tenement upon the plaintiff's common was evidence, if anything, of a right which could not exist in law. This argument might have had considerable force if the character of the dominant tenement had been so altered that it could not be applied to the purpose of producing fruits which would feed cattle. Had a case been made out of a town extending over the whole of the dominant tenement, or, as in the case put in the course of the argument, had a reservoir been dug there, the question might have arisen, whether the right of common was not extinguished, or at least suspended. We are not to be taken as expressing an opinion upon that question. It is unnecessary for the decision of the present case to do so, because the facts shew that the toftstead consisted of a cottage and stable, with a garden and orchard of the extent of about two acres of land, which might either be laid down for pasture or meadow, or cultivated so as to produce artificial plants and roots for the feeding of cattle. No case is made out upon the evidence of such a change in the character of the dominant tenement that cattle might not be fed off its produce. Even, therefore, if my Brother Hayes had succeeded in satisfying the Court that levancy and couchancy is not a mere measure of the number of cattle which the land is capable of keeping out of the produce, natural or artificial, grown within its limits, but that it has reference to the capacity of the land in its actual state to produce food for cattle,—he could not have succeeded in shewing that the facts negative the capacity of the land for the purpose. Land in a state of cultivation, in which it was capable of sustaining cattle upon it, is afterwards partly built on and partly turned into a garden and orchard, not with a view, it is true, to sustain cattle, but at the same time in such a state that the occupier might at any time use it to produce fruit that would sustain cattle. We find no authority in the cases relating to the abandonment or loss of rights, by a destruction absolute or temporary of the enjoyment, which would at all justify us in holding under these circumstances that the right of common once created and existing was destroyed by the subsequent acts of the proprietor. His acts of enjoyment, which are spread over a long period, ought, if possible, to be referred to a legal origin, rather than treated as a series of trespasses; and we ought to assume that there was a legal origin of the right, unless the facts are evidently inconsistent with it, or the right has been either extinguished or suspended. We think that the enjoyment was referable here to the legal origin which I have described, and there is nothing to shew that the right so created was extinguished. This was the ground upon which the judgment of the Court below proceeded, and I think it must be in the experience of those who have heard trials with reference to rights of common of this description, that that judgment was in accordance with the direction usually given respecting lands capable of being applied to maintain cattle, that levancy and couchancy is a measure of capacity, rather than a description of cattle as actually lying down on the land, or actually sustained by the fruits thereof.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

Feb. 27, 1866.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

35 L. J. Ex. 123; L. R. 1 H.L. 1; 14 L. T. 33; 14 W. R. 519; 12 Jur. N.S. 417.

Revenue—Duties on Railway Fares—Exemption—Parliamentary Trains—5 & 6 Vict. c. 79.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 85.

RAILWAY.—The Midland Railway Company from Birmingham to Gloucester have running powers over a great portion of the line belonging to the Great Western Railway Company, forming a loop-line with their own, but their powers extend only to the carriage of passengers over any portion of the loop-line who travel also over some portion of the Midland main line. The Midland Company, however, ran one train daily which stopped at every station on the loop-line. The fares paid by passengers getting into the train at stations on the loop-line were received by the officials of the Great Western Company, and they accounted for them to the Midland Company, but refused to render accounts of such receipts to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or to pay upon them the duty prescribed by the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, on the ground that these fares were not received by them for carrying the passengers, inasmuch as they were not the carrying company, the train, engine, carriages, &c. belonging to the Midland Company. Neither did they receive the fares from any other company by way of toll, but in a manner wholly unprovided for by the act:—Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Exchequer, that it was unimportant for whom the Great Western Company received the fares, they being the hands that received them; and that the receipts, being in respect of passenger traffic, they must be accounted for, and the duty paid to Her Majesty.

By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, it was enacted (section 6), that on and after the several days thereafter specified, "all passenger railway companies shall, by means of one train at the least to travel along their railway from one end to the other of each trunk, branch or junction line belonging to or leased by them, so long as they shall continue to carry other passengers over such trunk, branch or junction line, once at the least each way on every week day, except Christmas Day and Good Friday (such exception not to extend to Scotland), provide for the conveyance of third-class passengers to and from the terminal and other ordinary passenger stations of the railway, under the obligations contained in their several acts of parliament and with the immunities applicable by law to carriers of passengers by railway, and also under the following conditions": one of such conditions being, that "such train shall start at an hour to be from time to time fixed by the directors, subject to the approval of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations;" and another, that "such train shall, if required, take up and set down passengers at every passenger station which it shall pass on the line." The train in question ran over all the railway over which the Midland Company carried passengers, and stopped at every station, and started at an hour which had been at one time approved by the Board of Trade; but as the Midland Company could not set down at any station on the loop-line a passenger who had also been taken up at another station on the loop-line, the Board of Trade had since withdrawn their approval:—Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Exchequer), that inasmuch as the Midland Company in running their trains from Birmingham into Gloucester had not the power of stopping at every station on the loop-line for the purposes of setting down passengers not taken up on the main line, they could not comply with the latter of the above conditions; and that they could not bring themselves within the former of such conditions, as the Board of Trade had refused to give them their sanction, and so no exemption could be claimed under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85. from the duties imposed by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79.

The suit originated by information filed by the Attorney General in the Court of Exchequer, to recover from the Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Company (now amalgamated with the appellant company—the Great Western Railway Company) passenger duty in respect of so much of the fares received by them for the conveyance from stations on their loop-line, between Abbott's Wood and Stoke Prior, to stations on the Midland Railway line, of passengers by cheap traffic trains belonging to the Midland Railway Company, as was derived from the conveyance of such passengers over such loop-line.

The questions on the appeal were the same as in the Court below: viz., first, whether any duty at all was payable in respect of the passenger fares in question; and, secondly, whether, if duty was payable, the appellant company—the Great Western Railway Company—were liable to pay the same.

The judgment of the Court below was in favour of the Crown, and against the appellants on both points; with regard to the first point, Martin, B. dissented from the rest of the Court, holding that no duty was payable; but on the second point the Court were unanimous in their opinion (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 218).

The circumstances giving rise to the questions in dispute are as follows:

In 1845, the Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Company obtained an act of parliament, enabling them to make a line of railway commencing at a place on the Birmingham and Gloucester line, called Abbott's Wood, and running thence through Worcester and Droitwich, and returning to the Birmingham and Gloucester line at a place called Stoke Prior. This line of railway is about fourteen miles long, and is the line referred to as "the loop-line."

The Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company (now merged into the Midland Railway Company) are, under a licence and authority for that purpose conferred on them by the Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Company's Act, entitled to use, as they do in fact use, this loop-line for the conveyance of passengers from stations on the loop-line to stations on their own line, and vice versa; the act, however, provided that the said Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Company should not be permitted to convey any passengers along the loop-line, or any part thereof, unless such passengers should have passed or be intended to travel or pass in the same train over some portions of the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway between Abbott's Wood and Gloucester or between Stoke Prior and Birmingham.

With regard to the trains of the Midland Railway Company conveying passengers from stations on the loop line, the passengers by such trains were booked at the stations of the appellant—the Great Western Railway—company and by their clerks, no separate establishment of any sort being kept, and the balance of the money received, after deducting the share of it which belonged to the appellant—the Great Western Railway—company, was accounted for, through the medium of the clearing house, to the Midland Railway Company, and it was in respect of fares received by the appellant—the Great Western Railway—company for passengers booked by them at their stations on the loop-line, for conveyance to stations on the Midland line by trains belonging to the Midland Railway Company, and which, so far as they ran over the line of the latter company, complied with the requisitions of the Cheap Traffic Trains Act, and were, therefore, to that extent exempt from duty, and which also stopped at all stations on the loop-line, and purported to be cheap traffic trains for passengers from stations on the loop-line to stations on the Midland line, and vice versa,—that the duty in question was claimed.

The act by which the duties at present payable in respect of passengers conveyed by railways are imposed is the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, which was passed in 1842. The material sections are the 4th and 5th, which are as follows :

Section 4. " And be it enacted, that the proprietor or company of proprietors of every railway in Great Britain, and every other person who shall carry or convey, or cause to be carried or conveyed, any passenger for hire in or upon any railway in Great Britain, shall, from time to time and at all times, keep and enter, or cause to be entered, in a book or books to be kept for that purpose, in such manner and form as the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes shall direct or approve, a just and true account of all and every sum and sums of money which shall be received or charged daily by or for such proprietor or company or other person for the hire, fare or conveyance of all such passengers, as aforesaid, whether the same shall be received for the conveyance of passengers on the railway of such proprietor or company or other person only, or on such last-mentioned railway and any other railway, or on any such other railway only, and for or in respect of all which sums of money the duties charged by this act shall, in manner hereinafter directed, be paid by the said proprietor or company or other person so receiving or charging the same as aforesaid, without any deduction or abatement thereout on any account or pretence whatever; and the proprietor, or company of proprietors, of any railway so receiving or charging any such sums of money as aforesaid shall also in like manner keep and enter, or cause to be entered, an account of all sums of money paid or accounted for, or to be paid or accounted for, by such proprietor or company to the proprietor or company of proprietors of any other railway (specifying the same) upon which any of such passengers shall be carried or conveyed, as his or their share or proportion of any of such sums of money so received or charged as aforesaid, or as or for or in the nature of toll or otherwise for the use of such last-mentioned railway in the conveyance of such passengers; and the proprietor or company of proprietors of every such last-mentioned railway shall in like manner keep and enter, or cause to be entered, an account of all sums of money so paid or accounted for to him or them as last aforesaid, and for or in respect of which the duties shall or ought to have been paid as aforesaid by such first-mentioned proprietor or company; and every such proprietor and company, and other such person and persons respectively, shall, within five days after the first Monday in every calendar month, deliver to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or to the proper officer appointed for receiving the same, a true copy or true copies of the account or accounts by this act directed to be kept, so far as the same shall relate to all sums of money received or charged and paid or accounted for as aforesaid during the preceding four or five weeks, as the case may be; (that is to say,) from and including the first Monday in the preceding month up to the first Monday of the month in which such account shall be rendered, or ought to be rendered as aforesaid; and to and with every such account there shall be annexed and delivered an affidavit (to be taken before any one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace) of such proprietor or other person as aforesaid, or of the secretary, chief clerk or accountant of such proprietor or company or other person, stating that the deponent is well acquainted with the books and accounts of the said proprietor, company or other person, and that he has examined and checked the same, and also the account to which such affidavit is annexed, and that, to the best of his knowledge, information and belief, such last-mentioned account doth contain and is a true and faithful account of all and every sum and sums of money received or charged by or for such proprietor or company or other person aforesaid for the hire, fare or conveyance of passengers on any railway during the period comprised in such account, and of all other matters and things required by this act to be contained in such account; and such proprietor or company or other person shall, at the time of delivering every such account, pay, or cause to be paid, to the Receiver General of Stamps and Taxes, or to the officer authorized by the said Commissioners to receive the same, for the use of Her Majesty, the duties chargeable under this act or in respect of all and every the sum and sums of money so received or charged as aforesaid, and contained, or which ought to be contained, in such account."

Section 5. "Provided always, and be it enacted, that it shall be lawful (where there shall be no express contract or agreement between the parties to the contrary) for any such proprietor or company to deduct from and retain out of the monies to be paid over to any such other proprietor or company as aforesaid the amount of the duties by his act chargeable thereon, and which such proprietor or company receiving such monies shall have paid or be liable to pay."

The duties granted by this act continue to be payable, except so far as they are remitted by the provisions of the Cheap Traffic Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 85), which was passed in 1844, and the material sections of which are the 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th, which are as follows: "Section 6. And whereas it is expedient to secure to the poorer class of travellers the means of travelling by railway at moderate fares, and in carriages in which they may be protected from the weather:—be it enacted, that on and after the several days hereinafter specified all passenger railway companies which shall have been incorporated by any act of the present session, or which shall be hereafter incorporated, or which by any act of the present or any future session have obtained or shall obtain, directly or indirectly, any extension or amendment of the powers conferred on them respectively by their previous acts, or have been or shall be authorized to do any act unauthorized by the provisions of such previous acts, shall, by means of one train at the least to travel along their railway from one end to the other of each trunk, branch or junction line belonging to or leased by them, so long as they shall continue to carry other passengers over such trunk, branch or junction line, once at the least each way on every week day, except Christmas Day and Good Friday (such exception not to extend to Scotland), provide for the conveyance of third-class passengers to and from the terminal and other ordinary passenger stations of the railway, under the obligations contained in their several acts of parliament, and with the immunities applicable by law to carriers of passengers by railway; and also under the following conditions: (that is to say,) such train shall start at an hour to be from time to time fixed by the directors, subject to the approval of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations: such train shall travel at an average rate of speed not less than twelve miles an hour for the whole distance travelled on the railway, including stoppages: such train shall, if required, take up and set down passengers at every passenger station which it shall pass on the line: the carriages in which passengers shall be conveyed by such train shall be provided with seats, and shall be protected from the weather in a manner satisfactory to the Lords of the said Committee: the fare or charge for each third-class passenger by such train shall not exceed 1d. for each mile travelled: each passenger by such train shall be allowed to take with him half a hundredweight of luggage, not being merchandise or other articles carried for hire or profit, without extra charge; and any excess of luggage shall be charged by weight, at a rate not exceeding the lowest rate of charge for passengers' luggage by other trains: children under three years of age accompanying passengers by such train shall be taken without any charge, and children of three years and upwards, but under twelve years of age, at half the charge for an adult passenger. And with respect to all railways subject to these obligations which shall be open on or before the 1st of November next, these obligations shall come into force on the said 1st of November; and with respect to all other railways subject to these obligations, they shall come into force on the day of opening of the railway, or the day after the last day of the session in which the act shall be passed by reason of which the company will become subject thereunto, which shall first happen."

Section 7. "And be it enacted, that if any railway company shall refuse or wilfully neglect to comply with the provisions of this act as to the said cheap trains within a reasonable time, or shall attempt to evade the operation of such order, such company shall forfeit to Her Majesty a sum not exceeding 20*l.* for every day during which such refusal, neglect or evasion shall continue."

Section 8. "Provided always, and be it enacted, that, except as to the amount of fare or charge for each passenger by such cheap trains, which shall in no case exceed the rates hereinbefore in such case provided, the Lords of the said Committee shall have a discretionary power, upon the application of any railway company, of dispensing with any of the conditions hereinbefore required, in regard to the conveyance of passengers by such cheap trains as aforesaid, in consideration of such other arrangements, either in regard to speed, covering from the weather, seats, or other particulars, as to the Lords of the said Committee shall appear more beneficial and convenient for the passengers by such cheap trains under the circumstances of the case, and shall be sanctioned by them accordingly; and any railway company which shall conform to such other conditions as shall be so sanctioned by the Lords of the said Committee shall not be liable to any penalty for not observing the conditions which shall have been so dispensed with by the Lords of the said Committee in regard to the said cheap trains and the passengers conveyed thereby."

Section 9. "And be it enacted, that no tax shall be levied upon the receipts of any railway company from the conveyance of passengers at fares not exceeding 1*d.* for each mile by any such cheap train as aforesaid."

Some time after the Midland Railway Company had begun to make use of the loop-line for passenger traffic, to the exclusion of their old route, the Board of Trade withdrew their approval of the Midland Railway Company's cheap traffic trains, so far as they were trains for the conveyance of passengers over the loop-line.

An application having been made to the Oxford and Worcester Company for payment of the duty hereinbefore mentioned in respect of fares received by them for the conveyance of passengers by cheap traffic trains of the Midland Railway Company from stations on the loop-line to stations on the Midland Company's line, they refused to pay the same, and denied their liability in respect thereof. Hence the information in the Court of Exchequer.

Coleridge and Bere, for the appellants.—The Midland Railway Company are bound to run a cheap train from Birmingham to Gloucester over the whole of their line, including the loop-line, and therefore are entitled to exemption from duty in respect of such train. There is an absolute enactment that the company shall run such a train, with a penalty for not doing so; and though the approval of the Board of Trade is made requisite, the Board is not to be allowed vexatiously to withhold its approval, which was only intended to apply to the hours of starting and the general rate of travelling. The payment of the duty (if payable at all) can only be enforced against parties who are themselves carriers, and the appellants are not the carrying company: they receive the fares only as the agents and servants of the Midland Company, who, if there be any liability to duty at all, are the proper company to pay such duty. The appellants have no control over the trains which belong entirely to the Midland Company. Both companies cannot be the carrying company. In the case of two passengers, one getting into a train on the Midland main line, and the other on the loop, it is clear they would both be carried by the same company. The decree of the Court of Exchequer is erroneous.

The Attorney General, The Solicitor General, and E. Leigh Pemberton, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think we need not trouble the Attorney General to address the House in this case, for it seems to me to be a perfectly clear one. By the act of parliament 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, a duty is imposed upon passenger traffic, and that duty is to be ascertained and accounted for in the following manner.—Certain accounts are to be kept; the company over whose line the trains are run, or the company running the trains, is to keep an account of all money that it has received. That is all that is important to the present question. There are two other accounts to be kept, but they are for collateral objects: one of all money which the company receive for leasing their line, or giving a right of running over their line to other companies; and the other of all sums which they pay for having the right of running over other companies' lines. Those powers are immaterial to the present purpose. It is sufficient to say that the company are bound to keep an account of all monies which they receive for passengers.

It is enacted by the 14th section of the act, that every proprietor of a railway, or company, or other person who conveys passengers on a railway, shall deliver the accounts I have mentioned once a month, and at the time of the delivery of such accounts "pay, or cause to be paid to the Receiver General of Stamps and Taxes, or to the officer authorized by the said Commissioners to receive the same for the use of Her Majesty, the duties chargeable under this act, for or in respect of all and every the sum and sums of money so received or charged as aforesaid." It seems to me to be utterly unimportant for whom they receive it. It may be that they have to account for the whole of it, but that is quite immaterial. They are the hands that receive it; it is received in respect of passenger traffic, and is, therefore, to be accounted for, and the duty paid to Her Majesty.

That, indeed, was not the point mainly relied upon by the appellants, but what was relied upon was, that although by the statute of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, this duty is imposed, the subsequent statute of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, passed two years afterwards, made an exemption in respect of the money that was received from passengers travelling by this particular train. That exemption depends upon this fact: The legislature, in order to provide for the poorer class of travellers, enacted, that on and after several days thereafter specified, all passenger railway companies "shall, by means of one train at the least, to travel along their railway from one end to the other of each trunk, branch, or junction line belonging to or leased by them, so long as they shall continue to carry other passengers over such trunk, branch or junction line, once, at the least, each way on every week day, except Christmas Day and Good Friday (such exception not to extend to Scotland), provide for the conveyance of third-class passengers to and from the terminal and other ordinary passenger stations of the railway, under the obligations contained in their several acts of parliament, and with the immunities applicable by law to carriers of passengers by railway, and also under the following conditions." One of these conditions is, that "such train shall start at an hour to be from time to time fixed by the directors, subject to the approval of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations." Another is, that "such train shall, if required, take up and set down passengers at every passenger station which it shall pass on the line."

Now, without going in detail into the reasons which have been very clearly stated as bearing on the case, (though we did not quite understand them at first,) it is plain that the Midland Railway Company, in running their trains from Birmingham into Gloucester, had not the power of stopping at every station on the portion of the line which is situate between Abbott's Wood and Stoke Prior; and therefore they could not comply with the latter condition. Whether it is technical or not I do not know, but it is perfectly obvious that they cannot bring themselves within the former condition, as the Board of Trade have refused to give them their sanction.

It appears to me, therefore, on these very short grounds (and the grounds appear to be very clearly stated, so far as I have been able to gather from a cursory inspection of the judgment given by the Lord Chief Baron), that the case was rightly decided, and that this appeal is entirely unfounded. I shall, therefore, move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The two points are perfectly clear; and I entirely agree with what has fallen from my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Jan. 25, 1866.

DIAMOND v. SUTTON.

35 L. J. Ex. 129; L. R. 1 Ex. 130; 13 L. T. 800; 14 W. R. 374; 12 Jur. N.S. 319.

Referred to, Jackson v. Spittall, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. C.P. 321; L. R. 5 C.P. 542; 22 L. T. 755; 18 W. R. 1162 (C.P.). Followed, Arrowsmith v. Chandler, 1872, 27 L. T. 242 (Ex.). See Thomas v. Hamilton, [1886] E. R. A.; 55 L. J. Q.B. 555; 17 Q.B. D. 592; 55 L. T. 385; 35 W. R. 22 (C. A.).

Practice—Writ issued for Service on British Subject residing out of the Jurisdiction—Setting aside Writ—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 18.

PRACTICE.—The defendant resided in Jersey, and was the editor, but not the publisher or proprietor, of a periodical which was printed in Jersey, registered for transmission abroad, purported to be published in England, and was extensively circulated in England; and he was the writer of certain libels published in the periodical respecting the plaintiff. The plaintiff having served the defendant with a writ, indorsed for service on a British subject residing out of the jurisdiction, the defendant, without appearing, applied to have the writ set aside on the ground that there was no cause of action arising in England:—Held, that the application was not premature, and that the writ must be set aside, unless the plaintiff undertook to confine his declaration to causes of action arising in England.

Semble, per Martin, B., that the facts shewed a wrong committed by the defendant in England.

J. O. Griffiths moved to set aside the writ, in this case, which had been issued under section 18. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, for service out of the jurisdiction, and had been served on the defendant, a British subject residing at Jersey.

The affidavits shewed that the action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for alleged libels written by the defendant, and published in certain numbers of a periodical called Photographic Notes, of which the plaintiff was editor. The periodical was printed and published in Jersey, but it was registered for transmission abroad, and it purported on its title-page to be published by Sampson Low & Co., of 14, Ludgate Hill, London. It was stated by the plaintiff that the circulation was very small in Jersey, but large in England. It was stated by the defendant that he was not the publisher nor the proprietor of the journal, but merely the editor, and that he resided wholly in Jersey. The defendant had not appeared.

This application is quite regular, and is made because by appearance the defendant would admit the jurisdiction of the Court—Binet v. Picot (4 Hurl. & N. 365; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 244) and Forbes v. Smith (10 Exch. Rep. 717; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 167). No cause of action here has arisen in England. The defendant has no control over the publication of the periodical, nor is he concerned in transmitting it to England. He supplies certain manuscripts to the publisher, and, having done so, his connexion with them is at an end. The publisher is not bound to insert them.

[PIGOTT, B.—This is just as if the defendant had published a libel in the New York Times, and the publisher had sent it to England.]

A person who utters slander in England is not responsible for its repetition by other persons.

[MARTIN, B.—This matter was before me at chambers, and I thought that the facts shewed a publication of the libel in England, and that the writ ought to stand, if an undertaking were given to confine the action to the publication in England.]

J. C. F. S. Day shewed cause in the first instance.—This application is premature. The defendant is not obliged to appear, and he should have waited till the plaintiff applied for leave to proceed under section 18. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. The plaintiff would then have been obliged to satisfy the Court, or a Judge, that there was a cause of action which arose within the jurisdiction. Here there is internal evidence in the libels themselves, and on the title-page of the Photographic Notes that they were written for publication in England.

[MARTIN, B.—I think that the defendant has done an act which is a wrong in England, and in respect of which the law sanctions an action here; but causes of action may be joined now, and if under the pretence of suing the defendant for the cause of action which arose in England the plaintiff were to get the means of suing him for other matters, it would be an abuse of the act of parliament. CHANNELL, B.—The words of the act are that a Judge is to be satisfied that there is a cause of action which arose in England. It would appear from that, that he may have a discretion, and I do not think that he is bound to be satisfied without the undertaking.]

Per Curiam.¹—The writ must be set aside, unless the plaintiff, within a week, undertakes to confine the action to causes of action arising in England.

Judgment accordingly.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 8, 1865; Feb. 26, 1866.

RICHARDS v. HARPER.

35 L. J. Ex. 180; L. R. 1 Ex. 199; 4 H. & C. 55; 14 W. R. 648; 12 Jur. N.S. 770.

Referred to, Wakefield v. Duke of Buccleuch, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ch. 763; L. R. 4 Eq. 613; 16 L. T. 475 (V.C.): reversed, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. Ch. 441; L. R. 4 H.L. 377; 23 L. T. 102 (H.L.).

Mine—Covenant running with Land—Right to Support—Copyholds.

COPYHOLD.—The owner of freehold and copyhold lands adjoining each other surrendered the copyhold lands to a grantee, who covenanted for himself, his heirs and assigns, with the grantor, his heirs and assigns, that the grantor should have full power to mine under his own freehold lands without paying compensation for any injury which might be sustained by the copyhold portion and buildings erected thereon, in consequence of the removal of the support. The plaintiff was the assignee of the grantee; and the defendant was the assignee of the grantor, and compensation was sought by the plaintiff for damage resulting from the sinking of his land, in consequence of the mines excavated under the defendant's land:—Held, that the grantee had no power to disclaim the right to compensation so as to bind the lord of the manor without his consent, and that the covenant did not run with the land.

(1) Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Channell, B., and Pigott, B.

Semble, per Pollock, C.B., if the land had not been copyhold the grantee's covenant would have run with the land.

Per Martin, B. and Pigott, B. secus.

Action for undermining the plaintiff's land.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff was possessed of land, with a house, outbuilding and wall standing thereon, called the Ethringshall Parsonage, and was entitled to have the same supported by the land adjacent; that the defendants wrongfully, carelessly and improperly, and without leaving any proper or sufficient support, made underground excavations, and removed the land adjacent, whereby the ground on which the plaintiff's house, wall and buildings stood subsided and gave way; and alleged special damage.

The second count was for so wrongfully and negligently digging and working mines adjoining land and buildings of the plaintiff, that the same gave way and sank.

The third plea, as to so much of the declaration as related to the injury to the house, outbuildings and wall in the first count, and to the buildings in the second count, alleged that before and at the time &c., Benjamin Bickley was seised in fee of certain freehold lands adjoining the land in the declaration mentioned, in which freehold lands were mines and minerals, and was also seised in fee at the will of the lord of the manor of Sedgley (according to the custom of the manor), of the plot of land, being the land of the plaintiff mentioned in the declaration; and that on the 6th of May, 1834, he surrendered the copyhold plot to Charles Girdlestone, his heirs and assigns, at the will of the lord, according to the custom of the manor, but subject and liable as expressed in a deed made on the said 6th of May, 1834, between Bickley and Girdlestone, containing, inter alia, the following covenants entered into by Girdlestone, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with Bickley, his heirs and assigns. The first covenant was, that Bickley, his heirs, assigns or lessee for the time being, should have full power of mining under lands coloured red¹ on a plan annexed to the indenture, for the purpose of getting the minerals under any other lands belonging to Bickley, or draining away water, or any other reasonable purpose, without making any compensation to Girdlestone, his heirs, &c., for the privilege reserved, and notwithstanding any damage or injury which might be sustained by him or them, in the exercise of such privilege; and also that for the purpose of laying dry the said mines and minerals and those under any lands belonging to Bickley, it should be lawful for him, his heirs, &c., at all times to drive levels, through the coal and ironstone under the plot of land so surrendered, for the purpose of draining away water from all the mines and minerals under land belonging to him, without making any compensation to Girdlestone, his heirs, &c., for the privilege reserved, or for any damage which he or they might sustain in the exercise of the said privilege, either to the surface of the land surrendered, or to any buildings erected thereon by Girdlestone, his heirs, &c. The other covenants were, that Girdlestone, his heirs, &c., should only erect on the land surrendered a church or chapel, house for the use of the minister, school-rooms and house, stable and gig-house; that if Bickley, his heirs, &c., should, in working mines under lands then belonging to him, do damage to any buildings authorized by the indenture to be built upon the land surrendered, he or they should not be compelled or compellable, either at law or in equity, to make any compensation to Girdlestone, his heirs, &c.; and that Girdlestone should indemnify Bickley, his heirs, &c., from all claims for such compensation which might be set up, and from costs incidental thereto.

(1) It was assumed throughout the argument that this description included the freehold lands subsequently conveyed to the defendant.

The plea then stated divers mesne assignments, by which the said freehold lands belonging to Bickley adjoining the plaintiff's land became vested in the defendant, and alleged that the house, outbuildings and wall, in the first count mentioned, and the buildings in the second count mentioned, were part of the premises erected on the land in the declaration mentioned, in pursuance of the stipulation in the deed that Charles Girdlestone, his heirs and assigns, should only erect thereon a church or chapel and house for the use of a minister, school-rooms, with proper appurtenances, house for a master, and a stable and gig-house; and that the damage in the declaration mentioned happened solely in consequence of the defendants working in the adjoining freehold lands, and not from any working under the land in the declaration mentioned, nor elsewhere, and that such adjoining freehold lands were the lands mentioned in the first count of the declaration, as adjacent and near to the land, house, outbuildings and wall of the plaintiff, and were the lands which contained the mines in the second count mentioned.

The second replication to the third plea set out in extenso the deed mentioned in the plea. It recited that Bickley had on the day of the date of the indenture surrendered the land described therein to Girdlestone, his heirs, &c., but subject and liable as therein expressed, and that on the treaty for the purchase of the land it had been agreed that the covenants thereafter contained should be entered into; and after the operative part of the conveyance, contained ordinary covenants for quiet enjoyment, &c., and the covenants set out in the pleas. The replication next set out the surrender and admittance of Girdlestone, which were in the ordinary form. It then stated that the deed was not entered upon the rolls of the court of the manor, nor brought to the knowledge of the lord of the manor, or of the Commissioners for building New Churches, before the execution of the deed next mentioned, which was a deed executed by Girdlestone after his admittance, and by the lords of the manor, under the Church Building Acts, 58 Geo. 3, 59 Geo. 3. and 3 Geo. 4, and by which the copyhold land was enfranchised, and with the chapel, parsonage-house and school recently erected thereon, conveyed to the Commissioners for the purpose of being devoted to ecclesiastical purposes. The replication then stated that the Commissioners thereupon became seised in fee of the land mentioned in the declaration; that the church was afterwards consecrated, and the plaintiff in due form presented to the benefice and instituted and inducted, and became the lawful incumbent thereof, and was in lawful possession of the land with the house, outbuildings and wall erected thereon. It alleged finally that the sinking of the land in the declaration mentioned was not caused by the weight of the house, outbuildings, wall and buildings, or any of them, but solely by the wrongful acts of the defendant.

Demurrer.—The ground of demurrer stated was, that the covenant in the deed set out in the plea ran with the land thereby demised, and that the plaintiff held the same subject thereto.

The demurrer was argued in the spring of the year 1865, before Pollock, C.B., Martin, B. and Pigott, B. A written judgment was prepared by Martin, B., to which Pigott, B. assented, in the plaintiff's favour, on the ground that the covenants set out in the plea were not such as to run with the land, so as to bind the assignee of Girdlestone, and that it was immaterial that the lands conveyed to him were of copyhold and not freehold tenure. Pollock, C.B., dissented from this judgment, being of opinion that if the land had been freehold, the covenants would have run with the land. The case was directed to be re-argued on the question whether such covenants could run with copyhold tenements.

Gray (Staveley Hill with him) (Nov. 8, 1865), for the defendant, supported the plea.—This plea was originally pleaded generally, but on the argument I felt that it ought to be restricted to the buildings only, and it has been amended accordingly.

[MARTIN, B.—No objection was raised to it on that ground. I thought the plea bad, but that a Court of equity might treat the covenant as a trust, and that the proper amendment would have been to have pleaded it as an equitable plea.]

We could not have pleaded an equitable plea. It is not a case of a trust. My contention is that the covenant acts as a re-grant by Girdlestone to Bickley of a right to get the minerals. The authorities on the point are collected in the note to Spencer's case (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 43, 5th ed.). It is said that Keppel v. Bailey (2 Myl. & K. 517) is an authority against the defendant; but that was a case of a mere covenant. This is, in effect, a re-grant. The case, put simply, is this. A man who has a field conveys part of it to a grantee, who covenants that in the event of the vendor making works on his own portion so as to damage the land sold, he shall not be obliged to make compensation for it. The question is, whether such a privilege can be a subject of grant or not.

[MARTIN, B.—Ackroyd v. Smith (10 Com. B. Rep. 164; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 315) and Keppel v. Bailey (2 Myl. & K. 517) say that such a grant cannot be made.]

Those are decisions only on the particular circumstances then existing. Rowbotham v. Wilson (8 El. & B. 123; s. c. 8 H.L. Cas. 348; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49) was a case in which Inclosure Commissioners, by their award, had allotted the surface of lands to one commoner and the mines to another. The allottee of the surface signed the award, which contained a covenant that persons working the mines should not pay compensation for injury to the surface. After houses had been built on the surface and the minerals had been extracted from the mines for more than twenty years the ground gave way, and it was held that the assignee of the surface-owner could not recover compensation from the assignee of the mine-owner. That was a decision of the House of Lords in a similar case to this, and is in the defendant's favour.

[MARTIN, B.—In that case in the Exchequer Chamber Mr. Baron Watson and Mr. Justice Cresswell differed from the rest of the Court. I founded my opinion on some passages in Sheppard's Touchstone, and thought that the principles applicable to easements and servitudes did not apply.]

This is clearly not a case of a servitude.

Macnamara (Mellish with him), for the plaintiff, supported the demurrer.—The facts in this case take it out of the decision in Rowbotham v. Wilson (8 El. & B. 123; s. c. 8 H.L. Cas. 348; 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 49), where all the parties had notice of the award. The surrender to Girdlestone was absolute in its terms, and no notice of the deed was given to the lord of the manor. A surrender may be conditional, no doubt; but a lord is not bound to receive a surrender clogged with a trust—Watkins on Copyholds, p. 116, Flack v. Downing College (13 Com. B. Rep. 945; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 229). The lord of the manor had an interest in the preservation of the land, and Girdlestone could not bind him by his covenant.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Has the lord of the manor such an interest in the copyhold land as would enable him to bring an action against a person who irremediably injured it or wholly destroyed it?]

Yes; for he is interested in the fines.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Then your argument will be, that no tenant could, by covenant with another person, disclaim the right to compensation for irremediable injury done to the land, so as to bind the lord.]

He could not give another person a right to do that which, if he did it himself, would be a ground of forfeiture. There is another point. The land was enfranchised after the deed and before any injury was sustained. The lord of the manor was a party to the enfranchisement and gave his title to the plaintiffs. It has been decided, in the case of Brabant v. Sir Thomas Wilson

(1 Law Rep. Q.B. 44; s. c. 35 L. J. Q.B. 49), that the effect of enfranchisement is to put an end to all servitudes.—He also referred to Peachey v. the Duke of Somerset (1 Str. 447) and Watkins on Copyholds, pp. 332, 362.

Gray replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 26th of February—

MARTIN, B. said: This case was argued more than a year ago, and an elaborate judgment was prepared, which is now in my hand, and to which my Brothers Channell and Pigott agreed, but from which the Lord Chief Baron dissented. After the second argument the Lord Chief Baron thinks that the fact that the plaintiff's land was copyhold makes a difference; and therefore there is the unanimous judgment of the Court that on the demurrer to this plea the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. As the Lord Chief Baron differs from the prepared judgment, it will not be delivered.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 17, 1866.

PEARCE AND ANOTHER v. BROOKES.

35 L. J. Ex. 134; L. R. 1 Ex. 213; 14 L. T. 288; 14 W. R. 614; 12 Jur. N.S. 342.

See Waugh v. Morris, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. Q.B. 57; L. R. 8 Q.B. 202; 28 L. T. 265; 21 W. R. 438 (Q.B.). Referred to, Scott v. Brown, [1892] E. R. A.; 61 L. J. Q.B. 738; [1892] 2 Q.B. 724; 67 L. T. 782; 41 W. R. 116 (C. A.); Saxby v. Fulton, [1909] E. R. A.; 78 L. J. K.B. 781; [1909] 2 K.B. 208; 101 L. T. 179 (C. A.); Affill v. Wright, [1911] E. R. A.; 80 L. J. K.B. 254; [1911] 1 K.B. 506; 103 L. T. 834 (K.B. D. Div.).

Contract—Illegality—Ex Turpi causa, &c.—Contract in Aid of Prostitution.

CONTRACT.—It is a good defence to an action for the hire of a brougham that the defendant was a prostitute, and that the plaintiffs at the time of hiring knew it, and that the brougham was for the purpose of display; and it is not necessary to prove that the brougham was supplied in the expectation that the defendant would pay for it out of her earnings as a prostitute.

The declaration set out an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to supply the defendant with a new miniature brougham on hire until the whole of the purchase price (135 guineas) was paid (the period not to exceed twelve months), the defendant to have the option to purchase it, and to pay down 50*l.*, and the balance, with 5*l.* per cent. interest thereon, by instalments periodically, so as to complete the purchase within the twelve months; and in case the brougham should be returned on the plaintiffs' hands before a second instalment was paid, a forfeiture of fifteen guineas to be paid in addition to the 50*l.*, and also any damage beyond that occasioned by fair wear. The declaration then averred that the plaintiffs supplied the defendant with a carriage accordingly, and that, before a second instalment was paid and before action, the defendant returned the brougham on the hands of the plaintiffs, damaged otherwise than by fair wear, and the plaintiffs incurred certain expenses in repairing such damage; and all things happened, &c. to entitle them to bring and maintain this action, &c.

There were also common indebitatus counts.

The defendant pleaded inter alia that at the time of making the supposed agreement she was, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, a prostitute; and that the supposed agreement was made for the supply of a brougham to be held by her as such prostitute, and to assist her in carrying on her said immoral vocation, as the plaintiffs when they made the said agreement well knew, and in the expectation by the plaintiffs that the defendant would pay the plaintiffs the money to be paid by the said agreement out of her receipts as such prostitute. Issue thereon.

The action was tried at the London Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865, before Bramwell, B., when the jury found that the plaintiffs at the time of the hiring knew that the defendant was a prostitute, and that the brougham was for the purposes of display.

Montagu Chambers, in Hilary Term, obtained a rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs for the fifteen guineas penalty, on the ground that the third plea was not proved, and that the evidence did not support the finding of the jury.

W. D. Scymour (with whom was Beresford) shewed cause against the rule.—The defendant having proved that she was a prostitute, and that the plaintiffs knew it, there was no necessity to prove the further allegation in the plea that they expected to be paid out of the defendant's professional gains. The only authority in support of the plaintiffs' view on this point is a dictum of Lord Ellenborough at Nisi Prius, in Bowry v. Bennett (1 Campb. 348).

[BRAMWELL, B.—The manner of payment is quite beside the question.]

Crisp v. Churchill (1 Bos. & P. 340; s. c. 1 Campb. 348, n.) and Lloyd v. Johnson (1 Bos. & P. 341; s. c. 1 Campb. 348, n.) shew that a line is to be drawn between articles of necessary attire and articles of luxury, such as this carriage certainly was to a person in the defendant's position. After the finding of the jury that the brougham was for the purpose of display, it must be taken that the plaintiffs were acting in direct furtherance of immorality, and, therefore, the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio applies, and prevents them from recovering.

Montagu Chambers and J. O. Griffiths, in support of the rule.—The allegation in the plea as to the method of payment was necessary, and ought to have been proved by the defendant, according to Bowry v. Bennett (1 Campb. 348) and Girardy v. Richardson (1 Esp. 13), and the plea would have been demurred to if it had not contained this allegation. By finding that the brougham was used for the purposes of display, the jury have waived the real question. In these days, a brougham cannot be said to be a mere luxury, nor can the Court draw any line between necessities and luxuries in a case like this. If the article supplied can be used for any purpose whatever other than an immoral purpose, then the plaintiffs ought to succeed, according to Crisp v. Churchill (1 Bos. & P. 340; s. c. 1 Campb. 348, n.) and Lloyd v. Johnson (1 Bos. & P. 341; s. c. 1 Campb. 348, n.), in which latter case Buller, J. said, that "it is impossible for the Court to take into consideration which of the articles (i.e. expensive dresses, and gentlemen's nightcaps, washed by the plaintiff for the defendant, who was a prostitute,) were used by the defendant for an improper purpose, and which were not."

POLLOCK, C.B.—Since the case of Cannan v. Bryce (3 B. & Ald. 179), cited by Lord Abinger in M'Kinnell v. Robinson (3 Mee. & W. 434), I take the rule to be, that any person who contributes to the performance of an illegal act, with a knowledge that the subject-matter of his contract is intended to be illegally applied, cannot recover upon the contract; and that the old notion that, in order to bar the plaintiff from succeeding, it must be shewn that the price was to be paid out of the fruits of the illegality, has ceased to be part of the law, if it ever was part of the law, and I do not think that we should now make a distinction between that which is illegal and that which is immoral. The rule now is, ex turpi causa non oritur actio, whether the turpitude consist in immorality or illegality. If, therefore, this carriage was furnished for the purpose of enabling the defendant to make that display which was favourable to her immoral views, it appears to me that no cause of action can arise out of the contract. For certain purposes in criminal law, certain matters must be proved distinctly and absolutely; but I do not think that is at all necessary for the purpose of the administration of civil justice. If enough be given in evidence to satisfy a jury of the nature of the defendant's profession, and that the plaintiffs knew it, and were aware that the article supplied was to facilitate her success in her profession, I think that is quite sufficient, and I agree with my Brother Bramwell that the verdict of the jury expressed all that was necessary for the purposes of this defence.

MARTIN, B.—This plea really contains three averments; but in my judgment it is a good plea without the last averment, and there was therefore no necessity to prove that averment. When it was proved that the defendant was, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, a prostitute, and that the brougham was hired for the purpose of display (which is a very intelligible word), i. e. to aid and assist her in acting successfully as a prostitute—then the substance of the plea was proved. If it be a portion of a contract between lender and borrower that the money is to be applied to an illegal purpose, that is one thing; but if the money be simply lent to the borrower, the borrower having the intention of so applying it, and the lender merely knowing that he may so apply it, that is another matter; and I have a very strong impression Cannan v. Bryce (3 B. & Ald. 179) has been commented upon and dealt with upon that principle.¹ But upon the simple ground on which the plea in this case was founded, I think this rule should be discharged.

PIGOTT, B.—The principle of law is contained in the legal maxim, and there is no doubt that where persons engage to be parties to immoral contracts, they must not come to Courts of justice and seek to enforce them. The only question here is, whether the plea is proved. The jury are entitled to call in aid their knowledge of the usages of society; and if this woman was a prostitute, and was known to be such, and wanted an ornamental brougham, there is very little doubt that she wanted it for the purpose of plying her illicit trade. That was so found in effect by the jury, and I think there was sufficient evidence to support that finding. Then as to the other question, whether it was necessary that the plaintiffs should look to the profits of the business carried on by means of this brougham in order to constitute a turpis causa, I have no doubt whatever that the plaintiffs knew very well that the defendant's only means of paying would arise out of her trade; and Lord Ellenborough (as it seems to me) only makes use of the expression in Bowry v. Bennett (1 Campb. 348) as to "expecting to be paid from the profits" as an illustration of what amounts to appearing to do something in furtherance of the prostitution.

BRAMWELL, B.—There is no doubt this woman was a prostitute, and that the plaintiffs knew it. At any rate the jury found that they did. Then the only other fact in dispute was, for what purpose did she hire the brougham, and for what purpose did they let the brougham? As to the purpose with which she hired it, there was no other means of knowing, excepting that the jury might, as they did, apply their knowledge of the affairs of life to this unlawful transaction. For that reason, it seems to me, they might infer that this woman was hiring the brougham for the purpose for which they said she did hire it, and of which the jury shewed their intelligent appreciation by using the expression "for display." I take it, therefore, that she was a prostitute; that the plaintiffs knew it; and that she hired this brougham for the purpose of display, that is to say, for the purpose of pursuing and following her calling. The difficulty I had was this,—although she hired it for that purpose, can it be truly said the plaintiffs let it for that purpose? I should continue to feel this difficulty, as a matter of reasoning, were it not for Cannan v. Bryce (3 B. & Ald.

(1) See Hodgson v. Temple, 5 Taunt. 181; Gas Light and Coke Company v. Turner, 5 Bing. N.C. 666, per Tindal, C.J., affirmed in error, 6 Bing. N.C. 324; Feret v. Hill, 15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 207; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 185; and per Lord Lyndhurst, C., in Quarrier v. Colston, 1 Phill. 151.

179) and M'Kinnell v. Robinson (3 Mee. & W. 434), where the Court decided that it is not necessary that it should be part of the bargain that the subject-matter of the supposed unlawful contract should be unlawfully used, but that it is enough that it was handed over to the borrower or hirer, and that he should apply it or have the purpose or intent of applying it to an illegal use. It seems to me then that we are precluded by authority in this case; and it being made out that the defendant was a public prostitute, that the plaintiff knew it, and that she hired the brougham for the purpose of her prostitution, these cases seem to shew that the defendant had a good defence to the action. As to the allegation in the plea, which I said at the trial need not be proved, namely, that the plaintiffs expected to be paid out of the receipts of prostitution, it must not be supposed we are overruling anything decided by Lord Ellenborough. It is manifest to me that Lord Ellenborough could not have meant to lay down that the thing could not be illegal, unless there was a stipulation that the payment was to be out of the proceeds of the illegal matter, because, if so, he would have said in Bowry v. Bennett, that the bargain was that the money was to be paid out of the proceeds. If a man and woman had both been engaged in hiring this carriage, and the man had hired the brougham for the woman, then although she put it to the same purpose, yet, inasmuch as he was to pay from his own funds, the transaction would be perfectly lawful according to the plaintiff's argument. But how can it be that, if the same thing be done with the same purpose, it should be lawful when done by the man and not lawful when done by the woman? It seems to me that this allegation was not a necessary part of the plea, and that it was, therefore, not necessary to prove it.

POLLOCK, C.B.—As to Cannan v. Bryce (3 B. & Ald. 179), if money be lent with a doubt as to whether it is to be applied to an illegal purpose or not, the question must be left to the jury. If it be borrowed generally, but afterwards applied to an illegal purpose by the borrower, the case of Cannan v. Bryce (3 B. & Ald. 179) would not apply. That case rests on this, that the money was borrowed for the especial purpose of satisfying an illegal design.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 17, 1866.

BOLINGBROKE AND WIFE, administratrix, &c., v. KERR.

35 L. J. Ex. 137; L. R. 1 Ex. 222; 14 L. T. 365; 14 W. R. 657.

Distinguished, Moseley v. Rendell, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. Q.B. 111; L. R. 6 Q.B. 338; 23 L. T. 774; 19 W. R. 619 (Q.B.). Reviewed and explained, Abbot v. Parfitt, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. Q.B. 115; 24 L. T. 469; 19 W. R. 718 (Q.B.).

Practice—Misjoinder of Plaintiffs—Administrator—Assets.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—B. and his wife, who was administratrix of her father, carried on the father's business together for the benefit of his estate; and two years after the intestate's death goods were supplied to the defendant, which were made of materials purchased with money received by the wife from the estate:—Held, that the debt due from the defendant was not "assets," and that the wife could not sue in her representative character to recover the price of the goods.

This action was brought by Edward Bolingbroke and Harriet Ann, his wife, the said Harriet Ann being administratrix of James Augustus Heavens, deceased; and the declaration was for goods sold and delivered and work done, &c., "by the said Harriet Ann, as such administratrix as aforesaid."

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at the Middlesex Sittings in Hilary Term, 1866, it appeared that the plaintiff Harriet Ann married the plaintiff Edward Bolingbroke in 1860, shortly after the death of her father, the intestate; and that she and her husband carried on the father's business together for the benefit of the deceased's estate, and that the goods, &c., which were the subject-matter of the action, had been made from materials purchased with money which the wife had received from the estate, and were supplied to the defendant in September, 1862.

Bramwell, B. thereupon ruled that the wife was improperly joined as a plaintiff, and directed a nonsuit, reserving leave to the plaintiffs to move to set it aside, and enter a verdict for 73*l.*, the Court to make such amendments as the Judge had power to make at Nisi Prius.

Holl having obtained a rule accordingly,

E. C. Willoughby now shewed cause.—The goods were not sold by the wife in her capacity as administratrix, but merely as agent for her husband. They never were the goods and chattels of the intestate "whilst living and at the time of his death" within the meaning of the ordinary grant of letters of administration.¹ The contract here arose two years after the intestate's death, and was therefore entirely personal to the administratrix. The case differs from Werner v. Humphreys (2 Man. & G. 853; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 214; 1 Williams on Executors, 788), where the work had been partly done in the intestate's lifetime. The rule deduced from that case and Edwards v. Grace (2 Mee. & W. 190; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 68; 1 Williams on Executors, 787) is, that the executor can only sue in his representative character when the money recovered would be assets. Gibbett v. Read (9 Mod. 459; s. c. 2 Williams on Executors, 1498) may seem at first sight in favour of the plaintiffs, but it does not really touch the point; for the goods supplied to the defendant Kerr never were the intestate's goods, and could not be assets.

[He also contended that this was not a case for amendment, under the 35th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, citing Bradworth v. Foshaw (10 W. Rep. 760; and Day's Common Law Procedure Acts, p. 165) and Garrard v. Giubilei (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 181, 270).]

Holl, in support of the rule.—According to Gibbett v. Read (9 Mod. 459; s. c. 2 Williams on Executors, 1498) and other cases in Williams on Executors (Vol. 2, pp. 1496, et seqq.), the money recovered here would be "assets"; and therefore the wife may maintain the action in her representative capacity—Cowell v. Watts (6 East, 405).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The money might be "assets" in equity, without giving the administratrix the legal right to sue.]

Holl also contended that an amendment could be made under the 222nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

The COURT, however, intimated very clearly that in their opinion the wife ought not to have been joined as plaintiff, and that the nonsuit was right; and the plaintiff thereupon, at the suggestion of the COURT, accepted an offer made by the defendant, and the case ended in a Stet processus.

(1) For this form, see 1 Williams on Executors, 5th edit. 392.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 21, 1866.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. UPTON AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Ex. 138; L. R. 1 Ex. 224; 14 L. T. 334; 14 W. R. 732; 12 Jur. N.S. 489.

Distinguished, Attorney-General v. Charlton, [1877] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. Ex. 750; L. R. 2 Ex. D. 398; 37 L. T. 211; 26 W. R. 154 (C. A.): affirmed, [1880] E. R. A.; 49 L. J. Ex. 86; L. R. 4 App. Cas. 440; 40 L. T. 760; 27 W. R. 921 (H.L.). Referred to, Grenfell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1876] E. R. A.; 45 L. J. Ex. 465; L. R. 1 Ex. D. 242; 34 L. T. 426; 24 W. R. 582 (Ex. D.). Not applied, Attorney-General v. Mitchell, [1881] E. R. A.; 50 L. J. Q.B. 406; L. R. 6 Q.B. D. 548; 44 L. T. 580; 29 W. R. 683 (Q.B. D.).

Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 4, 10.—General Power of Appointment—"Succession"—"Predecessor."

DEATH DUTIES.—H, by will dated in 1851, left certain real estate to his wife C, for life, giving her a general power of appointment. He died in 1856. C exercised her power of appointment in 1858, in favour of E, the wife of the testator's nephew:—Held (dubitante Martin, B.), that E's interest in the annuity was a "succession" within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and that she took from C as "predecessor," and was therefore liable to pay a duty of 10l. per cent.

In re Barker (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404) commented upon.

Rear-Admiral Henry Fanshawe, by his will, dated the 14th of April, 1851, limited certain real estate to the use of his wife, Caroline Fanshawe, for life, with remainder to such uses as she should appoint; and in default of appointment, to certain uses for the benefit of his nephews, Charles Simon Faithful Fanshawe and John Faithful Fanshawe, and their respective issue male.

Rear-Admiral Fanshawe died on the 9th of August, 1856, after the time appointed for the commencement of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, without having revoked or altered the before-stated disposition of his real property; and upon his death, his widow by reason of such disposition became beneficially entitled in possession to the said real property during her life, and afterwards, in exercise of her power of appointment, by a certain deed-poll, dated the 3rd of August, 1858, she limited the lands to the use and intent that the defendants, and the survivors and survivor of them, &c. should, during the lives of Elizabeth Fanshawe, the wife of the said John Faithful Fanshawe, and their children, and the life of the longest liver of them, receive yearly an annuity of 200l. free from deduction, to be charged upon the same lands, upon trust to pay the same to the said Elizabeth Fanshawe during her life for her separate use.

Caroline Fanshawe, the admiral's widow, died in 1863, leaving the said Elizabeth Fanshawe surviving her; and the defendants on her behalf became entitled to the receipt of the annuity of 200l.

The Crown claimed duty in respect of the annuity, on the ground that the interest of Elizabeth Fanshawe in the annuity was a "succession" within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act, 1853; and, further, that the proper duty was 10l. per cent., inasmuch as the interest was derived from Caroline Fanshawe (the widow and appointor) as "predecessor," a stranger in blood to both Elizabeth Fanshawe and her husband.¹

(1) The 2nd section of the Succession Duty Act is as follows: "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death

The defendants resisted, on the ground that the interest of Elizabeth Fanshawe in the annuity was not a "succession" within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act, 1853; and, further that if it were, her interest was not derived from Caroline Fanshawe, but from the testator Rear-Admiral Fanshawe, and that therefore the proper rate of duty was 3l. per cent. only.

The Attorney General and The Solicitor General (Locke and Pemberton with them), for the Crown.—Caroline Fanshawe the widow and the donee of the power would have been liable to succession duty, but that she stood in the relation of wife to the testator; and by exercising her power of appointment she created a new succession, by virtue of which she must be regarded as the "predecessor" of Elizabeth Fanshawe. Had the widow given the property de suo, Elizabeth would have had to pay 10l. per cent., being a stranger in blood to the widow; and the same duty must be paid here, notwithstanding that the annuity is given in exercise of a power. To prevent technicality, the legislature says that, though there be apparently only one operation, there are in fact two operations constituting the succession. And this is clearer still from the analogy to the Legacy Duty Acts, which form the foundation of the Succession Duty Act and are in pari materia with it. Under the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. ss. 7, 18, legacy duty is payable both by the donee of the power and by the appointee—Drake v. the Attorney General (10 Cl. & F. 257); and the 4th section of the Succession Duty Act¹ has an effect corresponding to that of the 18th section of the Legacy Duty Act—The Attorney General v. Gardner (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 84) and In re Wallop's Trusts (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 351).

[MARTIN, B. referred to the 33rd section.²]

That section would have applied if the testator and Caroline Fanshawe had not been husband and wife. This case is not like Lovelace's case (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 489), *The Attorney General v. Lord Braybrooke*³ and Barker's case (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404), which were not within the 4th section at all, and have therefore nothing to do with this. In Barker's case (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404) there was a power subsisting in 1850, three years before the passing of the act, and the 2nd section¹ applied; whereas this is the case of a person having a power of appointment taking effect after the passing of the Succession Duty Act, and therefore clearly within the 4th section.

Bovill and Hannen, contra.—Caroline Fanshawe had no "property" in anything but the life estate which her husband gave her, and the exercise of the power by her was not a "disposition" within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act. It could not be the intention of the legislature that two duties should be payable in respect of one interest. The Legacy Duty Acts have nothing to do with the case, their language being entirely different from that of of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a 'succession'; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived."

The 4th section is: "Where any person shall have a general power of appointment, under any disposition of property taking effect upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act, over property, he shall, in the event of his making any appointment thereunder, be deemed to be entitled, at the time of his exercising such power, to the property or interest thereby appointed as a succession derived from the donor of the power; and where any person shall have a limited power of appointment, under a disposition taking effect, upon any such death, over property, any person taking any property by the exercise of such power shall be deemed to take the same as a succession derived from the person creating the power as predecessor."

(2) This section enacts, that "where the donee of a general power of appointment shall become chargeable with duty in respect of the property appointed by him under such power, he shall be allowed to deduct from the duty so payable any duty he may have already paid in respect of any limited interest taken by him in such property."

(3) 5 Hurl. & N. 488; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 283: and in error, 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 177.

the Succession Duty Act. The whole scope of the act is not to create a property, but simply to define a "succession" for the purpose of imposing a duty on successions, and the duty here (if any) is not imposed on the person taking under the appointment. The effect of the 4th section is, that in the case of a general power of appointment, the person exercising the power is to pay the duty; whereas when the power is limited, the appointee pays; and in both cases the succession is to be deemed a succession from the creator of the power—The Attorney General v. Lord Braybrooke.³ And in Lovelace's case (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 489) Lord Justice Turner says, that "the express provision of the 4th section, that the donee of a power should be a successor, would in the cases in which it applied override the provision in the 2nd section, placing the appointee in that position." Again, if any duty at all be payable by Elizabeth Fanshawe, then the Court is bound by the ratio decidendi in Barker's case (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404), which shews that the rate must be 3l. per cent. The act is constructed on the hypothesis that there may be several successions, and the 4th section is merely intended to hit the case where a donee might have escaped duty but for that section. It says that the donee takes a succession—from whom he takes it is not the question. The first part of the 4th section deals with the succession acquired by the donee of a general power when he exercises that power. The second branch deals with the succession of the appointee of a limited power; but the case of an appointee under a general power acquiring a succession by the exercise of that power—even if that be the case of Elizabeth Fanshawe—is not at all touched by the 4th section, but is left to the operation of the 2nd, and therefore according to the ordinary fundamental rule of construction, the appointee takes as through the limitation in her favour created by the exercise of the power had been introduced into the instrument conferring the power.

The Attorney General, in reply, was stopped by the Court.

[The following cases were also mentioned during the argument—In re Capdevielle (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 306), The Attorney General v. Brackenbury (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 108), The Attorney General v. the Earl of Sefton (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 230), The Attorney General v. Floyer (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404) and The Attorney General v. Partington (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 281).]

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that in this case the Crown is entitled to duty at the rate of 10l. per cent. I think that In re Barker has nothing to do with the present case. In that case the power was created before the act came into operation, and therefore the 4th section had no effect, and we had nothing to do with it at all; whereas on the present occasion we have.

The act of parliament appears to me to have been remarkably well drawn. I think very few public acts are entitled to so much commendation, in shewing a perfect acquaintance with the subject-matter dealt with, and with the means of producing the results which were obviously in the intention of those who framed the law. The real property law of this country is perfectly well known to be extremely artificial, creating an apparent difference, and professing to create a great difference, where in substance and in reality there is none,—making a difference between an estate left to a man and his heirs, and an estate left to a man for his life, with power by deed to dispose of the reversion, which he might therefore instantly dispose of by himself, giving himself the entire fee simple. The law makes a distinction between the one and the other properly enough, because in the one the man is required to do a certain act before he can take anything but the life estate.

Here the testator left to his widow an estate for life, with power by deed to dispose of the remainder. A person to whom an estate is so left may, no doubt, say, "I want nothing more than the estate for life, and I shall not encumber myself with anything else." A person in that case will be liable to one kind of succession duty, payable on the estate for life. But if the person having the power by deed to dispose of the remainder choose to do so, the act then says, " You shall be considered, eo instanti, as having taken an estate in fee simple, for you have exercised your power in favour of yourself, you have done an act shewing that you meant to take the benefit of being owner in fee simple, and you shall be considered as having taken it as if it had so been given to you; and you shall pay a certain duty accordingly."

It appears to me that, therefore, Caroline Fanshawe became exactly in the same position as if the whole estate had been left to her; for the moment she exercised the right to dispose of the estate, she took it as if she had taken the whole from her husband.

If the case had not fallen within the 4th section, very likely 3l. per cent is all that would have been claimed; but it is within the 4th section, and the consequence is that the wife of the testator in reality and in substance took the whole property; and it is she who gives it, and not the creator of the power; and therefore the appointee takes under Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe, who was no blood-relation to her, and the rate of duty is 10l. per cent.

MARTIN, B.—I am not quite clear that the defendants' contention is not right. But I have not so clear an opinion as to induce me to differ from the rest of the Court.

It seems to me that this question depends upon the definition of the term " succession " in the 1st section of the act of parliament, upon the 2nd section, upon the 4th section, and upon the 33rd section; and that one must examine all these sections for the purpose of ascertaining what the real meaning of this statute is. The difficulty arises from the 33rd section, which points to this, that the donee of a general power of appointment shall, in some instances, be liable to pay some duty in addition to what he has already paid. The 1st section enacts that " the term ' succession ' shall denote any property chargeable with duty under this act." The 2nd is a general enactment. And I apprehend that, if it had stood alone, the person taking under a power would by reason of the 2nd section, be liable to duty as taking from the settlor, and that, too, according to the rule of law, that a person taking under a power takes as if his name were inserted in the instrument creating the power. The 3rd section may be set entirely aside; and the 4th section may be read as if it came in immediately after the 2nd, and as if the two were in pari materia.

Now, it is clear that a distinction is to be drawn between a general power and a limited power, for that is an object of the 4th section, as it points out. The first part of the 4th section relates to the general power; and it seems to me, giving that a reasonable construction, that the statute has created a constructive property in the donee of the power equal to that which he gives to the person in whose favour he executes the power. In this instance the donee gives to Mrs. Elizabeth Fanshawe and her children an annuity of 200l., and it seems to me that, reading that with the definition of ' succession,' Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe must be deemed to have had at the moment of her death the property or interest (as property chargeable with duty under this act) from her husband as donor of the power; and that the construction which has been put upon it, that she is to be deemed the owner of the property, and to be disposing of it as a property obtained by her, and creating a new succession in the person in whose favour she exercises it, is not unreasonable. At the same time, the contention of the defendants that a construction might be given to it confining the matter to the donee of the power itself, and leaving any further interest created by her to be dealt with as if it fell under the 2nd section alone, is entitled to great consideration. With respect to Barker's case,³ the Attorney General there said that he was content with the 3l. per cent., and judgment was given as if that was clearly the right construction of the act of parliament. If there was anything wrong there, there is no reason why we should not say it was wrong, for there is nothing in it conclusive or binding upon us, so as to induce us to act upon the case. I have stated what appears to me to be a difficulty in the construction of the act of parliament, although it does not operate so strongly upon my mind as to induce me to differ from my learned Brothers.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that the Crown is entitled to judgment. I confess I do not understand the distinction that the then learned Attorney General made in In re Barker (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404). The ground upon which I proceed, independently of any opinion I may have expressed in that case (though I believe my present opinion is very much in conformity with it), is this, that the Crown is entitled, under the 2nd section; and that the 4th section does not give the Crown its title, but confirms that which it takes under the 2nd section. But if I am wrong in that opinion, then I say the 4th section must give the Crown a title.

It is conceded that if the estate had been devised to Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe, and she had then, out of her own estate, devised this annuity, the Crown would have been entitled to the duty of 10*l.* per cent. But it is said that, because another form of proceeding is used, (although in substance the same,) the Crown is not entitled to 10*l.* per cent.; the difference arising, not out of any matter of substance, but out of a mere matter of words. Now Lord Campbell, in Lord Braybrooke's case,³ reminded the House of Lords that "this statute, which by the same enactments imposes a tax on successions in every part of the United Kingdom, is to be construed not according to the technicalities of the law of real property in England or in Scotland, but according to the popular use of the language employed"; and Lord Kingsdown said in the same case, that "it was always more satisfactory to deal with the case on the substance and real effect of the transaction." Bearing those general considerations in mind, let us look at the 2nd section of the act. I know perfectly well that, as a matter of legal expression an appointee takes under the creator of the power, and not under the donee of the power. If there were any necessity for applying that technical rule to the interpretation of the 2nd section of the act, we must so apply it. But no technical words are used. Does any one mean to say that the legatees in this case will take their annuity "by reason of the disposition" which Admiral Fanshawe made of this property? I say, certainly not, in point of law. The "disposition" whereby the legatees take is the disposition which Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe made of the property. Then the word "succession" is not a word of art, nor a technical term, but a new word introduced into the law for the first time in this case. Again "the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor or other person"—not using again a term of art of any sort or kind—"from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived." From whom is the interest of these annuitants derived? Can it be said that it is derived from the Admiral, and not from Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe? These are ordinary English words, and ought to be construed by lawyers as ordinary Englishmen and not as lawyers would construe them. There is not one man in a hundred thousand who would not say that, in this case, the property was derived from Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe, and not from the Admiral. Let it be understood, as far as my opinion is of any importance, that I do not deny, or cast any doubt upon the rule of law, that where there is an appointment, the appointee comes in under the donor of the power, and not under the donee; but I say that that rule is not applicable here. I think this view of the case is corroborated by the 4th section, and not that the 4th section is in itself an intrinsic ground of reliance for the Crown in this case.

But supposing I am wrong, and that under the 2nd section alone the Crown would not have been entitled, then I think that inevitably, from the effect of the 4th section, the Crown must be entitled, because, although I fully appreciate the argument for the defendants that the object of the 4th section, together with other sections, was simply to shew what were "successions" and who were "predecessors," and what duty should be paid,—yet, when I find it here stated that the person exercising the general power of appointment "shall be deemed to be entitled at the time of his exercising such power to the property or interest thereby appointed, as a succession derived from the donor of the power," it seems to me to follow that from that time he must create a new succession. Having got the property or interest as a succession derived from the donor of the power, it seems to me to follow that after that time he would be the new person from whom the succession is derived. It may be put in this way: devise by A. B. with power of appointment to C. D.; C. D. appoints to himself for life, and to E. F. in remainder in fee. In that case, at the time of his exercising such power, C. D. is to be deemed entitled to the property or interest as a succession derived from the donor of the power by virtue of which he operates. It must be so, as it seems to me. He is operating on all the interest he possessed, or rather all the interest which he operates upon is an interest taken to be derived by him from the donor of the power. But a portion of that interest is the estate in fee in remainder; and it cannot be said to come to E. F. from the original creator of the power.

With respect to the distinction that was made in Barker's case (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404) that the 4th section would make the granting of a general power of appointment when the power came into effect, take effect after the passing of the act, I cannot think that can have been the intention of the 4th section, and for these reasons: I cannot at all see why a different duty should be paid, or a different provision should be made with respect to those powers which come into effect after the passing of the act and those which came into effect before. If the legatees there were to take under the original power and pay a small or large sum, I see no reason why the statute should have contemplated such a case as that, and made a difference—either for or against them—between that case and this. Another difficulty I see in the way of it is this,—that the last part of the 4th section is, that "where any person shall have a limited power of appointment under a disposition taking effect upon any such death"; now it is perfectly manifest that that does not mean the power taking effect upon the death; and if it does not mean that in the latter part of the section, no more does it, to my mind, in the former part of the section. It seems to me, therefore, that the distinction under which the then Attorney General gave up the point in In re Barker (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 404), although it may have been a very prudent distinction for him to take, is in reality an unfounded one; and I am compelled to say that, in my opinion, the Crown is in this case entitled under the 2nd section. But if I am wrong in that, then I think the Crown is entitled under the 4th section.

FIGOTT, B.—I am also of opinion that the Crown is entitled to 10l. per cent.; and I come to that conclusion from the construction which I put upon the two sections, the 2nd and the 4th, taken together, and being read as part of the same act. If it stood on the 2nd section alone, I should be of opinion that the Crown was only entitled to 3l. per cent., because it would appear to me then that Elizabeth Fanshawe would take by the operation of law from the Admiral, he being the person who created the power. It is not necessary to discuss that, because in my judgment the 4th section clearly gives the person who exercised this power the interest in the estate. That seems to me to have been the effect of the section, when Mrs. Caroline Fanshawe exercised her power of appointment. She was a person entitled, under the Admiral's will, to a general power of appointment; and the 4th section says that, "in the event of such person making an appointment thereunder, that person shall be deemed to be entitled at the time of exercising that power, to the property of interest thereby appointed." I take that to mean, "deemed to be entitled for all purposes." It is true the act goes on to say, "as a succession derived from the donor of the power." I apprehend that those words are added for the purpose of shewing that she shall be liable to pay duty as upon a succession from the donor of the power; but it still leaves the property vested in her, for all purposes; and being vested in her, she by the same act, it is true—though I do not see that that makes any difference—namely, by the same power of appointment, gives the estate, or a portion of it, to Elizabeth Fanshawe. Then, from whom does the latter take it? I cannot see how it can be consistent to say that she takes it from the Admiral. She takes it, as it seems to me, from the Admiral's widow, under that appointment, and the word "predecessor," as defined in the 2nd section, may be properly so construed. Who but Caroline Fanshawe is "the person from whom," in this instance, "the interest of the successor" is derived? Those words ought to have had something appended to them, if they were to be construed otherwise; because, although according to the 2nd section alone, the predecessor would be the Admiral, yet, with what follows in the 4th section, Caroline's predecessor is the widow, who took her succession from the Admiral; and in the 2nd section there is no exception as to anything that follows, and that is because, as it seems to me, the 2nd and 4th are to be read together.

In fact, the widow took the estate when she exercised the power of appointment, and having taken the estate herself, then by appointing in favour of Elizabeth, she gave the latter the succession.

Judgment for the Crown.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 23, 1866.

BLUMBERG AND OTHERS v. ROSE AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. Ex. 144; 4 H. & C. 311; L. R. 1 Ex. 232; 14 L. T. 365; 14 W. R. 657;
12 Jur. N.S. 378.

Debtor and Creditor—Composition Deed—Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

BANKRUPTCY.—A composition deed was expressed to be made between the debtors of the first part, a trustee of the second part, and the persons whose names were in the schedule thereto, thereafter called the creditors, of the third part. The deed recited a proposal to pay the creditors a composition by giving them promissory notes, "which the creditors had agreed to take in full satisfaction and discharge of their debts;" and recited also that the composition to be secured by the notes was payable to the non-assenting and non-executing creditors, and "such promissory notes had been deposited with the trustee to be held in trust for such last-mentioned creditors":—Held, that there was in this deed no inequality other than that which is necessarily incident to a deed where assenting creditors can bind non-assenting creditors; and that the deed was not bad by reason of its containing no provision compelling the trustee to tender the notes to the non-assenting creditors.

Declaration on a bill of exchange.

Plea, setting out a composition deed, executed in conformity with the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and averring performance of all the necessary statutable conditions, &c.

Demurrer and joinder.

The deed was in the following terms: "This indenture, made the 30th day of August, 1865, between the debtors (the defendants) of the first part, a trustee of the second part, and the several persons whose names or firms are set forth in the schedule hereto, hereinafter styled creditors, of the third part. Whereas the said debtors, being unable to meet their engagements with their creditors, have proposed to pay them a composition of 12s. 6d. in the pound, by giving them respectively three joint and several promissory notes, payable at six, nine and twelve months from the date hereof, signed by the debtors respectively, which said several promissory notes the said creditors have agreed to take in full satisfaction and discharge of their respective debts; and whereas the said composition to be secured by the said promissory notes is payable to creditors who have not executed or assented to these presents, and such promissory notes have been deposited with the said trustee, to be held by him in trust to deliver the same respectively to such last-mentioned creditors respectively on demand, as the said trustee doth hereby acknowledge: Now this indenture witnesseth, that, in consideration of the premises, each of the said creditors of the said debtors who shall have executed or otherwise assented to, or who shall be bound by these presents, for himself and his partners, and his and their respective heirs, &c., and so far only as may be done without prejudice to any security or suretiship, or any rights or remedies against any person other than the said debtors, and each of them, their and each of their heirs, &c., hereby release and discharge the said debtors, and each of them, their and each of their estate and effects, from all and every debts and debt and sums and sum of money due and owing by the said debtors to such creditors respectively, either alone or jointly with any partner or partners as aforesaid, of and from all judgments, executions, actions, suits, claims and demands whatsoever on account thereof; provided always that nothing herein contained shall discharge or prejudice any lien or security, or any suretiship held by any of the said creditors, and that the creditors who shall have executed or otherwise acceded to, or who shall be bound by, these presents, shall retain all their rights and remedies against any person other than the said debtors as if these presents had never been executed. And it is hereby declared that these presents are intended to operate as a composition deed, or deed of arrangement, executed by a debtor within the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861; and that all questions relating to the same, or any of the premises, shall be decided and determined according to the provisions of that act, with respect to composition deeds executed by a debtor in conformity with that section; and that these presents shall enure for the benefit of, and be effectual against, and binding in all respects upon all now-existing creditors of the said debtors; and that if there is anything herein not authorized by the said provisions of the said act to be introduced into a composition deed executed by a debtor in conformity with the said section, such unauthorized thing shall be considered as expunged as if it had never been inserted therein."

Holl, in support of the demurrer.—There is that inequality here between the scheduled and the non-scheduled creditors which makes the deed bad as against the latter. The scheduled creditors are parties to the deed, and had their promissory notes actually in hand at the time of the execution of the deed; whereas the non-scheduled are not parties to the deed, and only have their notes deposited in the hands of a trustee, who is under no obligation whatever to tender them the notes; and they may not even know that any deposit of the notes has been made for their benefit. A provision, making it obligatory on the trustee to tender to the non-scheduled creditors their notes, might easily have been inserted in the deed; and debtors are bound to take all reasonable means for the protection of all their creditors.

[BRAMWELL, B.—Does the rule as to the inequality apply where the debtor does the best he can for all?—Scott v. Berry (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 193—per Bramwell, B. 197).]

Though the non-assenting creditors are not bound to execute the deed, the debtors are bound to make its provisions as fair to them as they can. It is consistent with this plea that the non-assenting creditors never heard of the deed, or knew there was a trustee.

Joyce appeared for the defendants, but was not called upon to support the plea.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am very clearly of opinion that the inequality complained of here is not that kind of inequality which the statute contemplates. It is not possible, where there are two sets of creditors so essentially different, the one in the condition of having actually assented, and the other of not having assented, and perhaps in entire ignorance of the deed, but that there should be a certain degree of inequality. The inequality insisted on in respect of this deed, which is in principle perfectly equal, affords no objection whatever. The deed is perfectly good, and is an answer to the action.

MARTIN, B.—This inequality is necessarily incident to a case where a person not executing is to be bound by persons executing; it is not possible to avoid it; and there is not a word in the act of parliament requiring that to be done which the plaintiffs wish to insist upon.

BRAMWELL, B.—That is my difficulty. It may be that the non-assenting creditor may have never had an opportunity of assenting or dissenting, because he never heard of the deed; and, no doubt, that constitutes an inequality in one sense; but it is not the sort of inequality which the statute has contemplated; for there is not one word in the statute as to all the creditors having notice of the deed. If a man gets the assent of the requisite proportion of his creditors, he need say nothing to anybody else about it. On the part of the plaintiffs, it is said that he ought to give notice to every one; but if we were to hold that the deed is bad because notice was not given, we should be indirectly compelling a man to do, in certain cases, that which the statute has not obliged him to do. Therefore we must hold that this deed is a good one, and not unequal.

PIGOTT, B.—I also think that this is a good deed under the 192nd section of the act, and that the inequality suggested is only that kind of inequality which is inherent to deeds of this nature.

Judgment for the defendants.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 25, 1866.

MANNING v. TAYLOR AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Ex. 145; L. R. 1 Ex. 235; 14 W. R. 771.

Will—Construction—Devise of undivided Fourth Part.

WILL.—A testator, being seised in fee of two undivided fourth parts of land under lease to different persons, devised one of them by the following words, "I give unto Joseph Manning all my undivided quarter of three fields in the parish of Plympton Maurice, and are at lease to Miss Elizabeth Palmer on three lives; conventional rent, 13s. 4d.; heriot, 10s. on each life dying; known and commonly called Castle Hayes; to be received by the said Joseph Manning or his father for him":—Held, that Joseph Manning took an estate in fee, and not an estate for life merely.

Doe d. Atkinson v. Fawcett (3 Com. B. Rep. 274; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 244) followed.

Ejectment to recover possession of an undivided fourth part of lands called Castle Hayes, in the county of Devon. By consent and by an order of Bramwell, B., the facts were stated in a special case.

Previously to the year 1799 the lands called Castle Hayes were held in undivided fourth parts, and in that year John Hellyer purchased the fee simple of two of the said undivided fourth parts, subject to certain leases for lives then subsisting, but since determined.

His will, dated the 23rd of April, 1801, contained the following clause: "I give unto Joseph Manning, son of my daughter Elizabeth Manning, all my undivided quarter of three fields in the parish of Plympton Maurice, and are at lease to Miss Elizabeth Palmer on three lives; conventional rent, 13s. 4d.; heriot, 10s. on each life dying; known and commonly called Castle Hayes; to be received by the said Joseph Manning or his father for him."

The contention of the plaintiff was, that this clause gave an estate in fee simple to Joseph Manning; that of the defendants was, that it gave a life interest only.

In a previous portion of the will the testator had given the other undivided quarter of Castle Hayes, describing it as "now rented by Mr. Benjamin Trickey at 20l. 16s. 8d. per year," to his daughter for life, and after her death to Joseph Lane, her son, without any words of limitation. With respect to some other tenements, the testator, after disposing of the rent bequeathed the fee expressly, and it was argued from this that he mentioned the fee whenever he intended it to be devised; but the Court held, that the context of the will did not throw any light on the meaning of the clause in dispute, and therefore the words of the other clauses of the will are not set out in this report.

John Lane and Richard Manning, the father of Joseph Manning, were nominated executors of the will, and were directed to receive the rents of all that the testator had given to their children till they should each attain the age of twenty-one years.

The testator died in 1802. Joseph Manning entered into possession of the premises bequeathed to him, and died in 1846, devising all his real and personal estate to his wife, who died intestate in 1864. Upon the death of Joseph Manning, the heirs-at-law to John Hellyer gave notice to the tenants of the undivided fourth part of Castle Hayes devised to him to pay the rents to them, and the rents were ever after received by them and by the defendants, who had succeeded to their rights. The plaintiff was the son of Joseph Manning, and he issued the writ in this action in November, 1864.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether Joseph Manning took an estate in fee or for life in the premises, the verdict being to be entered for the plaintiff or the defendants accordingly.

Joshua Williams (Anstie with him), for the plaintiff.—Although previously to the Wills Act, 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 26, a devise of real estate to A. B. without words of limitation gave him only an estate for life, yet a devise of an undivided moiety in land, where the testator was seised in fee of such moiety, was held to give an estate in fee because the testator was considered to use the word "moiety" as a description of his estate in the land, and not as a description of the land itself. The rule is thus laid down in 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 264, 3rd edit.: "It was at one time a question whether under a devise by a testator of his 'moiety,' 'part' or 'share,' the devisee would take an estate in fee, but it seems now settled that he will. The force of such words, however, applies solely where the moiety, part or share belongs as such to the testator himself." The cases on which that statement is based are Bebb v. Penoyre (11 East, 160) and Paris v. Miller (5 M. & S. 408), and it was followed by Lord St. Leonards in Montgomery v. Montgomery (3 Jones & Latouche (Irish), 47). An express authority in the plaintiff's favour is Doe d. Atkinson v. Fawcett (3 Com. B. Rep. 274; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 244), where the words, "I give and bequeath to my son Richard Atkinson my moiety of the house which he now lives in," was held to give the moiety in fee.

[MARTIN, B.—It seems an extraordinary rule, that if a man says, "I devise all my three fields to A. B.," it should be construed to give only an estate for life, but that if he says, "I give all my moiety of three fields," it should give an estate in fee. It probably results from a desire on the part of the Courts to seize hold of any pretext to enable them to escape from the rule that a gift of land simply merely gives an estate for life. BRAMWELL, B.—And as to that rule, the act of 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 26. is a legislative admission that the decisions which established it were wrong.]

The distinction is, however, well settled, and it was observed by Vice Chancellor Kindersley in Green v. Marsden (1 Drew. 646).—He also contended that there was nothing in the context of the will from which an intention to give a life estate only could be inferred; but this portion of the argument is omitted.

Mellish (Lopes with him), for the defendants.—If the testator had intended to pass the fee, why did he mention the lease and rent? The rent is to be received by Joseph Manning, or his father for him, which shews that benefit to Joseph Manning during his life was alone contemplated. There is no provision for the receipt of rent after the death of Joseph Manning. The words "undivided quarter" are merely used to describe the subject-matter of the devise, not the interest to be conveyed, which is subsequently done. In Doe d. Atkinson v. Fawcett (3 Com. B. Rep. 274; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 244) the devise was of the testator's moiety, the testator having nothing else but the moiety; but here he had two undivided fourth parts, and in this devise only disposed of one of them; so that the principle upon which that case was decided, that the testator intended to dispose of the whole of his estate in the subject-matter, cannot apply here.

[PIGOTT, B.—The case states that he had "two undivided fourth parts," not "a moiety."]

But two undivided fourth parts are, in fact, a moiety (3 Com. B. Rep. 274; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 244).—He also referred to Vin. Abr. tit. 'Devise,' L. a, paragraph 11.

MARTIN, B.—I quite agree with what has been said by my Brother Bramwell, that nothing can be more unsatisfactory than having to deal with cases of this sort. In 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 247 (3rd edit.), the fundamental rule is laid down in these words: "Nothing is better settled than that a devise of messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments (not estate), without words of limitation, occurring in a will which is not subject to the newly-enacted rules of testamentary construction, confers on the devisee an estate for life only"; and this is stated to be the rule notwithstanding that, from a variety of circumstances, examples of which are there given, a contrary intention might have been surmised. The author continues: "This rule of construction is entirely technical, as, according to popular notions, the gift of any subject simply comprehends all the interest therein. A conviction that the rule is generally subversive of the actual intention of testators always induced the Courts to lend a willing ear whenever a plausible pretext for a departure from it could be suggested. Hence have arisen the various cases in which indefinite devises have been, by implication, enlarged to a fee simple." Now, in this case I think that there is nothing in the rest of the will throwing light on what the testator intended by these words. He had, when he made his will, a reversion in an undivided fourth part of these lands expectant on the termination of three lives. If he had said, "I give all my reversion in my undivided fourth part," it would have clearly passed the fee. I consider that the case falls exactly within the rule laid down in Doe v. Fawcett (3 Com. B. Rep. 274; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 244), and even without that authority, I think that I should have arrived at the same conclusion.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The testator directs that the rent shall be received by Joseph Manning, or his father for him, because the lands were under lease; and he probably thought that the bequest of the land would not carry with it a bequest of the rent. He, no doubt, wished to make it clear that the devisee was to have both rent and reversion. Besides, the case cited is conclusive.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 1, 1866.

KRAMER v. WAYMARK.

35 L. J. Ex. 148; 4 H. & C. 427; L. R. 1 Ex. 241; 14 L. T. 368; 14 W. R. 659;
12 Jur. N.S. 395.

*Practice—Death of Plaintiff after Verdict and before Judgment signed—Judgment signed by Next Friend—*17 Car. 2. c. 8. s. 1.—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), s. 139.

INFANT. PRACTICE.—The plaintiff, an infant, by his next friend, brought an action to recover damages for injuries which he had sustained from the defendant's negligence. Having obtained a verdict, the plaintiff died within fifteen days after the trial, and before judgment had been signed. The next friend, after the plaintiff's death, gave notice of taxation of costs to the defendant, and signed judgment for the amount of damages and taxed costs:—Held, upon a motion to set aside the judgment, that it was properly signed.

The plaintiff, an infant of the age of seven years, sued by his next friend to recover damages for injuries which he had sustained, on the 4th of July, 1865, from the kick of a horse, which was being led by a servant of the defendant, owing, as was alleged, to the negligence of the servant.

The case was tried, on the 28th of March, 1866, at Kingston, before Erle, C.J., and a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 150*l.* Evidence was given at the trial that the plaintiff had suffered permanent injury, and that he was not out of danger. The plaintiff died from the effects of the injury on the 6th of April, 1866, within fifteen days after the day of trial, and before judgment signed. Judgment was afterwards signed for the amount of damages and taxed costs.

A rule having thereupon been obtained to stay proceedings, upon payment by the defendant of the costs of the trial and costs since incurred in the action, or to set aside the verdict and judgment, or for a new trial, on the ground of the plaintiff's death after trial and before judgment signed,—

J. P. Murphy and Besley shewed cause.—The judgment was properly signed. It is enacted by the 17 Car. 2. c. 8. s. 1, "That in all actions, personal, real or mixed, the death of either party between the verdict and the judgment shall not hereafter be alleged for error so as such judgment be entered within two terms after such verdict." In the case of Ireland v. Champneys (4 Taunt, 884), which was an action for libel, judgment having been allowed to go by default, and the jury upon a writ of inquiry having given 1,500*l.* damages, the plaintiff died and his executors entered up judgment. The Court of Common Pleas set the judgment aside, on the ground that the suit had abated by the death of the plaintiff. But that case was wrongly decided; and in Palmer v. Cohen (2 B. & Ad. 966), which was also an action for libel, and was similar in its circumstances, the Court of Queen's Bench refused to disturb the judgment which had been entered up by the plaintiff's executor. The enactment of the 17 Car. 2. c. 8. is confirmed by section 139. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), which enacts, that "the death of either party between the verdict and the judgment shall not hereafter be alleged for error so as such judgment shall be entered within two terms after such verdict."

Montagu Chambers, Ribton and Beasley supported the rule.—The case is not within the 17 Car. 2. c. 8, nor the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. The plaintiff is dead, and the proper person to proceed would be his executor or administrator; but judgment has been signed here by the next friend, who is nothing more than an attorney to the plaintiff. The authority of an attorney is determined by the death of the party. Bac. Abr. tit. 'Authority,' E, Palmer v. Reiffenstein (1 M. & G. 94). The next friend gave the defendant the notice of taxation, which he had no right to do. The statute 17 Car. 2. c. 8. was not intended to meet the case of a purely personal action like the present. As to the Common Law Procedure Act, in Flinn v. Perkins (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 10) Mr. Justice Crompton held, that section 135. only applies to cases where representatives could have brought the action, and that the old maxim, actio personalis moritur cum persona, was not interfered with by that act, which applies only to procedure. Here, if the plaintiff had died before the commission day no trial could have taken place. Griffith v. Williams (1 Cr. & J. 47) is an authority that a new trial may be granted upon the application of a defendant after the death of the plaintiff.

MARTIN, B.—Judgment was regularly signed in this case under section 139. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which is a repetition of the enactment in 17 Car. 2. c. 8. s. 1. I concur in wondering how the Court of Common Pleas could give the judgment which they did in Ireland v. Champneys (4 Taunt, 884). The case of Palmer v. Cohen (2 B. & Ad. 966) is expressly in point. If the child had died four days later than he did, there would have been no pretence for this application; and, as it is, public interest is against a new trial. The rule will be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—If the defendant is right in his contention, he can raise the question by a writ of error. Section 139. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, seems to apply to all actions whether surviving to the representatives or not; and it is stronger against the defendant than the enactment of the 17 Car. 2. c. 8.

PIGOTT, B. concurred.

*Rule discharged.*¹

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 8, 1866.

In the matter of an arbitration between JOSEPH WHITWORTH AND WILLIAM WILSON HULSE.

35 L. J. Ex. 149; L. R. 1 Ex. 251; 14 L. T. 445; 14 W. R. 736;
12 Jur. N.S. 652.

Arbitration—Necessity for separate Findings on Matters in Difference.

ARBITRATION, REFERENCE AND AWARD.—Where certain specified matters in dispute and all matters in difference are referred to arbitration, the arbitrator is not bound to award separately what sum is to be paid in respect of any specific matter in dispute, unless it clearly appears from the submission that the parties intended that he should so find.

A submission to arbitration, after reciting that disputes had existed between W. and H, and that it had been agreed that W. should purchase H.'s shares in an incorporated company, and that an arbitrator should determine what sum W. should pay to H. upon the balance of accounts between them for the transfer of the shares, and should decide and determine all matters in difference between them, submitted to the arbitrator "the claims of the said H. against the said W. in respect of the said differences and matters aforesaid, and all other matters in dispute between them, and the amount to be paid for the said shares." The arbitrator in his award directed that a lump sum should be paid by W. to H. in respect of all the matters in difference, including the amount to be paid for the purchase of the shares:—Held, upon an application to set aside the award, or send it back to the arbitrator, that he was not bound to find the sum to be paid in respect of the shares separately from that to be paid in respect of other matters in difference.

(1) Those portions of the argument and judgment which related to the excessive amount of the damages are omitted. The rule was discharged as to that point also.

A submission to arbitration, dated the 3rd of February, 1865, recited that Joseph Whitworth and William Wilson Hulse had carried on business as engineers, and had since been shareholders in the incorporated company of Joseph Whitworth & Co. and the Manchester Ordnance and Rifle Company; that differences had arisen, and that by a memorandum in writing, dated the 13th of July, 1864, they had agreed to refer all matters in dispute to the arbitration of certain persons therein mentioned; that the period within which the award was to be made had expired; that an application had been made by Whitworth for a Judge's order, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, for an extension of the time, and that a bill in Chancery had been filed by Hulse, praying for an account, and for an injunction to prevent Whitworth from proceeding in the reference. It then recited that by a memorandum of agreement, dated the 15th day of December, 1864, and made between Whitworth and Hulse, it was agreed that all matters in difference between them should be referred to an accountant named; and that a formal agreement, containing all proper recitals, conditions and agreements, should be forthwith prepared and signed, and that the bill in Chancery and proceedings at Judge's chambers should be dismissed. Then followed a recital that at the time of the execution of that agreement it was understood between the parties that Hulse should retire from the company by the sale of his shares to Whitworth, and that the arbitrator should determine what sum Whitworth should, upon the balance of accounts between him and Hulse, pay to Hulse, for the transfer of the said shares; and should finally decide and determine all matters in dispute between them. It further recited that it had since been agreed that Hulse should assign all his interest in patents, &c. in which he was jointly interested with Whitworth to the latter, and that mutual releases should be executed of all claims and demands. Then followed the operative part of the agreement, the first clause of which was as follows:

"The claims and demands of the said W. W. Hulse against the said J. Whitworth in respect of the said differences and matters aforesaid, and all other matters in dispute between them, and the amount to be paid for the said shares, shall be and the same are hereby referred to the award," &c. of the said arbitrator.

Then followed the clauses usually contained in submissions to arbitration, concluding with a clause that the arbitrator should direct Hulse to assign his interest in the patents, and that mutual releases should be executed.

The award of the arbitrator, after reciting that by the agreement of reference, the claims and differences therein mentioned, and all matters in dispute between the parties, were referred to the award of the arbitrator, stated that he thereby made his award "of and concerning all and every the differences, disputes and matters referred," and continued as follows:

"I award and direct that the said J. Whitworth shall and do, on or before the 1st of January, 1866, pay to the said W. W. Hulse the sum of 22,978*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* sterling, in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands of the said W. W. Hulse against the said J. Whitworth in respect of the differences and matters in the said agreement mentioned, and of all other matters in dispute between them, including the amount to be paid by the said J. Whitworth to the said W. W. Hulse for the purchase of the shares in the incorporated company in the said agreement particularly mentioned."

The award also contained a clause providing for the assignment of Hulse's interest in the patents and the execution of mutual releases.

The submission having been made a rule of Court, a rule was obtained, calling on Hulse to shew cause why the award should not be set aside or referred back to the arbitrator, on the ground that he had not sufficiently determined all the matters in difference, and had not settled the amount to be paid for the shares.

Edward James, Milward and Baylis shewed cause, and contended that the arbitrator was justified in finding in one sum the amount to be paid to Hulse.

The COURT then called on

The Solicitor General and T. Jones to support the rule.—They urged that the award ought to be sent back, because it was essential that the amount to be paid for the shares should be specified. The stamp duty to be paid upon the transfer was ad valorem, and therefore the value should be stated. Besides, the intention of the parties, as appeared from the submission, was, that the value of the shares should be stated. It was clear that it never was intended that one lump sum should be awarded, and they were entitled to have it divided. Randell v. Randell (7 East, 81), Rider v. Fisher (3 Bing. N.C. 874), Richards v. Browne (9 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 199).

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. We are asked, in the first place, to set the award aside; but we ought not to do that unless it is perfectly clear that we have the right to do so. Any real objection to it can be raised in the action now pending on the award. Then we are asked to send it back to the arbitrator, and if Mr. Hulse consented we might do so; but his counsel does not consent, and we must therefore decide whether or not this award is bad. I am of opinion that it is perfectly good, and that the objection to it is unfounded. The cases referred to by the Solicitor General were correctly decided; and there is no doubt that if several matters are referred to an arbitrator he must decide on all of them; and the rule, that where an award is expressed to be made ita quod de præmissis, it is to be taken to decide everything which has been referred, will not prevail if it is a condition imposed on the arbitrator that he should decide on the matters referred to him separately. But in the present case, it does not appear from the submission that the parties intended the arbitrator to state separately what was to be paid in respect of the shares. It is recited that it had been agreed that he should determine what should be paid upon the balance of the account for the transfer of the shares. Then comes the actual submitting clause of the agreement, and under it I think that the arbitrator was perfectly justified in stating a lump sum to settle all matters in difference. If there were anything to shew that the arbitrator was to separate the sum to be paid for the shares from that to be paid in respect of the other matters, the Solicitor General would be right; but I think that there is not.

BRAMWELL, B.—If the submission made it necessary for the arbitrator to find a separate sum for the price of the shares, then the award is bad, and we ought to set it aside or refer it back to the arbitrator. All I say about it is, that it is not clear that it is necessary, and therefore we ought not to send it back without the consent of the party in whose favour it is made.

PIGOTT, B.—I concur in thinking that the parties never intended that the arbitrator should find separately on the items of the matters referred. If such had been their intention, they would have expressed it in much clearer terms.

Rule discharged with costs.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 3, 1866.

TANNER v. THE EUROPEAN BANK (LIMITED).

BOWEN v. THE SAME.

35 L. J. Ex. 151; L. R. 1 Ex. 261; 14 L. T. 414; 14 W. R. 675;
12 Jur. N.S. 414.

See Attenborough v. St. Katharine's Dock Co., [1878] E. R. A.; 47 L. J. C.P. 763; L. R. 3 C.P. D. 450; 38 L. T. 404; 26 W. R. 583 (C. A.). Approved, Robinson v. Jenkins, [1890] E. R. A.; 59 L. J. Q.B. 147; L. R. 24 Q.B. D. 275; 62 L. T. 439; 38 W. R. 360 (C. A.); Ex parte Mersey Docks, [1899] E. R. A.; 68 L. J. Q.B. 540; [1899] 1 Q.B. 546; 80 L. T. 143; 47 W. R. 306 (C. A.).

Interpleader—Count in assumpsit—Interpleader Act (1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58), s. 1.—Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126), s. 12.

INTERPLEADER.—A policy of insurance was handed over by T. to bankers, for them to collect monies due to him under the policy, which they failed to do. While the policy was in their custody B. gave them notice that he claimed it, and that they were not to return it to T. T. commenced an action against the bankers, his declaration containing a count in assumpsit claiming special damage for an alleged breach of duty in not collecting the monies due under the policy and re-delivering the policy to him, and counts in trover and detinue claiming the policy itself. B. also brought an action against the bankers, to recover the policy. An interpleader order having been made staying proceedings in T.'s action, and giving him leave to defend the action brought by B. against the bankers on indemnifying them against the costs,—Held, upon an application to rescind the order, that it was a just and reasonable one, and that the existence of the count in assumpsit, claiming special damage, was not a ground for rescinding the order.

This was a rule to rescind an interpleader order, made by Bramwell, B., at chambers.

It appeared from the affidavits that, in the month of January, 1866, the plaintiff Tanner delivered a policy of assurance on two vessels, the Alliance, and the Duchess of Sutherland, to the defendants, the European Bank, that they might collect for him a sum of money due under the policy from a person at Havre. This they did not succeed in doing. While the policy was still in their custody, they received notice from the plaintiff Bowen, that he claimed the policy under an assignment made to him by Tanner in May, 1863, of all policies on the Duchess of Sutherland, and that they were not to part with it to anybody but himself. The defendants, in consequence, declined to give the policy back to Tanner, who thereupon commenced an action against them. The declaration contained a count in assumpsit, alleging a bailment upon the terms that the defendants would collect the monies due and re-deliver the policy in a reasonable time, and special damage arising from their default, and counts in trover and detinue. Bowen also commenced an action to recover the policy. The defendants took out an interpleader summons at chambers, and Bramwell, B. made the order complained of in the following terms: "I do order that all further proceedings in the first-mentioned action (Tanner v. the European Bank, Limited), be stayed until further order. And I do further order, that the plaintiff in the first-mentioned action be at liberty to defend the action, by Bowen against the defendants, in the second-mentioned action (Bowen v. the European Bank, Limited); the plaintiff in the said first-mentioned action giving the said defendants an indemnity. And that the said plaintiff Bowen give security for costs to the said defendants to the satisfaction of the master. All other matters adjourned."

A rule nisi having been obtained by the plaintiff Tanner to rescind the order, Talfourd Salter, for the defendants, shewed cause.—This order was perfectly regular, and the Judge had power to make it, both under the Interpleader Act (1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58. s. 1.) and the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126. s. 12).

[BRAMWELL, B.—The difficulty is this. The plaintiff Tanner, in his action, claims special damage for the defendant's breach of duty in not collecting the money due to him under the policy, and he also claims the policy itself. I thought that the question as to the right to the policy was within the act, and that Tanner ought to be allowed to go on with his action as to the claim for damages. But I made the order upon the authority of Best v. Hayes (1 H. & C. 718; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 129).

No cause was shewn by the plaintiff Bowen, who consented to the order at chambers.

H. T. Cole, for the plaintiff Tanner, supported the rule.—A Judge has no power to make an interpleader order when there is a claim for breach of contract besides the claim for the chattel the right to which is disputed. The order deprives Tanner of his damages for the breach of contract, and if Bowen does not go on with his action Tanner will not be able to recover the policy. Crawshay v. Thornton (2 Myl. & Cr. 1; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 179) shews that, according to the practice in Equity, this order ought not to be made.

MARTIN, B.—We are all of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The power given to the Court or a Judge under the Interpleader Act (1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58) was to dispose of the merits of the claims and “make such other rules and orders therein as to costs and all other matters as may appear to be just and reasonable.” Mr. Cole is quite right in saying that when this statute was first enacted the Judges did, especially in this Court, act upon the idea that they were bound by the decisions of the Courts of Equity upon Bills of interpleader. Gradually, however, we have got out of that idea, and in the last case, Best v. Hayes (1 H. & C. 718; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 129), this Court stated that Judges were to do their best to do what was just and reasonable between the parties, without being fettered by the technical decisions of a Court of Equity. Now, in this particular case, I am by no means certain that had I been in my Brother Bramwell's position, I should have done exactly as he did; but I think, nevertheless, that this is a just and reasonable order, and that we ought not to interfere with it, unless we see that there is something wrong in it.

BRAMWELL, B.—I acted in this case upon the last Common Law Procedure Act, and the authority of Best v. Hayes (1 H. & C. 718; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 129), and I confess I did so with some misgiving as to the reasonableness of it, because the argument used by Mr. Cole for his client is a very cogent one. I thought, however, upon the authority which I have mentioned, that I ought to make the order, and, that being so, that I ought to put the plaintiff Tanner as nearly as possible in the same situation as that in which he would be in suing the defendants. I therefore made him defendant in Bowen's action, in which Bowen could only succeed by proving that he had an absolute title to the policy. The situation of a bailee is something like the situation of a tenant. He ought not to be permitted to deny the title of the person from whom he derives possession. But just as there may be an eviction as to land, so there may be an eviction as to chattel; and if the bailee is evicted by a third person, he ought to be relieved from an action brought against him by the bailor. Then the order which I made in this case is, that Bowen shall go on with his action, and shew, if he can, that he is entitled to evict the defendant of this chattel, and get it from him. If he is able to do that, clearly the defendants ought to be able to set that up as a good answer to the action by Tanner. That was my view of the matter.

I do not say that the order may not be subject to revision, and if Mr. Cole's client were to take out a summons at chambers, and say, "I want to go on with the special count alone, not for the purpose of recovering the policy, but for the purpose of recovering special damage," I should be inclined to say that he might go on if he struck out all but the count for damages. However, it is not necessary for us to answer that question here; and he has a right to say "I do not want my action split into two in that way." As to whether Bowen had a title or not, that will be a matter to be ascertained; but, according to my recollection, without saying that a sufficient title was made out, enough was shewn to make me think it reasonable to make the order; and I am satisfied that no injustice has been done.

PIGOTT, B.—I am also satisfied that no injustice has been done, and that the order was quite right. My Brother Bramwell took great pains to protect the plaintiff Tanner, when he called upon Bowen to give security for costs. If Bowen does not go on with his action in a reasonable time he will be barred of his claim. The special count clearly was not relied on by the plaintiff, otherwise the order would not have been made; though the existence of that count may afford ground for an application at chambers to revise the order, it is not a ground for this application to rescind it. As to the contention that the case does not come within the Interpleader Acts, however it might have been under the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 58, I am sure that it is a case within the Common Law Procedure Act of 1860, and I am glad that the Courts have not endeavoured to limit the powers given to them by that act of parliament. The case of Best v. Hayes (1 H. & C. 718; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 129) was rightly decided. In my judgment a man is placed in a very difficult position where he is an innocent bailee and has taken goods from a bailor and the person lawfully entitled to those goods claims them of him, as he subjects himself to an action at the suit of the first man under the contract, and an action at the suit of the second man, who has a right to the goods. That is a very unequal way of doing justice.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 30, 1866.

RAYMENT v. MINTON.

35 L. J. Ex. 153; L. R. 1 Ex. 244; 4 H. & C. 371; 12 Jur. N.S. 435; 14 L. T. 367; 14 W. R. 675 (Raymond v. Minton).

Principle applied, Learoyd v. Brook, [1891] E. R. A.; 60 L. J. Q.B. 373; [1891] 1 Q.B. 431; 64 L. T. 458; 39 W. R. 480 (Q.B. D.).

Condition Precedent—Apprentice Deed—Covenant to Teach—Readiness to be Taught.

APPRENTICE.—It is a condition precedent to the liability of a master, on a covenant to teach an apprentice his trade, that the apprentice should be ready and willing to be taught by the master.

The declaration stated that, by an indenture of apprenticeship, one H. Page, therein described as the son-in-law of the plaintiff, of his own free will and accord, and by and with the consent and approbation of the plaintiff, did put himself apprentice to the defendant, to learn the trade of an ornamental painter and decorator, and with him, the defendant, after the manner of apprentice, to serve for the term of five years; and that the defendant, by the said indenture, covenanted and agreed with the plaintiff to teach the said apprentice in the said trade by the best means in his power, the defendant finding unto the said apprentice good and sufficient meat, &c., during the said term of five years, and the plaintiff paying &c.; and that, after the making of the said indenture, the said H. Page entered into the service of the defendant, with him, after the manner of an apprentice, to serve for the term and in the manner aforesaid, and that he, the said apprentice, had always performed all things in the said indenture contained on his part to be performed, and had not done anything in the said indenture forbidden him to do; and all conditions were performed, &c., both by the plaintiff and by the said apprentice, necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said apprentice taught by the defendant as aforesaid, yet the defendant did not nor would, after the making of the said indenture, and during the said term or the part thereof already elapsed, teach the said apprentice in the said trade; but wholly failed, neglected, and refused so to do.

Third plea—that, at the time of the alleged breach, the said apprentice would not be taught, and by his own wilful acts hindered and prevented the defendant teaching him in the said trade of an ornamental painter and decorator, by the defendant used, and then by his said acts caused the breach to which this plea is pleaded.

Demurrer and joinder.

Goddard, for the plaintiff.—The plea really makes the covenant to teach dependent on the apprentice's covenant to serve faithfully, whereas these covenants are quite independent of each other—Winstone v. Linn (1 B. & C. 460), per Bayley, J., and Philps v. Clift (4 Hurl. & N. 168; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 153), per Watson, G. For all that appears on the plea, there may have only been that sort of misconduct on the part of the apprentice for which the master might have lawfully punished him. The plea should at least have stated that the apprentice wilfully and against orders absented himself from the place of instruction.

[MARTIN, B. referred to Mercer v. Whall (5 Q.B. Rep. 447; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 267).]

Grantham, for the defendant, cited Hughes v. Humphreys (6 B. & C. 680), but was not called upon to argue.

MARTIN, B.—There can be no doubt as to how this case should be decided. The master says, "I will teach this young man the business of an ornamental painter and decorator by the best means in my power"; and even if there were no covenant at all by the apprentice, common sense points out that, if the apprentice will not be taught, but by his own wilful act hinders and prevents the contracting party from teaching him the business, there can be no cause of action against the master. In the words of Mr. Addison,¹ "The capability of the apprentice to be instructed by the master is naturally a condition precedent to the liability of the latter upon his covenant" to teach. And how can it be said that the master is liable for a breach of covenant, when the person, on whose behalf the apprentice fee is paid, will not obey his orders as he has agreed to do? Reason points out that it must be a condition precedent that the apprentice will allow himself to be taught.

POLLOCK, C.B. and BRAMWELL, B. concurred.

Judgment for the defendant.

(1) Addison on Contracts, 4th edit. p. 440.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

Feb. 8, May 14, 1866.

FLETCHER v. RYLANDS AND ANOTHER.*

35 L. J. Ex. 154; L. R. 1 Ex. 285; 4 H. & C. 263; 12 Jur. (N.S.) 603;
 14 W. R. 799: affirmed, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. Ex. 161; L. R. 3 H.L.
 330; 19 L. T. 220 (H.L.).

Trespass—Negligence—Escape of Water from Artificial Reservoir—Consequential Damage.

The plaintiff's colliery was flooded by water, which escaped from the defendants' reservoir down some old mine-shafts under the site of the reservoir, and through old coal workings under the land intervening between the plaintiff's and the defendants' land. There was no personal negligence on the part of the defendants; but the people who were employed by them in the construction of the reservoir had not exercised reasonable skill and care (with reference to the shafts) to provide for the pressure which the reservoir was to bear:—Held, reversing the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer, that the defendants were liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff.

Tenant v. Goldwin (1 Salk. 21, 360; s. c. 2 Ld. Raym. 1089) examined.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, against the decision of the majority of the Court of Exchequer upon a special case which was stated for their opinion (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 177).

The material parts of the special case are given in the report below (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 177), and are also set out in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. They were shortly these: the defendants employed competent persons to select a site for, and to construct, a reservoir on their land. During the construction, the work-people met with some old vertical mine-shafts. The defendants were not guilty of negligence themselves; but, in point of fact, their agents did not exercise reasonable skill and care (with reference to these shafts) so as to provide for the pressure the reservoir would have to bear. The water from the reservoir escaped down these shafts through certain old coal-workings under the defendants' land, and under land between the defendants' land and the plaintiff's, into the plaintiff's colliery, which was thereby flooded. Neither the defendants nor their agents knew of the existence of these old coal-workings. The question for the Court was, whether the plaintiff was, under these circumstances, entitled to recover damages from the defendants.

The arguments of Manisty (with whom was J. A. Russell), for the appellant, and of Mellish (with whom was T. Jones), for the respondents, were substantially the same as the arguments in the Court below; and the points made on either side are discussed in the following judgment.

In addition to the authorities cited below, these were now cited for the plaintiff: Lambert v. Bessey (Sir T. Raym. 422), Aldred's case (9 Rep. 58 a), Scott v. the London Dock Company (3 H. & C. 596; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 17, 220), Cox v. Burbidge (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 438; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 89), and Barber v the Nottingham and Grantham Railway Company (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 193; s. c. 15 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 726).

Cur. adv. vult.

BLACKBURN, J. (May 14), delivered the judgment of the Court as follows: This was a special case stated by an arbitrator under an order of Nisi Prius, * Coram Willes, J., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Keating, J., Montague Smith, J. and Lush, J.

in which the question for the Court is stated to be, "whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover any—and if any what—damages from the defendants by reason of the matters thereinbefore stated."

In the Court of Exchequer, the Chief Baron and Martin, B. were of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover at all; Bramwell B. being of a different opinion. The judgment in the Court of Exchequer was consequently given for the defendants, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the Court.

The only question argued before us was, whether this judgment was right, nothing being said about the measure of damages in case the plaintiff should be held entitled to recover. We have come to the conclusion that the opinion of Bramwell, B. was right, and that the answer to the question should be that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from the defendants by reason of the matters stated in the case, and, consequently, that the judgment below should be reversed; but we cannot at present say to what damages the plaintiff is entitled.

It appears from the statement in the case that the plaintiff was damaged by his property being flooded by water, which, without any fault on his part, broke out of a reservoir constructed on the defendants' land by the defendants' orders, and maintained by the defendants.

It appears from the statement in the 12th paragraph of the case, that the coal under the defendants' land had, at some remote period, been worked out, but that this was unknown at the time when the defendants gave directions to erect the reservoir; the water in the reservoir would not have escaped from the defendants' land, and no mischief would have been done to the plaintiff, but for this latent defect in the defendants' sub-soil. And it further appears from the 17th and 18th paragraphs that the defendants selected competent engineers and contractors to make their reservoir, and themselves personally continued in total ignorance of what we have called the latent defect in the sub-soil; but that these persons employed by them, in the course of the work became aware of the existence of ancient shafts filled up with soil, though they did not know or suspect that they were shafts communicating with old workings. It is found that the defendants personally were free from all blame, but that in fact proper care and skill was not used by the persons employed by them to provide for the sufficiency of the reservoir with reference to these shafts. The consequence was, that when the reservoir was filled, the water burst into the shafts, and flowed down through them into the old workings, and thence into the plaintiff's mine, and there did the mischief.

The plaintiff, though free from all blame on his part, must bear the loss, unless he can establish that it was the consequence of some default for which the defendants are responsible. The question of law therefore arises: What is the obligation which the law casts upon a person who, like the defendants, lawfully brings on his land something which, though harmless whilst it remains there, will naturally do mischief if it escape out of his land? It is agreed on all hands that he must take care to keep in that which he has brought on the land and keeps there, in order that it may not escape and damage his neighbours; but the question arises, whether the duty which the law casts upon him under such circumstances is an absolute duty to keep it in at his peril, or is, as the majority of the Court of Exchequer have thought, merely a duty to take all reasonable and prudent precautions in order to keep it in, but no more.

If the first be the law, the person who has brought on his land and kept there something dangerous, and failed to keep it in, is responsible for all the natural consequences of its escape. If the second be the limit of his duty, he would not be answerable except on proof of negligence, and consequently would not be answerable for escape arising from any latent defect, which ordinary prudence and skill could not detect.

Supposing the second to be the correct view of the law, a further question arises, subsidiary to the first, namely, whether the defendants are not so far identified with the contractors whom they employed as to be responsible for the consequences of their want of care and skill in making the reservoir in fact insufficient with reference to the old shafts, of the existence of which they were aware, though they had not ascertained where the shafts led to.

We think that the true rule of law is that the person who, for his own purposes, brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and that, if he does not do so, he is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. He can excuse himself by shewing that the escape was owing to the plaintiff's default, or, perhaps, that the escape was the consequence of vis major, or the act of God; but as nothing of this sort exists here, it is unnecessary to inquire what excuse would be sufficient. The general rule, as above stated, seems on principle just. The person whose grass or corn is eaten down by the escaping cattle of his neighbour, or whose mine is flooded by the water from his neighbour's reservoir, or whose cellar is invaded by the filth of his neighbour's privy, or whose habitation is made unhealthy by the fumes and noisome vapours of his neighbour's alkali-works, is damnified without any fault of his own; and it seems but reasonable and just that the neighbour who has brought something on his own property (which was not naturally there), harmless to others so long as it is confined to his own property, but which he knows will be mischievous if it gets on his neighbour's, should be obliged to make good the damage which ensues if he does not succeed in confining it to his own property. But for his act in bringing it there, no mischief could have accrued, and it seems but just that he should at his peril keep it there so that no mischief may accrue, or answer for the natural and anticipated consequences. And upon authority, this, we think, is established to be the law, whether the thing so brought be beasts or water, or filth or stench.

The case that has most commonly occurred, and which is most frequently to be found in the books, is as to the obligation of the owner of the cattle which he brought on his land to prevent their escaping and doing mischief. The law as to them seems to be perfectly settled from early times; the owner must keep them in at his peril, or he will be answerable for the natural consequences of their escape; that is, with regard to tame beasts, for the grass they eat and trample upon, although not for any injury to the person of others; for our ancestors have settled that it is not the general nature of horses to kick or of bulls to gore; but if the owner knows that the beast has a vicious propensity to attack man, he will be answerable for that too.

As early as the Year Book, 20 Edward IV. 11, 10, Brian, C.J. lays down the doctrine in terms very much resembling those used by Lord Holt in Tenant v. Goldwin (1 Salk. 21, 360; s. c. 2 Ld. Raym. 1089), which will be referred to afterwards. It was trespass with cattle; plea, that the plaintiff's land adjoined a place where the defendant had common; that the cattle strayed from the common, and the defendant drove them back as soon as he could. It was held a bad plea. Brian, C.J., says, "It behoves him to use his common so that it shall do no hurt to another man, and if the land in which he has common be not inclosed, it behoves him to keep the beasts in the common and out of the land of any other." He adds—when it was proposed to amend by pleading "that they were driven out of the common by dogs,"—that although that might give a right of action against the master of the dogs, it was no defence to the action of trespass by the person on whose land the cattle went.

In the recent case of Cox v. Burbidge (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 438; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 89), Williams, J., says, "I apprehend the law to be perfectly plain. If I am the owner of an animal, in which by the law the right of property can exist, I am bound to take care that it does not stray into the land of my neighbour, and I am liable for any trespass it may commit, and for the ordinary consequences of that trespass. Whether or not the escape of the animal is due to my negligence is altogether immaterial." So in May v. Burdett (9 Q.B. Rep. 112; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 64), the Court, after an elaborate examination of the old precedents and authorities, came to the conclusion that "a person keeping a mischievous animal is bound to keep it secure at his peril." And in 1 Hale P.C., 430, Lord Hale states that where one keeps a beast, knowing that its nature or habits are such that the natural consequence of its being loose is that it will harm men, the "owner must at his peril keep him up safe from doing hurt; for though he use his diligence to keep him up, if he escapes and do harm, the owner is liable to answer damages,"—though, as he proceeds to shew, he will not be liable criminally, without proof of want of care. In these latter authorities, the point under consideration was damage to the person; and what was decided was that, where it was known that hurt to the person was the natural consequence of the animal being loose, the owner should be responsible in damages for such hurt; though where it was not known to be so the owner was not responsible for such damages; but where the damage is—like eating grass and other ordinary ingredients in damage feasant, the natural consequence of the escape, the rule as to keeping in the animal is the same.

In Com. Dig., tit. 'Droit,' M. 2, it is said that "if the owner of 200 acres in a common moor enfeofs B. of 50 acres, B. ought to inclose at his peril, to prevent damage by his cattle to the other 150 acres, for if his cattle escape thither they may be distrained damage feasant. So the owner of the 150 acres ought to prevent his cattle from doing damage to the 50 acres at his peril." The authority cited is Dyer, 372, b, where the decision was that the cattle might be distrained; the inference from that decision that the owner was bound to keep in his cattle at his peril is, we think, legitimate, and we have the high authority of Comyns for saying that such is the law.

In the note to Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, 128, which is attributed to Lord Hale, it is said, "If A. and B. have lands adjoining, where there is no inclosure, the one shall have trespass against the other on an escape of their beasts respectively, Dyer, 372, Rast. Entr., 621, and the 20 Edw. IV, c. 10, although wild dogs, &c., drive the cattle of the one into the lands of the other."

No case is known to us in which in replevin it has ever been attempted to plead in bar to an avowry for distress damage feasant that the cattle had escaped without any negligence on the part of the plaintiff; and surely if that could have been a good plea in bar, the facts must often have been such as would have supported it. These authorities, and the absence of any authority to the contrary, justify Williams, J. in saying, as he does in Cox v. Burbidge (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 438; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 89), that "the law is clear that in actions for damage occasioned by animals that have not been kept in by their owners, it is quite immaterial whether the escape is by negligence or not."

As has been already said, there does not appear to be any difference in principle between the extent of the duty cast on him who brings cattle on his land to keep them in, and the extent of the duty imposed on him who brings on his land water, filth or stench, or any other thing which will if it escape naturally do damage, to prevent their escaping and injuring his neighbour; and the case of Tenant v. Goldwin (1 Salk. 21, 360; s. c. 2 Ld. Raym. 1089) is an express authority that the duty is the same, and is to keep them in at his peril.

As Martin, B. in his judgment below, appears not to have understood that case in the same manner as we do, it is proper to examine it in some detail. It was a motion in arrest of judgment, after judgment by default; and, therefore, all that was well pleaded in the declaration was admitted to be true. The declaration is set out at full length in the report in 6 Mod. It alleged that the plaintiff had a cellar which lay contiguous to a messuage of the defendant and used (solebat) to be separated and fenced from a privy house of office, parcel of the said messuage of the defendant, by a thick and close wall, which belonged to said messuage of the defendant, and by the defendant of right ought to have been repaired (de jure debuit reparari) yet he did not repair it, and for want of repair filth flowed into plaintiff's cellar.

The case is also reported by Salkeld, who argued it, and by Lord Raymond, whose report is the fullest. The objection taken was that there was nothing to shew that the defendant was under any obligation to repair the wall, that, it was said, being a charge, not of common right, and the allegation that the wall de jure debuit reparari by the defendant being an inference of law which did not arise from the facts alleged. Salkeld argued that this general mode of stating the right was sufficient in a declaration, and also that the duty alleged did, of common right, result from the facts stated. It is not now material to inquire whether he was or was not right on the pleading point. All three reports concur in saying that Lord Holt during the argument intimated an opinion against him on that; but that after consideration the Court gave judgment for him on the second ground.

In the report in 6 Mod. it is stated, "And at another day per totam Curiam, 'the declaration is good, for there is a sufficient cause of action appearing in it, but not upon the word solebat. If the defendant has a house of office inclosed with a wall which is his, he is, of common right, bound to use it so as not to annoy another.'—The reason here is that one must use his own so as thereby not to hurt another, and as, of common right, one is bound to keep his cattle from trespassing on his neighbour, so he is bound to use anything that is his, so as not to hurt another by such user.—Suppose one sells a piece of pasture lying open to another piece of pasture which the vendor has, the vendee is bound to keep his cattle from running into the vendor's piece; so of dung or anything else." There is here an evident allusion to the same case in Dyer as is referred to in Com. Dig., tit. 'Droit,' M. 2.

Lord Raymond in his report says: "The last day of term, Holt, C.J., delivered the opinion of the Court that the declaration was sufficient. He said that upon the face of this declaration there appeared a sufficient cause of action to entitle the plaintiff to have his judgment; that they did not go upon the solebat or the jure debuit reparari, as if it were enough to say that the plaintiff had a house, and the defendant had a wall, and he ought to repair the wall; but if the defendant has a house of office, and the wall which separates the house of office from the plaintiff's house is all the defendant's, he is of common right bound to repair it. The reason of this case is upon this account, that every one must so use his own as not to do damage to another. And as every man is bound so to look to his cattle as to keep them out of his neighbour's ground, that so he may receive no damage; so he must keep in the filth of his house of office that it may not flow in upon and damnify his neighbour. So if a man has two pieces of pasture which lie open to one another, and sells one piece, the vendee must keep in his cattle so as they shall not trespass upon the vendor. So a man shall not lay his dung so high as to damage his neighbour; and the reason of these cases is because every man must so use his own as not to damnify another." Salkeld, who had been counsel in the case, reports the judgment much more concisely but to the same effect. He says, "The reason he gave for his judgment was, because it was the defendant's wall and the defendant's filth, and he was bound of common right to keep his wall so as his filth might not damnify his neighbour, and that it was a trespass on his neighbour, as if his beasts should escape, or one should make a great heap on the border of his ground, and it should tumble and roll down upon his neighbour's.—He must repair the wall of his house of office, for he whose dirt it is must keep it that it may not trespass." It is worth noticing how completely the reason of Lord Holt corresponds with that of Brian, C.J., in the case already cited in the 20 Edw. IV. Martin, B. in the Court below, says that he thinks this was a case without difficulty, because the defendants had, by letting judgment go by default, admitted their liability to repair the wall, and that he cannot see how it is an authority for any case in which no such liability is admitted. But a perusal of the report will shew that it was because Lord Holt and his colleagues thought (no matter, for this purpose, whether rightly or wrongly) that the liability was not admitted, that they took so much trouble to consider what liability the law would raise from the admitted facts, and it does therefore seem to us to be a very weighty authority in support of the position that he who brings and keeps anything, no matter whether beasts, or filth, or clean water, or a heap of earth or dung on his premises, must at his peril prevent it from getting on his neighbour's, or make good all the damage which is the natural consequence of its doing so.

No case has been found in which the question as to the liability for noxious vapours escaping from a man's works by inevitable accident has been discussed, but the following case will illustrate it: Some years ago, several actions were brought against the occupiers of some alkali-works at Liverpool for the damage alleged to be caused by the chlorine fumes of their works. The defendants proved that they had at great expense erected a contrivance by which the fumes of chlorine were condensed and sold as muriatic acid, and they brought a great body of scientific evidence to prove that this apparatus was so perfect that no fumes possibly could escape from the defendants' chimneys. On this evidence, it was pressed upon the jury that the plaintiff's damage must have been caused by some of the numerous other chimneys in the neighbourhood. The jury, however, being satisfied that the mischief was occasioned by chlorine, drew the conclusion that it had escaped from the defendants' works somehow, and in each case found for the plaintiff. No attempt was made to disturb these verdicts on the ground that the defendants had taken every precaution which prudence or skill could suggest to keep those fumes in, and that they could not be responsible unless negligence were shewn; yet, if the law be as laid down by the majority of the Court of Exchequer, it would have been a very obvious defence. If it had been raised, the answer would probably have been, that the uniform course of pleading in actions for such nuisances is to say that the defendants caused the noisome vapours to arise on their premises and suffered them to come on the plaintiff's, without stating that there was any want of care or skill on the part of the defendants, and that the case of Tenant v. Goldwin (1 Salk. 21, 360; s. c. 2 Ld. Raym. 1089) shewed that this was founded on the general rule of law that he whose stuff it is must so keep it that it may not trespass.

There is no difference in this respect between chlorine and water; both will, if they escape, do damage, the one by scorching and the other by drowning; and he who brings them there must, at his peril, see that they do not escape and do that mischief. What is said by Gibbs, C.J., in Sutton v. Clarke (6 Taunt. 44), though not necessary for the decision of the case, shews that that very learned Judge took the same view of the law that was taken by Lord Holt.

But it was further said by Martin, B. that when damage is done to personal property, or even to the person, by collision either upon land or at sea, there must be negligence in the party doing the damage to render him legally responsible, and this is, no doubt, true; and, as was pointed out during the argument before us, this is not confined to cases of collision, for there are many cases in which proof of negligence is essential, as for instance, where an unruly horse gets on the footpath of a public street and kills a passenger—Hammack v. White (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 558; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 129), or where a person in a dock is struck by the falling of a bale of cotton which the defendants' servants are lowering—Scott v. the London Dock Company (3 H. & C. 596; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 17, 220); and many other similar cases may be found. But we think these cases are distinguishable from the present. Traffic on the highways, whether by land or sea, cannot be conducted without exposing those whose persons or property are near it to some inevitable risk; and that being so, those who go on the highway, or have their property adjacent to it, may well be held to do so, subject to their taking upon themselves the risk of injury from that inevitable danger; and persons who, by the licence of the owners, pass near to warehouses where goods are being raised or lowered, certainly do so subject to the inevitable risk of accident. In neither case, therefore, can they recover without proof of want of care or skill occasioning the accident, and it is believed that all the cases in which inevitable accident has been held an excuse for what prima facie was a trespass, can be explained on the same principle, namely, that the circumstances were such as to shew that the plaintiff had taken the risk upon himself.

But there is no ground for saying that the plaintiff here took upon himself any risk arising from the uses to which the defendants should choose to apply their land. He neither knew what there might be, nor could he in any way control the defendants or hinder their building what reservoirs they liked, and storing up in them what water they pleased, so long as the defendants succeeded in preventing the water which they there brought from interfering with the plaintiff's property.

The view which we take of the first point renders it unnecessary to consider whether the defendants would or would not be responsible for the want of care and skill in the persons employed by them under the circumstances stated in the 17th and 18th paragraphs of the case.

We are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, but as we have not heard any argument as to the amount, we are not able to give judgment for what damages. The parties probably will empower their counsel to agree on the amount of damages; should they differ on the principle, the case may be mentioned again.

Judgment for the appellant.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 30, 1866.

MANGAN v. ATHERTON.

35 L. J. Ex. 161; 4 H. & C. 388; L. R. 1 Ex. 239; 14 L. T. 411; 14 W. R. 771 (sometimes Mangan v. Atterton).

Commented on and distinguished, Clark v. Chambers, [1878] E. R. A.; 47 L. J. Q.B. 427; L. R. 3 Q.B. D. 327; 38 L. T. 454; 26 W. R. 613 (Q.B. D.).

Negligence—Dangerous Machine—Injury to Infant.

INFANT. NEGLIGENCE.—The defendant having placed a crushing-machine in a public market for exhibition, a child was injured by putting his fingers between the cogwheels while another child was turning the handle:—Held, that the defendant was not liable for negligence in leaving the machine unguarded where it was; and that the injury sustained by the child was the direct result of the improper meddling with the machine.

This action was brought in the Lichfield County Court. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant negligently and carelessly exposed, for a considerable length of time, in a public street, in the city of Lichfield, a crushing-machine unprotected, and without ordinary and reasonable precaution and care, whereby Michael Mangan, an infant, was much hurt and injured.

The cause was heard on the 7th of August, 1865, when it was proved that the machine, which was for the purpose of crushing oilcake, had on one side a set of cogwheels to work the rollers, through which the oilcake to be crushed passed, and on the other side a handle, by which the wheels were set in motion. The machine was standing as usual, during the market hours, in the place where the defendant displayed on market days the articles which he had for exhibition or sale, being part of the ordinary market area in Lichfield. The axle of the handle was at the height of 2 feet 9 inches from the ground, and was not in any way fastened up. The cogwheels, which were put in motion by the handle, were, at the point where they met, at a height of 2 feet 6 inches from the ground. The machine was not under the care of any person.

The plaintiff was four years old; and, while returning from school with his brother (who was seven years old), he and other lads stopped at the machine; and whilst one of the other boys was turning the handle, the plaintiff, on being told to do so by his brother, put his hand in the cogs, and three of his fingers were crushed so severely as to require amputation.

The Judge in summing up told the jury that, if they agreed with him in thinking that the machine was dangerous, and one that should not have been left unguarded in the way of ignorant people, and especially of children, without at all events the handle being removed or fastened up and the cogs thrown out of gear, then they would hold the defendant liable for such damages as they might think right.

The jury having inspected the machine, gave a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 10l., whereupon the defendant appealed to this Court.

Macnamara, for the appellant, the defendant.—First, there was no negligence on the part of the defendant; and secondly, even if there were, he is not liable, because the plaintiff brought about the accident by his own negligent act. In Lynch v. Nurdin (1 Q.B. Rep. 29; s. c. 10 Law. J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 73) the defendant negligently left a horse and cart unattended in the street, and was held liable for injury received by one boy in falling from the cart when it was put in motion by another boy; but the decision proceeded on the ground that the plaintiff was blameless, as explained by Parke, B. in Lygo v. Newbold (9 Exch. Rep. 302; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 108), and it was not followed in Singleton v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 287); nor did this Court regard it in Abbott v. M'Fie (2 H. & C. 744; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 177). Here there was no negligence, and ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff or his protector would have prevented the accident. The mere placing of the machine where it was would not have caused the accident but for the negligent act of the boys in meddling with it, and the defendant therefore is not liable—Murphy v. Caralli (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 16), per Bramwell, B.

A. S. Hill, for the respondent, the plaintiff, contended that as the jury had found their verdict for the plaintiff, they must be taken to have found that there was no contributory negligence on his part; and that Hughes v. M'Fie (2 H. & C. 744; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 177) was distinguishable, because here there was not, as in that case, any joint action between the plaintiff and the boy who turned the handle of the machine.

[BRAMWELL, B.—If the machine had been of a delicate construction, and had been damaged by the boy, could not the defendant have had an action against him?]

POLLOCK, C.B.—There is no foundation for this action, and there must therefore be judgment for the appellant.

MARTIN, B.—The plaint states that the defendant permitted the machine to remain in the street unprotected, “whereby the plaintiff was injured.” Now that is not so, for the injury was directly caused by the act of the other boy. Whatever negligence there was in leaving the machine as it was, and giving the other boy an opportunity of turning the handle, was far too remote to impose any liability on the defendant for the injury done to the plaintiff.

The Judge ought to have told the jury there was no negligence on the part of the defendant.

BRAMWELL, B.—If the machine had been painted with poisonous paint, and the plaintiff had sucked the paint, would the defendant have been liable? Would it not have been the fault of those who allowed the child to be there unprotected? Suppose the defendant again to place the machine as it was before, could he be said to be wilfully doing wrong? He had a perfect right to exhibit his goods, and is not liable for the effects of an accident caused by the improper meddling of the plaintiff and his companion. The word "negligence" has been very much misused in cases like this.

Judgment for the appellant

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 30, 1866.

CAVELL AND ANOTHER v. PRINCE.

35 L. J. Ex. 162; L. R. 1 Ex. 246; 15 L. T. 83; 14 W. R. 968;
12 Jur. N.S. 475.

Contract — Consideration — Marriage — Equitable Plea — Impotence of Husband.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—To a declaration on a covenant in a deed executed in anticipation of marriage, whereby the defendant covenanted to pay an annuity during the life of his intended son-in-law, the defendant pleaded on equitable grounds that the marriage was null and void by reason of the husband's impotence, and that the consideration for the deed had wholly failed:—Held, a bad plea.

Declaration on a deed executed in anticipation of the marriage of J. S. C. and the defendant's daughter, wherein the defendant covenanted to pay the plaintiffs (who were trustees under the deed), in consideration of the marriage, an annuity of 200*l.* by half-yearly payments, during the life of the said J. S. C. or until he should become bankrupt or an insolvent debtor within the meaning of any act of parliament. There were averments "that the said intended marriage was afterwards solemnized, and that the said J. S. C. was still living and had not become bankrupt or an insolvent debtor within the meaning of any act of parliament for the relief of insolvent debtors; and that of the said annuity the sum of 200*l.*, being the amount of two half-yearly payments thereof, was due and unpaid by the defendants to the said J. S. C."

Fourth plea,—upon equitable grounds—that the deed was made by and between the defendant and the plaintiffs, as trustees for the said J. S. C. and the defendant, in consideration of the marriage of the said J. S. C. with the defendant's daughter, and of such marriage being a valid marriage, and of the said J. S. C. being competent to contract the same, whereas in truth and in fact the said marriage was not a valid marriage, nor was the said J. S. C. competent to contract the same, but the said marriage was always null and void by reason of the impotence of the said J. S. C. of which the defendant had no notice at the time of the making of the said deed, and that the defendant's daughter had never been able to cohabit with the said J. S. C. by reason of his said impotence and the consideration for the deed had wholly failed.

Demurrer and joinder.

Keane (with him Haselfoot), in support of the demurrer, contended that the marriage, even if voidable, was at any rate not void on the ground stated in the plea. It could only be declared void by a competent Court; besides, its validity could be impugned on the ground of impotence by one of the parties only, and not by a third person. He cited Boehmer's Principia Juris Canonici, edit. 1785, par. 384.¹

Beresford, in support of the plea.—The Court must look to the real contract between the parties. It was not the mere solemnization of the marriage that was to make the defendant liable to pay the annuity during the life of J. S. C. Consummation of the marriage was the real consideration.

[POLLOCK, C.B. referred to Hall v. Wright (El. B. El. 746; 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 43).]

In such a case as this mere consent cannot make the marriage valid.

The Court held that the plea was bad.—They referred to H., falsely called C. v. C., (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Pr. M. & A. 81, per Bramwell B. 92), where Bramwell, B. said, "There seems some uncertainty whether such marriages are absolutely null or only voidable. The difference may be this, that they are valid at common law unless avoided—null by the law ecclesiastical." They also observed that it did not appear that the marriage had been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction; and that impotence could not be set up by a third party as a reason for the marriage being null and void, when neither husband nor wife had elected to treat it so.

Judgment for the plaintiffs

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 1, 1866.

BRIGGS v. OLIVER.

35 L. J. Ex. 163; 4 H. & C. 403; 14 L. T. 412; 14 W. R. 658.

Negligence—Prima facie Evidence—"Res ipsa loquitur"—Nonsuit.

NEGLIGENCE—The plaintiff going to the doorway of a house in which the defendant had offices, was pushed out of the way by a servant of the defendant, who was watching a packing-case which belonged to the defendant, and was leaning against the wall of the house. The plaintiff fell, and the packing-case fell on his foot and injured him. There was no evidence as to who placed the packing-case against the wall or what caused its fall:—Held, by Bramwell, B. and Pigott, B. (dissentiente Martin, B.), that there was a prima facie case against the defendant to go to the jury, the fall of the packing-case being some evidence that it had been improperly placed against the wall.

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the alleged negligence of the defendant's servant.

(1) This paragraph is as follows: Impedimenta dirimentia privata descendunt (i.) ex metu, (ii.) ex dolo (iii.) ex errore circa personam, vel circa statum ejus civilem, (iv.) ex impotentia coeundi antecedenti absoluta et perpetua. Hujus probatio non peragitur confessione conjugis, sed inspectione oculari per peritos instituenda: ex qua si definiri satis nequit perpetuumne an temporarium impedimentum, medicamentis vel mora tollendum, tum ad triennii experimentum est excurrendum, ut si per id tempus, a contractis nuptiis computandum nullo successu ad Venerem nitantur, post triennium matrimonium dissolvatur, dummodo impotentia confirmetur juramento conjugis, vel utriusque si impotens eam non diffitetur vel saltim actoris, si impotens contradicit. Ceterum ob impedimentum dirimens privatum non nisi ei cujus interest jus agendi competit: eoque juri suo renunciante matrimonium convalescit et subsistit.

At the trial, before the Recorder of the Manchester Court of Record, it was proved that the plaintiff went to the door of a house in Manchester to call at the office of a person named Gregory. The defendant occupied premises in the same house, and a packing-case belonging to him was leaning against the wall of the house close to the door. A servant of the defendant gave the plaintiff a push, no reason for which was assigned, but it was suggested that it was done to push him out of the way of the falling packing-case. The plaintiff fell into the road, and the packing-case fell on his foot and injured it. There was no evidence at all given to account for the fall. It was proved, however, that the defendant's servant was watching the case. The Recorder nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence.

A rule nisi, pursuant to leave reserved to set aside the nonsuit and enter a verdict for 30l. if the Court should think that there was evidence to go to the jury, having been obtained,—

C. Pollock shewed cause.—There was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant or his servant, and the accident itself was no proof of negligence. This fact distinguishes the case from Byrne v. Boadle (2 H. & C. 722; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 13) and Scott v. the London Dock Company (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 17: affirmed in Exchequer Chamber, ibid. 220). The rule is rightly laid down by Williams, J., in Cotton v. Wood (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 568; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 333), that where the evidence is equally consistent with either view,—the existence or non-existence of negligence,—it is not competent for the Judge to leave the matter to the jury.

Prentice supported the rule.—This case is stronger than either of those cited, and, as was said in those cases, res ipsa loquitur to prove negligence. The plaintiff was lawfully on the highway, and was injured by the defendant's packing-case, which there was sufficient evidence to shew was under the control of the defendant's servant.

Pigott, B.—In my judgment there was evidence to go to the jury of the defendant's negligence. The packing-case was the defendant's, and it was lodged against the wall, and there was some evidence that the defendant's servant was watching it. It fell from its own weight and, as I infer, from having been improperly placed against the wall, for there is no evidence of its having been disturbed in any way so as to fall. I think that upon those facts there was evidence of negligence; for they are not equally consistent with the existence or non-existence of negligence, packing-cases not being in the habit of falling unless there has been some negligence in the way in which they have been propped up.

Bramwell, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion; and I quite agree that we should be overruling the cases of Byrne v. Boadle (2 H. & C. 722; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 13) and Scott v. the London Dock Company (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 17: affirmed in Exchequer Chamber, ibid. 220) if we held that there was no evidence of negligence in this case. Every case must, no doubt, depend upon its own particular circumstances. Now, there was abundant evidence that the defendant was responsible for this packing-case. It was close to his premises, belonged to him, and his servant, as was not denied, was watching it; and therefore if it was in an unsafe position and did anybody damage he was responsible. Then, was there any evidence that it was in an unsafe position? To my mind, there was; and, as has been said, res ipsa loquitur. Packing-cases do not fall naturally and of their own accord when they are carefully placed in a proper position; and we have no right to assume that something was done to this packing-case by somebody else, not the defendant's servant, so as to cause its fall. Therefore there was a prima facie case of negligence, just as in the other cases cited, in one of which it was said that casks of flour do not roll out of window naturally, and therefore that if one is being handed out and falls, it is owing to the negligence of the persons handing it out; and in the other, that if a bag of sugar is being let down in a sling and it falls out, it is prima facie owing to its having been put in the sling in a negligent manner. The substance of this case is, that a packing-case, for which the defendant was responsible, fell on the plaintiff and injured him; and it seems to me that, in reason as well as according to authority, there was a prima facie case against the defendant to go to the jury; and it would be for them to say whether they were or were not satisfied that there was negligence on the defendant's part.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the Recorder was right, and that there was no evidence to go to the jury in this case. A man went to a house for the purpose of making an inquiry of a person who was standing in the doorway, and he was pushed aside and fell, and in his falling a packing-case fell on his foot. That is the whole of the evidence. How the packing-case was placed there, and how it came to be knocked down, there was no evidence whatever. I do not think I am overruling any decided case. Every case must depend on its own facts, and it is idle to say that this case is governed by a decision in a case where a bag of flour fell from a doorway at the top of a building. The declaration alleges that by reason of the defendant's negligence the matter complained of occurred. What possible evidence is there of that? It is all surmise and imagination. The fallacy that, as it seems to me, lies at the bottom of all these cases is, that the plaintiff is excused from proving negligence on the defendant's part, because the person who knows whether there was, in fact, negligence or not, is the defendant's servant. The plaintiff might have called him; and it is not to be assumed that he would have told an untruth about it. But he was not called; and it was said, as has been said in many of these cases, that it was for the defendant to disprove negligence. I think that that is bad reasoning and bad law. My view of the matter is that stated by Mr. Justice Williams in the case of Cotton v. Wood (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 568; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 333). It is a matter of the first importance that, where the existence or non-existence of negligence is equally consistent with the facts, the Judge ought not to leave the case to the jury. It may be that there was negligence in this case; but it was consistent with the evidence that there was none. I find it said by Chief Justice Erle in the same case, that a plaintiff is not entitled to have his case left to the jury unless he give some affirmative evidence of negligence. I entirely concur in that; and therefore I think that in this case the plaintiff was rightly nonsuited.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 2, 1866.

PRICHARD v. TIMOTHY AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. Ex. 165; 14 L. T. 443.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 192, 194.—Registration of Deed.

BANKRUPTCY.—A deed of assignment, made between a debtor of the first part, "trustees for themselves and the rest of the creditors parties thereto" of the second part, and "the other persons whose names and seals were thereto subscribed and set, being creditors," of the third part, contained an assignment of all the debtor's estate and effects to the trustees, in trust to pay the trustees and the other persons parties thereto of the third part "who should execute the deed within twenty-one days from the date thereof" their several debts; with a provision that such creditors as did not assent within such further time, not exceeding thirty days, as the trustees should declare, should be excluded from all benefit thereunder:—Held, that this was a deed professing to be for the benefit of all the creditors; and that, according to the 194th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, it could not be received in evidence before registration.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the Anglesey County Court.

The action was brought to recover 40*l.* for half a year's use and occupation of the Railway Hotel at Llanfair, in the county of Anglesey. The plaintiff sought to prove at the trial that one Lloyd was tenant of the hotel to the plaintiff, and that half a year's rent was due on the 13th of May, 1864. It appeared that on the 16th of March, 1864, Lloyd executed an assignment to the defendants of all his personal estate and effects "for (according to the case stated by the Judge) the equal benefit of his creditors"; and immediately after the execution of the deed the defendants entered into possession of Lloyd's effects in the hotel.

The solicitor who prepared the deed of assignment was called upon to produce it at the trial; and on its production it was found not to be registered under the provisions of the 192nd and the 194th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, whereupon the defendant's counsel objected to the deed being admitted in evidence.

The Judge held that the deed was inadmissible in evidence because it was not registered, and gave a verdict for the defendants.

The question for the Court was, whether the Judge was right or wrong in ruling that the deed was inadmissible in evidence.

The deed (which was appended to the case stated by the Judge) was expressed to be made between Lloyd of the first part; the defendants, "trustees for themselves and the rest of the creditors parties thereto," of the second part; and, "the several other persons whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed and set, being respectively creditors of Lloyd," of the third part. After reciting that Lloyd was indebted to the parties of the second and third parts in the several sums set opposite their respective names in the schedule, and that he was unable to pay in full, &c., the deed witnessed that the debtor assigned all his estate and effects, &c. to the trustees, upon trust to collect and receive, &c., and out of the monies to be received to pay the expenses of the deed, "and in the next place to pay, retain and satisfy, ratably and proportionably, and without any preference or priority to themselves, the trustees and their partners, and the other persons, parties thereto of the third part who should execute the deed within twenty-one days from the date thereof the several debts or sums set opposite to their respective names in the schedule thereto." There was also a provision that "such of the creditors as should not execute or assent in writing to take the benefit of the deed on or before the 16th of April next, or within such further time, not exceeding thirty days, as the trustees shall declare, should be excluded from all benefit under the deed."

Joseph Brown, for the appellant.—This deed is not within the 192nd or the 194th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, for it is clearly only for the benefit of certain creditors, and cannot be regarded as a deed for the equal benefit of all of them—Dewhurst v. Kershaw (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 146).

[BRAMWELL, B.—If all were to subscribe in time, would it not be for the benefit of all?]

It may become for the benefit of all, if all subscribe within the time limited. But that should have been found as a fact in the case. Whether the deed be for the benefit of all or not must be determined from the terms of the deed itself. That is really the effect of the decision of this Court in Hodgson v. Wightman (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 147), where Wilde, B. said that, "the 194th section applied to all deeds which are, or which profess to be, or are obviously on the face of them deeds of arrangement between the debtor and the whole body of his creditors." Now this deed, on the face of it, is for the benefit of those only of the creditors who sign within the time limited. In Berridge v. Abbot (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 507) a deed like this was virtually held not to be for the benefit of all the creditors.

Macnamara (with whom was Robins) contended for the respondents that, according to Hodgson v. Wightman (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 147), the Judge was right in excluding the deed; and cited Ex parte Wensley (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 23), where the Lord Chancellor said that the deed, as the act of the bankrupt, and as against the bankrupt, even if not registered, might always be received in evidence to undo the deed itself, but that it could not, without registration, be received as proof of any title or release under it.

MARTIN, B.—We are all of opinion that the learned Judge was right in excluding this deed from evidence. It seems to me that the case of Hodgson v. Wightman (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 147) is directly in point, and that, if the Judge had ruled otherwise, he would have overruled that case. We are to look at what this deed professes to be on the face of it. Now, the deed professes to be a deed between the debtor of the first part; the defendants, trustees for themselves and the rest of the creditors, of the second part; and the several other persons whose names and seals are thereunto subscribed as being creditors, of the third part. Now, according to the authorities, this may not have been a good deed to bar a dissenting creditor from setting up his debt; but that is not the test under the 194th section; there the test is, whether or not the deed professes to be an agreement between the debtor and the whole of his creditors. Now, I think the object of the debtor was to bar the whole of the creditors by giving them a composition according to the terms comprised in this deed. If Hodgson v. Wightman (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 147) is not to be overruled, the defendants are entitled to our judgment. We must give a construction to the 194th section according to what we can perceive was the object of the act of parliament. When we can see the object, we must carry the act out according to its spirit; but when we can hardly say what was the object of the legislature, then we must give a literal construction to the words used; we can only say the legislature have thought fit to say so-and-so, and it is our duty to carry out whatever the legislature have enacted. As I have had occasion to say before, I have never given or read, to my mind, a satisfactory judgment upon these sections of the act of parliament.

BRAMWELL, B.—I will only say that, as the case stands, the learned Judge was quite right. The case states, that on a given day Lloyd executed an assignment to the defendant of all his personal estate and effects for the equal benefit of his creditors: that means all his creditors. We are told that we must look at the deed itself, to see whether it is for their benefit. I think the deed shews the same thing, because any one of the creditors might have executed it if he thought fit, so that it was for the benefit of all the creditors if they had thought fit to execute it.

PICOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. If the 194th section applied only to deeds under the 192nd, the legislature would have said so. It extends beyond deeds under the 192nd section, and it includes such deeds as the present one. I may say that, if we were to adopt the plaintiff's construction, it is impossible to conceive what the difficulties of the Judges would be; for whenever one of these deeds was offered in evidence, the Judge at the trial would have to examine all the cases in point, and see if the deed was good under the 192nd section, and then say whether it was admissible or not. It was this very difficulty which, in my opinion, the legislature intended to avoid.

Judgment for the respondents.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 8, 1866.

COOMBS v. DIBBLE.

35 L. J. Ex. 167; 4 H. & C. 375; L. R. 1 Ex. 248; 14 L. T. 415; 14 W. R. 676;
12 Jur. N.S. 456.

Gaming and Wagering—Horse Racing—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18.

GAMING AND WAGERING.—An agreement between two persons, each of whom is possessed of a horse, to ride a race, the winner to have both horses, is null and void, being an agreement by way of wagering, within the meaning of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18, and not an agreement to contribute towards a prize to be awarded to the winner of a lawful game, within the meaning of the proviso in that section.

The declaration contained counts in trover and detinue for a horse.

The pleas were not possessed and non detinet, pleaded to the whole declaration.

At the trial, before Byles, J., at the last assizes at Taunton, it was proved that the plaintiff and the defendant, being each possessed of a horse, agreed to ride a race, the winner to have both horses. The race was ridden, and the defendant won. He thereupon came to the plaintiff's house and took away the horse. There was some evidence that the plaintiff voluntarily gave up the horse when the defendant demanded it, but no question as to this was left to the jury, who were asked, first, whether the agreement was made; secondly, whether the race was fairly won by the defendant. They answered both questions in the affirmative; and a verdict was thereupon entered for the defendant, the plaintiff having leave to move to enter a verdict for him for 14*l.*, the value of the horse, if the Court should be of opinion that the property in the horse remained in him, notwithstanding the agreement and the result of the race.

A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Edlin shewed cause. It is contended by the plaintiff that this agreement was null and void, as being by way of wagering; but that is not so, for it is within the proviso of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18, being an agreement to contribute towards a prize to be awarded to the winner of a lawful game.¹ The parties, being each possessed of a horse, agree to put the two together, so as to make a prize for the winner; and the fact that the only persons who contribute to the prize are the two persons who are to race, does not take the case out of the proviso—Batty v. Marriott (5 Com. B. Rep. 818; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 215).

[POLLOCK, C.B.—But there each party put 10*l.* into the hands of a stakeholder. The act contemplated contributions of money, not of horses.]

The contributions mentioned are to any "plate, prize or sum of money." There may be a prize of horses just as much as of money.

[MARTIN, B.—I should have thought that the proviso applied to something totally different from a case of two men racing for a stake contributed between them, but Mr. Justice Cresswell, in his judgment in Batty v. Marriott (5 Com. B. Rep. 818; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 215), distinctly laid

(1) 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18. is as follows: "And be it enacted, that all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made: Provided always, that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or toward any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise."

it down that such a case was within the proviso. POLLOCK, C.B.—But his judgment only speaks of a contribution in money.]

There is no doubt now that horse-racing is a lawful game—Evans v. Pratt (3 M. & G. 759; 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 87).

Prideaux, for the plaintiff, was not heard.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I entertain a clear opinion upon this point in favour of the plaintiff. Two gentlemen agree to ride a race, the winner to have both horses. There is no deposit of the stake, and I think that unless a very constrained force is put on the words of the statute, it cannot be said that this was an agreement to “subscribe or contribute for or toward any plate, prize or sum of money to be awarded to the winner of a lawful game.” To hold that those words apply to a contribution of horses would be to confound barter and sale.

MARTIN, B.—I think that this case falls within the first part of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. s. 18, and not within the proviso in it. The contract was a wager of one horse against another, and the horse was a “valuable thing alleged to be won upon a wager.” As to the proviso, I should be content to take the judgment in Batty v. Marriott (5 Com. B. Rep. 818; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 215) as law; and certainly we ought not to overrule the judgment of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. But I do not think that this case falls within that decision. There was no contribution or fund subscribed in this case. The contract was a void one, and no suit could have been maintained by the winner to recover the horse, and he would not have been justified in taking it by force and keeping it. It ought, however, to have been left to the jury to say whether the horse was not given up by the plaintiff to the defendant, for if it was, I am clearly of opinion that he cannot recover it back.

BRAMWELL, B.—This agreement is clearly within the first part of this section, and the question is, whether it is within the proviso. I accept the case in the Common Pleas as law, and see no reason to be dissatisfied with it as at present advised. I do not say that there may not be a prize of horses, and that parties could not contribute to such a prize so as to be within the meaning of the proviso. But, as my Brother Martin says, there was no contribution of horses here. The winner did not contribute in any way. And on a minute verbal criticism of the words of the act, the case might be held not to come within the proviso. But it was clearly the intention of the legislature that such a case as the present should come within the section and not within the proviso. Therefore, on this view of the question, our judgment will be in the plaintiff's favour. But, at the worst, this was a void contract, and not an illegal one, and if the plaintiff let the defendant take the horse he cannot get it back.

*Judgment for the plaintiff.*²

(2) On the point reserved at the trial, and on which the plaintiff had leave to move to enter a verdict, the judgment of the Court was in the plaintiff's favour; but an opinion having been expressed that the jury ought to have been asked whether the horse was given up by the plaintiff to the defendant, it was directed that the case should be mentioned again next term, an intimation being given that the value of the horse being small, it would be better for the parties to come to some arrangement so as to render a new trial unnecessary. No such arrangement having been come to, a rule for a new trial was ultimately made absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

April 20, May 3, 1866.

HUBBARD v. LEES AND PURDEN.

35 L. J. Ex. 169; 4 H. & C. 418; L. R. 1 Ex. 255; 14 L. T. 442; 14 W. R. 694;
12 Jur. N.S. 435.

Ejectment—Power of Appointment by Will—Requisite Number of Attesting Witnesses—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26.) s. 10.—Evidence—Pedigree—Entries of Births, &c. in New Testament—Certificates.

WILL.—A power to appoint by will attested by three witnesses, given since the passing of the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, is well exercised by means of a will attested by two witnesses in the ordinary way in conformity with the provision of the Wills Act; section 10. of that act applying to powers created subsequently to the coming into operation of the act as well as to powers previously in existence.

EVIDENCE.—In cases where a family pedigree has to be proved, entries of births, deaths and marriages of members of the family made in a New Testament, which is produced by a member of the family and proved to have been in the possession of the family for a considerable time, are admissible in evidence without proof of the handwriting.

The question of identity of a person named in a certificate of birth, death, or marriage with the person to whom the name is alleged to refer, is for the jury, and proof of such identity is not essential to the admissibility in evidence of the document.

Ejectment to recover one undivided fourth part of Shelmore Farm, in the county of Stafford. The defendant Lees, who was tenant to the other defendant, Purden, did not appear; but Purden defended as landlord. The case was tried, before Montague Smith, J., at the last Spring Assizes for Stafford.

Thomas Johnson, of Chebsey, was seised of Shelmore Farm and other real estate, and died intestate leaving two daughters. One of them, Elizabeth, married George Hewitt Landor, in 1838. Previous to the marriage, by a deed of settlement dated the 26th of June, 1838, her real estate, including her moiety of this farm, was conveyed to a trustee to uses, the limitations being to her mother, Mary Johnson, for life; remainder (after certain limitations in favour of herself and intended husband, and the issue of the intended marriage which did not take effect), to such uses as she, Elizabeth Johnson, should, notwithstanding coverture, appoint or devise "by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, with or without power of revocation, to be by her legally executed, or by her last will and testament in writing, or any codicil thereto, to be by her signed and published in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses;" remainder, in default of appointment, to the use of herself, her heirs and assigns. There was no issue of the marriage.

By her will, dated the 1st of April, 1852, attested by two witnesses in the manner prescribed by the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26. s. 9. She exercised her power of appointment in favour of her husband and his heirs. She died in 1852, and her husband died in July, 1856, without issue, and intestate as to his real estate. Mary Johnson, the mother of Elizabeth Johnson, died in August, 1856.

Purden took possession as pretended heir-at-law of George Hewitt Landor. The plaintiff now claimed as true heir-at-law of the same George Hewitt Landor, his relationship being traced in the following way: The plaintiff was the grandson of John Moore, who was the youngest son of Elizabeth Moore, who was the sister of George Hewitt Landor's grandfather. The common ancestor of the plaintiff and George Hewitt Landor was, therefore, the father of Elizabeth Moore.

To prove the births and deaths of the various members of the family, and especially to exhaust the descendants of the elder children of Elizabeth Moore, there were offered in evidence various certificates of births, baptisms, marriages and deaths, to which it was objected that there was no evidence of the identity of the persons named in them with the members of the family of the same name, to whom they were alleged to refer.

There was also tendered in evidence a copy of the New Testament containing entries of the births and deaths of Elizabeth Moore's children. This Testament was produced by Maria Moore, who had received it from her father, James Moore, who was the stepson of Elizabeth Moore. It was further stated by a witness that she had seen the Testament in the possession of Fanny Wells, a daughter of Elizabeth Moore, and that Fanny Wells gave it to her half-brother James Moore, from whom, as mentioned above, it came to the witness who produced it. This book was objected to on behalf of the defendant, on the ground that there was no proof of the handwriting of the entries.

All these documents were admitted in evidence. A verdict was entered for the plaintiff; and the defendant had leave to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for himself if the Court should think them, or any of them, inadmissible, and also if the Court should think that the power of appointment was not properly exercised by Elizabeth Johnson by her will, which was attested by two witnesses only.

J. J. Powell (April 20) moved accordingly, and obtained a rule on all the grounds of objection mentioned above, except that which related to the admissibility of the certificates, upon which the Court refused the rule, on the ground that the question of identity between the persons named in them and the members of the family was for the jury.

Gray and Dowdeswell (May 3) shewed cause.—As to the admissibility of the evidence, entries in family Bibles are admissible without proof of handwriting or authorship, they being what are called quasi records. All that is necessary is to shew that the books come from the proper custody, and to give some account of the way in which the books have been handed down into the possession of the person who produces them. As to the execution of the power, two witnesses were sufficient, the case being provided for by section 10. of the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, the operation of which is not confined to powers of appointment, which were in existence at the time of the passing of that act. That act, after prescribing the formalities to be attended to in the execution of wills, enacts, in section 10, "that no appointment made by will in exercise of any power shall be valid unless the same be executed in manner hereinbefore required, and every will executed in manner hereinbefore required shall, so far as respects the execution and attestation thereof, be a valid execution of a power of appointment by will, notwithstanding it shall have been expressly required that a will made in exercise of such power should be executed, with some additional or other form of execution or solemnity." The judgment of Lord Chancellor Westbury in Taylor v. Meads (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 203), in which West v. Ray (Kay, 385; 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 447) is affirmed, is express that this section applies to powers created subsequently to the passing of the act, although the decision is not on the same point, the question there being whether or not an appointment required to be made under seal was properly exercised by a will executed in the ordinary way. Here power to appoint by will is expressly given.

Powell and H. Matthews, in support of the rule.—Section 10. of the Wills Act only applies to powers existing before the coming into operation of the act. Before that time real estate could only pass under a will attested by three or more witnesses; and many powers of appointment by will which were intended to operate on real estate were required to be exercised by instruments attested by three or more witnesses, because the grantors wished that the same solemnities should attend the appointment by will as would have attended an ordinary devise by will. The legislature, therefore, when they enacted that two witnesses should suffice for a will, thought it only reasonable that the same number should suffice for the exercise by will of powers then in existence. But the section does not apply to powers granted subsequently. If a grantor, knowing that two witnesses only are required for a will, grants a power of appointment by will attested by three witnesses, his intention is clearly that some greater amount of attestation should be required than would be required for a will, and the exercise of the power must conform strictly with his directions. The words "shall have been expressly required" shew that this reading of the section is correct. As to the Testament, it was not admissible. The rule admitting entries in books only applies to family Bibles. In the case of a Testament it must be shewn that the entries were made by some member of the family. In none of the reported cases is it stated that such entries were admitted without any evidence of their authorship.—They referred to 1 Taylor on Evidence, s. 585. (p. 534, 3rd edit.)

MARTIN, B.—We are both of opinion that this rule should be discharged. I am clearly of opinion that the Testament was admissible in evidence. It was proved by a living witness to have been the book of Fanny Wells, and to have been given by her to her half-brother, who was the father of the witness, as her grandfather's book. It came from the proper custody, and to say that it was not admissible until proof had been given of the handwriting is untenable. If the handwriting can be proved you have no occasion to use the entries in the way in which it is sought to use them here at all. It is where Bibles of this kind contain entries so old that it is impossible to produce proof of handwriting, that the evidence becomes important. They are of the nature of records, and if they come from the proper custody, are assumed to have been adopted by persons cognizant of the facts, and are received in evidence accordingly.

Then, with respect to the question arising on the execution of the power of appointment, it seems to me clear that this case falls expressly within the 10th section of the Wills Act, and within what the legislature intended. What the legislature meant to express by that section was this: "We are aware that various appointments are to be made by will, and that the law requires a power to be exercised in the manner directed by the instrument which created it. But inconveniences and mischiefs have arisen, and probably will arise, in consequence of persons who exercise powers of appointment by will believing the ceremonies required for the execution of a will to be sufficient for the execution of a power by will. We think that we sufficiently protect the execution of the power if we enact that when the power is to be exercised by will, it shall be exercised in the manner required for a will by this act, though some additional ceremony or other form of execution may have been mentioned in the instrument creating the power." That is the simple meaning of the section according to plain language and good sense, and it was calculated to protect all parties, while laying aside mere matters of form, as far as practicable. I am requested by my Brother Montague Smith to say that he did not reserve this matter from any doubt about it, but because the cause was the last cause tried at the assizes, and he was unwilling, through want of time for deliberation, to do anything that might turn out to be an error.

BRAMWELL, B. concurred.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 30, 1866.

PEARSON v. PEARSON.

35 L. J. Ex. 172; L. R. 1 Ex. 308; 14 L. T. 596; 12 Jur. N.S. 589.

See Latham v. Lafone, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 97; L. R. 2 Ex. 115; 15 L. T. 627; 15 W. R. 453 (Ex.). Reviewed and not applied, Ex parte Atkinson, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. Bk. 10; L. R. 9 Eq. 736; 22 L. T. 279; 18 W. R. 598 (C. J.). Approved, Benecke v. Whittall, [1872] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. P.C. 81; L. R. 2 App. Cas. 602; 37 L. T. 73; 25 W. R. 913 (P.C.).

The Bankruptcy Act, 1861, was repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83. s. 20.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), ss. 192, 194, 197.—Deed of Assignment—Registration.

BANKRUPTCY.—Section 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, applies only to deeds which have been registered in conformity with the regulations contained in section 192. It is not sufficient, therefore, to bring a deed within the operation of section 197, that it has been properly registered under section 194.

Money had and received, and money due on accounts stated.

Plea—That after the accruing of the plaintiff's claim, and after the 11th of October, 1861, the plaintiff was indebted to divers persons, and thereupon a deed, bearing date the 24th of October, 1865, was made and entered into by and between the plaintiff of the one part and Robert John Wright and Robert Easton, as and being trustees on behalf of the thereunder signed creditors of the plaintiff, of the other part, relating to the debts and liabilities of the plaintiff and his release therefrom. And the plaintiff thereby conveyed all his estate and effects to the said Robert John Wright and Robert Easton absolutely as trustees, to be by them applied and administered for the benefit of the creditors of the plaintiff, in like manner as if the plaintiff had been at the date thereof duly adjudged bankrupt. And all things necessary in that behalf having happened and been done to render the said deed binding on the creditors of the plaintiff under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and to vest the debts and causes of action in the declaration mentioned in the said trustees, the said debts and causes of action became, and were, and are, vested in the said Robert John Wright and Robert Easton, as such trustees, for the benefit of the plaintiff's creditors as aforesaid.

Replication—That the said deed was registered under and by virtue of section 194. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and the same was not, under and according to section 192. of the said act, within twenty-eight days from the day of the execution of the said deed, produced and left, having been first duly stamped, at the office of the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, for the purpose of being registered; and together with such deed there was not delivered to the said Chief Registrar an affidavit by the plaintiff or some person able to depose thereto, or a certificate by the said trustees or either of them, that a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of the defendant, whose debts amounted to 10l. and upwards, had in writing assented to and approved of the said deed, and stating the amount in value of the property and credits of the plaintiff comprised in such deed.

Demurrer, and joinder therein.

Dowdeswell, in support of the demurrer.—Section 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, vests causes of action relating to the debtor's estate in the trustees on registration either under section 192. or section 194.

[MARTIN, B.—In Ex parte Morgan (1 De Gex, J. & S. 300; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 15) Lord Chancellor Westbury said, "In like manner the 197th section, a most important one, plainly relates only to such deeds as come within the 192nd section, that is, deeds registered in the office of the Chief Registrar. Ex parte Spyer (Ibid. 318; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 62) is to the same effect.]

But the decisions in those cases were on the 198th section, and not on the 197th section, the words of which, "every such deed or instrument," apply equally to the deeds mentioned in section 194. and those in section 192.

[MARTIN, B.—But section 198. begins with the words "after notice of the filing and registration of such deed," and "such deed" was held to be confined to deeds registered under section 192. BRAMWELL, B.—Section 197. speaks of the "debtor and creditors and trustees, parties to such deed," which seems to imply that deeds under section 192. were contemplated.]

On the other hand, the words "debtor and creditors and trustees, parties to such deed, or who have assented thereto, or are bound thereby," shews that the section was intended to apply to creditors who were not bound by the deed, i.e. creditors in cases where the deed, though registered under section 194, was not binding on non-assenting creditors under section 192.

E. L. O'Malley, in support of the replication, was not heard.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The question is, whether section 197. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is to be considered as applying to deeds registered under section 194, but not in conformity with the provisions of section 192. Is the 194th section to be considered as parenthetical only, or as carrying along with it all the provisions from section 190. to section 197, so that if a deed be within section 194. section 197. will apply to it, and transfer the debtor's causes of action to the trustees? Looking to the scope of the act, it appears to me that the latter is not the construction to be put upon it, and that the clause is really parenthetical, the construction put upon it by Lord Chancellor Westbury being the true one. The debt is not transferred to the assignees, and therefore I am of opinion that judgment should be for the plaintiff.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. As I had occasion to say before, and as I say now, I have never given a judgment upon this act of parliament which was satisfactory to my own mind. I do trust that in a future act of parliament the provisions made by the legislature will be such that we shall be able to give satisfactory judgments upon them, not founded upon surmises and remote inferences proceeding from very small premises. It seems to me that this 194th section is in the nature of a parenthesis; and I cannot think that it was the intention of the legislature that a debtor, by framing a deed and putting it in his pocket, should be able, without the concurrence of a single creditor, to transfer the whole of his property, including his debts, to his assignee. I think that the judgment of Lord Chancellor Westbury, in a case turning on the 198th section, in which he mentioned a decision of mine given at chambers, and stated it to be correct, concludes this case (Semble Ex parte Smith, 10 Law Times Rep. N.S. 551). He held there that the 198th section only applies to a deed under the 192nd, and not to a deed under the 194th. Mr. Dowdeswell suggests that section 198. speaks of "notice of the filing and registration of such deed"; and that as the 192nd section is the only section which requires notice, the 198th section was therefore held to apply only to deeds registered under the 192nd. But I think that the words "such deed" in section 197. and 198. must be taken to have the same meaning.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that our present construction of this section 197. is open to the remark, that we read "every such deed," which presumably includes every such deed as is mentioned in the preceding clauses, as if there was a limitation of it to "every such deed as first aforesaid," or, "as in the 192nd section aforesaid." That is the prima facie objection to the construction. But if the plaintiff's contention is right, the extraordinary state of things might arise which has been pointed out, that a deed executed by a debtor, without the assent of a single one of his creditors, would have the effect of transferring all his effects to his own self-elected trustees. Therefore, we start with some ground for such an interposition as I have suggested. Then there is, I think, a very good reason for saying that an interposition of some such words should be made because it is admitted that section 198, which has the words "such deed," does not include deeds registered under section 194. It is admitted therefore that even if we do not insert and interpose such words as I have suggested in section 197, we must do so when we come to section 198. If the interposition must be made in one section, there is no reason why it should not be made in the other; and there is the additional reason for doing it in this case, to avoid the absurdity of property passing in the manner which has been suggested.

Again, section 197. speaks of parties who are bound by the deed. Mr. Dowdeswell has very ingeniously suggested that that may mean "every such deed or instrument as well where parties assenting are bound by it as where there are no such parties." I cannot say it might not have that meaning if all other reasons concurred for putting such a meaning upon it. But here I think that the reasons are all the other way. If that had been intended the more accurate way of expressing it would have been to have said, "From and after the registration of such deed or instrument, as well where parties not executing it are to be bound by it, as where there are no such parties." If this really was the intention of the legislature there is undoubtedly an inaccuracy, or an uncertainty in the mode of expressing it, and the reason of the thing together with the admitted necessity of adding words to section 198, even if they are not added to section 197, concur to make me read the 197th section as though it contained some such words limiting it to deeds registered under section 192, as I have described.

CHANNELL, B.—I agree with the rest of the Court in thinking that our judgment should be for the plaintiff, but not entirely upon the grounds which have been explained. Apart from the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, no effect could be given to an assignment of a debt or chose in action so as to entitle the assignee to sue in his own name; and the defence which is set up by the plea is a defence founded upon this, that in effect the debt had vested in the trustees by operation of the act of 1861, no reference being made to any particular section of the act, so as to entitle them to sue, and to disentitle the original party, the assignor, to sue in his own name. The answer set up in the replication is, that although everything may have been done in the way of registration that is required to satisfy section 194, yet the provisions of section 192. have not been complied with. I do not adopt the argument of the plaintiff, that if section 194, quoad registration, is complied with it is unnecessary to consider whether, as regards registration, the 192nd has been complied with. It appears to me that the 192nd section contemplates a certain deed, which is particularly described in that section; and the section goes on to provide, but not completely, for the registration of that deed, the completion of the provisions for registration being continued in the 193rd section. Taking the two sections together, we have two matters; first, a particular description of a certain kind of deed, and then a provision for its registration. The 194th section must, I think, be considered as introduced as it were by way of parenthesis. My decision is not founded at all upon the fact that you may not register if you do it properly, according to the 192nd section, a deed which is not binding on non-assenting creditors under the 192nd section, but comes within the 194th. But the 197th section is one that gives effect to registration, and I apprehend that, although the 194th section may refer to a different deed from that which is described in the 192nd, yet the legislature intended that, unless the deed has complied, quoad registration, with the provisions of the 192nd section, the 197th section should have no effect. There is, therefore, nothing to give a right on the part of the trustees to sue, and, consequently nothing to disentitle the original assignor to sue in his own name for the benefit of the assignee.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 11, 1866.

LEE v. WILMOT.

35 L. J. Ex. 175; 4 H. & C. 469; L. R. 1 Ex. 364; 14 L. T. 627; 14 W. R. 993.

See Chasemore v. Turner, [1876] E. R. A.; 45 L. J. Q.B. 66; L. R. 10 Q.B. 500; 33 L. T. 323; 24 W. R. 70 (Ex. Ch.); Green v. Humphreys, [1884] E. R. A.; 53 L. J. Ch. 625; 26 Ch. D. 474; 51 L. T. 42 (C. A.); Firth v. Slingsby, 1888, 58 L. T. 481 (Ch. D.); Cooper v. Kendall, [1909] E. R. A.; 78 L. J. K.B. 580; [1909] 1 K.B. 405; 100 L. T. 251 (C. A.).

Statute of Limitations—Acknowledgment—Implied Promise to Pay—
9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1.

LIMITATIONS (STATUTES OF).—A letter written by a debtor before the debt was barred by the Statute of Limitations in the following terms—"It is quite true that I have not sent you any money for years; but really I have none of my own. We just manage to exist on my wife's; at least, on what is left of hers. We have hard work to get on; but I will try to pay you a little at a time, if you will let me. I am sure that I am anxious to get out of your debt. I will endeavour to send to you a little next week":—Held (per Bramwell, B. and Channell, B., Martin, B. dissentiente), a sufficient acknowledgment to take the debt out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

Declaration on a promissory note, made on the 20th of August, 1859, for 29l.

Plea—The Statute of Limitations.

The writ was issued on the 19th of September, 1866.

At the trial, before Pigott, B., the plaintiff produced in evidence the following letter, written to him by the defendant on the 13th of August, 1863:

"Dear Sir,—Your letter has reached me at last, after having been half over England. It is quite true that I have not sent you any money for years; but really I have none of my own. We just manage to exist on my wife's; at least, on what is left of hers. We have hard work to get on; but I will try to pay you a little at a time, if you will let me. I am sure that I am anxious to get out of your debt. I will endeavour to send you a little next week. And I remain, yours truly,

"F. S. Wilmot."

The plaintiff relied on this letter as a sufficient acknowledgment in writing to take the case out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

A verdict was entered for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, the defendant having leave to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant. A rule having been obtained accordingly,

A. Wills shewed cause. The rule is clearly established that to take a debt out of the operation of the statute there must be, in writing, either an express promise to pay or an acknowledgment or admission of the debt, so distinct and unqualified that the law will imply a promise to pay from it—9 Geo. 4. c. 14. s. 1, Chitty on Contracts, p. 726, 6th edit., Tanner v. Smart (6 B. & C. 603). If there is a conditional promise to pay it is further necessary to shew that the condition has been fulfilled. But as to this the construction depends on whether the acknowledgment or promise was made before or after the debt was barred by the statute. In Cornforth v. Smithard (5 Hurl. & N. 13; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 228) the debtor, in a letter written before the debt was barred, said, "I am ashamed the account has stood so long. I must beg to trespass on your kindness a short time longer, till a turn in trade takes place, as for some time things have been very flat." It was held that this was an unqualified acknowledgment and not a conditional promise, because it was written at a time when the debtor was not in a position to impose any condition on his promise to pay.

[CHANNELL, B.—That was the first case in which a distinction was drawn between acknowledgments given before and after the time when the debt became barred.]

In this case the debt was not barred in 1863 when the letter was written. The cases all shew that an acknowledgment is sufficient, unless its terms are inconsistent with a promise to pay. In Smith v. Thorne (18 Q.B. Rep. 145; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 199) and Rackham v. Marriott (2 Hurl. & N. 196; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 315), statements by debtors that they hoped to be able to pay at some future time were held not to take the case out of the statute, for the simple reason that the terms in which they were couched were inconsistent with an unqualified promise to pay. The cases of A'Court v. Cross (3 Bing. 328) and Sidwell v. Mason (2 Hurl. & N. 306; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 407) establish the same principle.

C. Crompton supported the rule.—Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. 4. c. 14, makes no difference in the law as to what will take a debt out of the operation of the statute; it merely requires that written proof should be required where previously parol evidence would have sufficed. Before that statute a parol acknowledgment without a promise would have been insufficient. This case is not different from Tanner v. Smart (6 B. & C. 603). It is not enough for the creditor to produce an acknowledgment which is not inconsistent with a promise to pay. In the recent case of Cockrill v. Sparke (1 H. & C. 699; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 118) the letter of a surety for a person named Hilder, "I agree to your receiving the dividend under Hilder's assignment, and do agree that your so doing shall not prejudice your claim against me for the same debt," was held not a sufficient acknowledgment of his own debt as surety to take the case out of the statute, and yet it was not inconsistent with a promise to pay. If in Rackham v. Marriott (2 Hurl. & N. 196; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 315) a mere hope, expressed too before the debt was barred, was not sufficient, still less ought a letter like the present to be held sufficient.

[BRAMWELL, B.—Was any objection made to the admission of this letter in evidence, that it was an answer to another letter, which ought to have been produced.]

No. In addition to the cases cited above, reference was made to Hurst v. Parker (1 B. & Ad. 93), Fearn v. Lewis (6 Bing. 349; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 95), Collis v. Stack (1 Hurl. & N. 605; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 138), Phillips v. Phillips (3 Hare, 299, 300), and Cawley v. Furnell (12 Com. B. Rep. 291; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 197).

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that there was evidence in this case to take the debt out of the operation of the Statute of Limitations, and, therefore, that this rule should be discharged. There must be, according to Lord Tenterden's Act, an acknowledgment or promise in writing. I doubt if the statute meant two different things when it said "acknowledgment or promise." If the acknowledgment is explicit, a promise to pay is inferred from it; but, however distinct it may be if accompanied with a refusal to pay, the inference of a promise is rebutted. I think that this letter does contain an acknowledgment, and that there is nothing in it which fairly excludes the implication of a promise.

BRAMWELL, B.—I also think that this rule should be discharged. It is clear that, if there had been some words omitted from the letter, it would be sufficient to take the case out of the statute, and yet, because the debtor goes on to state his intention to do his best to pay, it is said that the letter is insufficient, not because those words qualify what has gone before, but because it is said that they disprove any promise to pay. I think that, on the ground put by my Brother Channell, this is a sufficient acknowledgment. No objection was raised at the trial to the admissibility of the letter to which this was a reply, and which might have thrown light on this, and so none can be taken here.

MARTIN, B.—My opinion is, that this letter is not sufficient. The law is sufficiently laid down in 2 Wms. Saund. 64, h, i,—"To take the case out of the Statute of Limitations the document must either contain a promise to pay the debt, or an acknowledgment in writing, from which such promise can be inferred." In my judgment, the proper mode is not to look at what has been done in the case of other writings, but to look at this one only. The letter must have been in reply to an application for money. If it had stopped after the words "we have had hard work to get on," it would have been impossible to imply a promise to pay, and the words which follow do not contain one. I think that this rule should be made absolute.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 25, 1866.

In the matter of the succession of HENRY RICHARD CHARLES,
EARL COWLEY.

35 L. J. Ex. 177; 4 H. & C. 476; L. R. 1 Ex. 288; 14 W. R. 836;
12 Jur. N.S. 607.

Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 21, 22, 44.—Value of the Succession—Deduction for Expense of Management and Collection of Rents—Necessary Outgoings—Payments by Trustees.

DEATH DUTIES.—A testator devised real estate to trustees upon trust out of the rents to pay the interest on certain mortgage debts, and also certain annuities, and to pay the surplus to a cestui que trust for life, with remainder over. Power was given by the will to the trustees to pay certain sums to agents or receivers for collecting the rents:—Held, that in estimating the value of the succession of the cestui que trust no allowance was to be made for these payments for collection.

In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46) extended.

This was an appeal by petition, under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 50, against an assessment made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of the value of the succession of Henry Richard Charles, Earl Cowley, to real estate, under the will of William Richard Arthur, Earl of Mornington.

By his will, dated the 27th of June, 1863, the Earl of Mornington, after bequeathing certain legacies and annuities, and among others an annuity of 4,000*l.*, directed to be paid out of the income of the general residuary estate, devised his real estate to William Bulkeley Glasse and Andrew Alfred Collyer-Bristowe upon trust, out of the rents and profits to pay the interest of the mortgage debts charged thereon, to keep up the mansion-house at Draycot, and such farm-buildings as the lessees were not bound to keep in repair, to pay such portions of the annuities as the annual income of the residuary personal estate should be insufficient to satisfy, and subject and charged as above upon trust for Earl Cowley for life, with remainders over.

The petition set out the following proviso in the will: "Provided always, and I hereby authorize my trustees or trustee for the time being, during such time as my said manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, or such of them as for the time being shall be unsold, shall remain subject to the payment of any mortgage debt charged thereon, at the time of my decease, and during such time as the said annuities hereinbefore bequeathed, or any of them, shall continue payable, to permit and authorize any person who, but for the charges and provisions as to management created and contained by and in this my will, would, under and by virtue of this my will, be, for the time being, entitled to the possession of my said freehold manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, personally to occupy my said mansion-house at Draycot, and the offices, outbuildings, orchards, gardens, pleasure-grounds, parks, lands, woods, and plantations thereto belonging. And I expressly direct that, during such time as my said manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, or such of them as for the time being shall be unsold, shall remain subject to the payment of any mortgage debt charged thereon at the time of my decease, and during such time as the said annuity of 4,000*l.* to the said Lucile Bruchet shall continue payable, the said William Bulkeley Glasse and Andrew Alfred Collyer-Bristowe, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, their or his assigns shall continue in the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the said hereditaments and premises (but without prejudice always to the trust last aforesaid, as to the occupation of the said mansion-house and premises as last aforesaid), and manage and superintend the management of the same premises, and may cut timber and underwood from time to time in the usual course for sale or repairs, or otherwise, and may erect, pull down and repair houses and other buildings and erections, and drain or otherwise improve all or any of the said premises, and insure houses, buildings and other property against loss or damage by fire, and make allowances to and arrangements with tenants and others, and accept surrenders of leases and tenancies, and generally may deal with the premises as if they or he were the absolute owners or owner thereof, without being answerable for any loss or damage which may happen thereby. And I authorize the said William Bulkeley Glasse and Andrew Alfred Collyer-Bristowe, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, their or his assigns, during such times as last aforesaid, to appoint stewards or a steward of any manors or manor for the time being, subject to the trusts aforesaid, and to appoint agents, receivers, surveyors, bailiffs and others for the general letting and management of the manors, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments for the time being, subject to the trusts of this my will, and the collecting the rents and profits thereof, and out of the rents and profits of the said premises to pay or allow to the person or persons so employed such reasonable salaries, wages or other allowances as the said William Bulkeley Glasse and Andrew Alfred Collyer-Bristowe, or the survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, or their or his assigns, may think fit: Provided always, and I hereby declare my will to be, that the aforesaid provision as to management shall, as well after as before the discharge of the mortgage debts which shall be at my decease charged on the said premises, or any of them, and as well after the cesser as during the continuance of the said annuity of 4,000*l.* hereinbefore bequeathed, extend and be applicable to the period of the minority of any male person, or minority and discovery of any female person who, if of full age, would for the time being be entitled under the trust of this my will to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits, or surplus rents and profits of the said premises as tenant for life, or tenant in tail male, or in tail by purchase.

The testator died on the 25th of June, 1865, without having altered his will, except that by a codicil he charged his real estates with payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and certain legacies and annuities. At the time of his death the real estate was subject to mortgage-debts to the amount of 336,000*l.*, which subsisted at the time of the presentation of the petition, and the recipient of the annuity of 4,000*l.* was then alive. The trustees accepted the trust, and necessarily employed resident agents and superintendents of repairs upon the said estates, and paid them out of the respective rents certain annual salaries, being a reasonable remuneration for the services rendered.

They also necessarily employed receivers to receive the rents of the estates, and allowed them a percentage of 4l. on the gross annual receipts, the same being a reasonable remuneration for the services rendered by such receivers.

The petitioner, in making a return to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of the succession, claimed to have an allowance made to him under the provisions of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, in respect of necessary outgoings, including the salaries of the said resident agents and superintendents of repairs of the estates, and also in respect of the receivers' percentage on the gross amount of rents and receipts. The Commissioners in their assessment refused to make allowance for the salaries and percentage.

The sum in dispute in respect of duty on the assessment amounted to 1,116l. 8s. 9d., or thereabouts.

The petitioner appealed against the assessment.

Bovill and Hannen, for the petitioner.—The question to be decided depends on the construction of sections 21. and 22. of the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), which state the manner in which the interest of a successor to real estate is to be valued, and what necessary outgoings are to be deducted. Lord Cowley is only beneficially interested in the surplus remaining after payment of the interest on mortgage debts, annuities and expense of collecting the rents. He has no power to receive the rents himself, the trustees being expressly authorized to employ receivers. In the case of In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46) this Court refused to make allowance for salaries for receivers of rents, because they considered it optional with the successor whether he would receive his rents himself, or employ salaried persons to receive them for him.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—But there it was strongly urged that it was impossible for the successor to receive the rents himself because he was an infant and resident in India.]

But still they were voluntary outgoings, not necessary outgoings. Here, if a certain sum had been fixed for the remuneration of the trustees, it would clearly have had to be deducted in estimating the value of the succession. Besides, these payments for collection are not made for the benefit of Lord Cowley only, but for the benefit of the annuitants and all persons who receive payments out of the rents. The trustees have power to erect buildings, and there might be no surplus at all coming to him.

The Attorney General (Sir Roundell Palmer), for the Crown.—If the gift had been to Lord Cowley without the interposition of trustees, it is clear that the deduction for the expenses of collection of rents could not be made. Then the question simply comes to this, whether things which are not necessary outgoings can be made so by the separation of the legal and equitable estates. The argument for Lord Cowley goes too far, for if the discretion given to the trustees in expending money is so large he might object to be assessed at all. Nothing more is done here than to give the trustees powers of management in a wide form. We protest against this being called an assessment of the value to Lord Cowley. It is an assessment of the value of the property, not of the value to the owner; as is pointed out by Mr. Baron Bramwell in In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46). If this claim were allowed, a wide door would be opened for obtaining an allowance of outgoings not authorized by the statute. It would only be necessary to interpose trustees and direct them to make the payments. The rule applied to wills would have to be applied to deeds, and it would become simply a matter of conveyancing machinery.

Bovill, in reply.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I believe we are all of opinion that our judgment should be for the Crown. The case of In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46) is a direct authority on the point, assuming that there is no distinction between cases where expenses such as are here claimed to be deducted are incurred individually by the successor, or by trustees who are acting for him. It is said that the trustees in this case are not trustees for him only. Properly speaking, they are trustees for the whole estate; but at present they are trustees for him, and it appears to me that the distinction, which, no doubt, is a distinction in point of fact, and may be so speciously stated as for a moment to create a doubt, vanishes altogether when we look at the entire question, and all the elements to be considered in coming to a determination upon it. It is said that if a man is under the absolute necessity of incurring certain expenses before he can get that which is bequeathed to him, he ought to be allowed to deduct them. If that proposition were nakedly stated, it would appear to be not at all unreasonable; but when we come to consider the object of the tax, and the principle upon which the act of parliament is to be administered, it vanishes, I think, in a moment. Certainly the Crown ought not to receive less because a particular individual receives a great deal more. If one man has nothing left to him but 100*l.* a year, the rent of a house in the next street, which he can collect for himself, he pays upon that 100*l.* a year. If instead of the rent being to be collected in the next street it is to be collected 100 miles off, it is quite clear that the act makes no distinction, and that he can make no deduction on the ground that the succession is less valuable to him, because the property is at a greater distance from his residence. He may live there if he pleases, or he may employ an agent; and I think it may be laid down as a clear deduction from the different clauses of the act, that the duty depends on the value of the property, not with respect to the expenses that the individual may have occasion to incur in the collection, but with respect to the property itself. If he has so much that he cannot possibly collect it himself, so much the better for him; but that is no reason why the Crown should get less than it would get if the property were divided among a hundred or two hundred people; and that appears to me to be the real substantial justice of the claim of the Crown. According to the argument on behalf of the petitioner, the more wealthy a man becomes by a large bequest, the more the Crown is to lose in consequence of his inability to collect and deal with the whole. Therefore, it appears to me to be quite clear that what may be called the charges of collection, and the expenses which must be incurred for stewards and collectors of rents, are not deductions to be made from the claim of the Crown in respect of duty. Then, looking at the facts of this case, it is very true that Lord Cowley pays—that is, the trustees pay for him—a certain allowance which they pay at their pleasure; but the case finds that they pay no more than is necessary. It may be taken, therefore, that they pay no more than Lord Cowley would have to pay, if the property had been left directly to him, subject to all these charges. I think, therefore, that this creates no difference in point of fact, though there is an apparent difference in point of name; and for these reasons I think that our judgment should be for the Crown.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. There are two questions in this case; one substantial, and the other formal. The substantial question is, whether, when the property comes to a successor encumbered with debts, in ascertaining the amount on which the calculation is to be made for succession duty, the expense of management is to be deducted. It seems to me that the case of In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46) has substantially decided that question, and is an authority for our judgment in this case. But when one looks at the 44th section of the act of parliament, I apprehend there can be no doubt about it; for that act enacts that “the following persons, besides the successor, shall be personally accountable to Her Majesty for the duty payable in respect of any succession, but to the extent only of the property or funds actually received or disposed of by them;” and it specifies trustees, guardians, &c. “in whom the property, or management of any property subject to duty, shall be vested,” and enacts that persons so made accountable should be debtors to Her Majesty in case of non-payment. If these trustees had been called upon to make a return, instead of Lord Cowley (and in all probability they did, in fact, do it for him), they would not, upon the authority of the case of In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep.

(N.S.) Exch. 46), have been entitled to deduct the 1,100*l*. But I also think that section 21, coupled with section 34, establishes the same thing. By section 21. the interest of every successor is to be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of the property, after making such allowances as thereafter directed. The 22nd section then directs certain allowances; and it is admitted that this allowance claimed is not one of them. But the 34th section goes on to enact what shall be the value of the property and what allowance shall be made in respect of incumbrances, but the allowance is to be made in respect only of the yearly sums payable by way of interest, "as reducing the annual value pro tanto." It seems to me, therefore, that there is an express enactment that, in estimating the value of the property in respect of which duty is to be paid, a deduction ought not to be permitted for the expenses of the agent and receiver in the management of the property. I own I think that it is a clear point, and that it cannot be that the mode of estimating this succession duty can depend on the skill with which the conveyance is prepared by the conveyancer who has it in hand; and that we must look (according to what is laid down in the House of Lords in the case of Lord Saltoun v. the Advocate General of Scotland (3 Macq. 659) as the proper mode of looking at the act of parliament) at the substantial and general intention of the legislature as expressed. As to the hardship of calling on Lord Cowley to pay duty in respect of this sum, it is enough to say that he takes the property subject to its burdens. In my opinion, the Crown is entitled to our judgment.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the 21st section, which says, "The interest of every successor, except as herein provided, in real property, shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property," &c. Now, supposing it stopped there, there can be no doubt that the interest of Lord Cowley would be the value of this property, without this deduction. That is clear. But it goes on to say, "after making such allowances as are hereinafter directed." That was a necessary clause, not, perhaps, with reference to section 22,—as to which I shall have a word to say,—but with reference to the following sections. However, the only section thereby referred to is section 22, and I am strongly inclined to think (though it is not necessary perhaps to say it) that section 22. is of no operation, and that if it had not been there, still all the allowances for which it provides would have had to be made. It is absurd to suppose that you could put down the true annual value of a house without estimating the repairs and the other necessary charges upon it, in the shape of tithes and other matters that must be paid. However, whether it is necessary or not, all that it extends to is an allowance for "all necessary outgoings." Now, what is the meaning of that? Mr. Bovill argues that it means all outgoings which the owner cannot help. I do not think that is the true meaning. It means, not all such outgoings as the predecessor may have thought fit to put on the property, and which, therefore, in that sense, are necessary, but all such as are intrinsically necessary—such outgoings as it was not in the option of the predecessor to put on or not as he pleased. That seems to me to be the meaning of it, and that is a meaning in conformity with the reasoning of my Brother Watson in the judgment in In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46). Therefore, to my mind, this is not a necessary outgoing; and, on that short consideration, it seems to me that the case ought to be decided. It has been ingeniously argued that the charge must be on Lord Cowley's beneficial interest in the property; but there is nothing in the act to shew that. In sections 21. and 22. you do not find the words "beneficial interest"; you find "annual value of the property," to ascertain which you are to make the abatement of necessary outgoings. Therefore, upon the reason of the thing, it seems to me manifest that the case ought to be decided in favour of the Crown. Then, it is said that this is a hard case, because if the property, instead of being left to trustees, had been left to Lord Cowley directly, it would have been in his option to say whether he would incur the expense of receivers and agents or not, or whether he would pay them as much as the trustees have done. Possibly it is, to a certain extent, somewhat a hardship upon him—not in reality, because I have no doubt that the trustees will not lay out more than Lord Cowley would have felt himself bound to do; but if this is an argument at all (which, in reality, it is not), it is met by the counter-argument, referred to by my Brother Martin, that if we were to allow this, it would lead to every testator's saying, "I am going to leave a large estate. I know my devisee cannot manage it himself. In order that he may get the benefit of a deduction from the duty, I will have a formal trustee to do this or that thing;" and, by the mere contrivance of words, the successor would be subject to a less succession duty than he ought to be. However, it is not necessary to go into that. My judgment is based on the authority of In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46), and on the consideration that the tax is to be assessed on the "annual value of the property," making allowance for necessary outgoings, which means outgoings intrinsically necessary, and not necessary because of the arrangements which the testator thought fit to make.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The foundation of our judgment is the petition presented on the part of Lord Cowley, which I consider raises the question only of the quantum of assessment, that is, whether Lord Cowley is entitled to have, under the 22nd section of the act of parliament, an allowance in respect of the deductions which he claims. In that point of view, it seems to me very immaterial to consider, at least at any length, the question on whom the rate should properly be made. It appears to me that the rate may be made on any person who succeeds to the property, or, according to the 44th section, the trustees, or persons having the management of the property. I think that the rate is properly made in point of form; and I cannot help coming to the opinion, that whether the rate be made on the trustees or on the person who, according to the clauses in the act of parliament, may be treated as the successor, the quantum must be the same. Then, we have to consider the construction to be placed on the 22nd section. The preceding section directs the assessment to be made according to the value "of an annuity, equal to the annual value of such property, after making such allowances as are hereinafter directed." In section 22, we find the words again repeated, "in estimating the annual value of the lands," and then provision is made for certain deductions. Thus we have two things to ascertain; first, what is the annual value; secondly, what deductions are to be made for certain matters specially provided for in the act? It appears to me that neither the 22nd section, nor the one or two other sections which have been more slightly alluded to in the course of the argument, provide for the deductions that are now claimed. Even therefore if there was no authority on the point, I should come to this conclusion; but I conceive that though there is a difference in point of fact between the present case and the case of In re Elwes (2 Hurl. & N. 719; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 46), that case, in principle, is a decision in support of and warranting the judgment which the Court now pronounces. I am therefore of opinion that the Crown is entitled to our judgment.

Judgment for the Crown.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 12, 1866.

HODGSON v. SIDNEY.

35 L. J. Ex. 182; 4 H. & C. 492; L. R. 1 Ex. 313; 14 L. T. 624; 14 W. R. 923;
12 Jur. N.S. 694.

See Morgan v. Steble, [1872] E. R. A.; 41 L. J. Q.B. 260; L. R. 7 Q.B. 611;
26 L. T. 906 (Q.B.). Not considered, Rose v. Buckett, [1901] E. R. A.; 70 L. J. K.B. 736; [1901] 2 K.B. 449; 84 L. T. 670; 50 W. R. 8 (C. A.).

Bankruptcy—Vesting of Cause of Action in Assignee—Special Damage resulting from False Representation—Personal and Pecuniary Loss—Parties.

BANKRUPTCY.—To a declaration charging that the defendant, by a false and fraudulent representation respecting the solvency of a third person, induced the plaintiff to advance to that person the sum of 2,000l., and that "by reason of the said false and fraudulent representation the plaintiff sustained great loss, and became and was adjudicated a bankrupt, and suffered personal annoyance, and was put to great trouble and inconvenience, and was greatly injured in character and credit," the defendant pleaded, except as to the claim in respect of the plaintiff's becoming and being adjudicated a bankrupt, and the personal annoyance, trouble, inconvenience and injury to character and credit, that the loss alleged in the declaration was a pecuniary loss, and that the cause of action in respect thereof vested in his official assignee:—Held, on demurrer, that this was a good plea to the whole declaration, the exception in the plea being idle, and the only damage recoverable under the declaration being for pecuniary loss.

Quære—Whether in the case of injury to a bankrupt's estate, with special damage to himself, resulting from the act of a wrongdoer, the cause of action can be split between the bankrupt and his assignee, so as to enable the former to sue for the personal damage and the latter for the damage to the estate.

Declaration—For that the plaintiff, having been requested by one J. C. Piper to advance, lay out and expend a large sum of money, to wit, 2,000l., for the purpose of producing and to be employed in the manufacture of certain wine, which said wine, as the plaintiff was informed by the said J. C. Piper, had been ordered by one William Sidney for exportation to Australia and California, under conditions of certain cash payments to be made therefore by the said William Sidney, to the extent of 2,000l., applied to the defendant to inform him, the plaintiff, whether the said William Sidney might be depended upon for cash payments to the said extent, and whether the said order had been so given as aforesaid; and that thereupon the defendant, well knowing the aforesaid premises, and intending that the plaintiff should act upon the representation made by him as hereinafter mentioned, falsely and fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that the said William Sidney was able to carry out the arrangement for purchasing the said wine, which, as the defendant represented, he, the said William Sidney, had entered into with the said J. C. Piper, to wit, the said order, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said William Sidney was not able to carry out the said arrangement or order, or to pay for the said wine, and that the defendant, by so representing as aforesaid, induced the plaintiff to make certain large advances and payments of money on account of the said manufacture, and in respect of the said arrangement or order, whereby, and by reason of the said false and fraudulent representation, the plaintiff has sustained great loss, and became and was adjudicated a bankrupt, and suffered great personal annoyance, and was put to great trouble and inconvenience, and was greatly injured in character and credit.

Second plea—except as to the claim in respect of the plaintiff becoming and being adjudicated a bankrupt, and suffering the alleged personal annoyance, and being put to the alleged trouble and inconvenience, and being injured in character and credit—that the said loss which the plaintiff sustained, as in the declaration alleged, was a pecuniary loss, to wit, the loss of the monies which he so advanced and paid, as in the declaration mentioned; and that after the accruing of the supposed cause of action, and before suit, the plaintiff, being liable to become and to be adjudicated a bankrupt as thereafter mentioned, became bankrupt; and upon a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, duly filed against him by himself, in a Court having jurisdiction to receive the same and to adjudicate thereon, was by the said Court duly adjudicated to be a bankrupt, according to the statutes in force concerning bankrupts; and thereupon an official assignee of the estate and effects of the plaintiff as such bankrupt was, according to the said statutes, duly appointed before this suit; and all things were done and happened, and all times elapsed, according to the said statutes, to give validity to the said adjudication and appointment, and to cause the estate of the plaintiff, including the cause of action in the declaration mentioned, and therein pleaded to, to vest, and the same did vest in the said official assignee before this suit, and had not re-vested in the plaintiff.

Demurrer.

Lumley Smith (Streeten with him), in support of the demurrer.—The cause of action mentioned in the declaration did not vest in the assignee, but remained in the bankrupt. The action is in tort, not in contract; and it alleges special damage to the bankrupt, in respect of which the assignee, if he sued, could recover no compensation.

[BRAMWELL, B.—But the substantial part of the damage is the loss of the 2,000*l.*: the residue, such as the becoming bankrupt, being surely too remote.]

In Howard v. Crowther (8 Mee. & W. 601; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 355) Mr. Baron Alderson says, "Assignees can maintain no action for libel, although the injury occasioned thereby to the man's reputation may have been the sole cause of his bankruptcy." His opinion would appear to be that the bankrupt had a right to recover for such damage. The proper test to be applied is stated in Brewer v. Dew (11 Mee. & W. 625; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 448), which was an action of trespass for seizing goods, under an unfounded claim of debt, with special damage that the plaintiff was annoyed and injured in credit. It was contended there, as here, that on the plaintiff's subsequent bankruptcy the right of action vested in the assignee; but it was held, that as the jury had power to give vindictive damages beyond the value of the goods, the bankrupt was entitled to sue. Here, although the loss to the bankrupt's estate might be only 2,000*l.*, the jury might give him more. Wetherell v. Julius (10 Com. B. Rep. 267; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 367) is also an authority in the plaintiff's favour.

Field, in support of the plea.—The correct mode of ascertaining whether a cause of action remains in the bankrupt or vests in the assignee is to consider whether the cause of action affects substantially and primarily the person or the estate of the bankrupt—Drake v. Beckham (2 H.L. Cas. 626) and Wetherell v. Julius (10 Com. B. Rep. 267; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 367). Here the alleged wrong committed by the defendant affected primarily the plaintiff's estate.

MARTIN, B.—But by pleading this defence to a portion of the declaration only, the defendant admits that some cause of action did remain in the bankrupt. Can a cause of action be split so that the assignees may sue for the damages to the estate and the bankrupt for damages for personal injury?]

In the case already cited of Brewer v. Dew (11 Mee. & W. 625; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 448), Lord Abinger seemed to think that a plea, similar to this, limited to the value of the goods, would have been good; and in Rogers v. Spence (12 Cl. & F. 700), where such a plea was held bad, because it was pleaded to the whole declaration, which included some causes of action for which the assignees could not have sued, it was apparently assumed that it would have been good if properly limited to a portion of the declaration.

Lumley Smith, in reply.—No decision has been produced that a cause of action can be split between the bankrupt and his assignees. In Rogers v. Spence (12 Cl. & F. 700) Lord Campbell said, "The difficulty is where there is a mixed case of injury to the person and injury to the property. There has been no case as yet which has decided what, under such circumstances, is to happen." So in Beckham v. Drake (2 H.L. Cas. 626), Parke, B., after putting the case of a contract to cure the bankrupt of a disease and give him a sum of money, with a breach of both parts, says, "It is exceedingly difficult to say in whom the right of action would be. Either the right of action must be divided and each sue, or the right of action altogether must remain in the bankrupt, or altogether be transferred to the assignees, or both must join, the contract being entire to sue for damages;" but he expressly refrains from stating that a cause of action can be split. Then, if the declaration contains causes of action for which the assignees could not sue, the bankrupt must be able to sue himself, otherwise there would be no remedy for the injury sustained, though, possibly, as to the 2,000*l.*, he would be a trustee of the damages for his assignee.

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered as follows—

MARTIN, B.—This is an action for a fraudulent representation, and the plaintiff alleges that, by reason of the misrepresentation, he sustained great loss, and became and was adjudicated a bankrupt, and suffered great personal annoyance, and was put to great trouble and inconvenience, and was greatly injured in his character and credit. The plea alleges, except as to the claim in respect of the plaintiff being adjudicated a bankrupt, subjected to the alleged personal annoyance, and put to trouble and inconvenience and injured in character and credit,—that the plaintiff had become bankrupt, and the right of action had passed to his assignees. We are of opinion that the plea is a good plea, on the ground that this exception is null and idle, and that the matters excepted afford no cause of action, and that, in point of fact, the case is the same as if the plea had been pleaded to the entire declaration, and that it covers the whole cause of action. We think that the damage is a pecuniary damage, the right to sue for which goes to the assignee and does not remain in the bankrupt; therefore there will be judgment for the defendant.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that in this case the special damage alleged is not special damage, and that the only thing recoverable upon the declaration is the direct and natural damage of a pecuniary character, resulting from the fraudulent representation, the right to sue for which would pass to the assignees. But, further, it seems to me, that, supposing there were special damage in respect of which the bankrupt could have recovered had he not become bankrupt, a cause of action cannot,—I will not say be split, but—remain partially in him, for the purpose of recovering special damage, and go partially to the assignee for the purpose of recovering the natural damage. If there were a contract with two breaches in it, or if there were a tort of two different characters, as, for example, a trespass to a man's person and to his goods, even to his clothes, or some articles which he might have about him, I do not see at all why the assignee might not recover in respect of the latter, and the bankrupt in respect of the former. But where there is only one cause of action, it seems to me, as at present advised, that if the right to sue for pecuniary damage passes to the assignee, the bankrupt cannot say that enough of the cause of action remains in him to enable him to sue in respect of the special damage. On the two grounds, therefore, that no special damage is shewn, and that the breach in respect of which it is claimed was a cause of action which passed to the assignees, the plea seems to be good.

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 26, 1866.

RYALLS v LEADER AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. Ex. 185; L. R. 1 Ex. 296; 14 L. T. 563; 14 W. R. 838; 12 Jur. N.S. 503.

Libel—Privilege—Report of Proceedings before Registrar in Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 52, 58, 101, 102.

LIBEL AND SLANDER.—The examination of a prisoner in gaol by the Registrar in Bankruptcy under the 101st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is a public judicial proceeding; and therefore a fair and correct report without comment of the examination is privileged, even though it may contain statements which injuriously affect the character of a third person.

And semble (per Bramwell, B.), even though those statements be not relevant to the matter in hand.

Declaration on a libel published in the Sheffield and Rotherham Independent.

Plea—not guilty.

The libel complained of was contained in a report (without comment) of "Proceedings in Bankruptcy, at York Castle, on Saturday, December 16, before P. A. Welch, Esq., Registrar," wherein it was stated that Frederick George Gray, a prisoner confined in York Castle, had, when examined by the Registrar, said that he had been "in partnership with the plaintiff, who had compounded with his creditors."

The action was tried, at the West Riding Spring Assizes, 1866, before Keating J., who told the jury that a fair report of the proceedings in a public court of justice is privileged, and that this occasion was a privileged one; but that if they thought the report not fair, or that it was maliciously published, then the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict.

The libel was proved to be false in fact.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants.

Manisty obtained a rule to set this verdict aside, on the ground of misdirection.

Overend and Cave now shewed cause.—The proceedings before the Registrar, under the 101st section, are judicial proceedings in the strictest sense. The powers given to the registrars by the act support this view. The 52nd section empowers them to make adjudications of bankruptcy, and to grant protection; the 54th imposes penalties on parties or witnesses not attending before the Registrar when summoned; the 58th empowers the Courts to direct the Registrar to hold meetings of creditors; the 101st enacts that the Commissioner shall order the Registrar to examine the prisoners in the gaol, and gives the Registrar power to make an order of adjudication in Bankruptcy, and to grant protection; and the 102nd provides for the punishment of prisoners refusing to conform. When such extensive powers are given to the Registrar, it is for the interest of the public that the investigations should be conducted foribus apertis, and that it should be generally known on what grounds the debtor has been committed to prison. In The King v. Wright (8 Term Rep. 293, 298), Laurence, J. said, that, "though the publication of such proceedings may be to the disadvantage of the particular individual concerned, yet it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of Courts of justice should be universally known." The notice which the creditors are entitled to under the 101st section makes the proceedings before the Registrar sufficiently "public" for the purpose of the privilege claimed. A report of the proceedings before Judges at chambers, on applications to discharge a bankrupt out of custody (under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 42), was held in Smith v. Scott (2 Car. & K. 587) to be privileged, being a fair account of a "public" judicial proceeding. At any rate this report is perfectly fair, according to Lewis v. Levy (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 282; s. c. El. B. & El. 557) and Andrews v. Chapman (3 Car. & K. 286), for it is not accompanied with any comments reflecting upon the parties whose names appear in it.

(1) The 101st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, enacts, that the Commissioner in Bankruptcy or county court Judge shall make an order that a registrar shall attend at the prison (after notice has been given to all the prisoner's creditors) and examine every prisoner included in the gaoler's return who shall have been in prison, being a trader for fourteen days, or not being a trader for two calendar months, touching his estate and effects, debts, dealings, and transactions: that the registrar shall have power to make an order of adjudication in bankruptcy against every such prisoner, and to grant him protection and to make an order for his release from prison, and shall also direct in what court such adjudication shall be prosecuted, &c. The 102nd section enacts, that if the prisoner shall refuse to appear or to be sworn, or to answer all lawful questions of such registrar or of the execution of detaining creditor, or of any other creditor who shall be present, respecting his debts, liabilities, dealings, and transactions, or to make a full discovery of his estate and effects, and of all his books of account, or to produce the same, or to sign his examination when taken, the registrar shall report the same to the Court, and the Court may, by warrant under the hand and seal of the Judge or Commissioner, commit him to the common gaol of the county, and the Court may at the same time adjudge such prisoner bankrupt.

Manisty and T. Jones, in support of the rule.—It cannot be said that this was a public judicial proceeding. The Registrar is merely sent to the prison by the Commissioners to examine a prisoner. He exercises no judicial functions. The proceeding is entirely in invitum, and the public have no right to go within the walls of the prison. The privilege of entry is confined to creditors. Again, it has not yet been actually decided that the publication of proceedings in a court of justice is privileged if the publication reflect injuriously on character. In Lewis v. Clement (3 B. & Ald. 702) this was left an open question; and in The King v. Carlile (Ibid. 167), it was held to be unlawful to publish even a correct account containing matter of a scandalous or blasphemous nature. The privilege, if it exist at all, must be absolute, and not dependent on bona fides. At any rate, the publication of injurious statements, with reference to a stranger to the inquiry, cannot be justified.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that my Brother Keating was quite right in his ruling and the mode in which he presented the case to the jury. The complaint of the plaintiff is merely this: "You have published an account of certain proceedings in a court of justice containing that which is libellous upon me." The defence is, that this account was a fair, correct and bona fide statement of what passed in a court of justice. If this was a court of justice and a public court, and if the publication was a fair and correct account of what passed, then it is not the subject of an action. Now, the question is, was this court of justice a public court? I must say, I think it was. I think that, so far from endeavouring to limit, we ought to make as wide as possible the rights of the public to know what takes place in the course of the administration of justice. The jury found that it was a fair account of what took place; and, if that finding was according to the evidence, the verdict ought not to be disturbed.

MARTIN, B.—I also think that the direction of the learned Judge was perfectly right. The case depends upon whether or not any man had a right to report that which he heard. If he reported bona fide what occurred before the Registrar, I cannot entertain a doubt that his report was privileged. I collect from the 51st section of the act that the object of the legislature was, that this bankruptcy business should be discussed and performed in public, because the 51st section says that the Commissioners may "sit at chambers for the despatch of such part of the business of their Court as can without detriment to the public advantage arising from the discussion of questions in open court be heard in chambers." Then the 100th section proceeds to make a provision for what had been found to be a very great evil, viz., where prisoners went to prison and continued there voluntarily, setting their creditors at defiance, and keeping them completely at arm's length; and then came the 101st and 102nd sections, directing the Registrar to examine the prisoner, and providing for the committal of any prisoner who shall refuse to answer. Can any one contend that if any person may in consequence of default in these matters, and in consequence of the report of the Registrar be committed to prison as a criminal for the space of a month, such matters are not to be heard in public? The Registrar may have power to exclude persons in certain cases, provided it be expedient, but he cannot exclude the creditors. It seems to me this is a proceeding proper to be had in public, and, as a consequence, any bona fide and honest publication of what takes place there is justifiable. It is a mistake to call it a privilege; it is no privilege at all; it is a right.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this was a public court, and I think it is so according to the 101st and 102nd sections; therefore I think that what took place in it was as much the subject of publication as what takes place in any other court. I am inclined to think that, in point of law, this was not a public court, but the registrar thought fit to let it be a public one, then the same consequences would follow. It seems to me that just as those who are present may hear with their ears directly, so may those who are absent hear the same thing if any one communicates it to them. If it were not so, every witness who thought he had been subjected to unpleasant treatment in a court of justice, would be at liberty to bring an action against the publishers of reports of what occurs in courts of justice. And it also seems to me that there is no such qualification as that contended for, namely, that in order to be justified the matter published must be relevant to the matter in hand. I think those who publish the reports are justified if what they publish is an accurate account of what takes place. There may be some inconvenience on some occasions, but this is a case where individuals must suffer for the public benefit, because there is no means of communicating it in any other way; and I think it would be an impossibility to call on people to discriminate between what was relevant to the matter and what was not. When once it is established that the place is a court of justice, then what transpires in it may be published, even although some private inconvenience may ensue. Probably, the reason why this power of publication is limited to courts of justice, may be the reasonable expectation that unfair statements will not be made there. I therefore think that this rule should be discharged.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The Court of Bankruptcy has for the purpose of carrying out the powers of the act, the power to exercise all the authorities of the superior Courts of law and equity, and the jurisdiction possessed by the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors; and by the 52nd section of the act of 1861 large powers are conferred upon the registrar like those which formerly devolved upon the Commissioners, and he may perform those duties in court or in chambers. These large powers are further expanded by the 58th section and others, giving the power to summon witnesses and to call for papers and documents, and thus putting parties in the same position that they would be placed in if they were subpœnaed in an ordinary court of law. Now, it was not contended, and I think it could not have been contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that a proceeding before the registrar at chambers would not be a public judicial proceeding; but we are told, and fairly enough, that this examination in the gaol before the registrar is supportable, if at all, under sections 100, 101, 102; and that the larger provisions of a general character have no application to proceedings under one or other of those three sections. But that is to put a very narrow and uncalled for construction upon the act. The 100th section calls upon the gaoler to make certain returns, and the 101st then calls upon the registrar to act, and it is quite clear that in carrying out the authority that is given by the 101st section he must go at a particular time yearly to the gaol and execute it, and in that respect the proceedings at the gaol stand in a somewhat different position from a hearing before the registrar in open court or in chambers. But then I see no ground of necessity, therefore, to hold that the proceeding before the registrar at the gaol is not a proceeding of a judicial character. The 102nd section requires the prisoner to appear and be sworn or to answer all lawful questions of such registrar or of the execution creditor, or of any other creditor who shall be present. And, therefore, one can well understand why this power is given for the protection of the public, to prevent prisoner from continually remaining in gaol and preventing the creditors having the benefit to be derived from an adjudication in bankruptcy, and it is partly in case of the man himself; and, looking at what the registrar may do when he gets there, and that the bankrupt ought to answer the questions that are put to him, I think that gives a sufficient publicity to the proceedings to make them proceedings in a public court of justice. I am disposed so to think, even though the Judge might, in certain cases, have power to exclude the public; because, if there be a court open for the parties interested to be there and to hear what passes, that is sufficiently a court of justice for the purposes of this case.

Another point has been made, namely, that assuming this to be a report of proceedings in a public court of justice, it is not, under the circumstances, such a report as the law will protect, because it contains a reflection upon the character of a third person. I think that when the reference to the conduct of a third person is not irrelevant to the inquiry before the Judge, the publication of it does not prevent the party relying on this defence. What is the matter complained of here? That there is a publication of a statement made by the alleged bankrupt on his own part comprising his partner. I cannot for a moment think that the reference to the position of his partner is so irrelevant as to shew that this is not a bona fide and fair report. I think that, upon both these grounds, the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 26, 1866.

O'BRIEN v. BRODIE.

35 L. J. Ex. 188; L. R. 1 Ex. 302; 14 L. T. 559; 14 W. R. 840; 12 Jur. N.S. 527.

Inapplicable, Ex parte Todhunter, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. Bk. 17; L. R. 10 Eq. 425; 25 L. T. 313; 18 W. R. 890 (C. J.). Referred to, Ex parte Veness, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. Bk. 23; L. R. 10 Eq. 419; 25 L. T. 311; 18 W. R. 979 (C. J.). See In re Halling, [1878] E. R. A.; 47 L. J. Bk. 25; 7 Ch. D. 159; 37 L. T. 809; 26 W. R. 182 (C. A.).

The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and The Bankruptcy Act, 1861, were repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83. s. 20.

Debtor and Creditor—Execution—Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), ss. 133, 184.—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), s. 73.—Sale suspended by Interpleader Order.

BANKRUPTCY.—The sale of goods which had been seized in execution was suspended by an interpleader order for seven days; on the seventh day the execution debtor was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition, after which the goods were sold:—Held, that notwithstanding the interpleader order, the execution creditor was still a creditor having security within the meaning of the 184th section of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and that therefore, not having sold before the adjudication, he was only entitled to receive a rateable part of his debt.

This action was tried, before Pollock, C.B., at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1865, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 133*l.* 14*s.*

On the 20th of December, 1865, the sheriff entered on the defendant's premises under a fi. fa. The goods seized were thereupon claimed by Harriet Lloyd, the defendant's mother, under a bill of sale. An interpleader summons was then taken out by the sheriff, and on the 23rd of December Lush, J. made an order that upon payment of the sum of 200*l.* into court by the claimant within seven days, or upon her giving within the same time security for the payment of the same, and upon payment to the sheriff of the possession-money from that date, the sheriff should withdraw; and further, that, unless such payment should be made or such security given within the time aforesaid, the sheriff should proceed to sell the goods and pay the proceeds of the sale (after deducting the expenses and the possession-money) into court; and further, that the parties proceed to the trial of an issue, &c.

The claimant did not comply with the terms of this order.

On the 30th of December the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition; an official assignee was duly appointed, and notice was given to the sheriff that the goods were claimed by the official assignee.

On the 1st of January, 1866, the sheriff took out another interpleader summons, upon which Martin, B., made an order barring the claim of the official assignee. On the 10th of January, 1866, the sheriff sold the goods, and after deducting his fees, &c., paid the balance, 51*l.* 6*s.*, into court under the order of the 23rd of December.

On the 20th of January a creditors' assignee was chosen, and the plaintiff and the assignee having each applied at chambers to get the money paid to him, Martin, B. referred the matter to the Court.¹

Hannen now moved for a rule directing that the money should be paid to the assignee.

(1) The 133rd section of the act of 1849 enacts that "All payments really and bona fide made by any bankrupt, or by any person on his behalf, before the date of the fiat or the filing of a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, and all payments really and bona fide made to any bankrupt before the date of the fiat or the filing of such petition, and all conveyances by any bankrupt bona fide made and executed before the date of the fiat or the filing of such petition, and all contracts, dealings and transactions by and with any bankrupt really and bona fide made and entered into before the date of the fiat or the filing of such petition, and all executions and attachments against the lands and tenements of any bankrupt bona fide executed by seizure, and all executions against the goods and chattels of any bankrupt bona fide executed and levied by seizure and sale before the date of the fiat or the filing of such petition, shall be deemed to be valid notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy by such bankrupt committed, provided the person so dealing with, or paying to or being paid by such bankrupt, or at whose suit or on whose account such execution or attachment shall have issued, had not at the time of such payment, conveyance, &c., or at the time of so executing or levying such execution or attachment, or at the time of making any sale thereunder, notice of any prior act of bankruptcy by him committed," &c.

The 184th section is as follows: "No creditor having security for his debt, or having made any attachment in London or in any other place, by virtue of any custom there used, of the goods and chattels of the bankrupt, shall receive upon any such security or attachment more than a rateable part of such debt, except in respect of any execution or extent served and levied by seizure and sale upon, or any mortgage of or lien upon, any part of the property of such bankrupt before the date of the fiat or the filing of the petition of adjudication of bankruptcy, provided always," &c.

The 73rd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is as follows: "If any execution shall be levied by seizure and sale of any of the goods and chattels of any trader debtor upon any judgment recovered in any action personal for the recovery of any debt or money demand exceeding 50*l.*, every such debtor shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from the date of the seizure of such goods and chattels: provided always, that unless in the mean time a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor be presented, the sheriff or other officer making the levy shall proceed with the execution, and shall at the end of seven days after the sale pay over the proceeds or so much as ought to be paid to the execution creditor, who shall be entitled thereto notwithstanding such act of bankruptcy, unless the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt within fourteen days from the day of the sale, in which case the money so received by the creditor shall be paid by him to the assignee under the bankruptcy, but the sheriff or other officer shall not incur any liability by reason of anything by him done as aforesaid: provided also, that in case of bankruptcy the costs and expenses of such action and execution shall be retained and paid out of the proceeds of the sale, and the balance only after such payment be paid to the assignees."

Holl shewed cause in the first instance.—The 133rd section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, does not apply, because here the act of bankruptcy was not committed prior to the seizure—Edwards v. Scarsbrook (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 45); nor is the case within the 73rd section of the act of 1861 (which is the only section of that act which could have any application here), because this adjudication was founded on the debtor's own petition, and not on the execution. So that the case turns entirely upon the 184th section of the act of 1849. Now that section was only intended to apply to a common law execution, and to give the assignees the benefit where there is laches on the part of the creditor; and therefore this case is not within the rule in Hutton v. Cooper (6 Exch. Rep. 159; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 153) and Young v. Roebuck (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 260), for here the creditor's hands were tied by the interpleader order, which prevented the sale and took the goods entirely out of the controlling power of the sheriff, although they remained in his custody. The plaintiff was no longer a "creditor having security for his debt" within the meaning of the 184th section; his hands and the sheriff's were tied whilst the debtor was still sui juris, and when the Judge directed the goods to be dealt with in a particular manner, they became clogged with a trust in respect of which a Court of equity would interfere—Murray v. Arnold (3 Best & S. 287; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 11), per Blackburn, J. It would have been a contempt of Court if the sheriff had sold before the claimant had the opportunity of complying with the order by paying the money or giving security, and the sale, when it did take place, was not by virtue of the writ, but was under the Judge's order.—[He also cited Parsons v. Lloyd,² decided by Bramwell, B. at Chambers.]

Hannen, contra.—The 133rd section has some bearing on the question, as it gives protection to the execution creditor, who has seized and sold before the adjudication and without notice; but the case is governed by the 184th section, which deprives him of the benefit of his execution when he has not sold. The words are clear that he is to have only a rateable part of his debt, and unless there be some implied reservation as to cases where a sale is prevented by operation of law, this case must be decided on the principle of Hutton v. Cooper (6 Exch. Rep. 159; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 153). The principle on which the Judge gave the claimant seven days, was pointed out by the legislature in the 73rd section of the act of 1861; and the Judge must be taken to have considered, in making the order, whether there was danger of bankruptcy or not. That section shews that the legislature intended to limit more and more the rights of the execution creditor. If the goods had been sold on the 23rd of December, and the money handed over

(2) Holl stated this case as follows :

PARSONS AND ANOTHER v. LLOYD.

Goods which were seized by the sheriff of Surrey under a fi. fa. were claimed by a mortgagee. The sheriff interpleaded, and Martin, B. ordered a sale and that the proceeds of such sale, after deducting the amount of the mortgagee's claim, should be paid to the execution creditor to the amount of his execution. The sheriff sold under the order; the debtor afterwards became bankrupt, and his assignees claimed the proceeds. The sheriff called on the assignees and execution creditor to interplead, and the parties agreed to abide by the opinion of Bramwell, B.

BRAMWELL, B.—Though (as there is no appeal) my reasons are unimportant, I wish the parties to see that I have duly considered the matter. The execution creditor would be entitled, notwithstanding the bankruptcy, but for some special provision in the Bankruptcy Acts, because the assignee succeeded to the rights of the bankrupt as he possessed them, which was subject to the execution. Then, is there any such special provision? I think not. I think section 184. does not apply. The goods were not subject to a common law execution, which that section deals with. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, gives the execution creditor a lien right in respect of which there is no special provision in the bankruptcy acts, unless it be the one in section 184. as to liens. In this case the defendant might have given a second mortgage on these goods, which would have been perfectly valid. He did not, but Martin, B., by his order, having full power, did. In short, the execution, as such, was at an end by this order, and the plaintiffs had a lien as security by other means, valid against a subsequent bankruptcy.

to him, still, having regard to the dates, the assignee could have recovered it back according to the 73rd section, as the adjudication would have been within fourteen days of the order. Notwithstanding the interpleader order, the sale was under the original execution, for the order only interfered to suspend the sale for a time; no new authority to sell was created; and the effect of the order cannot be to prevent the assignees taking advantage of the act of bankruptcy. *Parsons v. Lloyd*² was different, because there the sale was completed and the execution at an end before the bankruptcy.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I think that the legislature, had they contemplated this case, would have provided for it; as it is, they have not provided for it, and I have a great difficulty in legislating, under the name of interpreting a clause in an act of parliament. The plain result of the language used appears to me to be this: that though there be a seizure, the seizure is to convey nothing, unless it be followed up by a sale. I think that is the clear and plain result of the 184th section of the act of 1849. Here there has been no sale. Very intelligent and equitable grounds are suggested to us upon which we ought to say that the 184th section does not apply to a case like this. But I think the meaning of the 184th section is, that a seizure by a sheriff not followed by a sale is not to prevail against the title of the assignees. Now here, the sale has been prevented by a proceeding which in all probability the act of parliament did not intend should have operation. In future, probably, no Judge will postpone a sale for a single instant, but leave the sheriff to sell, in order not to deprive the execution creditor of the benefit of his judgment. But I consider the words of the act too strong to be got over by the suggestions made on behalf of the creditor, though I feel the force of them in every way. There being no sale, and nothing in lieu of a sale, I think the rule should be made absolute.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. If I were to put a construction upon the Interpleader Act and the 184th section of the act of 1849 alone, I should hold that in consequence of the interference of a Judge, in taking the case out of the usual course and making this order, the creditor ceased to have security for his debt within the true meaning of the 184th section; and that in fact the goods became in custodia legis, as it were. But when I look to the 73rd section of the act of 1861, it is perfectly clear that if that had been done which it is suggested might have been done, the assignee would still be entitled to the money; for if the Judge had said, "Now you have seized, go on and sell," the assignees would be entitled to recover from the creditor. Putting the two sections together, I think there is a clear indication that the legislature intended that the general body of the creditors should take the money. We have nothing to do but to carry out the law; we have nothing to do with its policy. As I find it to be the result of these two sections that the assignee has the right to the money, it is my duty to abide by what the legislature has enacted.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think if the creditor were to succeed here, he would recover more than a rateable part of his debt. Now, the 184th section says, that he shall not receive more than a rateable part, except in respect of an execution levied by seizure and sale before petition. And if the creditor receive this money, he will certainly receive it in respect of an execution, but in respect of an execution which had not been levied by seizure and sale before the date of the fiat or the filing of the petition, and therefore the 184th section is against him. I only wish to add, that I consider this opinion in no way inconsistent with what I said at chambers in Parsons v. Lloyd.²

CHANNELL, B.—The question is one of general importance and of considerable difficulty; it turns principally upon the 184th section of the Bankrupt Act of 1849, though some light has been thrown upon the 184th section by the 133rd section. Now, the words of the 184th section are extremely strong, and if there had been no Interpleader Act, or no order made by a Judge upon the Interpleader Act, it could have admitted of no doubt that the plaintiff, who had levied under the execution upon the judgment, and had not proceeded to sale, would be a creditor having security for his debt, and would, therefore, by the operation of the 184th section, be deprived of his right to more than a rateable portion of his debts with the other creditors. Now, the argument suggested is, that in the events that have happened the creditor no longer has security for his debt within the meaning of the 184th section, because the Judge has interfered to prevent either the sheriff acting for the execution creditor (or the execution creditor giving directions to the sheriff) freely and voluntarily in the matter. But I think he still remained a creditor having security; and I have come to that conclusion not only upon the words of the 184th section, but from the course of legislation that has taken place, the tendency of which evidently is to give the property of the bankrupt to the creditors generally; and for these reasons I think the rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 4, 12, 1866.

GIDDINGS AND ANOTHER v. PENNING.

35 L. J. Ex. 191; L. R. 1 Eq. 325; 14 L. J. 667; 14 W. R. 940;
12 Jur. N.S. 634.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1861, was repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83. s. 20.

Debtor and Creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1861—Unreasonable Provision—Penalty for not verifying Debt.

BANKRUPTCY.—A clause in a deed of arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, rendered it lawful for the trustees to require debts to be verified by solemn declaration, and subjected those creditors who should not comply with such requisition within two months to the loss of all benefit, dividends and advantages under the deed,—their dividends to fall into the general estate for the benefit of the creditors not making default:—Held (dubitante Martin, B.), that this clause was unreasonable and invalidated the deed.

Declaration on the common indebitatus counts.

Plea—of a deed of arrangement under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, expressed to be made between the defendant of the first part, two trustees on behalf of his creditors, of the second part, and the "several other persons whose names or the names of whose firms were written in the schedule thereunder written, and whose seals or the seals of individual members or of a member or agent of whose firms were affixed, being respectively creditors of the defendant, upon or against whom the said deed should become valid, effectual and binding by reason of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861," of the third part.

Replication, that the plaintiffs never executed or assented or became parties to the said deed, nor were they or their firm, or any agent of theirs, or their debt, named or mentioned in the schedule written under or forming part of the said deed.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

The defendant contended that the deed shewed on the face of it that it was to operate for the benefit of all the creditors, whether scheduled or not, and that the plaintiffs were bound by it.

The plaintiffs contended that the following clause which was contained in the deed was unreasonable, and rendered the deed inoperative as against them: "It shall be lawful for the trustees, at the expense of the estate, to require the amount of any debt of any of the creditors to be verified by solemn declaration; and in the event of any such creditor, if in Great Britain or Ireland, failing so to verify such debt for two calendar months after such requisition, such creditors or creditor shall lose all benefit, dividends and advantage to be derived from these presents, and thereupon such last-mentioned dividends shall fall into the general estate for the benefit of the creditors not making similar default."

J. M. Howard (with him F. Abbott), for the defendant.—The case differs from Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 172), where a similar clause was held unreasonable because it left the method and the sufficiency of the verification in the discretion of the trustee, Erle, C.J. saying that such a power would be unreasonable if carried out in its terms, and a non-assenting creditor might well refuse to be bound by a deed containing such a power. Here, however, the trustee has no such power, and there is simply the substitution of a solemn declaration for the ordinary affidavit. In Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169) a similar provision was held reasonable by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, though they refrained from expressing any opinion as to the reasonableness of the entire clause in Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 172). The only question here is, whether the forfeiture of the debt is too severe a penalty for not verifying. There must be some provision binding the creditor to come in within a definite time; and seeing that the statutory majority of the creditors, who are the best judges of what is a reasonable penalty, have adopted this provision as a reasonable one, it is not for the Court to make it void because they think it unreasonable.

Macnamara, for the plaintiffs.—In Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 172) the Court did not advert to the clause which attached forfeiture to non-verification, because they held it unreasonable that the trustees should have the power of rejecting a debt if the creditor should not verify in the way the trustees should think expedient. In Coles v. Turner (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 198) the same Court held, that the provision as to verification had per se the same effect as the entire objectionable clause in Leigh v. Pendlebury (33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 172); and the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in reversing the judgment of the Court below in Coles v. Turner (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 198), did so on the ground that there was no penalty of forfeiture following non-compliance with the required verifications. The clause objected to here is unreasonable in either view, because it actually contains the provision for forfeiture.

[MARTIN, B.—The clause was usual in the old composition deeds.]

Those deeds only bound the parties who assented to them. In Lyne v. Wyatt (Ibid. 179) a corresponding clause, making forfeiture the penalty for breach of a covenant not to sue, was held unreasonable.

Howard, in reply, cited Scott v. Berry (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 193, 197), where Bramwell, B. said, that "if the debtor, not being able to covenant directly with the non-assenting creditors because they will not be parties to the instrument, enters into a covenant with third parties on their behalf, and so does his best to give them the same right, they ought not to be allowed to complain that they are not on equal terms with the other creditors."

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered, on the 12th of June, as follows—

CHANNELL, B.—The stipulation, by reason of which the plaintiffs seek to invalidate this deed, involves two matters for consideration: first, what the stipulation requires the creditor to do; and, secondly, the consequences attaching to non-compliance with the stipulation. After some doubts in the course of the argument, I have arrived at the conclusion, taking the stipulation in its entirety, that it is unreasonable as it is.

I do not think it unreasonable on the part of the trustees to require the amount of any debt to be verified by solemn declaration. I take it that means a declaration to be substituted for an affidavit—the form of verification ordinarily adopted; and whatever unreasonableness might attach to a condition requiring a declaration to be made to the satisfaction of trustees,—so that they could, if so disposed, take a captious objection to it,—does not apply, in my judgment, to the first part of this stipulation; for all it amounts to when reasonably read is, that the person claiming to be a creditor for a certain amount, shall make, not an affidavit, but a solemn declaration that he is a creditor for that amount; and if that be good in point of law, it, in my judgment, gives the trustees no right to object to its sufficiency. But it would be very different if the stipulation required the declaration to be made to the satisfaction of the trustees. I therefore wish it to be understood, that with the first part of the stipulation I find no fault.

But there the deed provides that if the creditor shall not verify within a certain time, if within Great Britain or Ireland, he shall lose all benefit, dividends and advantages to be derived from the deed, and the dividends are to fall into and form part of the general residue, in which he is not to participate. Now, this is very different from the case frequently arising under the Bankruptcy law, where a party proving and claiming at a late period of the proceedings is not entitled to disturb prior dividends, but is entitled to come in for a share of future dividends. Here he is to forfeit his claim altogether. Looking, then, at the second part, which, in my opinion, cannot be separated from the first, it appears that the stipulation in its entirety is unreasonable, and therefore the deed is not binding on non-assenting creditors.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion.

MARTIN, B.—I am somewhat inclined to be of a contrary opinion. And my reason for thinking that this provision does not defeat the deed is, that it was common to insert a similar clause and provision in the old composition deeds, as may be seen by reference to the precedents in Forsyth on Composition with Creditors. And on that ground, if the thing rested with me, I should not be of opinion that it had the effect of defeating the deed.

POLLOCK, C.B.—I am of opinion that the clause by which the debt is forfeited is unreasonable, and therefore that the deed is a void deed. The ground of my opinion is, that the new law introduced upon this subject is founded upon applying the principles of the common law to certain arrangements among the creditors themselves when a specified proportion in value and in number unite, and without the expense of a bankruptcy proceeding. It seems to me to be the object of the law to produce, through the medium of a majority of the creditors in number and value, what may be called a bankrupt arrangement, giving effect to the bankrupt law, without any appeal to the Judges of the Court of Bankruptcy, but only to the arrangements made by the creditors themselves; and the clause in the act of parliament by which the minority are bound by the majority is precisely in accordance with what the bankrupt law itself enacts, when it gives to a certain majority in number and value the power of giving, through the medium of a certificate, an effectual release to the bankrupt, so as to enable him to begin the world again. But there is, in no part of the bankrupt law, anything which appears to justify the introduction of a penal clause, by which, just because a man does not come within a certain time to participate in a share of the effects of the insolvent, he is therefore to lose every chance of getting any portion of his claim and forfeit it altogether. I think such a stipulation extremely unreasonable, notwithstanding that it is found in a deed of composition which binds nobody but those who are actually parties to it. It cannot be said to be unreasonable quoad the creditors who all agree to it and who enter into the composition deed on the distinct understanding that if a creditor does not bring his claim forward, it shall be forfeited. But that is not the case here. This is a statutable provision, endeavouring to produce the effect of bankruptcy or insolvency through the medium of the action of the creditors themselves. And my view is supported by the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Coles v. Turner (35 L. J. C.P. 169), where it was held that "a clause in a deed of assignment, by which a trustee is empowered to require any creditor to verify, &c., by statutory declaration or otherwise, has not the effect of depriving the creditor who fails to produce proof, of all benefit under the deed, and such clause is, therefore, reasonable." In my judgment, the conclusion follows, from that decision, that if the deed had contained the clause which is now under discussion, namely, that the creditor should forfeit all benefit, the Court would have pronounced that it was unreasonable. Blackburn, J., in delivering judgment (see 35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 171), said, "It will be found that the provision in this deed did, perhaps, require no more from the creditors than would be required if the deed were silent. At all events, it requires nothing unreasonably beyond what would thus be required. It does not make a trustee arbitrator, finally to decide whether there is any debt, nor does it impose any penalty on those creditors who fail to produce what the trustee thinks sufficient proof of the debt." I must infer from all that, that if the deed had contained a forfeiture in consequence of the want of proof, the Court would have held the condition unreasonable, and therefore the deed void.

I am now called upon to decide in this case, whether an entire forfeiture of the whole right to participate under the deed is unreasonable or not, in the case of a person who is no party to it, but who is only made a party by the act of parliament, which binds those who do not consent, and who are made parties provided a certain majority in number and value consent. Now had the deed provided that the creditor who failed to give a satisfactory account of his debt, should forfeit all claim to the distribution that had already taken place, and that if he came in to prove, he should come in without disturbing any former dividend; all that would have been in accordance with the spirit of the bankrupt law. But I think the forfeiture, as provided by this deed, is useless, unjust, pernicious, quite contrary to the spirit of the bankrupt laws, and, therefore, unreasonable.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 2, 1866.

BAINES AND ANOTHER v. EWING.

35 L. J. Ex. 194; 4 H. & C. 511; L. R. 1 Ex. 320; 14 L. T. 733; 14 W. R. 782.

See, In re Norwich Equitable Fire Assurance Society, 1888, 58 L. T. 35.

Insurance—Principal and Agent—Secret Limitation of Authority.

MARINE INSURANCE. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—The defendant authorized a broker at Liverpool to underwrite marine policies for him "not exceeding 100l. by any one vessel." The broker underwrote a marine policy for 150l. At Liverpool it is notorious that there is generally a limit fixed between the principal and the broker, though this limit is not disclosed to the public:—Held, that the agent in this case had no authority to underwrite for 150l., and that the contract being indivisible, the assured could recover nothing from the defendant in respect of the policy.

Declaration on a marine policy of insurance subscribed by the defendant for 150*l*. Plea that the defendant did not subscribe the policy and become an insurer as alleged. Issue thereon.

The action was tried, before Lush, J. at the Liverpool Spring Assizes, 1866. It appeared in evidence that the defendant had authorized his agents at Liverpool to underwrite policies for him to the extent of 100*l*. by the following letter:

"Gentlemen,—I hereby authorize you in my name, on my behalf, to underwrite policies of insurance against marine risks, *not exceeding 100*l*. by any one vessel*; and I authorize you to hold and retain all premiums received for me as a fund to answer losses, it being understood that all accounts between us are to be settled according to the usual course of transacting business between an underwriter and a broker, as customary in Liverpool; separate deposit account to be kept at the bank, and accounts to be rendered half-yearly.

. . . .—I remain, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM EWING."

It also appeared that, according to the custom of doing insurance business at Liverpool, the agent or broker underwrites for his principal, whose name he gives to the Underwriters' Association at the time. It is known that there is in nearly every case a limit fixed between the principal and the broker as to the extent to which the broker may underwrite, but it is not known to the public what that limit is.

In this case the defendant's brokers had underwritten the policy for 150*l*.

At the desire of the parties, Lush, J. directed the verdict to be entered for 150*l*., giving the defendant leave to move to enter a nonsuit or to reduce the damages to 100*l*.

Edward James having obtained a rule accordingly,

Brett and Quain shewed cause.—The defendant has allowed his agents to hold themselves out as persons authorized to underwrite for him, not perhaps as his general agents for all purposes, but as general agents for underwriting all policies brought to them. The private and confidential restrictions to which the agent is subject, are as against third persons, inoperative unless disclosed—2 Duer, 346, s. 50. The question then is, what are the usual incidents of an agency to underwrite in the principal's name? In this case they are the incidents of underwriting in the ordinary Liverpool way. In Liverpool the agents sign for all sorts of different amounts, and the fact of a limit being fixed between the principal and his agent cannot limit the right of the assured to assume that the broker is doing his duty. In Story on Agency, s. 127, p. 100, it is said, that "if a person is held out to third persons, or to the public at large, by his principal as having a general authority to act for and to bind him in a particular business or employment, it would be the height of injustice, and lead to the grossest frauds, to allow him to set up his own secret and private instructions to the agent limiting that authority." So Smith on Mercantile Law (7th edition), p. 128. If there had been no question of limit here, it cannot be doubted that the broker would have been a general agent—Story on Agency, s. 126,¹ and Lloyd on Agency, p. 136. And the fact of there being a limit makes no difference, because it is not disclosed, and therefore the same rule prevails as if there were no usage as to limit—just as in the case of a factor employed to sell who has not an unlimited authority, the limit privately agreed upon between him and his principal cannot bind the public. At any rate, the case is within the ordinary rule as to a general and specific authority laid down by Story on Agency, s. 131.² At any rate, the broker acted under authority to the extent of 100l., and therefore to that extent the defendant is liable. He can sever the contract—Co. Litt. 258 a.³

(1) "In the case of a general agent the principal will be bound by the acts of his agent within the scope of the general authority conferred on him, although he violates by those acts his private instructions and directions, which are given to him by the principal, limiting, qualifying, suspending, or prohibiting the exercise of such authority under particular circumstances."

Edward James Mellish, and H. T. Holland, for the defendants, were not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—As to the point that although there was no authority to enter into the contract for 150l., still the contract is valid to the extent of 100l.,—the limit to which the agent who made the contract had authority to go,—I am of opinion, upon plain, intelligible and legal principles, that the contract was one entire contract, and it is not divisible.

And with respect to the other point, it seems to me very clear. A contract was made by an agent on behalf of his principal the defendant, and it was necessary, in an action against the principal, to prove the authority. This is the authority: "I hereby authorize you, in my name and on my behalf, to underwrite policies of insurance against marine risks, not exceeding 100l. by any one vessel." That is the authority which is produced to prove a declaration alleging that a policy was effected by the defendant for 150l. upon a single vessel. Now, if the case stood there, the agent clearly made a contract which he was not authorized to make. But then, it is said, there is a practice in Liverpool, whereby brokers, acting on behalf of others who underwrite ships, make valid contracts in their names. But it is also accompanied with this, which is well known, that in almost all cases a limit is put on the amount to which the broker, who signs his principal's name, is to go. When the name of the underwriter is given to the Underwriters' Association, the limit is not disclosed; it remains known only to the broker and his principal. Now, that having been stated, and the parties having produced this authority by which the contract which is contained in the policy was certainly not authorized, it is said that, by reason of this custom at Liverpool, there is virtually an authority to underwrite for 150l. He states it is perfectly well known there is a limit put upon it; therefore any man who makes a contract of this kind on a policy with an agent, knows that he is dealing with an agent, who has also a limit to his authority put upon him. When a person has given a limit to the authority, and another person makes a contract with a knowledge that a limit is universally put, how can it be said that there is any authority in the broker to bind the principal to a greater extent than the limit stated? The opinion I take of the matter is consistent with common sense; and it is impossible by any refinement in Duer's Marine Insurance or any other book, to alter the common-sense view. When the person with whom the contract is made has had notice that there is a limit, I cannot see how, after that, he can make the underwriter liable to an unlimited extent; and this view is entirely consistent with that taken by the learned Judge at the trial.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. In this case the particular capacity of the agent cannot be relied on; therefore the plaintiff is obliged to rely on the defendant having held out the agent as possessing an authority which, in fact, he had not,—that is to say, he must say he has held out the broker as his agent, having authority to sign policies for more than 100l. How can he do so? The utmost that can be said is, that he has held him out to have that authority which a Liverpool broker ordinarily has. It seems to me almost a matter of logical demonstration in this case that the proposition put forward by the plaintiff must be answered against him. What would have been the case if there had been no such limitation upon Liverpool brokers in general, it is not necessary for me to say, because it might give rise to some questions of very considerable difficulty and nicety. A passage has been cited from Story on Agency, section 131, to the effect that factors possess a general authority; and if on selling they violate their principal's instructions, the principal is nevertheless bound. I see that Story refers to Fenn v. Harrison,⁴ which certainly does not warrant the general proposition. I can understand that, if a factor has authority to sell, although he has also given to him a particular amount at which to sell, it is presumed he has authority to sell in the ordinary way,—that is to say, in ordinary contracts there is the ordinary obligation of delivery, and other matters of that sort; but I doubt extremely whether, when he has authority to sell at a particular price only, he could, in spite of that particular express limit, have an authority to sell for any price he thought fit. I do not think any case referred to in the note by Mr. Justice Story warrants that. Again, we are asked how is this business to be carried on if this sort of argument prevails? There are two answers to that question. In the first place it is carried on, and in the next place it will be carried on, in this way: the assured trusts to the honesty of the broker, that he is not telling him an untruth when he assumes to act beyond his authority, and he trusts to the solvency of the party whose name is mentioned as principal; and I dare say that, generally speaking, he is very well content to trust to the matter without referring to the terms of the powers of the broker, because, generally speaking, though people may sometimes pledge their credit beyond what is right, and beyond their means at the time, yet, after all, they do not often assume an authority which they do not possess. People must trust to the veracity of the broker and to the solvency of the principal.

(2) "It makes no difference in a case of this kind whether the factor, if known to be such, has been employed by the principal to sell, or whether it is the first and only instance of his being so employed by the principal; for, still being a known factor, he is held out by the principal as possessing in effect all the ordinary authority of a factor in relation to the particular sale."

(3) "Regularly it is true that where a man doth lesse than the commandement or authority committed unto him, there the act is void. And where a man doth that which he is authorized to doe and more, there it is good for that which is warranted, and void for the rest."

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that so much of the rule which has been obtained by the defendant as seeks to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff for 150*l.* and to enter a nonsuit, should be made absolute; and, except for the purpose I am about to notice, that would render it unnecessary to discuss the other part of the defendant's rule, because if he is right in asking the Court to enter a nonsuit for him, he does not want the other part of the rule. If the defendant is right in his contest on that point, it becomes unimportant in that point of view. I am clearly of opinion that if the defendant is right in his contest, that there was no authority to underwrite for 150*l.*, the plaintiff cannot sever that sum and seek to recover his verdict for the amount of 100*l.* I do not want to add anything upon that point.

The material question is, whether the defendant is liable in respect of the policy declared upon. Now, if we are to look at the express authority given, not only does it not establish a liability upon the defendant, but it negatives the liability. Then it is stated that we are not bound to look at it; but even if we are, we cannot give effect to it, upon the ground that the authority which is given to a general agent, cannot be limited by any secret limitation given by his principal to him inconsistent with that general authority. I do not want to interfere with that as a general rule of law; it is one of which I entirely approve; nor do I think that to make a man a general agent, for the purpose of the application of that rule, he must be a general agent for all purposes. If I may use such an expression, which is not very correct, a man may be a kind of special general agent, that is, an agent to sign bills or to execute policies; and although his authority is not extended to every matter of business, it may be general to every matter of business to which the authority applies. Then it appears to me in this particular case,—looking at the custom alleged (which we must take as part of the case), that it is understood in Liverpool there is a limit to a broker's authority,—the only argument that can be urged for the plaintiff is, that the precise limit is not known; but that makes no difference, as the knowledge of the custom prevents the plaintiff from contending that the broker stood in the situation of a general agent, so as to apply the argument that has been addressed to us on the part of the plaintiff. For these reasons, I think the rule the defendant has obtained to enter a nonsuit should be made absolute.

(4) 3 Term Rep. 757, 762; s. c. 4 Term Rep. 177. Story also incites Whitehead v. Tuckett, 15 East, 400; Pickering v. Busk, 15 Ibid. 38, 43; Daniel v. Adams, Amb. 495 498.

Rule absolute to enter a nonsuit.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

June 18, 1866.

SMITH AND ANOTHER v. RIDGWAY.*

35 L. J. Ex. 198; L. R. 1 Ex. 331; 4 H. & C. 577; 14 L. T. 632; 12 Jur. N.S. 742; 14 W. R. 868: affirming, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Ex. 11; L. R. 1 Ex. 46; 4 H. & C. 37; 13 L. T. 561; 14 W. R. 207 (Ex.).

Referred to, Cuthbert v. Robinson, [1882] E. R. A.; 51 L. J. Ch. 238; 46 L. T. 57; 30 W. R. 366 (Ch. D.); King v. King, 1885, 18 L. R. Ir. 531 (V.C.). See Seal v. Taylor, [1894] E. R. A.; 63 L. J. Ch. 275; [1894] 1 Ch. 316; 70 L. T. 329 (C. A.).

Will, Construction of—"Appurtenances"—"Manufactory."

WILL.—A testator was possessed of two buildings used as manufactories of earthenware, one on the west and the other on the east side of a street. The buildings were capable of being used as separate manufactories, but for very many years they had been used together, and they were occupied by the same tenants, A. and B, at the time of the testator's death. At that time, however, certain repairs were necessary in order to make the buildings on the east side available as a separate manufactory. The value of the buildings on the east side was about half that of those on the west. The testator, by a codicil to his will, devised his manufactory on the west side of the street—describing it as in the occupation of A. and B, with the outbuildings and appurtenances thereto belonging—to certain devisees. The buildings on the east side were not specifically mentioned either in the will or the codicil, but there was in the will a general devise of all the real property to trustees for sale:—Held, that the buildings on the east side, although at the time forming part of the manufactory in the occupation of A. and B, did not pass under the words of the devise in the codicil, as appurtenant to the manufactory on the west side.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer discharging a rule to enter a nonsuit.

The material facts are fully stated, with the pleadings, in the report below (35 L. J. Ex. 11).

It appears that one Joseph Mayer was possessed of two manufactories of earthenware, the one on the east and the other on the west side of High Street, in Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent. They were distinct factories, and capable of being used separately, but for many years they had been occupied by the same tenant. At the time of Mayer's death in 1860, the smaller factory (which was on the east side of the street, and of about half the value of the other) could not be used as a factory without a new chimney being built and other repairs being executed.

* Coram Willes, J., Blackburn, J., Byles, J., Mellor, J., Shee, J. and Smith, J.

By his will, Mayer devised all his real estate to the plaintiffs and one Abington, upon trust for sale.

By a codicil he devised to Abington and Abner Wedgwood absolutely, as tenants in common, his "messuages, cottages, manufactory and land on the west side of High Street, in Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of Ridgway & Abington and others: his messuage on the east side of High Street, in Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of Mrs. Ridgway; his messuage on the east side of High Street, in Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of Mrs. Adams; and his five messuages or cottages at the corner of Broom Street, Hanley aforesaid, in the occupation of William Charters and others, all which said messuages, lands, hereditaments and premises were situate in the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent aforesaid, together with the stables, warehouses, outbuildings, yards, gardens, and all other rights, members and appurtenances to the said messuages or tenements, lands and hereditaments belonging or appertaining."

At the time of Mayer's death the defendant and Abington occupied both factories in partnership. The plaintiffs contended that Abington was devisee in trust jointly with them of all the hereditaments not specifically devised by the codicil, including therefore the factory on the east side, in respect of which they sought to recover a portion of the rent in this action.

The defendant contended that the testator, when he specifically devised the manufactory on the west side, describing it as "in the occupation of Ridgway and Abington," must be taken to have intended to include in the description the buildings on the east side of the street, which would then of course be taken out of the general devise in the will to the plaintiffs as trustees for sale.

The Court below held, that the factory on the east side could not be considered as appurtenant to the factory on the west side, and discharged the rule for a nonsuit, which the defendant had previously obtained.

W. H. Terrell (with whom was Quain) now argued, in support of an appeal from this decision, that the clause in the codicil carried both the factories.

Milward (Baylis with him) argued, for the plaintiffs, the respondents, that the manufactory on the east side could not pass under the word "appurtenances," or any other of the general words used.

Terrell was heard in reply.

The arguments did not differ materially from those in the Court below. In addition to the authorities cited there, the following were now cited—Steele v. the Midland Railway Company (14 Law Times, N.S. 8) (as to what is included in the term "house" under the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act), and Bodenham v. Pritchard (1 B. & C. 350, and note to 2 Wms. Saund. 401).

WILLES, J.—We are of opinion that this judgment ought to be affirmed. The question for our decision is, whether the words "on the west side" in the devise ought to be rejected as a false description inserted by mistake, or whether they are true words of restriction of the general terms of the devise in which they are inserted, and of which they profess to be a limitation; in which latter case the Court must of course in construction restrain the devise to this portion by the condition which those words impose, namely, that the whole of the property passing thereunder should be "on the west side" of High Street.

It is unnecessary to enter into any consideration of the authorities, because they are all consistent from the time of Lord Bacon to the time of Webber v. Stanley (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 217), in which case

Erle, C.J., laid down the law with a clearness and an authority which cannot be at all surpassed. And the law is that, where words can be applied so as to operate upon the subject-matter, and so as to limit the other terms employed in the devise where there is a subject-matter to which all the terms apply, we ought not to reject any of the terms as being a false description,—as was expressed in the maxim commented on by Lord Bacon, Non accipi verba debent in demonstrationem falsam quæ competunt in limitationem veram.

The question is, whether, looking at all the words employed by the testator, they are satisfied by—and are a competent description of—the “property upon the west side of the High Street,” or whether, in order to satisfy the language of the testator taken altogether, it is necessary to say that property on the east side passes, and that the introduction of the words “on the west side” ought to be rejected as a false demonstration.

Now that must depend, of course, on the facts; and the result of the evidence appears to be that there is (and has been for a great number of years) a manufactory on the east side; that in the state in which it was at the time of the devise in 1860, it could not have been used as a distinct manufactory, without the chimney being repaired and other work being done upon it. It also appears that, with such alterations and repairs, it was capable of being used as a manufactory distinct and separate from that on the west side. Both factories appear to have been taken under one lease about the year 1830, at which time it would seem that the factory on the east side was of importance; but that in consequence of expenditure and improvements in the factory on the west side, that factory appears to have subsequently become the more important part of the property, and the principal process of the manufacture would seem to have been carried on there. And the manufactory on the west, like that on the east side, appears also to have been capable of being used as a distinct manufactory.

In point of fact, however, it would seem that both factories were more or less used for the purpose of the same business from 1830 down to the present time. At the time of the devise, and also at the time of the testator's death, it appears there was a manufactory upon the west side, answering to the description in the devise, and there was another manufactory on the east side, which does not come within its terms, unless we are to reject the west side.”

Now, before we can reject language of the testator, which is applicable to the subject-matter existing at the time when the words were used, some reason must be presented to us; and one reason—and the main one—relied upon strongly for the defendant, is, that in this will the term “manufactory” is found used—not alone, but—in company with very general language sufficient to describe all that was necessary to make up the entirety of the manufactory, by reason of its use being essential to the convenient occupation of the manufactory as such; there are the ordinary general words which are intended to take in any small members of the property, which may be supposed to have been omitted in the specific description which precedes; and it is said that the factory on the east side of the street ought therefore to have been held to pass, as “belonging or appertaining to” the factory on the west side of the street, or, at any rate, under the general word “appurtenances.”

I apprehend the rule upon that subject is clear enough. There can be no doubt that words which prima facie describe a building only, may be considered to include land, which is so intimately connected with the use of the building that it would be, in the mention of it, as in the cases referred to in Steele v. the Midland Railway Company (14 Law Times, N.S. 3), and the cases collected in the notes to Smith v. Martin (2 Wms. Saund. 401). And it must be admitted that the word “manufactory,” which is a larger and vaguer term, may well include, not merely the building, such as machinery works, but may also include small outbuildings necessary to be used in the course of manufacture, such as a drying-house, or land that is used in the course of any of the necessary processes. But in this case the difficulty is, that that which was sought to be included in the members as belonging to the manufactory, is a thing which is itself capable of being used as a manufactory; it is not a mere accessory (except in the use to which it is put by the tenants of the manufactory, to which it is said to pass as a member) but it is a distinct manufactory by itself, and capable of being described as such, and not one of those smaller matters that would pass under the word "appurtenances," or, as shewn in the notes to Smith v. Martin (2 Wms. Saund. 401), even without that word. Moreover, it is to be observed, that between the description of the manufactory and these general words, there is inserted, first of all, a devise in terms of a message "on the east side of the street"; secondly, another message, "on the west side of the street"; and, thirdly, "five messages or cottages at the corner of — street as aforesaid." All of which, like the manufactory in question, are described somewhat precisely by way of locality; and then follow the general words. Therefore, as the general words may well have application to some portion of the devise, it is not necessary to find them an application that shall extend to a subject-matter of precisely the same description as the manufactory on the west side.

It should seem, therefore, that the proper answer to the question is, that there is here a true restriction of the devise to the manufactory on the west side. I would observe we are not assisted here by an argument often used on these occasions, namely, that there was an appearance on the face of the testamentary instrument of an intention by the testator to dispose of the whole of his property, for the result of holding that the manufactory on the west side alone passes, is not that, as to the manufactory on the east side, he died intestate; because that factory did not pass under the codicil, but under the will, to the plaintiffs (and to another tenant, whose name is omitted, for reasons to which it is unnecessary to refer), as the testator's trustees for sale.

Upon the whole, therefore, we do not see our way to a different conclusion from that at which the Court of Exchequer have arrived, nor do we feel ourselves justified in striking the words of the description "on the west side of High Street, in Hanley aforesaid," out of the will; and, therefore, the judgment of the Court below will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

May 22, June 12, 1866.

VANDENBERGH v. SPOONER.

35 L. J. Ex. 201; 4 H. & C. 519; L. R. 1 Ex. 316; 14 L. T. 701; 14 W. R. 843.

Observed upon, Newell v. Radford, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. C.P. 1; L. R. 3 C.P. 52; 17 L. T. 118; 16 W. R. 79 (C.P.). Distinguished, Jones v. Joyner, 1900, 82 L. T. 768 (Q.B.D. Div.).

Statute of Frauds, s. 17.—Essentials of Contract—Names of Buyer and Seller.

SALE OF GOODS.—A contract signed by S., by which "S. agrees to buy the whole of the lots of marble purchased by V. now lying at L.," is not a sufficient memorandum in writing within the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds to bind S., inasmuch as the name of the seller, as seller, does not appear.

Action for goods sold and delivered, and goods bargained and sold, &c.
Plea, never indebted.

At the trial, before Bramwell, B., at the Middlesex Sittings in Hilary Term, the following memorandum was produced, signed by the defendant:

"D. Spooner agrees to buy the whole of the lots of marble purchased by J. Vandenberg, and now lying at Lyme Cobb, at one shilling per foot.

(Signed) "D. Spooner."

It was then proved that the defendant afterwards wrote out another note as follows, which the plaintiff signed, believing it to be a copy of the former:

"J. Vandenberg agrees to sell to Mr. D. Spooner his several lots of marble purchased by him, now lying at Lyme, at one shilling the cubic foot, and a bill at one month.

(Signed) "J. Vandenberg."

The jury found that the real contract was contained in the former of these two notes, the one signed by the defendant, and found a verdict for the plaintiff for 35*l*.

A rule for a nonsuit was afterwards obtained by J. B. Karlake on the ground that the note was not a sufficient memorandum of the contract within the Statute of Frauds to bind the defendant, as it did not contain the name of the seller as seller.

Huddleston and Hannen shewed cause.—The seller's name is to be found in the note, and all the necessary elements of an agreement are there. The note in fact states all that was to be done by the person charged, and is signed by him, and that is sufficient to satisfy the 17th section of the statute—Sarl v. Bourdillon (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 188; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 78), Bailey v. Sweeting (9 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 843; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 150). In Williams v. Lake (2 El. & El. 349; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 1), Mr. Justice Hill says, that "it is sufficient if the particulars appear by a reasonable construction, together with the signature of the party to be charged." And in Blackburn on the Contract of Sale, p. 55, it is said that "it is not necessary that the name of the party with whom the contract is made should be inserted, if there be on the face of the memorandum a sufficient description to shew who he is." This document must be read as ordinary men of business would read it; and, reading it in that way, the reasonable construction and inference is that the plaintiff is the seller. But even if it does not appear from the document itself that he is the seller, still it may be shewn from the surrounding circumstances who the seller is, just as parol evidence was admitted in Macdonald v. Longbottom (1 El. & El. 987; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 256), to shew the meaning of "all your wool."

Karslake and T. K. Kingdon, contra.—The document which the jury have found not to be the contract may be put aside at once. Either then there is no contract at all, because the notes do not tally, or the contract is found in that note only which is signed by the defendant; and the absence of the plaintiff's name as one of the contracting parties is fatal to the validity of that note—Champion v. Plummer (1 Bos. & P. N.R. 252) and Williams v. Lake (2 El. & El. 349; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 1). The way in which the plaintiff's name is mentioned serves only to identify the goods; the name cannot, just because of certain extrinsic circumstances, be imported into the contract as the name of one of the parties. If that were allowed, the whole contract might as well be proved by parol at once. Sarl v. Bourdillon (1 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 188; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 78) does not help the plaintiff, for that case only decided that where the purchaser wrote an order in the seller's book, the seller's name, which was written on the fly-leaf of the book, might be incorporated into the contract; whereas Boydell v. Drummond (11 East, 142) shews, on the other hand, that parol evidence cannot be given to connect names written in different books so as to shew that they are the names of the parties to the contract. Although for certain purposes you may look to the surrounding circumstances, yet for the essential elements of the contract you must look only to the written document itself. The plaintiff might have purchased these goods as broker, and on the face of the contract there is no sort of reasonable certainty that he is the person selling the goods to the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

BRAMWELL, B. (June 12) delivered the judgment of the Court (Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B., Martin, B., and Channell, B.).—This case turns upon whether there was a sufficient memorandum in writing within the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds to bind the defendant to an alleged purchase of goods. A memorandum was produced, signed by him, but not mentioning the sellers' name as the seller, but only mentioning it in this way, that the defendant agreed to buy certain goods which had been "purchased by J. Vandenberg," the plaintiff; and the question is, whether as a matter of "construction" or of "reasonable intendment," no matter which of the two expressions is used, that document would convey that Vandenberg was the seller. We have come to the conclusion that we cannot say it conveys that meaning. We may speculate or guess, on reading the document, that Vandenberg is the seller, but we cannot say that is the reasonable construction of the document. There is therefore, in our opinion, no sufficient memorandum in writing within the Statute of Frauds to bind the defendant, inasmuch as the name of the seller, as seller, does not appear. The rule will be made absolute to enter a nonsuit.

MARTIN, B.—I do not intend to differ from the rest of the Court, but I cannot say that I am satisfied that the document is not a sufficient memorandum.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 12, 1866.

BICKFORD v. D'ARCY AND BEACHEY.

35 L. J. Ex. 202; 4 H. & C. 534; L. R. 1 Ex. 354; 14 L. T. 629;
14 W. R. 900; 12 Jur. N.S. 816.

Interrogatories—Action against Solicitors—Liability to Penalties.

DISCOVERY. SOLICITOR.—In an action against D. and B., a firm practising as attornies and solicitors, for not properly investing the plaintiff's monies intrusted to them, the plaintiff was allowed to administer interrogatories to the defendant B., although they were such that the answers might render B. liable to a penalty (under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 2. and the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. s. 26) for practising as an attorney and solicitor without having the proper certificate,—the Court holding that the questions were put bona fide in aid of the action, to ascertain whether B. was really liable with D., and that B. might safely answer them, as they related to the business of the partnership as scriveners.

Baker v. Lane (3 H. & C. 544; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 57) explained.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff employed the defendants as her attornies and solicitors to invest monies for her on mortgage, and that the defendants promised to invest the same on mortgage in a proper manner, and received the monies for that purpose, but did not invest the same, though a reasonable time in that behalf had elapsed before action. There were also the ordinary money counts.

Pleas, to the first count, that the defendants did not promise, and that they did not, in pursuance of the alleged retainer and employment, receive the said monies for the purpose and on the terms alleged; to the other counts, never indebted.

Pigott, B., at chambers, made an order allowing interrogatories to be administered to the defendant Beachey.

The first interrogatory, from which the characters of the others may be inferred, was as follows: "Did you, during the year 1857, and during the succeeding years down to July, 1865, or during any and which of such years, receive any and what share of the profits made in those years respectively, in the business of attorneys or solicitors, carried on by the firm of D'Arcy & Beachey, at Newton Abbott, Devonshire?"

It appeared, from the affidavit of the defendant Beachey, that he had never been admitted as an attorney and solicitor; and he was never partner with D'Arcy, and that the money was paid to D'Arcy alone.

According to the plaintiffs' affidavit, the defendants' firm formerly consisted of D'Arcy and the son of the defendant Beachey, and that the last-named defendant had entered the firm on the death of his son; and that the question was, whether the father was, under the circumstances, liable to refund the plaintiff's money which had been intrusted to the firm.

J. B. Karslake obtained a rule to shew cause why the order of Pigott, B., should not be rescinded.—The objection to the interrogatories was, that they might tend to make the defendant liable to an indictment for misdemeanor, and to penalties (under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 2. and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. s. 26), for practising wrongfully as an attorney or solicitor, without the necessary certificate, &c.

J. D. Coleridge and H. T. Cole, for the plaintiff, now contended that the interrogatories ought to be allowed, on the authority of Osborn v. the London Dock Company (24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 40; s. c. 10 Exch. Rep. 698), which was acted upon in Chester v. Wortley (25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 47; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. 410). The objections, if taken at all, should be taken when the defendant comes to answer them—Bartlett v. Lewis (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 477). At any rate, the Court had a general discretion in the matter—Tupling v. Ward (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 222) and Stern v. Sevastopulo (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 268, per Erle, J., 270).

[CHANNELL, B., referred to The Queen v. Garbett (2 Car. & K. 474).]

Karslake and Wills, in support of the rule, relied principally on Baker v. Lane (3 H. & C. 544; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 57), where it was held that interrogatories could not be allowed in an action of libel if they tended to charge the defendant with an indictable offence. The interrogatories here are framed in order to render the defendant liable as an attorney. They inquire as to the share he had in the profits of the firm as attorneys; and his answers might render him liable to penalties.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—He would not be liable to penalties for acting as a scrivener. The inquiries seem directed to that branch of the business.]

Even in cases where criminal proceedings cannot be taken, the Court will not compel a party to answer: ex gr., in Pye v. Butterfield (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 17), interrogatories were disallowed, on the ground that the answers might expose the defendant to a forfeiture.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In the judgment in Baker v. Lane (3 H. & C. 544; s. c. 34 Law R. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 57) we did not state our reasons at length; but the real ground discussed among ourselves was, that the interrogatories were not bona fide. Now, I believe that these interrogatories are put bona fide. For myself, I should have preferred, in the first place, making a broad distinction between what may be called an examination in chief and a cross-examination. Here the interrogatories are administered under circumstances not at all similar to a cross-examination. So far as I know, this distinction has never yet been made. I fall in with the general view of the Court, that interrogatories of this character, if made bona fide, ought to be allowed; though I think it would be better if originally such a distinction had been made as I have pointed out; and that if the questions obviously tended to criminate, they should not be allowed.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. In Wigram on Discovery it is said that, if the question involves a criminal charge, the interrogator is not entitled to an answer to such question, although the question may be put. Soon after the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125. was passed, Osborn v. the London Dock Company (24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 40; s. c. 10 Exch. Rep. 698) was decided in this Court, Mr. Baron Alderson being at the time a member of the Court; and both he and Mr. Baron Parke seemed to adopt the view put forward in Wigram on Discovery; and the Court of Common Pleas seems also to have adopted it. I have acted on the same principle, but I have over and over again directed a question to be struck out when I thought it was not put bona fide; for in such a case I would not allow a proceeding in chambers to be made use of for putting a man in the disagreeable position of saying, "I will not answer that."

I remember the discussion in Baker v. Lane (3 H. & C. 544; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 57), and without saying that there was mala fides, there was certainly a further object in the interrogatories than that of merely getting answers for the particular suit. Now, in the present case the question is, whether or not the defendant Beachey is jointly answerable with D'Arcy for the alleged negligence in respect of certain monies. I do not see any objection to this, and I believe the questions are put bona fide, and that the real object is to obtain answers to questions to which the plaintiff is entitled to have answers. That is, in point of fact, whether Beachey was a partner in the transaction as a scrivener. I think he may very safely answer these questions without submitting himself to any penalty whatever. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged.

CHANNELL, B.—I also think that this rule should be discharged. If I thought these interrogatories were propounded with a different object, and not to serve the purposes of the suit, I should have come to a different conclusion. I apprehend that the object the plaintiff has in view is to shew that the firm of D'Arcy & Beachey was intrusted with the duty of investing the plaintiff's money, and that in that firm the defendant Beachey was a partner so as to be responsible in his own person for the negligence of the firm. The business of a money-scrivener is a business which is not necessarily incident to the business of an attorney; but it may be incident to it, and is commonly carried on with it. And, therefore, the reference to the fact that Beachey may have been in partnership with D'Arcy as an attorney, is for the purpose of shewing that he is responsible as one of the firm intrusted with the investment of the plaintiff's money.

It appears further that, as far as the authorities go, they are in favour of the plaintiff. I think that Osborn v. the London Dock Company (24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 40; s. c. 10 Exch. Rep. 698) and Chester v. Wortley (25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 47; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. 410) are in favour of the plaintiff; and I do not think, looking at the particular circumstances of Baker v. Lane (3 H. & C. 544; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 57), that we ought to consider the decision of this Court in that case interferes with the fair inference to be drawn from Osborn v. the London Dock Company (24 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 40; s. c. 10 Exch. Rep. 698) and Chester v. Wortley (25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 47; s. c. 17 Com. B. Rep. 410). I confess I wish some clear rule could be laid down on more satisfactory grounds.

I do not think that the defendant may not be relieved from the necessity of answering these questions; but I think the interrogatories may be propounded. We may have to discuss the question over again; but on the question of whether the interrogatories ought to be allowed, we ought to be governed by the decision in Osborn v. the London Dock Company (24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 40; s. c. 10 Exch. Rep. 698).

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 12, 26, 1866.

LORD COLCHESTER AND OTHERS v. KEWNEY.

35 L. J. Ex. 204; 4 H. & C. 445; L. R. 1 Ex. 368; 14 L. T. 888; 14 W. R. 994; 12 Jur. N.S. 743: affirmed, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Ex. 172; L. R. 2 Ex. 253; 16 L. T. 463; 15 W. R. 930 (Ex. Ch.).

Land-Tax—Exemption—Hospital—Royal Charity—38 Geo. 3. c. 5. s. 25.

HOSPITAL. LAND TAX.—The proviso in the 38 Geo. 3. c. 5. s. 25, exempting hospitals from land-tax, does not apply to hospitals founded since the passing of that act.

Quære—If an asylum for the maintenance and education of orphan children of soldiers who have fallen in active service, built and endowed out of a fund produced by general subscription, is an hospital within the meaning of 38 Geo. 3. c. 5. s. 25.

SPECIAL CASE stated by consent, and by order of Bramwell, B., without pleadings.

The plaintiffs were three of the Royal Commissioners and Trustees of the Patriotic Fund, and the defendant was the collector of land-tax for the parish of Wandsworth, acting in the division of West Brixton, in the county of Surrey, within which the asylum and buildings of the Victoria Patriotic Asylum were situate.

The plaintiffs and divers other persons were appointed Commissioners under a Royal Commission, dated the 7th of October, 1854, for the purpose of ascertaining the best mode of applying the Patriotic Fund which had been raised by public subscription for the widows and orphans of soldiers and marines who had fallen in the Crimean War. The Commissioners, after having appropriated a portion of the fund to the immediate relief of those persons for whose benefit it was intended, decided on establishing and endowing with the residue an institution for the education of three hundred daughters of soldiers, sailors and marines who had fallen in active service. They accordingly purchased a portion of Wandsworth Common from Lord Spencer, the Lord of the Manor of Battersea and Wandsworth, and built the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

The children admitted were lodged, boarded, clothed and educated at the cost of a portion of the Patriotic Fund, which had been invested in public securities under the control of the Paymaster General. The asylum was occupied exclusively by the children and the necessary officers and servants of the establishment, the latter being paid and removed by the plaintiffs and the other Commissioners.

In August 1863, the assessors of land-tax for the parish of Wandsworth assessed the asylum in respect of its site and the buildings within the walls and limits of the asylum to the land-tax for one half-year, in the sum of 37l. 10s. on a rental of 1,500l. The plaintiffs claimed exemption under the 38 Geo. 3. c. 5. s. 25, by which, amongst other buildings, hospitals are exempted, and also on the ground that the asylum was a royal charity and Crown property. They appealed to the local Land-tax Commissioners, who decided that the asylum was not an hospital within the meaning of the statute nor a royal charity, and dismissed the appeal. The defendant thereupon distrained for the amount of the assessment; and, an action being brought by the plaintiffs, the question for the opinion of the Court was, whether or not the asylum was liable to be assessed and rated to the land-tax.

Sir R. P. Collier, Solicitor General (Prideaux with him), was heard (June 12) for the plaintiffs.

Mellish (Philbrick with him), for the defendant, contended that the asylum was a school and not an hospital within the meaning of 38 Geo. 3. c. 5. s. 25; and that even if it were an hospital, the section exempted only hospitals in existence at the time of the passing of the act.

The arguments are sufficiently noticed in the judgment of the Court.—The following statutes and authorities were referred to: The Warden and College of All Souls v. Costar (3 Bos. & P. 635), Harrison v. Bulcock (1 H. Black. 68), The Attorney General v. Hill (2 Mee. & W. 159; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 105), Johnson's Dictionary, "Hospital," "Almshouse," Com. Dig. tit. 'Hospital,' note, 38 Geo. 3. c. 60. and 42 Geo. 3. c. 116.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 26th of June the judgment of the Court (Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B., Martin, B., and Channell, B.) was delivered by—

CHANNELL, B.—The question for our decision in this special case is, whether the site of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum is liable to be assessed to the land-tax. Exemption is claimed by the plaintiffs, who are the trustees of this asylum, on two grounds. First, that this asylum is an hospital, and therefore exempt by the 25th section of the 38 Geo. 3. c. 5; secondly, that it is Crown land, and therefore exempt. On the part of the defendant, these propositions are disputed, and it is further contended that even if this were an hospital within the meaning of that word in the section in question, yet it was not in existence in the 38th year of the reign of George the Third, and that the exemption only extends to institutions then existing. The facts are fully set out in the case, and it will not be requisite further to refer to them. It will, however, be necessary to examine the statutes imposing the land-tax to shew how the law now stands, and the successive changes that have been made. The tax appears to have been first imposed as an annual tax in the time of William and Mary, and by several successive acts of parliament to have been continued. Those acts imposed, not only the tax now known as the land-tax, but also a tax on personal property and salaries, somewhat analogous to the present income and property tax, and from the time of the 4 & 5 W. & M. they contained a clause exempting hospitals from its operation in somewhat similar terms to that hereafter referred to. These annual acts appear to have been passed in much the same terms, until 1798, the date of the 38 Geo. 3. c. 5, the last annual act. The 25th section of that act provides that nothing in the act shall extend to charge any college or hall in either of the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or certain colleges named, or the corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, or the College of Bromley, "or any hospital in England, Wales or Berwick-upon-Tweed, for or in respect of the scites of the said colleges, halls or hospitals, or any of the buildings within the walls or limits thereof." The section then proceeds to provide for the exemption of persons connected with such institutions from the tax on their salaries, and also for the exemption of land which in 1693, the date of the act 4 & 5 W. & M., had formed part of the site of any college, or of certain specified institutions, and also that the act should not charge "any other hospitals or almshouses" in respect of lands the rents of which in 1693 had been applicable solely to the relief of the inmates.

Now, the first question that arises is, whether if this asylum had been in existence at the time of the passing of this act, the trustees could have claimed exemption. It is objected that they are not incorporated, and that there can be no hospital without incorporation, and no doubt the old authorities tend to shew that an hospital must be incorporated. But they shew something more, for Lord Coke says, in the case of Sutton's Hospital (10 Rep. 1), that there is no legal hospital except where the poor persons benefited are themselves incorporated; and he says that where the corporate succession is vested in trustees to effectuate the purposes of the institution, that is no legal hospital. It seems, however, tolerably clear that a legal hospital, in that sense, is not meant when the word "hospital" is used in this section, for towards the end of the section the words "other hospitals," follow the names of some particular hospitals, some of which seem not to be incorporated in such a manner as to make them legal hospitals under this definition. If, then, we understand that the word "hospital" in the section does not mean strictly a legal hospital, is there any reason for supposing that there need be any incorporation at all? It seems rather more reasonable to hold that the word is used in a popular sense only, and that any institution which, though not in a strictly legal, might in a popular sense be called an hospital, might claim exemption. But some doubts arise whether even upon this view this institution would be an hospital, by which word we understand rather an institution for the relief of the sick or aged than for the maintenance and education of children. We do not speak of an hospital for orphans. But upon the whole we are inclined to think that if this institution had been in existence at the time of the passing of the act 38 Geo. 3. c. 5, it might have claimed exemption.

This point is certainly not so clear as to make it unnecessary to consider the position of a subsequently founded hospital of that character and the course of subsequent legislation. In the same session of 38 Geo. 3. was passed another act, c. 60, which enacted that the sums charged by the previous act, c. 5, on counties, towns and places in respect of lands within the same, to be raised, levied and paid within a year, should be raised, levied and paid yearly for ever, and that the several powers, provisions, clauses, &c., of the former act, except as in the second act altered or varied, should be in full force as if repeated and re-enacted in that act, but that all this should be subject to redemption as therein provided. By subsequent statutes the provisions for redemption were from time to time altered, repealed, re-enacted, and consolidated; but the scheme remained the same, and the alterations were principally of the machinery and regulations for carrying it into effect. Now, one object of the legislature in passing the act was to support the public credit by imposing a fixed charge on land, on the strength of which money could be borrowed, and to relieve the country of a portion of the existing debt on advantageous terms. Provision was made for redemption of the tax by transferring to the Commissioners for the reduction of the national debt a sum in consols, the income of which should exceed by one-tenth the tax to be redeemed. At this time the funds were greatly depreciated, as compared with other securities, and especially with land. A permanent charge of 10*l.* a year upon land would therefore be of greater value in the market than a sum producing 11*l.* a year in the funds. It would therefore, if the then imposed tax was to be permanent, be to the interest of landowners to redeem, and upon their doing so the revenue would be benefited to the extent of one-tenth of the tax redeemed. It was therefore the policy of the legislature to encourage redemption. That this was so we see from the extensive powers given to persons having a limited interest only to raise money to redeem the tax, and other inducements held out to landowners to redeem, and from the fact that upon refusal of the owners, third persons might purchase the tax, retaining it as a charge payable to themselves. But no one would have redeemed the tax unless it had been made a permanent charge upon the land, not likely ever to be much less in amount and not to be got rid of except by redemption. If that were the case the redemption would necessarily increase the market value of the land, and would do so as we have shewn to a greater extent than the sum required to be expended in the redemption. If, however, the land was to be liable to the tax in the hands of one purchaser, but not of another, the value of the land to sell would not be increased in proportion to the outlay for redemption. To carry out the policy of the act, therefore, we should expect to find that no new or shifting exemptions could arise or come into effect after the tax became permanent. The effect of the acts on several points was explained in The Queen v. the Land Tax Commissioners (2 El. & B. 694; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 211). Upon each district separately assessed a fixed quota was to be charged. That was not to be altered, although before levy the amount of tax redeemed within the district was to be deducted and the remainder only levied. This was to be levied on the lands not exonerated by redemption. These lands were to be assessed yearly by an equal pound-rate, sufficient to produce the required amount. We see, therefore, from this, in the first place, that the amount of tax payable in any particular portion of land would increase or decrease not according as the value of land increased or decreased absolutely, but according as it increased or decreased relatively to the other lands in the district not exonerated; and as any owner who was about to improve his land to such an extent as to have any effect on the rest of the district might be expected first to redeem the tax, no person could ever expect that the amount of tax upon his land would ever be sensibly diminished, although he would know that if he improved without taking the precaution of redeeming, the tax would be increased. We see, then, that this inducement for redemption, viz., that no loss was likely to be incurred, was actually held out by the legislature. In the next place, we see that if any portion of land chargeable with tax came into the hands of a proprietor having a valid claim of exemption, a greater burden would be thrown upon the remainder of the district, for the amount to be raised would be the same as before, and the land on which it was to be charged less. This of itself is a strong argument for supposing that all exemptions must attach at the time these quotas were thus permanently fixed, and must in all changes of ownership follow the land and not the proprietor. As long as the tax was imposed annually, although the legislature, in fact, imposed the same quota in each district as they had done before, it must be taken that this was done deliberately and after consideration of all the changes that had taken place in the ownership of property since the last act. We find in two cases arising under the temporary acts, viz., Harrison v. Bulcock (1 H. Black. 68) and All Souls College v. Costa (3 Bos. & P. 635), that it has been held, with respect to additions to hospitals and colleges which had been made since exemption was first given, but before the act imposing the tax under which the assessment complained of was made, that such additions were exempt. The distinction between those two cases and the present was noticed in one of them, the All Souls College case (3 Bos. & P. 635), by the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Lord Alvanley, who says, that with respect to colleges founded since the land-tax was made perpetual, he would say nothing. The inference we are disposed to draw from what was said in that case seems to us to be, that the important thing to see in construing the exemption is, whether or not the land was within the exemption at the time of the passing of the act imposing the tax on all land. In that case it was, in the present it was not. Considering, therefore, the hardship on other proprietors in the district, which would be caused by shifting exemptions coming into operation on a change of ownership, together with the evident policy of the act to make the charge on lands a permanent one, with a view to encourage its redemption for the benefit of the revenue, we think we should hold that there can be no exemption in case of lands not exempt when the tax was made permanent. The same conclusion would, we think, necessarily be drawn from a strict construction of the words of the exemption; for "any hospital" must mean "any existing hospital."

Then, the further question arises, whether this asylum is exempt as Crown land; but to this we think the same reasoning will apply. There is, indeed, very great doubt whether, supposing this asylum to have been in existence in 1798, it would have been exempt on this ground, viz., as Crown land. It is true that the Commissioners were appointed by the Crown, and, to some extent, for public purposes; but it was mainly to administer funds contributed for a particular purpose by individuals, and all taxes or other imposts charged upon them would be payable from these funds, and not from the public purse. But however that may be, we think that these lands, having been chargeable with land-tax when belonging to Lord Spencer, as we presume to have been the case, although it is not distinctly stated, would be chargeable still in the hands of the Crown, if directly purchased for the Crown. The case quoted to shew that Crown lands are not chargeable with land-tax, The Attorney General v. Hill (2 Mee. & W. 159; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 105), seems to us to favour this view rather than the contrary; for it is distinctly found in the case (at page 163) that the assessment complained of on Deptford Dockyard was for land which had formed part of the dockyard when the land-tax was made perpetual. This shews that, in the opinion of the late Mr. Justice Wightman, who was then counsel for the Crown, it was a material point in order to make out the exemption. It may be observed that the effect of holding that the Crown must pay the land-tax chargeable on land which they may purchase, is not really to tax the Crown, but merely to make the Crown pay the market-price for land purchased. If the tax had been previously redeemed, of course the purchase-money would have been larger, and the difference between the money in the two cases would be gained by the Crown at the expense of the other proprietors of the district, not at the expense of the public revenue, whenever lands were purchased on which the tax had not been redeemed, if the exemption claimed were to be allowed. If there were any provisions for reducing the amount of the tax to be levied on the district, of course the case would be different. There may be some difficulty in enforcing payment against the Crown, and we do not say that all, or even any, of the remedies provided for ordinary cases, could be resorted to. We do not, however, think that this shews that the lands would not be still chargeable, or that an assessment, in which part of the quota to be levied on the district was assessed on Crown lands, chargeable before they became Crown lands, would not be a good one. For these reasons, we think our judgment should be for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 8, 1866.

WRIGHT v. CHILD.

35 L. J. Ex. 209; 4 H. & C. 529; L. R. 1 Ex. 358; 15 L. T. 141.

Sheriff—Negligence in conducting Sale—Interference of Debtor—Special Bailiff.

SHERIFF.—The sale of goods under a fi. fa. having been fixed for the 26th of July, the sheriff's officer, at the request of the debtor, delayed issuing advertisements till the 25th. On that day a further delay of some hours was granted at the request of the debtor's attorney, who ultimately instructed the officer to go on and sell, at the same time under another writ which had been delivered to the officer during the day. The goods were thereupon sold together without being lotted, at a considerable loss:—Held, that the interference of the debtor did not make the officer his agent, and that the sheriff was not relieved from his liability in respect of the negligent conduct of his officer in conducting the sale.

This action was brought by the assignee of Joseph Outram, a bankrupt, against the sheriff of Staffordshire, for negligence in executing a fi. fa. against the bankrupt's goods.

The first count of the declaration alleged that a fi. fa. issued out of the Court of Common Pleas to the defendant (the sheriff of Staffordshire) against the goods of Joseph Outram, indorsed for 163*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* (the sum recovered against him in an action in the said Court), and that the defendant accordingly took divers goods of the said Joseph Outram of far greater value than sufficient to satisfy the writ; yet that the defendant, although the said execution was brought for the recovery of a debt, &c., exceeding 50*l.*, unlawfully, wrongfully, injuriously and negligently sold by auction the said goods without publicly advertising the sale thereof on or during the three days next preceding the day of sale,¹ and wrongfully, &c. sold the said goods for a small, inadequate and insufficient price, and for much less than the reasonable price and value, and without taking due and reasonable care in and about the advertising and giving notice, and without giving due and sufficient notice thereof, and negligently and improperly conducted himself in and about the conduct and management of the sale, and wrongfully, &c., converted to his own use a great part of the said goods and of the proceeds of the sale; and by reason of the premises the sale of the goods realized a much less sum than it would otherwise have done, and the plaintiff, as Outram's assignee, was deprived of and lost a great part of the bankrupt's estate and effects.

The second, third and fourth counts were similar to the first, and related to other writs issued in other actions against the bankrupt. The fifth count alleged a delivery of all these writs to the sheriff, seizure by him thereunder, and negligence in the execution thereof. There were also counts in trover, and money counts.

Pleas—not guilty; leave and licence; a denial of Outram's property in the goods; and to the money counts, never indebted. Issue on all the pleas.

The action was tried before Montague Smith, J., at the Gloucester Spring Assizes, 1866, when the following facts appeared in evidence.

A fi. fa. was levied against Outram's goods on the 20th of July, under three of the writs mentioned in the declaration, and the sheriff's officer fixed the sale for the 26th. In consequence, however, of Outram having requested the officer not to issue any advertisements of the sale till an attempt had been made to raise money, no advertisement was published before the 25th of July. On the morning of the 26th the officer proceeded to lot the goods for sale, but again postponed the sale for some hours on the application of Outram's attorney. Later in the day the attorney told the officer that no money was forthcoming, and that he could go on with the sale. In the mean time, the other writ in the declaration had been delivered to the officer, and upon his telling the attorney that he could not sell under that writ without Outram's authority, the attorney authorized him to sell under all four writs at once. The goods were thereupon all sold together, and fetched 430*l.*, which was shewn to be very much less than their real value.

(1) The 74th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, is as follows: "Wherever the goods and chattels of a debtor are sold under an execution upon any judgment recovered in any action or suit brought for the recovery of a debt, money demand, or damages against any debtor exceeding 50*l.*, such goods and chattels shall in all cases, unless the Court shall otherwise direct, be sold by the sheriff by public auction, and not by bill of sale or private contract, and such sale shall be publicly advertised by the sheriff on and during three days next preceding the day of sale."

The sale also was proved to have been hurried, and otherwise negligently conducted.

Outram was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition on the 1st of August, and the plaintiff was appointed assignee.

The jury found that the advertisement of the sale had been postponed by Outram's interference, but that the defendant had not taken due care about the sale. They gave the plaintiff 150*l.* on the counts for negligence, and 15*l.* on the money counts.

J. O. Griffiths (pursuant to leave reserved) obtained a rule for a nonsuit, or to reduce the damages, on the ground that the defendant was not liable, because the bankrupt had by his own acts disentitled himself from suing the sheriff; or that if he could do so, it would only be in respect of the sheriff's overcharges for fees.

Huddleston and H. James shewed cause.—An execution debtor occupies a very different position with regard to the sheriff from that occupied by an execution creditor. The creditor may say, "I will have an officer of my own;" but the debtor cannot appoint a special bailiff, and has no right to interfere at all. Besides, the interference that took place in this case extended only to the delay in advertising; and, if it amounted to any contract at all to relieve the sheriff from liability, it certainly did not extend to the subsequent negligence of the officer in carrying out the sale; and it is in respect of that particular negligence that the jury have given the plaintiff 150*l.* Until the execution was satisfied, the sheriff remained liable; he could not divest himself of his official and ministerial character; even the appointment of a special bailiff would not relieve him from the subsequent liability—Taylor v. Richardson (8 Term Rep. 505). Even where the officer is authorized by the debtor to sell more goods than are necessary to satisfy the writ, the sheriff must be identified with his officer to the extent of the sum to be levied—Cook v. Palmer (6 B. & C. 739), per Bayley, J. Here the officer, after granting an indulgence to the debtor, which is by no means unusual, went on with the sale under the writ, and the sheriff is therefore responsible for the whole. Again, the assignee is not in this case estopped by the bankrupt's acts—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 73, 74.

Mellish and J. O. Griffiths, in support of the rule.—The questions are, first, could the bankrupt himself have maintained this action? and, secondly, can his assignee do so? First, then, the bankrupt here made the bailiff his own agent. When an execution creditor appoints a special bailiff who sells negligently, no doubt the sheriff is still answerable to the debtor, though not to the creditor; and so the converse may be equally true; that is, the execution debtor may have interfered so that he cannot sue the sheriff, though at the same time the sheriff is not thereby released quoad the creditors. Here the two heads of negligence are so mixed up that they must both be regarded as the consequence of the debtor's original interference; they cannot be separated merely because of the peculiar finding of the jury. Far less interference on the part of the creditor would have discharged the sheriff—Ford v. Leche (6 Ad. & E. 699; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) K.B. 150).

[MARTIN, B.—"Leave and licence" does not extend beyond that for which it was given. The sheriff's authority to sell was still under the writ. The title of the buyer was under the writ.]

So it would be in the case of a special bailiff. The execution debtor can put himself in the same position in several respects as the execution creditor; for instance, they can both rule the sheriff to return the writ; and as the direction of the creditor's attorney would have been sufficient to constitute the officer the agent of the creditor, and would have disentitled the creditor from ruling the sheriff—Porter v. Viner (1 Chit. Rep. 613. See also 1 Chitty's Archbold, (10th edit.) pp. 16, 587, and cases there cited), so by analogy the same reason is equally applicable to the debtor's interference here, and ought therefore to disentitle him from suing the sheriff. And secondly, the bankrupt himself being disentitled, the 73rd and 74th sections of the Bankruptcy Act cannot have the effect of placing his assignee in a better position than himself in respect of suing the sheriff.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. There was no contract, nor anything like a contract, that the sheriff's officer should be Outram's agent. Outram's interference may have relieved the sheriff from any liability in respect of postponing the advertisement; but with regard to the not taking due care about the sale, there is no evidence to shew that the sheriff was relieved from performing his ordinary duty of making the most he could of the goods.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think, on examining the case, that the defendant fails upon the facts. I think that we cannot come to the conclusion that there was an agreement between Outram and the sheriff's officer superseding the authority of the writ. I think there was merely a sort of modification of the authority, such as a man may, and very frequently does, give, that is to say, Outram may have said, "I will not charge you with the consequences, if you postpone the sale for me." But the sale was after all under the writ, and with the same powers which the sheriff's officer had before the interference of the debtor.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I agree that there is no evidence of a contract to discharge the sheriff. There may have been a modification of the officer's authority, which would relieve the sheriff as to acts or omissions under certain circumstances to which this modification clearly applied, but no further, and the sheriff is still liable for his negligence in conducting the sale.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Error from the Court of Exchequer.)

May 14; June 18, 1866.

REDPATH v. WIGG AND O'BEIRNE.

35 L. J. Ex. 211; 4 H. & C. 432; L. R. 1 Ex. 335; 14 L. T. 764; 14 W. R. 866;
12 Jur. N.S. 903.

Followed, Easterbrook v. Barker, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. C.P. 17; L. R. 6 C.P. 1; 23 L. T. 535; 19 W.R. 208 (C.P.).

Debtor and Creditor—Deed of Inspectorship—Liability of Inspectors—Bankruptcy Act, 1861 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 134.) s. 192.

BANKRUPTCY.—M, trading as C. J. M. & Co., ordered goods of the plaintiff, and before their delivery executed a deed of inspectorship. The inspectors under the deed afterwards requested the plaintiff by letter to send in the goods, signing their names "for C. J. M. & Co." Under the deed M. had power to carry on the business for six months, under the control of the defendants, who were to receive moneys, pay current expenses, including salaries, &c., but were not to share in the profits, and had no power to take the management of the business out of M's hands:—Held, that the deed did not make the inspectors M's principals in the business, or liable as such for the debts incurred by M. & Co., and that there was no evidence of their liability to go to the jury.

Error upon a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Martin, B.

The action was brought for goods sold and delivered, by the plaintiff (who carried on business as an iron-founder, under the firm of Redpath & Leigh) against the inspectors of the estate of Charles James Mare, who carried on the business of a ship-builder, under the firm of C. J. Mare & Co.

At the trial, in London, at the Sittings after Hilary Term, 1866, it appeared that Mare executed a deed of inspectorship dated the 3rd of January, 1865, which was intended to operate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

The goods in question were ordered on the 9th of December, 1864, by an order signed by a clerk "for C. J. Mare & Co.," which order was accepted by the plaintiff before the execution of the deed of inspectorship. The stoppage of payment took place before the goods were ready for delivery.

On the 1st of February, 1865, the plaintiff wrote to C. J. Mare & Co., stating that the goods were ready, and awaiting further instructions as to delivery. On the 3rd of February, 1865, an order for delivery, as follows, was sent to the plaintiff, signed by the defendants :

" Messrs. Redpath & Leigh,

" Please send three of Redpath's patent iron pumps, &c. (describing the goods previously ordered).

(Signed) " George Wigg,
" James L. O'Beirne.
" for C. J. Mare & Co."

Upon this order being given, the goods were on the 13th of February sent in to Mare's place of business, together with an invoice made out in the name of his inspectors. Whether this invoice came to their knowledge did not appear, but it was soon afterwards returned with a request, signed by a clerk "for C. J. Mare & Co.," that the firm should be made the debtors instead of the inspectors. The required alteration was accordingly made by one of the plaintiff's clerks, and the invoice returned,—but, as the plaintiff stated, without his knowledge.

The deed was made between Mare of the one part, Wigg and Green (for the latter of whom the defendant O'Beirne was afterwards substituted under a power), as inspectors, of the second part, and Mare's creditors of the third part. It provided for Mare being allowed to carry on his business under the inspection and subject to the direction and control of the inspectors for six months from the 1st of January, 1865, or for such longer period as they should think proper.

Mare covenanted to state an account for the assistance of the inspectors, to act under their direction, control and advice, not to dispose of the property without their consent, or to give any preference to any of his creditors; to keep proper books, and allow the inspectors to inspect them; not to enter into any new trade, or doubtful or uncertain contracts, or to become surety for any one, or do anything to obstruct the inspection or liquidation contemplated by the deed.

Then followed authority to the inspectors to sue for and get in any claims in Mare's name; and it was further provided that the inspectors might employ, or authorize him to employ, all necessary clerks, servants and workmen to assist in carrying on the business, and to pay to them, or to Mare himself, such reasonable salaries, wages or remuneration as they should think fit. Then followed a provision for the application of the moneys coming under the inspector's control: first, to the payment of the expenses of the inspection deed; secondly, to the expenses of carrying out the powers and provisions of the deed; and thirdly, and not until after those expenses (which would include such debts as the plaintiff's) were discharged, the payment rateably of all debts due from Mare to the creditors. Then followed an express provision that the expenses in respect of the business should, in the first instance, be paid out of moneys produced by carrying on the business, and subject thereto, out of any other moneys coming under the control of the inspectors from time to time; with a provision that, as often as they had in their hands money amounting to 50*l.* under the inspection, it should be paid into the bank to the credit of the inspectors, and should be distributed as they should direct; and that they should pay dividends whenever they possessed a competent sum, after allowing for current expenses. There was the usual power retained in respect of creditors who should not have signed, or the amounts of whose debts had not been previously ascertained, and a power to sue, and to litigate and arrange any claim by or against the inspectors. There was also a power to pay out of moneys in hand the expenses of carrying out any contract already entered into by the debtor in the way of his business, or which he might, with the sanction of the inspectors, enter into during the inspectorship, and to determine such contract if they should think it not for the benefit of the estate. In case of a violation of these terms by the debtor, the inspectors were to be at liberty to declare the deed to be void. If at the end of the six months the creditors were not paid there was a power to determine whether the debtor should be called on to submit to a winding-up, and to execute an assignment, or whether he should be allowed further time by letter of licence. The statutory majority were to be consulted in the case of any such extension of the time, and the statutory majority had also power to discharge him by agreeing to accept any composition which they might think proper to accept upon their debts. There was power to appoint a new inspector in case of inability or refusal to act (under which power O'Beirne was appointed inspector instead of Green). Then followed the usual provision with regard to the receipt of the inspectors being a discharge. They were not to be answerable for each other's default or for loss to the estate, and they were to be reimbursed all costs and expenses actually incurred in the course of the inspectorship; and there was a declaration that the deed was intended to operate as a deed of inspectorship under the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

It was contended for the defendants at the trial, that there was no evidence of their liability to go to the jury; but Martin, B. ruled that there was; and a verdict having been found for the plaintiff, a bill of exceptions was tendered.

J. C. Mathew, for the defendant O'Beirne, now argued that, if the defendants were liable, they could only be liable as the real principals in the transaction, Mare being their agent; and that the circumstances under which the order was given shewed no such state of things.

[WILLES, J. referred to Hart v. Alexander (2 Mee. & W. 484; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 129) and cases where a new partner has entered a firm after a contract has been made.]

The question in every such case is, for whom the business is carried on; and on the facts here, there can be no doubt that the liability is that of Mare & Co., and not of the defendants.—He cited Cox v. Hickman (8 H.L. Cas. 268; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 125) and Bullen v. Sharp (35 L. J. C.P. 105).

Garth, for the defendant Wigg, was not heard.

Joseph Brown (Barnard with him), for the plaintiff, contended that the letter of the 3rd of February was really a fresh order, in giving which the defendants acted as principals; they became responsible by signing it as they did. Why should they have so signed it, or have given a fresh order at all, except to quiet the plaintiff's apprehensions as to payment? They thus induced the plaintiff to supply the goods, for the invoice shews that he gave them credit. If there were any doubt arising from their using this form of order, it should operate against them in favour of the persons who were thereby induced to deal with them.

Mathew, in reply.—The only evidence against the defendants is the order, and in that they say clearly that they are not principals, but that they are acting for C. J. Mare & Co.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court¹ was delivered on the 18th of June by—

WILLES, J.—After stating the facts as given above, his Lordship said: The invoice, having been altered without the plaintiff's knowledge, may be considered out of the case, and the question for our decision is, whether the order of the 3rd of February, and the supply of the goods thereunder, furnish any evidence of liability on the part of the defendants.

Upon this it is first to be observed that there was no suggestion of fraud. The deed when put in appeared to be an ordinary transaction, the bona fides of which was not impeached; nor was the action founded upon any misrepresentation as to the authority from Mare to give the order in the name of "C. J. Mare & Co." The order upon the face of it purported to be given by the defendants for a named principal, on whose behalf (and not for themselves) they professed to act. Had the order been signed, like the original one, by a clerk of C. J. Mare & Co., no liability could have been imposed upon such clerk, except by shewing want of authority from the alleged principal. And the burthen of proving want of authority would have rested with the plaintiff. No such evidence was offered or suggested to exist in this case. The plaintiff therefore cannot rely upon any ostensible liability of the defendants, but must shew that the capacity which they actually filled was that of Mare's real principals, so as to be in substance themselves C. J. Mare & Co. for the time.

This question whether the inspectors are to be considered as principal traders, and the debtor as only a servant or agent of theirs, is one of great and general importance (and so far as we are aware quite novel), the decision of which in the affirmative would seriously interfere with arrangements under inspectorship, inasmuch as it must needs deter responsible persons from undertaking the office of inspector. It would of course be possible to suppose a case in which the debtor becomes by arrangement a mere servant, acting only for the benefit of others, or in which the business is intended to be carried on at the expense of new creditors, who might be deceived into giving credit to the debtor, but really for the advantage of the old ones. Such a case, should it arise, would admit of an easy solution as one of fraud.

On the other hand, there may be a good business, with a temporary embarrassment, where the intention is to keep together the debtor's business in his name (which may be an important element of its success), and for his permanent benefit as well as for the temporary benefit of his creditors; and where with that view a letter of licence is granted, enabling him to carry on the business, and to retain it for himself after he has paid his creditors, who stipulate however that, until the debts are discharged, the business shall be carried on under the inspection and control of persons appointed by them, who shall receive the proceeds, pay the current expenses of the business, and distribute the surplus. In such a case, the object seems to be to maintain the debtor in the position he previously occupied, as the person principally interested in the business; and it seems no more reasonable to hold the inspectors liable, as being his masters, than it would be to say that a confidential clerk, to whose opinion his employer absolutely defers, or to whom he intrusts the entire control of the business, is as to third persons the principal.

The difference between such a case and the present is, that there the principal might resume the control at any time, whereas in the case before us Mare could only do so upon payment of the debts, or a composition agreed to by the majority of creditors, or by breaking his contract to submit to inspection; which he might do if he thought proper, at the risk of damages and loss of the benefit of his deed. But the cases put by way of illustration clearly shew that the mere fact of inspecting and controlling another person's business does not involve responsibility for debts contracted therein by him or in his name; and as for the contract, it cannot, in favour of third parties, create such responsibility, unless it makes the inspectors the real principals.

(1) Willes, J., Byles, J., Blackburn, J., Keating, J., Montague Smith, J. and Lush, J.

In order to ascertain the precise position which the defendants occupied, it will be necessary to refer to the terms of the deed.—[His Lordship then stated the effect of the deed, as given above.]—This being the scope of the deed, it appears that the intention of the parties was, instead of pressing Mare for immediate payment or liquidation, to allow him to continue the business in such a manner if possible that, after paying his creditors, he should have the option of continuing the business for himself; that the business was to remain his, subject to his clearing off his debts; that the inspectors were to inspect, direct and control him, to receive the proceeds of the business, and, after paying current expenses (including such debts as the plaintiff's), and not before, to divide the surplus amongst his other creditors. They were not to have any share of the profits, and were only to receive their actual costs and expenses. The deed contains no power to the inspectors to take the management of the business to the exclusion of Mare, so that they could not dismiss him, as a master or principal might dismiss his servant or agent.

Under these circumstances, we think it cannot be maintained that the inspectors became Mare's masters or principals in the business, or liable as such for debts incurred by Mare & Co. Nor can the plaintiff justly complain of this result. The form of the order gave him notice that Mare & Co. were his customers, and to that firm and to the trust for payment of current expenses, he must be content to look.

The direction of the learned Judge that, under the above circumstances, there was evidence of liability on the part of the defendants was therefore erroneous, and a trial de novo must be awarded.

Venire de novo.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 5, 26, 1866.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR THE PRINCE OF WALES v.
CROSSMAN.

35 L. J. Ex. 215; L. R. 1 Ex. 381; 4 H. & C. 568; 14 L. T. 856; 14 W. R. 996;
12 Jur. N.S. 712.

Practice—Venue—Privilege of the Attorney General for the Duchy of Cornwall.

CROWN. PRACTICE.—An information being laid in Middlesex, by the Attorney General for the Duchy of Cornwall, for the recovery of dues claimed in respect of goods imported into a port alleged to be parcel of the Duchy, the defendant applied to the Court to change the venue to Devonshire, upon the ordinary affidavit that the cause of action arose and the witnesses resided there:—Held, first, that although the Attorney General for the Crown may not have a right in all cases to lay and retain the venue where he pleases, he has such right in the case of such an information, it being a suit in the nature of a transitory action; secondly, that in the case of such an information relating to matters affecting the Duchy of Cornwall, the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales would have the same right as the Attorney General for the Crown; but, thirdly, that as documents relating to the Duchy of Cornwall would have to be produced from their place of deposit in Middlesex, there was no such preponderance upon the balance of convenience in favour of a trial in Devonshire as to call on the Court to interfere, or to render it necessary to decide the question of prerogative.

Information, laid in Middlesex, by the Attorney General for H.R.H. Albert Edward, Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, against Thomas Crossman, for certain customs and dues in respect of goods imported into the port of Torquay, within the water of Dartmouth, parcel of the ancient possessions of the Duchy of Cornwall, in the county of Devon, and for breaking bulk from ships coming from foreign parts at Torquay.

Application was made to Channell, B., at chambers, for an order to change the venue to Devonshire, upon the ordinary affidavit that the cause of action arose in Devon, and that the defendant and all the witnesses as to facts resided at Torquay. The question to be tried was, whether or not the Prince of Wales was entitled to recover these dues in respect of Torquay being within the charter by which the Duchy of Cornwall was granted. The matter having been referred to the Court,

F. M. White obtained a rule nisi, against which Karslake and Garth shewed cause in the first instance.—This is not an action; and it is a question whether the practice for the Court respecting a change of venue in ordinary actions applies to the case of an information filed by the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales. The Attorney General for the Prince of Wales stands for some purposes in the same position as the Attorney General for the Crown—The Attorney General for the Prince of Wales v. St. Aubyn (Wightwick, 167). The Attorney General for the Crown may lay and retain the venue anywhere—The Attorney General v. Smith (2 Price, 113).

[BRAMWELL, B.—But is there any authority for saying that the Court will not change the venue if they think it convenient?]

Inquiries have been made at the Crown Office, and no precedent has been found of the venue being changed.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Does the Duchy of Cornwall go to the Prince's eldest son?]

No.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Then the Crown is interested as immediate successor.]

That is so. If there is no Prince of Wales a suit may be revived by the Crown—The Attorney General v. the Mayor and Corporation of Plymouth (Wightwick, 134). As a mere matter of convenience the venue should remain unchanged. The Crown might claim a trial at bar in this Court. It would be most inconvenient if the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales had to consult the Attorney General for the Crown before proceeding with the suit, or before opposing an application to change the venue. The practice of changing the venue is based upon the equity of the statute of 6 Rich. 2. c. 2.—The Attorney General v. Churchill (8 Mee. & W. 171, 193; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 314), 1 Tidd's Practice, 9th edit. 601; but the Crown is not named in it, and is not bound by that statute which moreover applies to actions only, and not to informations. Besides, as documents must be produced from the Duchy Office in London, there is good reason why the venue should be retained in Middlesex.—They also referred to Rowe v. Brenton (Concanen; s. c. 3 Man. & Ry. 133), and The Crown Suits Act, 1865, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104.

F. M. White, in support of the rule, commented on the authorities cited, and referred in addition to Bisse v. Harcourt (Carth. 126), Pye v. Leigh (2 W. Black. 1065), The Earl of Shaftesbury v. Craddock (Ventr. 363), and Count de Standford v. Nedham (1 Lev. 56).

BRAMWELL, B.—I wish to say one word as to my own opinion. It seems to me that the counsel for the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales have made out that his rights are to be treated on the same footing as those of the Attorney General for the Crown; but I doubt very much, when we come to see what the nature of the application is and the answer to it, whether any question of prerogative arises. The application seems to be made and resisted on the ground of convenience. The defendant says that it would be more convenient to try at Exeter; and the Crown, although they assert their right irrespective of convenience, also say that it would be more convenient to try in London. As far as I can judge, the balance of convenience is not such as that, if this were a case between subject and subject, we should interfere with the right of the plaintiff to lay his venue where he likes; and I do not think we ought to do so here. But, for my own part, I should be very sorry to lay down, without much consideration, that in any case, at the pleasure of those who advise the Crown, they may lay and retain the venue in an inconvenient county. I am not at all prepared to assent to any such proposition. I do not at all dissent from anything that may be said by my Brother Channell.

CHANNELL, B.—The Court is very anxious to deliver judgment in this case at these Sittings, in order that the party who wishes to go to trial may have an opportunity of doing so either in Devonshire or in Middlesex; and a judgment has been prepared, which I am to read as the judgment of my Lord Chief Baron, my Brother Martin and myself. There has not been time to submit it to my Brother Bramwell to enable him to give all the considerations and reasons he would wish to give; but he has stated that he does not differ from us in the result; and from what he has said to-day it would seem that there is not any difference between the reasons on which he relies and those which will be found in our judgment.

This was an information, filed by the Attorney General for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, to recover certain port-dues, alleged to be due from the defendant to the Duchy, claimed by the Duchy in respect of goods brought into and loaded at Torquay, which is alleged by the Attorney General for the Prince to a member of the port of Dartmouth, referred to in Hale's De Portibus Maris, p. 48. The venue in this information is laid in Middlesex. Application was made by the defendant to a Judge at chambers to change the venue to the county of Devon. This application was supported by an affidavit, which, if made in an ordinary action between subject and subject, and not answered, would have been sufficient to entitle the defendant to have the venue changed, on the ground that the cause of action arose within the county of Devon. It would still, however, have been open to the Judge in such an action to have retained the venue in or restored it to Middlesex, notwithstanding the cause of action arose in the county of Devon, upon being satisfied upon affidavit that, on the score of saving expenses, or some manifest convenience, it was proper that the trial should take place in Middlesex.

In the present case, the Judge at chambers, on certain objections being made on behalf of the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales, referred the application to the Court. Accordingly, in last term, Mr. Meadows White, on the part of the defendant, obtained a rule to change the venue to Devon, against which cause was shewn, in the first instance, by Mr. Karslake and Mr. Garth, on behalf of the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales. It was contended, on the part of the Attorney General, that the Court had no power to change the venue in this case; that the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, is, in cases affecting the rights of the Duchy, in the same position as the Attorney General for the Crown, and that they both have the right, not only to lay the venue where they please, but to keep it there. It was further contended, that the application of a defendant by motion to change the venue arose upon the equity of the statutes of Richard the Second and Henry the Fifth, and that these statutes did not bind the Crown, the Crown not being named therein—see the judgment of the Court delivered by Mr. Baron Parke in the case of The Attorney General v. Lord Churchill (Concanen; s. c. 3 Man. & Ry. 133), where the origin of changing the venue in actions is explained; see also Tidd's Practice, 9th edit. vol. 1, p. 601 and following pages. It was further contended that the statutes applied to actions only, and not to informations.

We are agreed that it is for the officers of the Crown to make out clearly the prerogative in any case where they claim to be on a different footing from the subject as regards procedure in any litigation. This was in effect laid down in the case before referred to, namely, The Attorney General v. Lord Churchill (Concanen; s. c. 3 Man. & Ry. 133).

We think, although the Attorney General for the Crown may not have a right in all cases not only to lay, but also to retain the venue where he pleases, that in an information such as the present, which is a suit in the nature of a transitory action, he would have the right. It would not necessarily follow that the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales would have the same right. The authorities cited to us to shew that he would were The Attorney General v. the Mayor and Corporation of Plymouth (Wightwick, 134), The Attorney General for the Prince of Wales v. St. Aubyn (Wightwick, 167), Rules on the Revenue Side of the Exchequer, June, 1860, Rule 190, November, 1861, and November, 1863, The Crown Suits Act, 1865, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104; and Roure v. Brenton (8 Concanen; 3 Man. & Ry. 133) was also referred to. We think, in this case, that the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales must be taken to be in the same situation as the Attorney General for the Crown. But it does not appear to us absolutely necessary to decide whether in the case of an information such as the present, if filed by the Crown, the Crown would have a right to lay and keep the venue where it pleased; nor whether, if as against the Crown, the venue could not be changed on motion, the Crown not being bound by the statutes and practice referred to, the same rule would apply to the Attorney General for the Prince. For the case was argued before us on the ground of convenience as well as on the points we have noticed. The facts on which the argument as to convenience or inconvenience proceeded were not stated on affidavit; at least no affidavit has been filed, but were referred to by counsel on each side with the sanction of the other. For the defendant were urged upon us the inconvenience and expense of bringing up witnesses from Torquay to London to attend the trial. On the other hand, it is clear, from the facts stated to us by the counsel for the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales, and not disputed by the defendant's counsel, that the question to be tried must depend to a considerable degree upon the documents and records which would be produced by the officers of the Duchy, no doubt more conveniently in Middlesex; nor was it disputed by the defendant's counsel that the Attorney General for the Prince of Wales might allege such an interest in the Crown as to entitle him to appear and claim a trial at bar. The inconvenience of bringing a Devonshire jury to Middlesex for a trial at bar at Westminster would be great, and would go a long way to counterbalance the inconvenience of many of the witnesses residing at Torquay. We think, then, that the Court ought not to interfere to change the venue, and that the rule should be discharged, and discharged without costs.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Appeal from the Court of Exchequer.)

June 19, 1866.

REUSS AND ANOTHER v. PICKSLEY AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. Ex. 218; L. R. 1 Ex. 342; 4 H. & C. 588; 15 L. T. 25; 14 W. R. 924;
12 Jur. N.S. 628.

See, Buxton v. Rust, [1872] E. R. A.; 41 L. J. Ex. 173; L. R. 7 Ex. 279; 27 L. T. 210; 20 W. R. 1014 (Ex. Ch.). Applied, Dartford Guardians v. Trickett, 1889, 59 L. T. 754 (Q.B. D.). Not applied, New Eberhardt Co., [1890] E. R. A.; 59 L. J. Ch. 73; 62 L. T. 301; 38 W. R. 97 (C. A.). Referred to, Filby v. Hounsell, [1896] E. R. A.; 65 L. J. Ch. 852; [1896] 2 Ch. 737; 75 L. T. 270; 45 W. R. 232 (Ch. D.).

Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2. c. 3), s. 4.—Agreement not to be performed within a Year—Written Proposal signed by Party to be charged, and Parol Assent by the other Party.

CONTRACT.—The 4th section of the Statute of Frauds,—which enacts that no action shall be brought upon any agreement which is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some note or memorandum thereof, shall be in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith or his agent,—is satisfied by a written proposal containing the terms of the agreement, signed by the party to be charged, proof being given of a subsequent assent to these terms by the other party without writing.

[Smith v. Neale (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 67; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 143) and Warner v. Willington (3 Drew. 523; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) (Chanc. 662) affirmed.)]

This was an appeal, by the defendants, against a judgment of the Court of Exchequer discharging a rule obtained by the defendants to set aside the verdict entered for the plaintiffs at the trial and enter a nonsuit, or for a new trial.

The first count of the declaration stated that, on the 8th of September, 1864, it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants, that the defendants should retain and employ the plaintiffs as the agents of the defendants, in Russia, for ten years from that date, in and about the sale for the defendants, in Russia, of machinery manufactured by the defendants in their trade or business of engineers and machine dealers at Leigh, near Manchester; that the defendants should allow to the plaintiffs full discounts for cash on all orders received by the plaintiffs direct, and should hand over to the plaintiffs, to be dealt with in the same way, all orders the defendants should receive from Russia, except those from Odessa; and that on all orders executed by the defendants from Russia, except Odessa, that might come through any other agents in Great Britain, the defendants should allow the plaintiffs a commission of 5l. per cent; and that the plaintiffs should confine themselves to the defendants for the sale of every description of machinery which the defendants manufactured, and the plaintiffs should sell in Russia; and further that the plaintiffs should take charge of certain machines of the defendants in Hull, intended for the Moscow Exhibition, and to be exhibited there by the defendants, and that the plaintiffs should pay for their account all freight, charges and assurance, in respect of the same, until as many of such machines as possible were delivered in Moscow, and that after the close of the exhibition in Moscow, the unsold remainder should be at the risk and expense of the defendants, either to keep in Moscow, or return home, as the defendants might think fit, at the defendants' expense; and that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants in Manchester cash for all machines sold during the exhibition; the price to be calculated at &c. And all conditions were performed &c. Yet the defendants did not nor would allow to the plaintiffs full discounts for cash on the several orders received by the plaintiffs direct, nor hand over to the plaintiffs, to be dealt with in the same way, the several orders which the defendants received from Russia, except those from Odessa, nor on the several orders executed by the defendants from Russia, except Odessa, and which came through other agents in Great Britain allow the plaintiffs the commission of 5*l.* per cent. as agreed; and although the plaintiffs were ready and willing to continue such agency as aforesaid, upon the terms aforesaid, yet the defendants, during the continuance of the said agency, and whilst the said agency was still subsisting and undetermined, and before the expiration of the said term of ten years, contrary to the said agreement, wrongfully discharged and dismissed the plaintiffs from the said agency and employment, whereby the plaintiffs were deprived of gains and profits which they would have acquired by reason of the said agency, and lost the benefit of the outlay and expense which they were necessarily put to and incurred upon the faith of the continuance of the said agency, and were otherwise damnified.

The second count stated that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants, as in the first count mentioned, and the plaintiffs thereupon became the agents of the defendants, and served them in that capacity until the 9th of March, A.D. 1865; and although all things were done to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain the action, and although the plaintiffs were, and always had been ready and willing to continue the agency, yet the defendants, by their own voluntary act, on the said day, put an end to their business, by transferring it to a joint-stock company, and precluded themselves from carrying on the said business, and thereby put an end to the said agency, whereby, &c.

The defendants, by their pleas, denied the alleged agreement, and traversed the material allegations in the declaration.

Issue was joined on all the pleas.

At the trial, before Pigott, B., at Manchester, it was proved that, in the year 1864, the plaintiff Ernst Gustavus Reuss carried on business in Manchester in partnership with his father, who was the other plaintiff on the record, and who had died since the commencement of the action.

The defendants carried on business at Leigh, near Manchester, as agricultural instrument makers. In 1864 the defendants were desirous of sending some machines to the Industrial Exhibition at Moscow, and wished the plaintiffs to take charge of them. After some negotiation it was verbally agreed that the plaintiffs should have an agency for ten years for the sale of the defendants' machines in Russia, and a commission on all sales, and that the plaintiffs should bear part of the expenses of the exhibition. The plaintiff E. G. Reuss went to Moscow in July for the purpose, amongst other things, of making arrangements for the reception of the defendants' goods; and during the month that he remained there a quantity of goods were sent by the defendants to the plaintiffs for transmission to the exhibition. On his return he had an interview with Mr. Sims, one of the defendants, and afterwards wrote him the following letter:

“ Manchester, 8th September, 1864.

“ Messrs. Picksley, Sims & Co., Leigh.

“ Referring to our conversation with Mr. Sims respecting the machinery for the Moscow Exhibition, it was arranged that we take charge of all the machines, &c., in Hull, and pay for our account all freight, charges, insurances, &c., till delivered in Moscow. That we sell in Moscow as many of the machines as possible, and that after the close of the exhibition the unsold remainder be at your risk and expense, either to keep in Moscow or to return home, as you think fit, at your expense; that we pay you here cash for all machines sold during the exhibition, the price to be calculated at list price, less the full trade discounts for cash; that you pay the travelling expenses there and back of Mr. Smith, but that we pay his additional salary whilst in Moscow of 10s. per day, and his hotel bill. That the agency for Russia be for ten years from date, on following conditions: You to allow us full discounts for cash on all orders received by us direct, and that you hand over to us, to be dealt with in the same way, all orders you receive from Russia (excepting those from Odessa). On all orders executed by you from Russia (excepting Odessa) that may come through any other agent in Great Britain, you allow us a commission of 5l. per cent.; that we act as and are hereby appointed your sole agents for the kingdom of Italy on the same conditions as for Russia. Awaiting your reply, we are, &c.,

“ Ernst Reuss & Co.”

This was replied to as follows:

“ Bedford Foundry, Leigh, Lancashire.

“ September 9, 1864.

“ Gentlemen,—Our Mr. Sims desires me to acknowledge the receipt of your favour, dated the 8th inst., and to say, as far as the agency for Russia goes, he considers it satisfactory, except that you must confine yourselves to us for every description of machinery we manufacture and which you sell in Russia. With respect to Italy Mr. Sims cannot at present say anything about it, in consequence of the change which is likely to take place in our firm shortly. I am, &c., “ p. p. Picksley, Sims & Co.

“ Josh. Smith.

“ Messrs. Ernst Reuss & Co.”

No reply was sent to this by the plaintiffs; but goods were afterwards sent by the defendants to the plaintiffs, and forwarded by them to Moscow, and exhibited there in September, 1864, and some were sold. Considerable expenses were incurred by the plaintiffs, exceeding the amount of their commission on the sales.

After the close of the exhibition the plaintiffs received from the defendants a printed circular, dated the 8th of December, 1864, stating that their works and warehouses would, on the 2nd of January, 1865, be transferred to a joint-stock company, which would carry on the business under the style of Picksley, Sims & Co. (Limited), and that the accounts of the late firm would be made up. The plaintiffs' agent at Moscow died at the commencement of the year 1865. An attempt was made by the plaintiffs and the defendants to come to a settlement, but without success, the defendants wishing the plaintiffs to buy the machines at Moscow—the plaintiffs demanding to be refunded the amount of their outlay, and making a claim for damages for breach of contract. No orders for machinery were received by either the plaintiffs or the defendants for Russia (except Odessa) up to the time of the alleged breach.

At the trial, Pigott, B., directed the jury that the letters of the 8th and 9th of September contained one entire contract as to the Moscow and Russia agencies, and not two separate contracts relating the one to the Moscow the other to the Russia agency. The jury found that the plaintiffs assented to the terms of the agreement contained in the letters, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 850l.; the defendants having leave to move to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no sufficient memorandum in writing signed by the defendants to satisfy the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, the agreement being one which was not to be performed within one year from the time when it was made.

The defendants moved accordingly, and obtained a rule nisi, to enter a nonsuit or for a new trial on the ground that the learned Judge misdirected the jury in ruling that the Moscow and Russia stipulations were one contract, and also on the ground that the damages were excessive. The Court of Exchequer, after argument, discharged the rule, the plaintiffs consenting to reduce the damages to 650*l.*, and the defendants having leave to appeal.

Brett (Hayman with him), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—There were here, in fact, two contracts. As to the contract for the Russian agency, there was no assent by word or deed. There was a proposal and a counter-proposal in writing, but nothing more. Even if there was a parol assent, that is insufficient to satisfy section 4. of the Statute of Frauds.

[WILLES, J., referred to Smith v. Neale (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 67; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 143).]

As to the Moscow contract, the only assent shewn was by the defendants acting on it and sending goods to Hull for shipment to Moscow. This is insufficient to satisfy the statute, for an acceptance must be unambiguous—Warner v. Willington (3 Drew. 523; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 662). The statute requires that there should be an agreement, or memorandum of agreement, in writing, signed by the party to be charged. A signed proposal is neither one nor the other.

[BYLES, J.—It could not be stamped as an agreement.]

There is no express decision in point, but the principles to be applied are to be obtained from the cases cited, and Laythorpe v. Bryant (2 Bing. N.C. 735; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 217), Coleman v. Upcot (5 Vin. Abr. 527), The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Eccles (4 Hurl. & N. 139; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 122), Mozley v. Tinkler (1 Cr. M. & R. 692; s. c. nom. Morley v. Tinkler, 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 84), Martin v. Mitchell (2 Jac. & W. 426) and Williams v. Lake (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 1).

Manisty (Holker and Baylis with him), for the plaintiffs, supported the judgment of the Court below.—The letters constitute one contract only. The authorities are uniform that a written proposal may be assented to by parol, so as to render the proposal a memorandum in writing sufficient to satisfy the statute.

Brett replied.

WILLES, J. delivered the judgment of the Court.¹—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer ought to be affirmed. The action is brought upon a contract, and it is alleged that the defendants employed the plaintiffs as agents in Russia for the sale of their agricultural machinery, the services to be rendered by the plaintiffs as the defendants' agents to be paid for by a commission, orders from Odessa alone being excepted from the agency. The first count, upon which the judgment, no doubt, proceeded, further states that the plaintiffs, as incidental to the agency in Russia, had agreed to render certain services to the defendants in the exhibition of their machines at a show to be held at Moscow. It appears that the plaintiffs, through one of their firm, had negotiations with the defendants, through one of their firm, with reference to so much of the agency in Russia as related to the show at Moscow and to the exhibition of the defendants' machines there; and in the course of those negotiations the plaintiffs refused to undergo the expense which they would have to incur with reference to the show at Moscow unless they were repaid in some manner. There was a communication between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to the manner in which that remuneration should take place, and it was suggested that it should be by the plaintiffs being employed not only as the defendants' agents with reference to the show at Moscow, but also for ten years as agents for the sale of their machines in Russia. That negotiation when first entered into did not come to a head. One of the plaintiffs, Ernst Reuss, through whom the business was transacted, appears to have gone abroad for some time, and upon his return to this country he sent word that he desired to see one of the defendants, Mr. Sims, on business of importance, being that respecting which the negotiation had previously taken place. Accordingly an interview was had between them, at which the terms of the agency were discussed, and the letters which afterwards passed between the parties leave no doubt that the discussion related to the show at Moscow, to an agency for the sale of the defendants' machines in Russia, except Odessa, and to an agency which the plaintiffs desired to have for the defendants in Italy. Immediately after that discussion the letter of the 8th of September was written by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and on the following day an answer was sent by the defendants to the plaintiffs. Now, the letter of the plaintiffs was to this effect: "We propose to state what passed between our Mr. Reuss and your Mr. Sims respecting the agency. As to the Moscow Exhibition, it was arranged so and so,"—and then were stated the terms upon which the goods were to be sent to the Moscow Exhibition, and at whose expense they were to be, and what was to be done with them, and with reference to the expenses of Mr. Smith, who was to accompany or look after them. The letter then proceeds to speak of the agency for Russia, in terms which do not appear to be applicable to the subject of a distinct and separate contract. Having dealt with the show which was to be at Moscow, and the exhibition there of articles of the sort to which the subsequent agency was to refer, (which exhibition would operate as an accessory to that agency, by way of advertisement,) it goes on in terms which seem to shew that the writer was speaking of a matter cognate to, and not at all distinct from, that which had been discussed, to say "that the agency for Russia be for ten years from date, on following conditions." Then it states that commission is to be paid upon transactions which come direct through the plaintiffs, and also upon transactions which come through other agents, upon which the plaintiffs, having the exclusive contract of agency, were still to have an allowance by way of commission. With respect to this part of the dealings, the plaintiffs do not state that they were to abstain during the period of the agency from taking orders from other manufacturers, and that appears to be the only part of their proposal with respect to Russia to which the defendants objected in the letter of the 9th. The plaintiffs' letter then goes on to state that the plaintiffs, being agents for Russia, were to be sole agents for Italy. That is the scope of the letter of the 8th. The answer comes upon the 9th: "Our Mr. Sims desires me to acknowledge the receipt of your favour, dated the 8th inst., and to say, as far as the agency for Russia goes, he considers it satisfactory." The letter of the 8th had dealt with the exhibition at Moscow, and also with the valuable agency in respect of the loss of which damages were given, namely, the agency for Russia, except Odessa, during a period of ten years. No reference is made to the exhibition at Moscow, as distinct from the agency for Russia. The proper conclusion is, that as to what was said about Moscow, the writer of the letter of the 9th of September considered it to require no observation; and as to the rest of the agency for Russia, that it was satisfactory, except that the plaintiffs must confine themselves to the defendants for every description of machinery made by them. This was the only objection made as to the agency for Russia.

(1) Willes, J., Byles, J., Blackburn, J., Mellor, J., Shee, J. and Montague Smith, J.

With respect to Italy, the defendants say that arrangements have been made which put it out of the question. Therefore, the meaning of the letter of the 9th of September is this: "It is true that we came to an arrangement yesterday; but that arrangement with respect to Russia, excluding Odessa and including Moscow, is subject to a limitation which you have forgotten to express, namely, that you are not to trade with others for any description of machinery which we make; and as to Italy, other arrangements have been made."

Now, either that is a memorandum, signed by the defendants, of the arrangement that had taken place, or at the least it is a proposal that, to the extent mentioned in the letter of the 9th, the terms stated in the letter of the 8th should be the basis of subsequent dealings between the parties, that is, a proposal that the plaintiffs should, as alleged in their declaration, act as agents at the show at Moscow and for Russia for ten years, upon the terms agreed to, with the addition that during that time they should take no agency for any other firm than the defendants', an exception being made as to Odessa. These letters being, therefore, either an agreement in writing, or at least a proposal—assume them, in favour of the appellants, to be the latter—what followed was this. The show at Moscow took place; the goods intended to be exhibited there were forwarded to the plaintiffs, and dealt with by them as they had undertaken to deal with them. Large expenses were incurred by them in respect of those goods, as to which they had given the defendants previous notice that they would not incur them unless they were reimbursed by some means; the means suggested being their employment as agents for Russia for ten years. These expenses were incurred by them as the defendants' agents for the exhibition at Moscow. Was this evidence upon which the jury could properly find an assent by the plaintiffs to the terms of the letter of the 9th? The defendants insist that it was not; but their argument consists of a dissection of the terms of the letter of the 8th of September. We see no reason to dis sever those terms. On the contrary, taking the two letters together, and finding that the letter of the 9th, which professes to deal with the entire letter of the 8th, leaves out altogether any mention of Moscow, there is reason for supposing that the agency for Russia was considered by the defendants, who wrote the letter, to dispose of the whole matter, so far as Russia was concerned, and therefore to include all that was to be done at Moscow. Looking, moreover, at the nature of the transaction, and seeing that the exhibition of the goods at Moscow was connected by way of advertisement with what was to be done afterwards by the plaintiffs as agents in Russia, there appear to be, both by the correspondence and the nature of the transaction, sufficient reasons for treating the whole as one transaction. Therefore, what was done by the plaintiffs was a performance of their part, made known to the defendants, which was evidence of an assent by the plaintiffs to the terms contained in the letter of the 9th of September, considered with reference to the terms of the letter of the 8th. Treating the letter of the 9th as a proposal by the defendants, there was evidence of an assent to it by the plaintiffs, and the jury have found that they did assent.

That being so in point of fact, how ought it to be dealt with in point of law? In point of law, if the Statute of Frauds were out of the question, no inquiry would be made as to the precise time at which the different parts of the transaction arose. The question would be whether it was one transaction, and whether it contained an assent expressed so as to be understood by the parties to be bound. I have said already that it is sufficiently shewn that there was such an assent, and that the terms of the agreement were those insisted upon by the plaintiffs in the declaration. But the Statute of Frauds introduces a new element into this discussion, because it makes it necessary, by the 4th section, that an agreement like this, which is not to be performed by either party within a year, should be in writing and signed by the party to be charged, and what was signed here was not a formal agreement between the parties, such as a conveyancer or an attorney would draw, but simply a proposal on the one side assented to on the other side. All difficulty with respect to the terms of the proposal is out of the case. It was contained in a letter directed to the plaintiffs and signed by the defendants, so as to give therefore the names of the contracting parties, and contained the terms of the contract with respect to business, locality and time by reference to the letter of the 8th, which reference, it is unnecessary to say, was equivalent to a recital of the letter of the 8th in the letter of the 9th.

The only question therefore is, whether it is sufficient to satisfy the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, that the party charged should sign that which he proposes as an agreement, and that the other party should afterwards assent without writing to the proposal. I apprehend that, both upon reasoning and authority, a proposal so signed and assented to does become a memorandum or note of an agreement within the 4th section of the statute.

A variety of cases may be put, not depending upon the Statute of Frauds, for the purpose of illustration. Two will be sufficient. One of them was a case which arose under the Joint-Stock Companies' Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, which provided that no person should be deemed to have accepted any share in a company unless he had testified his acceptance by writing under his hand—(Schedule, Table B). It was thought, at first, necessary that there should be something done in writing by a member after the allotment of shares to him by the company, and that it was not sufficient that the shares were allotted to him in consequence of his proposal to take them, although that proposal was in writing and signed by him. But when the matter came to be considered in the Court of Common Pleas, that Court said that it was a mistake to suppose that there was no acceptance in writing; and that the true mode of regarding transactions of that description was to consider whether, no matter how many distinct moments of time there might be in each transaction, all did not go to make one complete transaction; and they decided that the acceptance was complete, and the statute satisfied by the proposal in writing, followed by an allotment assented to by the allottee. Probably that will be a sufficient illustration. The Court considered and acted upon, with entire consent, a judgment delivered by my Brother Blackburn, in the Court of Queen's Bench, in a case in which it was held that an acceptance of goods to satisfy the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds might be prior to the delivery of them.² It is quite a fallacy to suppose that because acts that happened at various periods of time, whether at intervals of days, or weeks, or months, they cannot be collected in law so as to constitute as much one transaction as if the parties had been in a room together, and the whole transaction had passed between them face to face at the time. That was the ground upon which the Lord Keeper, in the case of Coleman v. Upcott (5 Vin. Abr. 527), founded his decision that an offer in writing to sell an interest in land, accepted by parol, became binding as a contract upon the person who made the offer. I cannot say that that case was followed by Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in the case of Warner v. Willington (3 Drew. 523; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 662), but the principle of it was assented to. The Vice Chancellor, observing, I suppose, the note in Viner, from which it appeared that Coleman had signed the offer some two or three days after he had accepted it by parol, treated the case as not precisely shewing that a parol acceptance would have been sufficient, although the Lord Keeper's judgment was certainly based upon that foundation, and although in Lord St. Leonards' book³ the case is treated as an authority to that effect. The case of Warner v. Willington (3 Drew. 523; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 662) was followed by the case which has been cited from the Court of Common Pleas, of Smith v. Neale (2 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 67; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 143), and it was also cited and acted upon by the Court of Exchequer in the case of The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Eccles (4 Hurl. & N. 139; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 122).

So far with reference to agreements which must be mutual, but in which the statute requires only the hand of the party to be charged. But there are two classes of agreements to which reference may be made, and the law relating to which may be usefully considered in determining the present case. One is the class of cases in which a proposal is made, which may or may not be acted upon, the stipulating party having a choice whether he will or not act upon the contract of the person to be charged. Such is the ordinary case of a guarantee, which is a case all the more notable because it is within the very terms of the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. The creditor may supply the goods or not, as he thinks proper; but if he does supply them the surety is unquestionably bound, except in such cases as that of Mozley v. Tinkler (1 Cr. M. & R. 692; s. c. nom. Morley v. Tinkler, 4 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 84), where, upon the true construction of the guarantie, it required an answer from the creditor by way of assent before he was warranted in acting upon it. But in that case it was never doubted that if the creditor's assent had been made known to the surety, and the goods supplied, the guarantie would have been binding. And it does not appear to have occurred to any of the Court that the creditor must assent in writing.

(2) The cases referred to are respectively The Bog Lead Mining Company v. Montague, 10 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 481; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 380: and Cusack v. Robinson, 1 Best & S. 299; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 261.

(3) 1 Vendor and Purchaser, 164, 10th edit.; 106, 13th edit.

Lord Wensleydale expressly said that it was a case in which it was only necessary to have the signature of the person to be charged. It never was suggested, throughout the judgment, that the creditor must assent in writing. Here, therefore, there is a singular confirmation, as it appears to me, that the whole of the contract, in the sense of the whole of that which shews that both parties are bound, need not be in writing. If you have all the terms of the contract in writing, and the signature of the party to be charged, you have enough.

It may be said that this will lead to a prodigious deal of fraud and perjury, which the statute intended to obviate. In the first place, I cannot agree to that, because a person, in order to enforce an agreement, must not only produce evidence that the agreement was entered into, but also that he did, or was ready to do his part, to entitle him to performance by the other contracting party. But if that argument were good for anything, it would be good to shew that a regular agreement, signed by one party only, ought not to bind him. That was considered in the case of Laythorpe v. Bryant (2 Bing. N.C. 735; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 217), where, notwithstanding the doubt which had been expressed by Sir William Grant in the case of Martin v. Mitchell (2 Jac. & W. 426), the Court of Common Pleas decided that it was sufficient that the party to be charged under the agreement should have signed; and it was pointed out in the course of the argument, that the person who seeks to enforce the agreement has not the other altogether at his mercy, but must fulfil his own part of the agreement before he can seek performance on the part of the person who has signed.

The only other case to which I shall refer, is that of a contract where both parties must sign, otherwise the contract is ineffectual; that is the case of an ordinary lease for years, not under seal, which, by the conjoint operation of sections 1. and 4. of the statute must be in writing, signed by the parties making the same. I am speaking of leases within the Statute of Frauds, and before the modern act of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76, and the repealing act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, from which it appears that the legislature thought that it would be beneficial and useful to mankind that certain leases should be under seal if they were to operate as leases at all. I speak of a lease of a chattel interest, as affected by the Statute of Frauds only. Where it was signed by the lessee, and not signed by the lessor, the lessee took no interest, and was not bound, according to the principles laid down in Soprani v. Skarro (Yelverton, 18). Now, suppose that the lessee in such a case had signed before the lessor, every argument that could be advanced for the purpose of shewing that no agreement was signed, and that a subsequent act cannot turn what is not an agreement into an agreement, would apply to that case. But could any person suggest that it made any difference with reference to the validity of the lease as to the Statute of Frauds, whether the lessee or the lessor signed his name first?

Many more cases might be put, but these are enough to shew that the law is clear. You must look not to the precise moments at which the assent of the one party and the assent of the other were given, but you must look at the entire transaction, and if the assent was given so as to constitute a contract between the parties, the proposal, though prior in time, is, in fact, a memorandum or note of the terms of that contract, signed by the party to be charged.

We are all of opinion that the doctrine laid down by Vice Chancellor Kindersley, which was in reality only a re-discovery of that which appears to have been the contemporaneous exposition of the Statute of Frauds, is the true interpretation of that statute. We think that the judgment of the Court below ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

July 4, 5, 6, 1864; June 29, 30, 1865; Feb. 22, June 5, 1866.

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD, appellants, v. GIBBS
AND OTHERS, respondents.

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD, appellants, v.
PENHALLOW AND OTHERS, respondents.

35 L. J. Ex. 225; 11 H.L. Cas. 686; L. R. 1 H.L. 93; 14 L. T. 677;
14 W. R. 872; 12 Jur. N.S. 571.

Followed, Worrall v. Lloyd, 1866, L. R. 1 C.P. 719 (C.P.). See Coe v. Wise, 1866, L. R. 1 Q.B. 711; 14 L. T. 891; 14 W. R. 865 (Ex. Ch.). Applied, Att.-Gen. v. Colney Hatch, [1868] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. Ch. 265; L. R. 4 Ch. 146; 19 L. T. 708; 17 W. R. 240 (L.C. & L. J.). Referred to, Foreman v. Mayor of Canterbury, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. Q.B. 188; L. R. 6 Q.B. 214; 24 L. T. 385; 19 W. R. 719 (Q.B.). Principle applied, Campbell v. Hornsby, 1873, Ir. R. 7 C. L. 540 (Ex. Ch.). See Clowes v. Staffs Potteries, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. Ch. 107; L. R. 8 Ch. 125 n; 27 L. T. 521; 21 W. R. 82 (L. JJ.). Applied, Winch v. Thames Commissioners, [1874] E. R. A.; 43 L. J. C.P. 167; L. R. 9 C.P. 378; 31 L. T. 128; 22 W. R. 879 (Ex. Ch.). Principle applied, Goslin v. Agricultural Hall, [1876] E. R. A.; 45 L. J. C.P. 348; L. R. 1 C.P. D. 482; 35 L. T. 92 (C. A.). Referred to, Harris v. Great Western Railway, [1876] E. R. A.; 45 L. J. Q.B. 729; L. R. 1 Q.B. D. 515; 34 L. T. 647 (Q.B. D.); Weir v. Barnett, 1878, L. R. 3 Ex. D. 32; 38 L. T. 929; 26 W. R. 147 (Ex. D.): affirmed sub nom. Weir v. Bell, 1878, L. R. 3 Ex. D. 238; 38 L. T. 935; 26 W. R. 746 (C. A.). Explained, Forbes v. Lee Conservancy, [1879] E. R. A.; 48 L. J. Ex. 402; L. R. 4 Ex. D. 116 (Ex.). See, Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, [1879] E. R. A.; 48 L. J. Q.B. 562; L. R. 4 Q.B. D. 433; 40 L. T. 491 (Q.B.): affirmed, [1880] E. R. A.; 49 L. J. Q.B. 228; 42 L. T. 212 (C. A.): latter decision affirmed, [1881] 50 L. J. Q.B. 353; L. R. 6 App. Cas. 193; 44 L. T. 653; 29 W. R. 617 (H.L.). Discussed, Fleming v. Manchester Corporation, 1881, 44 L. T. 517 (Q.B. D.). Followed, Dormont v. Furness Railway, [1883] E. R. A.; 52 L. J. Q.B. 331; L. R. 11 Q.B. D. 496; 49 L. T. 184 (Q.B. D.). Approved and applied, Reg. v. Williams, [1884] E. R. A.; 53 L. J. P.C. 64; L. R. 9 App. Cas. 418; 51 L. T. 546 (P.C.). Referred to, Lowther v. Curwen, 1888, 58 L. T. 168 (Ch. D.). Distinguished, The Moorcock, [1889] E. R. A.; 58 L. J. Adm. 73; L. R. 14 P.D. 64; 60 L. T. 654; 37 W. R. 439 (C. A.). See Gibraltar Commissioners v. Orfila, [1890] E. R. A.; 59 L. J. P.C. 95; L. R. 15 App. Cas. 400; 63 L. T. 58 (P.C.). Referred to, Jersey v. Uzbridge Rural Sanitary Authority, [1891] E. R. A.; 60 L. J. Ch. 833; [1891] 3 Ch. 183; 64 L. T. 858 (Ch. D.). See Reg. v. Selby Commissioners, [1892] 61 L. J. Q.B. 372; [1892] 1 Q.B. 348; 66 L. T. 17 (C. A.). Considered and distinguished, Dunbar v. Ardee Guardians, [1897] 2 I.R. 76 (C. A.). See Taff Vale Railway v. Amalgamated Society, [1901] E. R. A.; 70 L. J. K.B. 219; 83 L. T. 474; 49 W. R. 101 (C. A.): reversed, [1901] E. R. A.; 70 L. J. K.B. 905; [1901] A.C. 426; 85 L. T. 147; 50 W. R. 44 (H.L.). Applied, Wheeler v. Public Works Commissioners, [1903] 2 I.R. 202 (C. A.). Referred to, Hackney Corporation v. Lee Conservancy, [1904] E. R. A.; 73 L. J. K.B. 766; [1904] 2 K.B. 541; 91 L. T. 13 (C. A.). See the Bearn, [1906] P. 48; 94 L. T. 265 (P.D.): affirmed, [1906] E. R. A.; 75 L. J. P. 9; [1906] P. 69; 94 L. T. 265 (C. A.); Bede S.S. Co. v. Wear Commissioners, [1907] E. R. A.; 76 L. J. K.B. 434; [1907] 1 K.B. 310; 96 L. T. 370 (C. A.). See Tozeland v. West Ham Union, [1907] E. R. A.; 76 L. J. K.B. 514; [1907] 1 K.B. 926; 96 L. T. 519 (C. A.). Referred to Hillyer v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital, [1909] E. R. A.; 78

L. J. K.B. 958; [1909] 2 K.B. 820; 101 L. T. 368 (C. A.); McClelland v. Manchester Corporation, [1912] E. R. A.; 81 L. J. K.B. 98; [1912] 1 K.B. 118; 105 L. T. 707 (K.B. D.).

Negligence—Statutory Trustees of Docks—Liability of Corporate Body—Nonfeasance—Neglect of Servants.

CORPORATION. NEGLIGENCE. SHIPPING. STATUTE.—Trustees appointed by statute for public purposes, with power to levy tolls, but not deriving any personal benefit, are liable in their corporate capacity for damage sustained by reason of the default of their servants or agents to the same extent as absolute owners levying tolls for their own profit, although there is no improper conduct on the part of such trustees.

Dictum of Lord Cottenham in Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & F. 894) overruled.

The above cases were proceedings in error from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, sitting in Error from the Court of Exchequer.

The action in the first case was brought against (in the first instance) the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, and was continued by suggestion against their successors, the plaintiffs in error. The declaration contained two counts.

The first count alleged that the plaintiffs (below) were the owners of a cargo of guano on board the ship called the Sierra Nevada, and that the said ship, in endeavouring to enter a certain dock of the defendants (below), called the Wellington Half-Tide Dock, struck against a bank of mud remaining, by the negligence of the defendants (below), in the entrance of the dock. The second count alleged that the defendants (below), knowing that the said dock was, by reason of an accumulation of mud therein, in an unfit state to be navigated, did not take reasonable care to put the same into a fit state for that purpose, whereupon the Sierra Nevada in endeavouring to enter into the dock struck against the mud, and the cargo thereby became damaged.

The defendants below demurred to the declaration, and pleaded several pleas, including a plea of not guilty.

The demurrer was argued before the Court of Exchequer in 1856 (26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 109), when judgment was given in favour of the defendants below. The plaintiffs below brought error upon the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed it, and gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs below (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 321).

The action in the second case was brought by the owners of the vessel, the Sierra Nevada, against the plaintiffs in error, in respect of the damage sustained by the vessel.

The declaration in that action, in respect of the vessel, was in the same form as the declaration in the action in respect of the cargo. The defendants below pleaded two pleas, the material plea being not guilty. The plaintiffs below joined issue on the pleas, and the cause came on for trial before the Lord Chief Baron and a special jury in 1859, when the learned Lord Chief Baron directed the jury that if, in their opinion, the cause of the misfortune was a bank of mud in the dock, and the defendants, by their servants, had the means of knowing the state of the dock, and were negligently ignorant of it, then, in his opinion, the defendants below were liable. A bill of exceptions was tendered to this ruling, which was duly sealed by the Lord Chief Baron, and the jury returned their verdict in favour of the plaintiffs below.

The defendants below brought error on the judgment given by the Court of Exchequer upon the verdict, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber overruled the bill of exceptions, and confirmed the judgment given by the Court of Exchequer (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 329).

Both the above cases depended upon one and the same point of law, namely, whether a public board, the members of which receive no emolument whatever, direct or indirect, appointed under the provisions of an act of parliament to carry out certain duties imposed upon them by the legislature, for the general benefit of the community, are liable for damage sustained by reason of the default of one of their officers, where no improper conduct on the part of the board is the cause of the injury.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber decided the question in the affirmative, and the judgment of the House of Lords was now sought as to the propriety of that decision.

The facts of the cases are further mentioned in the opinion of the learned Judges delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn; and the arguments of counsel and the cases cited are also therein sufficiently referred to.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Mellish and Quain, were for the appellants, and

The Solicitor General (Sir R. P. Collier), Sir H. Cairns, Cleasby, Honyman and V. Lushington, for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Cranworth) put the following questions to the Judges :

In The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Gibbs—

Does the declaration in this case state a good cause of action?

In The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Penhallow—

Is the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber right?

The following opinion was delivered by—

BLACKBURN, J.—I have the honour, in answer to your Lordships' questions in these cases, to deliver the joint opinion of all the Judges who heard the argument.¹ The two actions before your Lordships, though arising out of the same transactions, do not come before your Lordships' House in precisely the same manner.

In Gibbs v. the Mersey Board, the action by the owner of the cargo, the question is raised by a demurrer to the declaration, on which all the material averments must be considered as admitted to be true. The damages are assessed on the second count, and it is to the averments on that count that your Lordships' attention should be directed. On this record it is admitted by the demurrer that the defendants (the dock corporation, at that time called by the style of the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks), knowing that the dock and its entrance was, by reason of accumulations of mud, unfit to be used by ships, did not take due and reasonable or any care to put it in a fit state, but negligently suffered the dock to remain in such unfit state, whilst, as they well knew, it was used by vessels, and that the damage arose in consequence.

In the action of Penhallow v. the Mersey Board, the action by the shipowner, the averments in the second count are similar to those in the first action; but they are not admitted by a demurrer. The question was raised at Nisi Prius, on the plea of not guilty, which the jury have found for the plaintiffs; but the charge of the Lord Chief Baron is brought before your Lordships by a bill of exceptions, by which it appears that he told the jury that if in their opinion the cause of the misfortune was a bank of mud, "and the defendants by their servants had the means of knowing the state of the dock, and were negligently ignorant of it, then, in his opinion, the defendants were liable"; obviously meaning that if the jury so thought, they ought to find the issue for the plaintiffs.

The exception taken to this summing up was, that even if the jury thought the cause of the misfortune was a bank of mud, the defendants were not liable unless they knew that the dock and entrance were, by reason of the said mud bank or otherwise, unfit for navigation. That is the only exception. Mr. Mellish, in the course of his very able reply at your Lordships' bar, contended that the statement in the bill of exceptions disclosed no evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants. But that is not the exception on the record; and we need hardly remind your Lordships that the party tendering a bill of exceptions is confined to the exceptions he makes at the trial. This is not a merely technical answer; had the exception been that there was no evidence of negligent ignorance fit to be left to the jury, the whole of the evidence bearing on that point would have been set out on the record, and then the Court of Error could have formed a judgment whether it was sufficient or not; as it is, the record contains no more of the evidence than is necessary to explain the exception really made at the trial, viz., that the Chief Baron told the jury, in effect, that it was not necessary to prove knowledge on the part of the defendants or their servants of the unfit state of the docks, and that proof that the defendants by their servants had the means of knowledge and were negligently ignorant of it, would entitle the plaintiffs to the verdict.

(1) Channell, B., Blackburn, J., Keating, J., Shee, J. and Pigott, B.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber, in each of the cases, based their judgment on that of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (11 Ad. & E. 230; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 338). In that case the defendants were a company incorporated by act of parliament for the purpose of making and maintaining a canal, which was to be open for the use of the public on the payment of rates, which the canal company were empowered to receive for their own proper use and behoof, i. e., to be divided among the shareholders. And the Court of Exchequer Chamber in that case state the law thus (11 Ad. & E. 242):—

“The facts stated in the inducement shew that the company made the canal for their profit, and opened it to the public upon payment of tolls to the company; and the common law in such a case imposes a duty upon the proprietors, not, perhaps, to repair the canal, or absolutely to free it from obstructions, but to take reasonable care, so long as they keep it open for the public use of all who may choose to navigate it, that they may navigate it without danger to their lives or property.”

In the present case, the dock board do not receive the dock rates for their own use and behoof, i. e., to be divided amongst themselves or their shareholders; but they are bound by the statutes under which they are incorporated to apply them to the purposes of the acts, which may in substance be stated to be to maintain the docks and pay the very large debt contracted in making them. The Court of Exchequer Chamber in both cases decided that this difference did not affect the question; that so long as the dock was kept open for the public, the duty to take reasonable care that the dock and its entrance were in such a state that those who navigate it may do so without danger, was equally cast on the proprietors having the receipt of the tolls and the possession and management of the dock, whether the tolls are received for a beneficial or a fiduciary purpose. If this proposition is correct, the direction of the Lord Chief Baron excepted to was right, for a body corporate never can either take care or neglect to take care, except through their servants; and, assuming that it was the duty of the corporation to take reasonable care that the dock was in a fit state, it seems clear that if the corporation, by their servants, had the means of knowing that the dock was in an unfit state, and were negligently ignorant of its state, they did neglect this duty, and did not take reasonable care that it was fit. And after hearing the very able arguments at your Lordships' bar, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was correct. It is pointed out by Lord Campbell, in The Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. the Southampton Local Board of Health (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 41), that in every case the liability of a body created by statute must be determined upon a true interpretation of the statutes under which it is created. It is desirable, therefore, in the first place, to state what was the effect of the legislation, so far as it applied to these docks, at the time of the accident on the 12th of April, 1865.

The docks in Liverpool have been made at different times, under a great many different acts of parliament, the earliest being the 8 Anne, c. 12. At the time when the accident happened which gave rise to these actions, the latest of the acts was the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64. All these numerous statutes are public acts, of which the Courts must take judicial notice; and as many of the statutes were at that time still in force, though their provisions had been in many respects varied by those subsequently passed, it is extremely difficult to ascertain with precision what was, at the time of the accident, the exact state of the legislation peculiar to those docks. But, having had the assistance afforded by the able and industrious counsel who argued at your Lordships' bar, we think we may venture to say that the effect of the material parts of the statutes is the following:—

The members of the Town Council of Liverpool and their successors were formed into a corporation by the style of the "Trustees of the Liverpool Docks." By statutes 51 Geo. 3. c. 143. s. 2; 6 Geo. 4. c. 87. s. 3. and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64. ss. 2, 3. and 4, the powers of this corporation were to be exercised by committee. On this Mr. Mellish founded an argument which we shall notice afterwards. Subject to these provisions we may say that the effect of the legislation was, that the dock corporation were empowered to make and maintain docks and warehouses, which were to be open to the use of the public, paying dock-rates for the use of the docks and warehouse-rates for the use of the warehouses. The same accommodation and the same services were to be supplied to those using the docks and the warehouses respectively that would have been supplied by any ordinary dock and warehouse company to their customers. Powers are given to the trustees of the Liverpool Docks from time to time to close the docks for the purpose of cleansing and repair. General powers are given to them to appoint officers and servants; but the duties of those officers and servants are not in any place defined in the statutes, except by statute 51 Geo. 3. c. 143. ss. 80, 81, 82, 84, 85. and 86. By those sections, the water-bailiff or harbour-master, or any of the dock-masters, have power to remove wrecks and obstructions, and to regulate the time and manner in which vessels shall enter and leave the docks; and penalties are imposed on those who disobey the orders of those officers. On these latter sections, and on the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Metcalfe v. Hethrington (11 Exch. Rep. 257; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314), an argument was raised for the defendants, which we will notice afterwards. At present we will only observe that such powers are almost essential for the due use of any dock; and that, accordingly, it has been for many years the practice to insert similar clauses in all harbour and dock acts, whether for private companies or public bodies. And in the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), the clauses commonly in use are collected under the head "And with respect to the appointment of harbour-masters and pier-masters and their duties." It will be found on examining them that section 56. in the general act is equivalent to section 80. in the 51 Geo. 3. c. 143; and that the other powers given to the officers of the Liverpool Dock Corporation are also given to the officers of all dock companies, whether for public or for private purposes, incorporated by any statute which incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847.

By a general appropriation clause, 51 Geo. 3. c. 146. s. 29, all the revenues of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks are to be applied in the first instance to making and maintaining the docks, paying the interest on the large debt secured on the dock-rates, and to paying "all the charges and expenses already incurred, or hereafter to be incurred, in the carrying into execution or under or in consequence of any of the former acts or this present act; and the residue in paying off the principal moneys of the debt." And when it is all paid off, the trustees are required to lower and reduce the rates, "as far as can be done, leaving sufficient for defraying all charges of management and other concerns of the docks, &c., and improving, repairing, and maintaining the same, and for the carrying into execution the provisions of this act and the former acts." By subsequent enactments, the trustees of the Liverpool Docks are enabled to raise much more money on bonds, and to make much more extensive works; but in substance this clause still, at the time of the accident, remained the clause governing the appropriation of all moneys received by the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, including the moneys paid for the use of the docks and warehouses. There are some peculiar enactments in one of the statutes (6 Geo. 4. c. 187. ss. 180. to 186.) which were relied upon as shewing the intention of the legislature, on which we shall remark afterwards; but, with this exception, there is nothing in the statutes either extending or limiting the liability of the dock trustees to those paying for the use of the docks, so as to make it different from that which the general law would cast upon them under such circumstances. And, consequently, in our opinion, the great question in both these actions is, what is the duty which the general law does cast upon a corporation, being the proprietors of docks maintained under such enactments?

Now, it is obvious that a shipowner who pays dock-rates for the use of the dock, or the owner of goods who pays warehouse-rates for the use of a warehouse and the services of the warehousemen, is, as far as he is concerned, exactly in the same position, however the rates may be appropriated. He pays the rates for the dock accommodation, or for warehouse accommodation and services, and he is entitled to expect that reasonable care should be taken that he shall not be exposed to danger in using the accommodation for which he has paid. It is well observed by Mr. Justice Mellor in Coe v. Wise (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 281), of corporations, like the present, formed for trading and other profitable purposes, that though such corporations may act without reward to themselves, yet in their very nature they are substitutions on a large scale for individual enterprise. And we think that, in the absence of anything in the statutes (which create such corporations) shewing a contrary intention in the legislature, the true rule of construction is, that the legislature intended that the liability of corporations thus substituted for individuals should, to the extent of their corporate funds, be co-extensive with that imposed by the general law on the owners of similar works. If, indeed, the legislature has, by express enactment or necessary intendment, enacted that they should not be subject to such a liability, there is an end of the question; and if the legislature had in the acts now under consideration enacted that none of the revenue of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks should be applied to the purpose of discharging liabilities incurred in consequence of the trustees acting as proprietors of docks and warehouses, it would go far to shew that the legislature intended that they should not be so liable. But the appropriation clause in the acts now under consideration has no such effect. It was, indeed, supposed by the Court of King's Bench, in The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 789), that its effect was to prohibit the payment of poor-rates; but your Lordships' House has decided, in the recent case of Jones v. the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1), that this was a mistake, and that the trustees of the Liverpool Docks were, out of that fund, to defray all expenses incident by law to the maintenance of the docks, and, as such, poor-rates. We think, on the same principle, they are at liberty to apply the fund to the discharge of the liabilities which, in execution of the act, by keeping open the docks and warehouses, they must from time to time incur to their customers. It was pointed out in the course of Mr. Mellish's argument, that the effect of applying the revenue of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks to the payment of such a liability as the present, would be to postpone the time at which the rates would be reduced, and that, consequently, the ultimate loss would fall on those who were the payers of the rates at the time when the rates, but for this liability, would have been reduced; and so that, in the possible, but not very probable, event of the plaintiffs being then persons using the docks, the loss would partly fall upon the plaintiffs themselves. But we are unable to see how that affects the question whether the action would lie or not. A shareholder in an incorporated company, such as a railway company or an ordinary dock company, who has a cause of action against the corporation, does in effect, by obtaining redress, diminish the future dividends of the shareholders, including his own. In this respect his position is analogous to that of the ratepayer; yet it never can be contended that a shareholder in an incorporated dock company could not maintain an action for an injury to his ship from the neglect of the company. It was pointed out by Sir Hugh Cairns, in the course of his argument at your Lordships' bar, that the legislature, in the 6 Geo. 4. c. 187. ss. 130. to 136, shewed a clear intention that the funds of the dock trust might, in some cases at least, be applied by the committee to indemnifying parties who had suffered by the negligence of the servants of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks; and also that damages recovered against the trustees of the Liverpool Docks might be levied out of the rates, by the circuitous and somewhat clumsy process of distraining on the goods of the treasurer, who was to recoup himself out of the rates. And these enactments, so far as they go, seem to us to shew that the legislature at least did not intend to take away any liability of the trustees, which would otherwise have been cast on them by the general law, though we should not willingly infer from them that it was intended to impose any liability beyond that which would be imposed by the general law.

Mr. Mellish also founded an argument on the wording of these sections, taken in conjunction with the enactments in the second clause of the 51 Geo. 3. c. 143, and the second, third and fourth clauses of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, which it is proper we should now notice. The trustees of the Liverpool Docks were required by the 2nd section of 51 Geo. 3. c. 143. to appoint a committee of their body, and all their powers were to be exercised by that committee, except in so far as the trustees of the docks might reserve any question for their own determination. By the subsequent enactments, this committee was to consist partly of the members of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks and partly of members elected by the persons who had paid dock-rates, and the whole of the powers of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks were to be exercised exclusively by this committee so constituted. When the demurrer in the case of Gibbs v. the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks was argued in the Court of Exchequer, that Court gave judgment upon the ground that the action, if it lay at all, lay against the committee, and not against the trustees of the Liverpool Docks. But in the Court of Error, the defendants, by their counsel, very handsomely agreed that the plaintiff should not be put to the expense and trouble of issuing another writ against the committee; but that, if the action would lie against either body, judgment might be given against the defendants on the record. Subsequent legislation has done away with the committee, and the question, whether the writ ought in such a case to have been directed against the one body or the other, can never in future arise. Your Lordships will probably agree with the Court of Exchequer Chamber that this arrangement was one which ought not to be disturbed by the Court, and there has been no attempt on the part of the counsel for the Mersey Board (who now represent both the original defendants and the committee) to depart from the agreement. But Mr. Mellish argued that the whole scheme of the legislature shewed that the intention of the legislature was to give to the committee an uncontrolled discretionary power to compensate such persons as in their opinion ought to be compensated, and no others. He did not say that they were to exercise this power capriciously, but quasi judicially, though without appeal; and he argued that the change of the constitution of the committee, by which one-half were to be elected by the ratepayers (though only introduced by the later acts) rendered this less unlikely. But we do not think that such is the fair construction to be put on the enactments. It is contrary to the general rule of law, not only in this country but in every other, to make a person judge in his own cause; and, though the legislature can, and no doubt in a proper case would, depart from that general rule, an intention to do so is not to be inferred except from much clearer enactments than any to be found in these statutes. We have gone through these enactments, and we think your Lordships will hardly be inclined to dispose of this important case on any of the special provisions peculiar to these acts.

As we have already intimated, in our opinion the proper rule of construction of such statutes is, that, in the absence of something to shew a contrary intention, the legislature intend that the body, the creature of the statute, shall have the same duties, and render its funds subject to the same liabilities as the general law would impose on a private person doing the same things. This rule of construction was not admitted by the defendants. They did not rest their case exclusively, or even mainly, on any special provisions peculiar to their own private legislation, but upon broader grounds, which, if we do not mistake them, were in effect two:—

They said that by the general law of this country, bodies, such as the present, are trustees for public purposes, and that being such, they are not in their corporate capacity liable to make compensation for damages sustained by individuals from the neglect of their servants and agents to perform the duties imposed on the corporation, or, at all events, that the duty of such a corporation was limited to that of exercising due care in the choice of their officers, and that if they had properly selected their officers, any evil which ensued must be the fault of the officer, and that redress for it must be sought against him alone.

A great many cases were cited at your Lordships' bar as supporting this position, many of which are really not applicable to such a case as the present. Lane v. Cotton (2 Ld. Raym. 646), Whitfield v. Le Despencer, the case of the Postmaster-General (Cowp. 754), and Nicholson v. Mounsey, the case of the captain of the man-of-war (15 East, 384), are authorities that where a person is a public officer in the sense that he is a servant of the Government, and, as such, has the management of some branch of the Government business, he is not responsible for any negligence or default of those in the same employment as himself. But these cases were decided upon the ground that the Government was the principal, and the defendant merely the servant. If an action were brought against the manager of the goods traffic of a railway company for some injury sustained by the owner of goods on their line, it would fail unless it could be shewn that the particular acts which occasioned the damage were done by his orders or directions; for the action must be brought either against the principal or against the immediate actors in the wrong—see Story on Agency, s. 313. And all that is decided by this class of cases is, that the liability of a servant of the public is no greater than that of the servant of any other principal, though the recourse against the principal, the public, cannot be by an action. The principle is the same as that on which the surveyor of the highways is not responsible to a person sustaining injury from the parish ways being out of repair, though no action can be brought against his principals, the inhabitants of the parish. But the defendants in the present action are not servants of the public in that sense. For this we need do no more than refer to the recent decision of your Lordships' House in Jones v. the Mersey Board (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1), where they were held to be rateable as occupiers of the docks on the very ground that they did not occupy as servants of the public or Government.

Another class of cases also cited depends upon the following principle. If the legislature direct or authorize the doing of a particular thing, the doing of it cannot be wrongful; if damage results from the doing of that thing, it is just and proper that compensation should be made for it, and that is generally provided for in the statutes authorizing the doing of such things. But no action lies for what is damnum sine injuria; the remedy is to apply for compensation under the provision of the statutes legalizing what would otherwise be a wrong. This, however, is the case, whether the thing is authorized for a public purpose or for private profit. No action will lie against a railway company for erecting a line of railway authorized by their acts, so long as they pursue the authority given them, any more than it would lie against the trustees of a turnpike-road for making their road under their acts; though the one road is made for the profit of the shareholders in the company and the other is not. The principle is, that the act is not wrongful, not because it is for a public purpose, but because it is authorized by the legislature—see The King v. Pearse (4 B. & Ad. 30). This, we think, is the point decided in The Governors of the British Cast Plate Manufacturers v. Meredith (4 Term Rep. 794), Sutton v. Clarke (6 Taunt. 29) and several other cases, as is well explained by Mr. Justice Williams in Whitehouse v. Fellows (10 Com. B. Rep. 779; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 305). But though the legislature have authorized the execution of the works, they do not thereby exempt those who are authorized to make them from the obligation to use reasonable care that in making them no unnecessary damage be done. In Brine v. the Great Western Railway Company (2 Best & S. 402; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 101) Mr. Justice Crompton says: “The distinction is now clearly established between damage from works authorized by statutes, where the party generally is to have compensation and the authority is a bar to an action, and damage by reason of the works having been negligently done, as to which the owner’s remedy by way of action remains.” This distinction is as applicable to works executed for one purpose as for another. This principle seems to have been acted upon in Leader v. Moxon (2 H. Black. 924), and it is to some extent recognized in Sutton v. Clarke (6 Taunt. 29) by Gibbs, C.J., who puts the judgment on the ground that the defendant, in the execution of a duty imposed on him by the legislature, had exercised his best skill, diligence and caution in the execution of it. “We are of opinion,” says Gibbs, C.J., “that he is not liable for an injury which he did not only not foresee, but could not foresee. He has done all that is incumbent on him, having used his best skill and diligence.” This certainly implies that in the opinion of those who concurred in that judgment the defendant would have been liable if he had neglected to use his best skill and diligence. In the subsequent case of Jones v. Bird (5 B. & Ald. 837) Bayley, J. laid down a stricter rule. He said that the defendants, who in that case were the persons actually executing a sewer, authorized by statute, were not protected merely because acting bona fide and to the best of their skill and judgment. “That,” he says, “is not enough; they are bound to conduct themselves in a skilful manner; and the question was most properly left to the jury to say whether the defendants had done all that any skilful person could reasonably be required to do in such a case.” And there is a considerable number of cases to which we shall afterwards refer, in which, on this principle, actions have been held to lie against bodies executing works under the authority of statutes for the improper mode in which their powers have been executed, though the defendants did not derive any profit from the execution of the works.

There are, however, authorities that bear the other way upon this part of the case; and it is necessary to examine these authorities in order to contrast them with the others. It will be for your Lordships then to decide on which side the preponderance of authority lies. Those in favour of the defendants are Hall v. Smith (2 Bing. 156; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. C.P. 113), Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & F. 894), Halliday v. St. Leonard’s, Shoreditch (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 192), and Metcalfe v. Hethrington (11 Exch. Rep. 257; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314). It is necessary, in considering these authorities, to bear in mind the distinction between the responsibility of a person who causes something to be done which is wrongful, or fails to perform something which there was a legal obligation on him to perform, and the liability for the negligence of those who are employed in the work. This distinction is well stated in Pickard v. Smith (10 Com. B. Rep. 480), by Williams, J., who says, “Unquestionably no one can be made liable for any act or breach of duty unless it be traceable to himself or his servant or servants in the course of his or their employment;

consequently, if an independent contractor is employed to do a lawful act, and in the course of the work he or his servants commit some casual act of wrong or negligence, the employer is not answerable. That rule, however, is inapplicable to cases in which the act which occasions the injury is one which the contractor was employed to do; nor, by a parity of reasoning, to cases in which the contractor is entrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfilment, whereby an injury is occasioned." "If the performance of the duty be omitted, the fact of his having intrusted it to a person who also neglected it furnishes no excuse either in good sense or law." Liability for the collateral negligence depends entirely upon the existence of the relation of master and servant, between the employer and the person actually in default, according to the well-known exposition of the law in Quarman v. Burnett (6 Mee. & W. 509; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 308), where Parke, B. says, "Upon the principle of qui facit per alium facit per se, the master is responsible for the acts of his servant; and that person is undoubtedly liable who stood in the relation of master to the wrong-doer, he who had selected him as his servant from the knowledge of or belief in his skill and care, and who could remove him for misconduct, and whose orders he was bound to receive and obey; and whether such servant has been appointed by the master directly, or intermediately through the intervention of an agent authorized by him to appoint servants for him, can make no difference. But the liability by virtue of the principle of relation of master and servant must cease where the relation itself ceases to exist." In such a case as the present, the liability does not depend on that relation. Liability for doing an improper act depends upon the order given to do that thing; and the liability for an omission to do something depends entirely on the extent to which a duty is imposed to cause that thing to be done; and in the last two cases it is quite immaterial whether the actual actors are servants or not. Now, in Hall v. Smith (2 Bing. 156; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. C.P. 113), the action was brought against the Commissioners for paving Birmingham (sued by their clerk), Norton, a surveyor, and Kimberley, a contractor, employed by them to make a sewer, for leaving a quantity of rubbish unguarded and unlighted, whereby the plaintiff was thrown down and injured. The commissioners were authorized by an act of parliament to order the making of the sewer. "No negligence," says Chief Justice Best, "was imputed to the commissioners themselves; they had ordered the tunnel to be made, and left the making of it to the defendants Norton and Kimberley, the former of whom was the surveyor, and the latter the undertaker of the work. The accident happened to the plaintiff from these persons not putting up rails, and not having lights during the night." The close of his judgment is, that "no action can be maintained against a man acting gratuitously for the public for the consequence of any act which he is authorized to do, and which, so far as he is concerned, is done with due care and attention; and that such a person is not answerable for the negligent execution of an order properly given." This, no doubt, is true; but it would be equally true if the defendants, instead of being a body acting gratuitously for the public, had been a body, like a railway company, authorized to make the tunnel for their own profit. No action could have lain against them unless they stood in the relation of master to the parties actually guilty of negligence. This was not noticed by Chief Justice Best, as is pointed out in Scott v. the Mayor of Manchester (1 Hurl. & N. 59). There, Mr. Baron Alderson says, "Hall v. Smith (2 Bing. 156; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. C.P. 113) goes too far—the person who selects the workmen is the party liable. Commissioners may get rid of liability by making contracts, but if they employ their own servants to do the work, they will be liable for the acts of such servants." But, he adds, "Hall v. Smith (2 Bing. 156; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. C.P. 113) was rightly decided upon the facts." But though what Chief Justice Best said in Hall v. Smith (2 Bing. 156; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. C. P. 113) was irrelevant, and therefore of less weight, still, his opinion is an authority in favour of the defendants. It is, however, based upon a ground quite inapplicable to the present or indeed to any modern case. He points out clearly and forcibly that it is harsh and impolitic to cast on individuals, gratuitously, a public duty, and make them responsible out of their private means for the non-fulfilment of it. But for many years it has been the practice of the legislature to exempt the private means of commissioners from liability, either, as in the present series of acts, by incorporating them, or by enabling them to sue and be sued in the name of a clerk, and restricting the execution to the property which they hold as commissioners. The basis of Chief Justice Best's reasoning fails, and debile fundamentum fallit opus. Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & F. 894) was a Scotch appeal brought before the House of Lords on a bill of exceptions. The action was against the trustees of a turnpike road, to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff from falling over a heap of stones negligently left on the road. It was stated on the bill of exceptions that the trustees had given directions, through their surveyor, that a drain should be filled up, and that the workmen engaged in filling up the drain left negligently the stones in the road. Assuming that the law of Scotland and of England are the same, it is clear that no one could be answerable for this sort of negligence unless he stood to those who actually were guilty of the negligence in the relation of master and servant. The judge who presided at the trial took a different view of the law of Scotland, and directed the jury "that road trustees on a public road are liable for any injury which may happen to passengers, in consequence of the negligence or improper conduct of labourers or surveyors, or other persons employed by the trustees, or by the officers of the trustees, when engaged in any operation performed upon the authority of the trustees." And to this direction there was an exception. If the body authorizing the operation had been a railway company or a private individual, instead of being trustees of a turnpike-road, this direction would, according to English law, have been wrong; and this is pointed out by Lord Brougham, who says: "The rule of liability and its reason I take to be this—I am liable for what is done by me and under my orders by the man I employ, for I may turn him off from that employ when I please. And the reason I am liable is this, that by employing him I set the whole thing in motion, and what he does, being done for my benefit, and under my direction, I am responsible for the consequences of doing it." Language which is very similar to that already cited from Quarman v. Burnett (6 Mee. & W. 509; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 308). But though all that really was decided in that case was that the trustees were not liable for the negligence of persons in their employment who were not shewn to be their servants, it is not to be disputed that Lord Cottenham's language goes a great deal further, and shews that, in his opinion, persons incorporated for the purpose of executing works could never in their official or corporate capacity be liable to damages at all, the remedy for any wrong or neglect being only against the individual corporators for their individual wrong or neglect. His reasoning on this point is: "If the thing done is within the statute, it is clear that no compensation can be afforded for any damage sustained thereby, except so far as the statute itself has provided it. And this is clear on the legal presumption that the act creating the damage, being within the statute, must be a lawful act. On the other hand, if the thing done is not within the statute, either from the party doing it having exceeded the powers conferred on him by statute, or from the manner in which he has thought fit to perform the work, why should the public fund be liable to make good his private error or misconduct?" Lord Cottenham is there speaking of a body of trustees acting under the Scotch Turnpike Act, but his reasoning is general; and the dilemma, if a good one, is applicable to all cases. This is, no doubt, a very high authority, being said by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, though in a Scotch case; but not being the point decided by the House, it is not conclusively binding, and we think that, with great deference to his high authority, we must dissent from the position there laid down, both on principle and on the preponderance of authority.

It is pointed out by Lord Campbell in The Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. the Southampton Local Board of Health (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.)

Q.B. 41) that in every case the liability of a body created by statute must be determined upon a true interpretation of the statute under which it is created. And if the true interpretation of the statute is, that a duty is cast upon the incorporated body, not only to make the works authorized, but also to take proper care, and use reasonable skill, that the works are such as the statute authorizes, or, as in the present case, to take reasonable care that they are in a fit state for the use of the public who use them, there is, with great deference to Lord Cottenham, nothing illogical or inconsistent in holding that those injured by the neglect of the statutable body to fulfil the duty thus cast by the statute upon it, may maintain an action against that body, and be indemnified out of the funds vested in it by the statute. Accordingly, the Court of Queen's Bench, in Ward v. Lee (7 El. & B. 426; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 142), and the Court of Common Pleas, in Clothier v. Webster (12 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 798; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 316), have expressed an opinion that an action lay against a local board of health in its corporate capacity, for an injury sustained from making improper works. And in The Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. the Southampton Local Board of Health (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q. B. 41), the point was expressly decided. And this decision was followed and approved of by the Court of Exchequer, in Ruck v. Williams (3 Hurl. & N. 308; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 357), where it was held that no action would lie against the Improvement Commissioners of Cheltenham (sued by their clerk) for the improper mode in which they caused a sewer to be made. And Bramwell, B. forcibly observed: "I can well understand if a person undertakes the office or duty of a commissioner, and there are no means of indemnifying him against the consequences of a slip, it is reasonable to hold that he should not be responsible for it. I can also understand that if one of several commissioners does something not within the scope of his authority, the commissioners as a body are not liable; but where commissioners, who are a quasi corporate body, are not affected (i. e. personally) by the result of an action, inasmuch as they are authorized by act of parliament to raise a fund for payment of the damages, on what principle is it that if an individual member of the public suffers from an act bona fide but erroneously done, he is not to be compensated? It seems to me inconsistent with actual justice, and not warranted by any principle of law." In Whitehouse v. Fellows (10 Com. B. Rep. 779; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 305), the Court of Common Pleas decided that an action lay against the trustees of a turnpike-road sued in their quasi corporate capacity by their clerk, for negligence in the manner in which they had caused drains to be made. This decision, it is hardly necessary to point out, though quite consistent with all that was decided by the House of Lords in Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & F. 894), is directly opposed to the opinion of Lord Cottenham. And, lastly, in Brownlow v. the Metropolitan Board (13 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 768; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 140), it was decided that an action lay against the Metropolitan Board for the injury sustained by a shipowner for the improper construction of a sewer in the bed of the Thames. And this decision was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (16 Ibid. 546; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 233). It must rest with your Lordships to say whether those decisions to which we have referred are to be overruled. We think they are not consistent with Lord Cottenham's opinion.

Before leaving this part of the subject we ought to call your Lordships' attention more particularly to the case of Halliday v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch (11 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 192). The point actually decided there was, that there is an exception from the general law making a master liable for the negligence of his servant, where the servant is employed by a public body. The Court of Common Pleas did not intend to decide anything inconsistent with the decisions of the Court of Exchequer Chamber now at your Lordships' bar, or with their own decision in Whitehouse v. Fellows (10 Com. B. Rep. 779; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 305). And the point which they did decide does not arise in the present case, so that it is unnecessary directly to decide anything upon it. But we think we ought to call your Lordships' attention to the case, as much of what was said in the course of the judgment by Chief Justice Erle, is based upon the opinion of Lord Cottenham in Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & F. 894), and is therefore an authority making against the view we have submitted to your Lordships.

There remains only one further point to consider. The acts under which the Liverpool Docks have been made contain, as has been already mentioned, clauses enabling the trustees of the docks to appoint water-bailiffs and harbour-masters, and confers on those officers powers of regulating the manner in which vessels shall enter the docks, &c. It was argued that the effect of these clauses was to confine the duty of the trustees to that of selecting proper officers, and they could not be responsible further. The case of Metcalfe v. Hethrington (11 Exch. Rep. 257; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314) was cited as an authority for this position, and we think it is a decision much in point. The Court of Exchequer there, in construing the Maryport Harbour Act, attributed this effect to enactments not very dissimilar to those now in question, and we agree, if this was so, the consequence would follow that the plaintiff's remedy would be, not against those who appointed the officer, but only against the officer himself. But we cannot agree in so construing the present acts.

As has been already pointed out, clauses almost identical with those now in question are inserted in every Harbour and Dock Act, whether the docks be, as in the present case, the property of public commissioners or of a trading company. And we cannot think that it was the intention of the legislature to deprive a shipowner who pays dues to a wealthy trading company, such as the St. Catherine's Dock Company for instance, of all recourse against them, and to substitute the personal liability of a harbour-master, no doubt a respectable person in his way, but whose whole means, generally speaking, would not be equal to more than a very small per-centage of the damages, when there are any. If these enactments are in the present case so construed as to relieve the Mersey Board from liability, the corresponding enactments in the Harbours, Piers and Docks Clauses Act, 1847, must also be so construed as to relieve all trading dock companies from liability, and that we think a reductio ad absurdum. This was not brought to the notice of the Court of Exchequer when deciding Metcalfe v. Hethrington (11 Exch. Rep. 257; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314). With the greatest respect for those who joined in that decision, we think it was erroneous.

For these reasons, we answer both your Lordships' questions in each of these cases in the affirmative, that is, in favour of the plaintiffs below, the defendants in error.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—These are two appeals, depending very much upon the same principles as those which led to the decision of your Lordships' house last year, in the case of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1).

The question there was, whether the trustees of the docks and harbour, who are a body having no beneficial interest in the tolls and other produce of the docks, were rateable to the relief of the poor. The argument was, that, as a public body, not receiving tolls for their own benefit, they were not liable; but your Lordships, after a long argument, decided that they were.

The question in the present two cases is different. Both cases arise out of one transaction. A ship called the Sierra Nevada in entering, or endeavouring to enter, one of the docks sustained injury, by reason of a bank of mud left negligently at its entrance. The ship and the cargo were damaged. Two actions were brought against the appellants; one by Gibbs, as owner of the cargo, the other by Penhallow, as owner of the ship. I do not think it necessary to go through the pleadings. In both cases the Exchequer Chamber held that the appellants were liable. In both cases they have appealed; and the ground of appeal is, that they are not a public company deriving benefit, like a railway company, from the traffic, but a public body of trustees, constituted by the legislature, for the purpose of maintaining the docks, and for that purpose having authority to collect tolls, to be applied in the maintenance and repair of the docks, then in paying off a large debt, and ultimately in reducing the tolls for the benefit of the public.

In the case of Gibbs, it must be taken, as admitted by the appellants, that knowing that the dock was, by reason of an accumulation of mud thereon, in an unfit state to be navigated, they did not take reasonable care to put the same "into a fit state for that purpose"; whereupon the Sierra Nevada, in endeavouring to enter into the dock, struck against the mud, and the cargo thereby became damaged. In the other case (which did not arise upon a demurrer) it must be taken as an established fact that the appellants had, by their servants, the means of knowing the dangerous state of the dock, but were negligently ignorant of it. It is plain that if the appellants are liable in the former case, they must be liable also in the latter. If the knowledge of the existence of the mudbank made them responsible for the consequences of not causing it to be removed, they must be equally responsible if it was only through their culpable negligence that its existence was not known to them. The principles, therefore, which are to regulate the judgment of the House in the one case must also decide it in the other; and the question, therefore, is what are the principles which regulate the liabilities of such a body as that of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

Where such a body is constituted by statute, having the right to levy tolls for their own profit, in consideration of their making and maintaining a dock or a canal, there is no doubt of their liability to make good to the persons using it any damage occasioned by their neglect in not keeping the works in proper repair. This was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench, and their decision was affirmed in the Court of Error in the case of The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (11 Ad. & E. 230; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 338). The ground on which the Court of Error rested their decision in that case is stated by Chief Justice Tindal to have been that the company made the canal for their profit, and opened it to the public upon the payment of tolls; and the common law in such a case imposes a duty upon the proprietors to take reasonable care, so long as they keep it open for the public use of all who may choose to navigate it, that they may do so without danger to their lives or property.

The only difference between that case and those now standing for decision by your Lordships is, that here the appellants, in whom the docks are vested, do not collect tolls for their own profit, but merely as trustees for the benefit of the public. I do not, however, think that this makes any difference in principle in respect to their liability. It would be a strange distinction to persons coming with their ships to different ports of this country, that in some ports, if they sustain damage by the negligence of those who have the management of the docks, they will be entitled to compensation, and in others they will not, such a distinction arising not from any visible difference in the docks themselves, but from some municipal difference in the constitution of the bodies by whom the docks are managed.

It is impossible to argue, after the decision of this House in the case of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1), that the appellants are not in the occupation of the docks; they are as much the occupiers of them as if they received the tolls and dues for their own use and benefit. The principle of that decision, coupled with that of The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (11 Ad. & E. 230; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 338), must govern this case. The appellants are the occupiers of the docks, entitled to levy tolls from those who use them, and so are liable to the same responsibilities as would attach on them if they were the absolute owners, occupying and using them for their own profit.

It cannot be denied that there have been dicta, and perhaps decisions, not capable of being reconciled with the result at which I have arrived; but the whole series of authorities has been so fully brought under review, in the very able and elaborate opinion of the learned Judges delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in answer to the questions put to them by your Lordships, that I do not feel myself called on to do more than to express my concurrence in that opinion.

I content myself, therefore, with moving your Lordships to give judgment, in both cases, for the defendants in error.

LORD WENSLEYDALE.—The Court of Exchequer Chamber, in both these cases, founded their judgment on that of the Exchequer Chamber in the case of The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby (11 Ad. & E. 230; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep (N.S.) Exch. 338), in which case there a company incorporated by act of parliament, for the purpose of maintaining a canal, to be open for the use of the public on payment of rates, which the canal company might receive for their own benefit (that is, the profits to be divided amongst the shareholders); and the Court held that the common law imposed a duty on the proprietors, not, perhaps, to repair the canal, or absolutely to free it from obstructions, but to take reasonable care, so long as they kept it open for use of all that might navigate it, that they might navigate it without damage to their lives or property.

Of the propriety of this decision there could be no doubt, where the profits were received for the benefit of the company. In the present case, the dock board do not receive the rates for their own use, but to be applied to great public purposes for the benefit of all the subjects of the realm; that is, to maintain the docks for any who choose to frequent them, and to pay the debt incurred in their construction; and the Court decided that there was no difference between that case and the present.

If this question were res integra, not settled by the authority of decisions, I am strongly inclined to think that this decision of the Courts could not be supported. It would appear to me that this case falls within the principle of those cases which have decided that when a person is acting as a public officer on behalf of Government, and has the management of some branch of government business he is responsible for the neglect or misconduct of servants, though appointed by himself, in the same business. This was the principle of the decision in Lane v. Cotton (2 Ld. Raym. 646) and Whitfield v. Le Despencer (Cowp. 745), and other cases. The subordinates are the servants of the public, not of the person or persons who have the superintendence of that department, even if appointed by them.

Thus, the Postmaster-General, who has the management of one department of the public service—the duly receiving and conveying and delivering letters from and to different places, which is eminently beneficial to the whole community, and causes profit to the Government—is not responsible for any of the servants of the Post-office department, though he might appoint or dismiss them; and whether the Postmaster-General be an individual, as he is now, or two, as in the case of Whitfield v. Le Despencer (Cowp. 754), or if more, however numerous, or the Crown were to make a corporate body for the regulation and government of the Post-office, neither individuals nor a corporate body would be responsible for the neglect of their servants. In this case, if there had been a Postmaster-General for all the ports of England, to take care that the receipt and discharge of goods and the repairs of ships should be easy and convenient, and the receipt of Customs duties convenient; or suppose his duties to be limited to a certain number of ports, or suppose a corporation were appointed instead of an individual, would it cause that corporation to be responsible for the defects of its officers, by whom alone they act in the management of the docks, and in the due discharge of its duties towards the public, on whose behalf it was acting?

If we had now only to review a great number of cases connected with this subject decided in different Courts, many contradictory and very many unsatisfactory, I should be disposed to abide by the decision of the case of Metcalfe v. Hethrington (11 Exch. Rep. 257; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 314), where the trustees and managers of the harbour were held not to be responsible for the default of the persons actually employed in conducting the business of the harbour.

If this case depended only on the decision of the Courts below, I should feel great difficulty indeed in supporting the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber; but I cannot help thinking that the decisions of your Lordships' House, which are, no doubt, binding upon your Lordships and all inferior tribunals, have gone so far that they have concluded the question, and ought to be considered as deciding that the appellants are responsible. In the case of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees v. Cameron (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1), and Jones v. the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1), in July, 1864, your Lordships, upon a full review and consideration, after a difference of opinion between the consulted Judges, decided that the appellants, the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, were liable to be rated as occupiers, though they occupied those docks for the purposes of those who frequented the port, and derived no benefit from the occupation; and that they did not occupy for public purposes in such a sense as to exempt them from liability to poor rates.

It seems to follow, therefore, that they were not considered as being on the same footing as occupiers of public buildings for Post-office or other Government purposes, but were liable as mere private individuals; and if so, it is difficult to say that they were acting on behalf of the public for the public benefit, and, therefore, were irresponsible for the neglect and default of their servants, by whom alone they could act. Whether they were acting for the benefit of the public or not, seems to be decided by that case.

As we are bound by your Lordships' decision, the opinion of the learned Judges, delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, must be considered as correct, and therefore ought to be affirmed.

LORD WESTBURY.—I entirely concur in the conclusion derived from the authorities and from the principles of law laid down in the very able opinion delivered to your Lordships by Mr. Justice Blackburn. I concur also in the observations of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and that judgment ought to be given for the defendants in error.

But I think it desirable to say a few words with reference to the difficulty felt by the learned Judges in consequence of certain observations that fell from Lord Chancellor Cottenham, and which are reported in the case of Duncan v. Findlater (6 Cl. & F. 894). I can well divine what was, at that time, passing in the mind of my Lord Cottenham. My Lord Cottenham seems to have thought, that if a corporation be trustees of property for the direct benefit of certain individuals, and there is no other corporate property, and if in their capacity as trustees an act is done by order of the corporation, which amounts to a tort or trespass, and gives a right of action, and a right to damages to any private individual, a Court of equity would not permit an execution to issue on any judgment that might be recovered against the property of the corporation, seeing that it is property held upon trust for certain beneficiaries, and that the corporation, as trustees, have no interest therein. But I apprehend that that was a misapprehension on the part of the noble and learned Lord, and that it would lead to very mischievous consequences. It is by no means true that a Court of equity is able to protect the property of beneficiaries against the act of trustees. If trustees alienate property for a valuable consideration, to a person who pays that consideration without notice of the trust, the interest of the beneficiaries suffers from that act; and it would be a very unreasonable and a very mischievous thing if, in the case of a corporation dealing with the public or with individuals, such corporation should, by any conduct of theirs in respect to property committed to their care, give a right of action to individuals, that such individuals should be deprived of the ordinary right of resorting to a remedy against the body doing or authorizing those acts, and should be driven to seek a remedy against the individual corporators, whose decision or order, in the name of the corporation, may have led to the mischief complained of. It is much more reasonable in such a case, that the trust or corporate property should be amenable to the individual injured, because there is then no failure of justice, seeing that the beneficiary will always have his right of complaint, and his title to relief against the individual corporators, who have wrongfully used the name of the corporation.

The learned Judges observed, and with very great correctness, that it is not everything that falls from a noble and learned Lord in advising the House which is to be considered as the opinion of the House. Those observations of Lord Cottenham, which directly tend to this conclusion, that the corporation in the case supposed would not be amenable, nor would the corporate property be liable, but that the party injured would be obliged to have resort to the individual members who directed the act to be done, would, if they were recognized as the law, undoubtedly lead to very great evil and injury.

I confine my observations to the case of a remedy sought for a wrongful act; because your Lordships are very well aware that the rule has been well established, that if, in the case of a contract entered into with a corporation created by an act of parliament, the contract is made by the corporation ultra vires of the corporation, the party may not be entitled to recover under that contract. That may be a very convenient rule, and it is not at all affected by the considerations we are now dealing with; but with regard to the observations attributed to the noble and learned Chancellor (Lord Cottenham), I conceive that they ought not to be taken or regarded as establishing any rule that at all interferes with the decision at which your Lordships have arrived in the case now before you.

With regard to what has been suggested by my noble and learned friend (Lord Wensleydale) that it would be a more correct principle to hold officers of public departments not to be answerable for inferior servants, that may be quite correct where an officer fulfilling a public duty is directly appointed by the Crown, and is acting as the servant of the Crown; but it has no application to the case of trustees incorporated for the purpose of public works, and standing in relation to the public in the way these trustees do in the present case. I concur, therefore, in the motion of my noble and learned friend.

Judgment affirmed, with costs, in both appeals.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

Feb. 18, 19, 22, 23, July 7, 1864. June 22, 1865.

JONES AND OTHERS v. THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD.

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. CAMERON AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. M.C. 1; 11 H. & C. 443; 11 E. R.; 20 C.B. N.S. 356; 12 L. T. 643; 13 W. R. 1069; 11 Jur. N.S. 746.

Followed, Leith Harbour Commissioners v. Inspector of Poor, 1866, L. R. 1 H. L. (Sc.) 17 H.L. (Sc.). See, Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Gibbs, [1866] E. R. A.; 35 L. J. Ex. 225; L. R. 1 H.L. 93; 14 L. T. 677; 14 W. R. 865 (H.L.). Distinguished, Mayor of Lincoln v. Overseers of

Holmes Common, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. M.C. 73; L. R. 2 Q.B. 482; 16 L. T. 739 (Q.B.). Commented on, R. v. St. Martin's, Leicester, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. M.C. 99; L. R. 2 Q.B. 493; 16 L. T. 625; 15 W. R. 1036 (Q.B.). See, R. v. Sherford, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. M.C. 113; L. R. 2 Q.B. 503; 16 L. T. 663; 15 W. R. 1035 (Q.B.). Principle applied, Lancashire JJ. v. Cheetham Overseers, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. M.C. 12; L. R. 3 Q.B. 14; 16 W. R. 124 (Q.B.). Principle adopted, Greig v. Edinburgh University, 1868, L. R. 1 H.L. (Sc.) 348 (H.L. (Sc.)). Applied, R. v. M'Cann, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. M.C. 123; L. R. 3 Q.B. 677; 19 L. T. 115; 16 W. R. 985 (Ex. Ch.). See, R. v. Mayor of Oldham, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. M.C. 169; L. R. 3 Q.B. 474; 18 L. T. 240; 16 W. R. 789 (Q.B.). Applied, R. v. Rhymney Railway, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. M.C. 75; L. R. 4 Q.B. 276; 17 W. R. 530 (Q.B.). Referred to, Att. Gen. v. Dakin, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. Ex. 113; L. R. 4 H.L. 338; 23 L. T. 1; 18 W. R. 1111 (H.L.); Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham Overseers, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. M.C. 30; L. R. 6 Q.B. 193; 23 L. T. 490; 19 W. R. 246 (Q.B.); Morgan v. Crawshaw, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. M.C. 202; L. R. 5 H.L. 304; 24 L. T. 889; 20 W. R. 554 (H.L.). Principle applied, Att.-Gen. v. Black, [1871] E. R. A.; 40 L. J. Ex. 194; L. R. 6 Ex. 78; 25 L. T. 207; 19 W. R. 1114 (Ex. Ch.); St. Thomas' Hospital v. Stratton, [1876] E. R. A.; 45 L. J. M.C. 23; L. R. 7 H.L. 477; 30 L. T. 37; 23 W. R. 882 (H.L.). Adopted, R. v. West Derby Overseers, [1875] E. R. A.; 44 L. J. M.C. 98; L. R. 10 Q.B. 283; 32 L. T. 400 (Q.B.). See, Mayor of Essendon v. Blackwood, [1877] E. R. A.; 46 L. J. P.C. 98; 2 App. Cas. 574; 36 L. T. 625; 25 W. R. 834 (P.C.). Distinguished, Hare v. Putney Overseers, [1881] E. R. A.; 50 L. J. M.C. 81; 7 Q.B. D. 223; 45 L. T. 337; 29 W. R. 721 (C. A.); R. v. Curzon, 1882, 46 L. T. 159; 30 W. R. 521 (Q.B.D. Div.). Referred to, Martin v. West Derby Assessment Committee, [1883] E. R. A.; 52 L. J. M.C. 66; 11 Q.B. D. 145; 31 W. R. 489 (C. A.). See, Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas, [1884] E. R. A.; 53 L. J. Q.B. 4; 8 App. Cas. 891; 49 L. T. 781; 32 W. R. 34 (H.L.). Discussed, Coomber v. Berkshire JJ., [1884] E. R. A.; 53 L. J. Q.B. 239; 9 App. Cas. 61; 50 L. T. 405; 30 W. R. 779 (H.L.). See, R. v. West Bromwich School Board, [1884] E. R. A.; 53 L. J. M.C. 67, 153; 13 Q.B. D. 929; 52 L. T. 164; 32 W. R. 866 (Q.B.D. Div. & C. A.); Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Llanelian, [1885] E. R. A.; 54 L. J. Q.B. 349; 14 Q.B. D. 770; 52 L. T. 118; 33 W. R. 97 (C. A.). See, Dewsbury and Heckmondwike Waterworks Co. v. Penistone Union, [1886] E. R. A.; 55 L. J. M.C. 28; 16 Q.B. D. 585; 54 L. T. 592 (Q.B. D.); affirmed, [1866] E. R. A.; 55 L. J. M.C. 121; 17 Q.B. D. 384; 54 L. T. 592; 34 W. R. 622 (C. A.); Dublin Corporation v. M'Adam, 1887, 20 L. R. Ir. 497 (Ex. D.). Discussed, Tunnicliffe v. Birkdale Overseers, 1888, 20 Q.B. D. 450; 59 L. T. 190; 36 W. R. 360 (C. A.). See, Bray v. Lancashire JJ., [1888] E. R. A.; 57 L. J. M.C. 57; 59 L. T. 438 (Q.B.D. Div.); affirmed, [1889] E. R. A.; 58 L. J. M.C. 54; 22 Q.B. D. 484; 37 W. R. 392 (C. A.). See, Dillon v. Haverfordwest Corporation, [1891] E. R. A.; 60 L. J. Q.B. 477; [1891] 1 Q.B. 575; 64 L. T. 202; 39 W. R. 478 (Q.B. D.). Referred to, Perry v. Eames, [1891] E. R. A.; 60 L. J. Ch. 345; [1891] 1 Ch. 658; 64 L. T. 438; 39 W. R. 602 (Ch. D.); Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1892] E. R. A.; 61 L. J. Q.B. 265; [1891] A.C. 531; 65 L. T. 621 (H.L.). See, London County Council v. Erith Churchwardens, [1893] E. R. A.; 63 L. J. M.C. 9; [1893] A.C. 562; 69 L. T. 725; 42 W. R. 330 (H.L.); London County Council v. Lambeth Overseers, [1896] E. R. A.; 65 L. J. M.C. 148; [1896] 2 Q.B. 25; 74 L. T. 605; 44 W. R. 621 (C. A.); affirmed, [1897] E. R. A.; 66 L. J. 806; [1897] A.C. 625; 76 L. T. 795 (H.L.); Waterford Union v. Barton, [1896] 2 I. R. 538 (Ex. D.). Adopted, Middlesex County Council v. St. George's Union Assessment Committee, [1897] E. R. A.; 66 L. J. Q.B. 101; [1897] 1 Q.B. 64;

75 L. T. 464; 45 W. R. 215 (C. A.). Referred to, Harte v. Holmes, [1898] 2 J. R. 656 (Q.B. D.). Applied, Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Birkenhead Assessment Committee, [1901] E. R. A.; 70 L. J. K.B. 584; [1901] A.C. 175; 84 L. T. 542; 49 W. R. 610 (H.L.). See, Hackney, Corporation v. Lee Conservancy Board, [1904] E. R. A.; 73 L. J. K.B. 766 [1904] 2 K.B. 541; 91 L. T. 13 (C. A.); Davies v. Seisdon Union, [1907] E. R. A.; 76 L. J. K.B. 472; [1907] 1 K.B. 680; 96 L. T. 315 (C. A.): affirmed, [1908] E. R. A.; 77 L. J. K.B. 742; [1908] A.C. 315; 99 L. T. 30 (H.L.). Referred to, Winstanley v. North Manchester Overseers, [1910] E. R. A.; 79 L. J. Q.B. 95; [1910] A. C. 7; 101 L. T. 616 (H.L.).

*Poor-Rate—Rateable Occupation—Beneficial Occupation—Exemption on Ground of Public Purposes—Trustees of Public Works, &c., Crown Property—*43 Eliz. c. 2.—8 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96.

CROWN. RATES AND RATING.—The occupation of property which is liable to be rated under the 1st section of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. is an occupation yielding or capable of yielding a net annual value, that is to say, a clear rent over and above the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the property in a state to command such rent, and it is not necessary that the occupation should be beneficial to the occupier; so that trustees, who are in law, the tenants and occupiers of valuable property upon trust for charitable purposes, such as hospitals or lunatic asylums, are rateable, notwithstanding that the buildings are actually occupied by paupers who are sick or insane.

The only occupiers exempt from the operation of the act are the Sovereign, because he is not named in the statute, and the direct and immediate servants of the Crown, whose occupation is the occupation of the Crown itself; and the only ground of exemption from the statute is that which is furnished by the above rule. And, consequently, when properly yielding a rent above what is required for its maintenance is sought to be exempted on the ground that it is occupied by bare trustees of public purposes, the public purposes must be such as are required and created by the Government of the country, and are therefore to be deemed part of the use and service of the country.

The first above-mentioned case was a proceeding in error from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, sitting in error from the Court of Common Pleas, confirming the judgment given in the Court below in favour of the plaintiffs below (who were the defendants in error) upon a special case.

The question raised in the case was whether the docks at Liverpool were liable to be rated to the relief of the poor.

The action, in form an action of replevin, was brought by the plaintiffs below in their present corporate name of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (hereinafter called the Dock Corporation), against the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Liverpool, the plaintiffs in error, who were the defendants below, for the taking and detaining of certain goods and chattels of the Dock Corporation. The distress complained of was levied by reason of the non-payment of a poor-rate, made on the 2nd of June, 1858, whereby the Dock Corporation were assessed in the sum of 20,580*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*, as the amount payable by them in respect of the dock estates within the parish of Liverpool.

Upon the distress being levied the Dock Corporation entered into the usual replevin bond and brought their action, and thereupon a special case containing the facts was stated between the parties, and which, so far as is material, was as follows:

SPECIAL CASE.

The dock estates within the parish of Liverpool became vested originally in the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the borough of Liverpool, as trustees of the docks and harbour of Liverpool, by virtue of several acts of parliament. Part of those estates was granted voluntarily by that corporation, part was sold by that body to the trustees for a pecuniary consideration, and other parts were purchased by the trustees from private individuals according to the powers given to them by the said before-mentioned and other acts, being altogether twenty-two in number, and forming a series extending from the eighth year of Queen Anne to the twenty-first year of her present Majesty, both inclusive. Before the construction of many of the present works, part of the land was shore both above and below high-water mark, but the greater part consisted of lands and buildings in the occupation of individuals rated to the relief of the poor of the said parish. The dock estates at present consist of docks, basins, piers, jetties, graving docks, gridirons, wharfs, quays, sheds, offices, buildings, landings, landing-stages, slips, stairs, river walls, dams, embankments, locks, gates, bridges, weirs, sluices, tunnels, cuts, channels, roads, railways, tramroads, cranes, engines, machinery, and other matters and conveniences requisite to form complete docks; and the trustees are authorized to receive large sums of money under the name of dock rates and duties, for the accommodation of vessels in the said docks, by virtue of the said acts of parliament.

Under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 187. and the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64. a committee was appointed in the manner directed by the acts, called 'The committee for the affairs of the estate of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks,' and all the powers and authorities of the said trustees of the Liverpool Docks were vested in such committee. By the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 162, local and personal, entitled 'An Act for consolidating the docks at Liverpool and Birkenhead into one estate, and for vesting the control and management of them in one public trust, and for other purposes,' s. 26, all the docks, lands, buildings, and other property, real and personal, situate at Liverpool, that were held by or in trust for the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, became vested in the plaintiffs under the style of 'The Mersey Dock and Harbour Board,' but subject to all charges and liabilities affecting the same. By section 49. of the last-mentioned act, it is enacted that, "subject to the provisions of this act, the board shall stand possessed of all the property, powers, rights, and privileges hereby transferred to them upon the trusts, and for the purposes upon and for which such property, powers, rights and privileges were holden previously to the commencement of this act." The 56th section of the same act enacts as follows: "The following rules shall be observed by the board with respect to the monies received by them under this act (that is to say):—(1.) The conservancy expenditure shall be defrayed out of the conservancy receipts. (2.) The pilotage expenditure shall be defrayed out of the pilotage receipts. (3.) No portion of the conservancy receipts or pilotage receipts shall be applied in aid of the general expenditure. (4.) No sums shall be payable in respect of any docks by any vessel that does not use the same. (5.) Save as by this act is provided, no monies receivable by the board shall be applied to any purpose unless the same conduces to the safety or convenience of ships frequenting the port of Liverpool, for facilitating the shipping or unshipping of goods, or is concerned in discharging a debt contracted for the above purposes." The 59th section of the same act is as follows: "The board shall render to parliament, as soon as may be after the 24th day of June in every year, an account of its receipts during the preceding year ending the 24th day of June, and the manner in which the same has been applied."

The board manages the dock estates by its servants and agents, who receive and account for to the board the dues and other monies arising from the management of the said estates, and no part of the estates and premises comprised in the above assessment or schedule is let off to other persons, nor are any rents paid to the board for any part thereof. With regard to the application of the monies received as dock duties, the statute 8 Ann. c. 12. s. 9, under which the first dock was built, enacts "That all and every such sum and sums of money that shall be raised and received by the duties aforesaid, and recovered for any of the forfeitures in this act appointed, other than so much thereof as shall be laid out and allowed to the collector or other necessary officer for the collecting and managing the said duty for charges of recovering the same, shall, by the said mayor, aldermen, bailiffs, and common council for the time, be applied and disposed of to the building and repairing the said new dock or basin and other works, and for the securing, preserving, amending, and maintaining the said dock or basin and harbour of Liverpool, and to no other use and purpose whatsoever." By sections in the subsequent acts, all the acts in the series, including this of 8 Anne, are directed to be read and construed as one act.

All the dock rates payable by the former acts of parliament were repealed by the 51 Geo. 3. c. 143, by which new rates were substituted. The 27th section of that statute is as follows: "And be it further enacted, that all the monies which shall be collected, received, levied, borrowed and raised by and under this act shall be applied in paying and defraying the charges and expenses attending the obtaining and passing this present act, and to the paying the expenses and charges attending the levying and collecting the said rates and duties, and after the paying and appropriating one-third part of the said monies to and for the purpose of making and completing the southernmost portion of the said North Docks, as hereinafter is mentioned, then to the paying off and discharging the present bond debt of 114,705*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, and the debt of 67,406*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* owing by the said trustees to the Corporation of Liverpool for the purchase of land and strand intended for the site of the southernmost of the said Northern Docks, and any future bond debt, and the interest on the same, and to the paying and discharging the interest and all other monies which may be hereafter borrowed and taken up at interest under the provisions of this act upon the credit of the said dock rates and duties as aforesaid, and to the carrying into execution the purposes of this act and the said recited acts, in the making, erecting, building, finishing, and maintaining such docks, basins, piers, and other works and buildings in the port of Liverpool, under the said acts and this act, and to the paying, defraying, and satisfying all other charges and expenses already incurred or hereafter to be incurred in the carrying into execution, or under or in consequence of any of the said former acts or this present act; and the residue or surplus of all monies arising from such rates or duties which shall remain after such application thereof as aforesaid shall from time to time be applied in or towards the repayment of the principal monies which shall have been borrowed under this act, until all such principal monies shall be repaid, and all assignments of or mortgages upon such rates and duties are paid off, satisfied, discharged, and redeemed; and when by the means last mentioned all the principal monies which shall have been borrowed shall be repaid, and all assignments and mortgages upon the said rates are satisfied and redeemed, then and in such case it shall be lawful for the said trustees, and they are hereby required, to lower and reduce the rates and duties hereby granted and made payable, as far as the same can be done in the then state of the docks, basins, buildings, and other works and buildings of the said port, and leaving sufficient for all charges of management and collection of rates and other concerns of the said docks, basins, piers, works, and other buildings, and improving, repairing, and maintaining the same, and for the carrying into execution the provisions of the said former acts and this act."

By the act 6 Geo. 4. c. 187. power is given, by the 105th section, to the said trustees to levy certain fresh rates; and by the 106th section to lower all rates, and to raise the same again; and by the 130th section it is enacted, "That all the monies which shall be collected, levied, borrowed and raised under this act, or the said recited act, shall be applied in any order, with respect to priority of such application, as to the said trustees shall seem expedient and proper, except as by this act provided as to the time of payment of assignments of the said rates and duties granted by virtue of the said recited act, in payment of and in defraying the costs, charges, and expenses of obtaining this act, and in paying the expenses and charges of collecting the rates and duties and all interest due and to grow due from time to time on monies borrowed or taken up at interest by the said trustees, and any principal monies that may be called in from time to time, and in the general management and conducting of the said trust estate, in the construction of the works by this and the said former acts authorized to be erected, established and maintained, in supporting, maintaining, and repairing the same, and every part thereof, and in carrying into execution all the provisions of the said several acts and this act, and in paying off and discharging the whole or any part of any present bond or other debt, and any future bond or other debt, and all interest due and to grow due thereon, and also in the paying and satisfying all the charges and expenses already incurred, or hereafter to be incurred in carrying into execution the usual purposes of or under or in consequence of any of the clauses, provisions, powers, or authorities contained in the said former acts or this act."

By the act 4 Vict. c. 30. power is given to the trustees to erect transit-sheds, to make a wet-dock, to construct other works, and to raise a further sum of money, and to levy certain additional rates; and by the 124th section it is enacted, "That all the monies which shall be collected, levied, borrowed, or raised, under and by virtue of the said recited acts and this act, shall be applied in any order, with respect to priority of such application, as to the said trustees shall seem expedient, in and towards completion of the several docks, transit-sheds, warehouses, and other works, by the said recited acts and this act authorized to be made, formed, erected and built, and for and towards the several objects and purposes in the said recited acts and this act mentioned, in the general management and conducting of the said trust estate, and carrying into execution all the provisions of the said recited acts and this act, and for the general improvement and reparation of the docks, basins, and works, of the said trustees."

By the act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 80. power is given to the said trustees to construct additional docks and raise further sums of money; and by the 127th section it is enacted, "That all the monies which shall be collected, levied, borrowed, or raised, under and by virtue of the said recited acts and this act, shall be applied, first, in and towards the payment of all expenses of and attending the passing of this act, and then in and towards the completion of the several docks and other works by the said recited acts and this act authorized to be made and constructed, and for and towards the several objects and purposes in the said recited acts and this act mentioned, and in the general management and conducting of the said trust estate, and carrying into execution the provisions of the said recited acts and this act, and for the general improvement and reparation of the several docks and other works of the said trustees."

By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 109. power is given to the said trustees to construct additional wet-docks and other works, and to raise a further sum of money; and by the 47th section it is enacted, "That all the monies which shall be collected, levied, borrowed, or raised, under and by virtue of the said recited acts and this act, shall be applied, first, in and towards the payment of all expenses of and attending the passing of this act, and then, in and towards the completion of the several docks and other works by the said recited acts and this act authorized to be made and constructed, and for and towards the several objects and purposes in the said recited acts and this act mentioned, and in the general management and conducting of the said trust estate, and carrying into execution the provisions of the said recited acts and this act, and for the general improvement and reparation of the several docks and other works of the trustees."

By the act 11 Vict. c. 10. power is given to the said trustees to construct additional docks and other works; and by the 40th section it is enacted, "That all money which shall be collected, levied, borrowed, or raised, under and by virtue of this and the said recited acts, shall be applied in and towards the payment of all expenses of and attending the passing of this act, and in and towards the construction and completion of the several docks, warehouses, and other works by the said recited acts and this act authorized to be made and constructed, and for and towards the several objects and purposes in the said recited acts and this act mentioned, and in the general management and conducting of the said trust estate, and carrying into execution the provisions of the said recited acts and this act, and for the general improvement and reparation of the several docks and other works of the trustees."

The board are bound to apply the present dock rates and dues, and all other monies received by them out of the dock estate, according to the directions of the several acts of parliament, and no member of the board derives any private advantage or emolument whatsoever from the execution of the trusts of the dock estate.

All the docks, sheds, tramways, railroads, offices, and other things mentioned in the assessment, were erected and provided under and in pursuance of the said several acts of parliament or some of them, solely for the purposes of the dock business, and are not used for any other purpose whatsoever, and all revenue of every kind derived by the board from any part of the property is carried to the general dock estate.

By the 4 Vict. c. 30. s. 52. the trustees were empowered to build warehouses on the quays of one of the docks, and by the 11 Vict. c. 30. s. 3. such power to build warehouses was extended to all the dock-quays, and by section 71. of the first-mentioned, and by section 4. of the second-mentioned act, such warehouses were expressly made subject to all parochial and other rates. None of the warehouses built in pursuance of the said acts are included in the assessment.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was rateable to the relief of the poor in respect of their property. If the Court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment was to be entered for the defendants for such sum as the Court should think they were entitled to distrain for, and costs; if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for their costs of suit.

This special case was argued, before the Court of Common Pleas, on the 5th of June, 1860 (8 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 114; s.c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 185), when judgment was given in favour of the Dock Corporation. Against this judgment there was an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 239), and that Court confirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas.

[Prior to the date of the rate now in question two attempts had been made, one in 1806 and the other in 1825, to rate the Dock Corporation in respect of the Liverpool Docks. By a rate made on the 23rd of September, 1806, the Dock Corporation, by their then style of "The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks," were assessed in respect of the dock dues in the sum of 1,650*l.* The Court of Quarter Sessions, upon appeal, amended the rate by striking out the assessment upon the trustees, subject to the opinion of the Court of King's Bench on a special case. That case was argued before the Court of King's Bench in Hilary Term, 1808, when the order of the Court of Quarter Sessions was confirmed. The point raised and determined in favour of the Dock Corporation was, as appears by the last sentence of the special case, whether the Dock Corporation were liable to any rate whatever for the relief of the poor in the parish of Liverpool. There is no report of this case.

In 1825 the Dock Corporation, by their then style of "The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks," were, by a rate made for the relief of the poor of the parish of Liverpool, again assessed in respect of the dock estate. The Court of Quarter Sessions, upon appeal, amended the rate by striking out the assessment upon the trustees, subject to a case for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench. The case was argued before that Court in 1827, when the order of the Court of Quarter Sessions was confirmed—The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780).

The Dock Corporation, by five of their Dock Acts, viz., 4 Vict. c. 30. s. 71; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 119. s. 34; 11 Vict. c. 10. s. 4; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 174. s. 31, and the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 92. s. 175, passed respectively in the years 1841, 1846, 1848, 1855, and 1858, were empowered to erect and complete warehouses upon the dock estate. The legislature, on each of these occasions, enacted, that the occupancy by the Dock Corporation of the warehouses so to be erected and completed should be subject to the payment of all parochial and other local rates, in like manner as the same would be payable in respect of warehouses the occupancy of which is beneficial.]

The secondly above-mentioned case (The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron and others) was a proceeding in error from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, sitting in error from the Court of Common Pleas, confirming the judgment given in that Court (9 Com. B. Rep. 812; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 194) in favour of the defendants upon a special case. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber without argument.

The action, in form an action of replevin, was brought by the plaintiffs, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, against the defendants, the overseers of the poor of the township of Birkenhead, for the taking and detaining of certain goods and chattels of the plaintiffs. The distress complained of was levied by reason of the non-payment of two poor-rates, made one in May, 1858, and the other in November, 1858, whereby the plaintiffs were assessed in the respective sums of 167*l.* 10*s.* and 235*l.* 2*s.*, as the amounts payable by them in respect of that portion of the Mersey Dock estate which is situate within the township of Birkenhead.

Upon the distress being levied the plaintiffs entered into the usual replevin bond and brought their action, and thereupon a special case, which is not necessary to be here set out, was stated between the parties, and was argued before the Court of Common Pleas in January, 1861, when the Court took time to consider, and on the 25th of February following gave judgment in favour of the defendants, on the ground that the plaintiffs ought to have appealed to the Sessions against the rates, and that an action of replevin would not lie (9 Com. B. Rep. 812; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 194).

Three questions of law arose in that case. First, whether the interest the plaintiffs had in the dock estate was such as to render them liable to be rated to the relief of the poor, under the taxing power conferred by the 43 Eliz. c. 2. Secondly, whether it was competent for the plaintiffs to raise the first question by an action of replevin. Thirdly (if the two previous questions should be answered in the plaintiffs' favour), whether the act of parliament by which the dock estate was vested in the plaintiffs, affirmatively imposed upon them a liability to poor rates, in respect of that part of the dock estate which is situate at Birkenhead.

The first question was identical with that raised in the first above-mentioned case. The second question was waived during the argument. And with regard to the third question, it does not require to be further noticed, by reason of the case having been determined upon the first question.

Bovill and Mellish, for the appellants in the first case and the respondents in the second case, after referring to The Queen v. the Churchwardens and Overseers of Chirton, nom. The Tyne Commissioners v. the Overseers of Chirton (1 E. & E. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), The Trustees of Birkenhead Docks v. the Overseers of Birkenhead (2 El. & B. 148), The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780),

The Queen v. the Trustees of the River Lea (19 J.P. 319) and Adamson v. the Clyde Navigation Trustees (a Scotch case unreported), The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 58) and The Queen v. the Overseers of Longwood (13 Q.B. Rep. 116; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 65), argued that there was no difference as to the liability to be rated between the trustees of the Mersey Docks and the trustees of any other docks. The Queen v. the Harrogate Commissioners (15 Q.B. Rep. 1010; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 25). The same general principle pervades all these cases, and the later decisions are all uniform from 1845. There is no exemption under the Statute of Elizabeth of property held for public purposes, unless held by the Crown or for the Crown. Looking at the contention on the other side, the marginal note in The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 730) is not according to the decision, which was, that the trustees were not occupiers, or if occupiers, not for their own benefit; and if that case is the law, all the other cases are wrong, for in all the other cases the trustees were occupying in a similar manner to the trustees in that case. The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) was decided on the ground that there was a direction to lower the rates, and any other application of the rates would be in direct violation of the act. That case governed The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70, note (c)). An election must be made between one class of cases or the other. The question is, what is the proper construction of the statute of Elizabeth, and there is no such exemption in the statute as contended for on the other side. Then the acts relating to the Mersey Docks contain no exemption from the rate or any prohibition to the trustees to apply the dock-rates towards the poor-rates, and no repeal of the Statute of Elizabeth with respect to dock companies. The construction of the Statute of Elizabeth in The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) cannot be sustained. The trustees are bound to discharge their legal liabilities; there is no exemption on the ground of public purposes. The Queen v. the Churchwardens and Overseers of Chirton (1 E. & E. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 131) governs the present cases. If any benefit is derived from the occupation, it is immaterial whether the occupier receives as a trustee or not—The Corporation of Manchester v. the Overseers of Manchester (17 Q.B. Rep. 859), The Mayor of Liverpool v. the Overseers of West Derby (6 El. & B. 704; s. c. 25 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 112). The trustees are occupiers within the Statute of Elizabeth.

[The LORD CHANCELLOR.—If we accede to your proposition, what will become of the case of The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053)?]

There the trustees were merely nominal owners; there was no profit arising; so, also, in The King v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (4 Burr. 2435).

Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Quain (Parker with them), for the respondents in the first case and the appellants in the second case.—The question is, what is the true construction of the statute of Elizabeth as applied to the present case? To render property liable to be rated there must be an occupation from which the occupier must or may derive a benefit; where the occupation is attended with no profit to the occupier or others, there is no liability to be rated. So, where the property is held for public purposes for benefit of the community at large, then, according to the true construction of the Statute of Elizabeth, that is not a property which is liable to be rated—the Taunton Market case, The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 68). Then, how do the present cases stand on the basis of authority? Except the cases of The Queen v. the Trustees of the River Lea (19 J.P. 319) and The Queen v. the Churchwardens and Overseers of Chirton (1 E. & E. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 131), no authority is to be found for a period of 250 years to controvert our proposition, and those cases are distinguishable. The construction contended for would exclude works held by public boards for public purposes. Early's case (2 Bulst. 354) points to this conclusion, as well as Dalton's Country Justice, 148 (edit. 1697), tit. 'Poor,' The King v. the Inhabitants of St. Thomas's Southwark (2 Stra. 745), Viner's Abridgment, tit. 'Poor,' E. 5, and the case of St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053). The distinction is between actual occupation and beneficial occupation. In The King v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (4 Burr. 2435) the corporation were as much in occupation as the trustees of the Mersey Board, but derived no benefit. In The King v. Gardener (Cowp. 79) and Robson v. Hythe (Cald. 310) the rate was on account of benefit derived. The Earl of Bute v. Grindall (2 H. Black. 265) is important, as shewing that even Crown property may be rated in the hands of a de facto occupier who derives an actual benefit. In Lord Amherst v. Lord Somers (2 Term Rep. 372) such a distinction was taken—The King v. Hurdiss (3 Term Rep. 497). All these cases turn on the question whether the person rated is an occupier within the statute. Eckersall v. Briggs (4 Term Rep. 6) distinguishes an occupation for a public purpose from a private occupation. The King v. the Mayor of London (Term Rep. 21) was decided on the ground that it did not appear that the persons rated were not beneficial owners. In The Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 730) the occupation was for public purposes, and therefore the occupier was not rateable. The King v. Parrot (5 Term Rep. 593) was a case of beneficial occupancy; and The King v. Terrot (3 East 506) of beneficial enjoyment—The King v. The New River Company (1 M. & S. 503). Everything in the present case is inconsistent with the idea of beneficial ownership, and the present case was decided before on that ground. One regular course was followed in The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 113), The King v. the Inhabitants of St. Giles, York,¹ The Queen v. the Mayor of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 41), The Queen v. the Guardians of the Wallingford Union (10 Ad. & E. 259; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89) and The King v. the Beverley Gasworks (6 Ad. & E. 645; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 84). If the Liverpool case (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 730) were wrongly decided, they have caused fifty other cases to be wrongly decided. If The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 68) had not been referred to on the other side, we should have cited it as an authority in our favour upon the principles of liability to rating as there laid down by Lord Denman. It establishes The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 730). In the Queen v. the Harrogate Commissioners (15 Q.B. Rep. 1010; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25) Lord Campbell says nothing against The Liverpool case (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) or The Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 730). Crease v. Sawle (2 Q.B. Rep. 862) is an authority as to not hastily setting aside decided cases. The Birkenhead case (2 El. & B. 148) was decided on narrow and technical grounds, and proceeds on the assumption that the occupation was within the statute of Elizabeth, and it would be monstrous to overrule The Liverpool case (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) on such an authority. The Queen v. the Trustees of the River Lea (19 J. P. 319) and Adamson v. the Clyde Navigation Trustees must fall to the ground with The Birkenhead case (2 El. & B. 148), as they were decided on its authority, as also The Queen v. Chirton (1 E. & E. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131). If The Birkenhead case (2 El. & B. 148) was rightly decided, it does away with the distinction between an occupation for public purposes and a beneficial occupation. The docks would not be liable to be rated under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. The warehouses authorized to be erected by the 4 Vict. c. 30. and the subsequent acts being rendered expressly liable to rates by such acts, shews that the legislature considered the remaining property was not liable to be rated. It is quite clear that property held beneficially is liable to be rated, and that property not held beneficially is free from such liability. If the Liverpool Docks are not liable to be rated, the Birkenhead Docks are not liable, as they are held on the same trusts, and not beneficially. The rate is not a liability attaching to the property, but to the person in respect of his occupation—Theed v. Starke (8 Mod. 213), Case v. Stevens (Fitz. 298). The trust now before the House is a much wider trust than those in the cases which appear to be against us; it is one for the benefit of the whole community.

(1) 3 B. & Ad. 579; s. c. nom. The Trustees of the York Lunatic Asylum v. the Churchwardens of St. Giles, York, 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 50.

Mellish, in reply.—There is no case before The Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 730), in which there was an exemption on the ground of the occupation being for public purposes. To be free from the liability to rates, either there must be no revenue, or a statutory enactment that no portion of it is to be applied for rates. There is no distinction between the present case and the case of The Queen v. Chirton (1 E. & E. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), which is an express authority in our favour.

The LORD CHANCELLOR put the following questions to the Judges.—First, “Are the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board ‘occupiers’ of the docks vested in them within the true meaning of the word ‘occupier,’ in the statute of 43 Eliz.?”

Secondly, “If they are occupiers within the statute, are they exempted from liability to be rated for relief of the poor by the operation or effect of the statutes, 4 Vict. c. 30, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 119, 11 Vict. c. 10, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 174, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 92, or any of them, or by reason of the purposes for which they occupy the same, or on any other ground appearing in the special case?”

Thirdly, “Does the act of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 162. (the act of 1857) impose upon the board a liability to poor-rate in respect of the docks, estate, and property vested in the board, or any and what part thereof, by virtue of the 26th and 27th sections of the last-mentioned act?”

On the 7th of July, 1864, the following opinions were delivered.—

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords, the opinion which, with your Lordships’ permission, I am about to read, contains the joint answers to your Lordships’ questions of the Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Justice Williams, Mr. Justice Mellor, Mr. Baron Pigott, and myself.

To the first question put to us by your Lordships in these causes, we answer that, in our opinion, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are occupiers of the docks in question within the true meaning of that word as used in the statute of 43 Eliz. c. 2.

Our reasons for that opinion are as follows: The statute 43 Eliz. c. 2. sect. 1. requires the overseers of every parish to raise by “taxation of every inhabitant, parson, vicar, and other, and of every occupier of” various kinds of real property, and inter alia of “lands in the parish, in such competent sum as they shall think fit,” a stock for setting the poor of the parish to work, and for the relief of the poor of the parish.

Though the words of this enactment might seem to give the overseers a discretion to tax each inhabitant in such arbitrary sum as they might think fit, it has long been settled that the taxation of the different persons must be equal and in proportion to the value of their respective means. It would appear, from the passages cited at your Lordships’ bar from Dalton’s Country Justice, that this was determined very shortly after the statute was passed. It has always been so held, and the Legislature, by the Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96), has affirmed this principle by enacting that no rate shall be valid unless made “upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenants’ rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent."

In order, therefore, that a valid rate may be imposed, it is essential that the occupation be of value beyond what is required to maintain the property; for if the occupation be of so little value that the hypothetical tenant (under the Parochial Assessment Act) would either give no rent, or a rent which, after deducting the average annual expense of the maintenance, would leave no overplus, there is nothing to rate.

The question whether replevin lies has been waived, and therefore it is not necessary further to consider whether in such a case the more proper expression would be that the person in possession of the property was not an occupier at all within the meaning of the statute of Elizabeth, so that the overseer had no jurisdiction to make the rate, and consequently that the levying of it might be resisted in replevin or trespass; or whether, as seems to have been the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in The Overseers of Birmingham v. Shaw (10 Q.B. Rep. 868; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89) and The Queen v. Bradshaw (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 176), he is an occupier, whom as such the overseers have jurisdiction to tax, though on appeal the rate must be reduced to nothing.

But that question having been waived, this is now immaterial. Which-ever may be the true mode of enunciating the position, it is clear that there can be no valid rate unless the occupation be such as to be of value, and if the words "beneficial occupation" are to be understood as merely signifying that the occupation is of value (which is obviously the sense in which the phrase is used in many of the cases cited at the bar), it is clear that a beneficial occupation is essential as the foundation of the rate; but it is equally clear that, if the phrase be understood in this limited sense, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have a beneficial occupation; for they actually occupy land as docks, and in virtue of that occupation receive payments from the shipping using the docks, at present, greatly in excess of what is necessary to maintain the docks. Hereafter the charges on shipping may be reduced so as greatly to diminish the revenue derived from this occupation; possibly at some future time to render it no greater than the sum requisite to maintain the docks; but whilst the dues on shipping are maintained at their present rate, it is clear that the hypothetical tenant would give for the occupancy of the docks as at present enjoyed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board a rent greatly in excess of what would be necessary to maintain the docks in a state to command that rent.

Where there is an actual demise of property to an occupier who pays rent to the owners of the property the tenant, if a subject, is rateable, without any regard to the purpose to which the rent is applied. It is immaterial whether the landlord enjoys the rent himself, or is obliged to pay it away as interest to mortgagees, or even (as in the case with the tenants of Crown property) pays it into the Consolidated Fund, or the privy purse of the Sovereign. The occupier in each case is rateable. And if the matter were now for the first time to be determined without reference to the decisions, it would seem that where the owners of the property are themselves in occupation and receive the value, the amount of which is measured by the rent which the hypothetical tenant would give, the purposes to which that amount is applied ought to be as immaterial as if there had been a real demise at that rent; and the occupiers, if subjects, ought to be rated, whatever be the object for which the property is occupied, unless some special enactment exempted them. But the decisions have now settled that there is an exemption; and the important question in the present case is, what is the nature of the occupation and of the purposes which bring the occupiers' case within that exemption? And on this question the decisions are to some extent inconsistent, and it is necessary to examine them.

The Crown, not being named in the statute of Elizabeth, is not bound by it; and consequently the overseers cannot impose a rate on the Sovereign in respect of lands occupied by Her Majesty, nor on those occupied by her servants for Her Majesty.

The exemption depends entirely on the occupier and not on the title to the property. The tenants of Crown property, paying rent for it, are rateable, like all other occupiers; and it has even been determined that where apartments in Hampton Court, a royal palace, were gratuitously assigned to a subject, who occupied them by permission of the Sovereign, but for the subject's benefit, the subject was rateable in respect of her occupation of this royal property—The Queen v. Lady Emily Ponsonby (3 Q.B. Rep. 14). On the other hand, where a lease of private property is taken in the name of a subject, but the occupation is by the Sovereign or her servants on her behalf, the occupation being that of Her Majesty, no rate can be imposed—Lord Amherst v. Lord Sommers (2 Term Rep. 372).

So far the ground of exemption is perfectly intelligible; but it has been carried a good deal further, and applied to many cases in which it can scarcely be said that the Sovereign or the servants of the Sovereign are in occupation. A long series of cases have established that where property is occupied for the purposes of the government of the country, including under that head the police, and the administration of justice, no one is rateable in respect of such occupation. And this applies not only to property occupied for such purposes by the servants of the great departments of State, such as the Post Office—Smith v. Birmingham (7 El. & B. 483); the Horse Guards—Lord Amherst v. Lord Sommers (2 Term Rep. 372); or the Admiralty—The Queen v. Stewart (8 El. & B. 360),—in all which cases the occupiers might strictly be called the servants of the Crown; but also to property occupied by local police—The Justices of Lancashire v. Shelford (El. B. & El. 230); to county buildings occupied for the Assizes and for the Judges' lodgings—Hodgson v. the Local Board of Health of Carlisle (8 El. & B. 230); or occupied as a county court—The Queen v. the Township of Manchester (3 El. & B. 336; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 48); or for a gaol—The Queen v. Shepherd (1 Q.B. Rep. 170; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 44).

In these latter cases it is difficult to maintain that the occupants are, strictly speaking, servants of the Sovereign, so as to make the occupation that of Her Majesty; but the purposes are all public purposes of that kind which, by the constitution of this country, fall within the province of Government, and are committed to the Sovereign, so that the occupiers, though not perhaps strictly servants of the Sovereign, might be considered in consimili casu. These decisions are uniform, and it was not disputed at the bar, that the exemption applies so far; but there is a conflict between the decisions as to whether the exemption goes further.

There are several cases relating to charities which were mentioned at your Lordships' bar, but were not much pressed, nor, at it seems to us, need they be considered now; for, whatever may be the law as to the exemption of property occupied for charitable purposes, it is clear that the docks in question can come within no such exemption.

There is, however, one case on this subject, that of The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053), which it is necessary to notice on account of the effect which, in The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430), was attributed by Lord Kenyon to part of what fell from Lord Mansfield in that case. In The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053) the question before the Court was whether Joseph Mansfield was rateable as occupier of St. Luke's Hospital; but the Court entered into the larger question, whether there was any one who could be charged as occupier; saying very truly, that unless there was some one who could be so charged no rate could be imposed. Lord Mansfield, as to that, is reported to have said, "As to the lessees, mere nominal trustees cannot be esteemed occupiers or rated as such." In the subsequent case of The King v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (4 Burr. 2435), Lord Mansfield says that the Corporation of London "are not de facto the occupiers of St. Bartholomew's Hospital: the poor are the occupiers; but they are not rateable." This may perhaps shew that Lord Mansfield only meant to lay down the position that those in whom the legal estate is vested are not necessarily the occupiers; which is, no doubt, true; no one could contend that the person in whom a term assigned to attend the inheritance had vested, could be rated as occupier, in point of law, of the estates de facto occupied by his cestui que trust. But if Lord Mansfield meant (as it rather seems that Lord Kenyon thought he did), that the persons in actual valuable occupation of property are not rateable if they occupy in a merely fiduciary character, it is a position which cannot be maintained. The counsel for the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, at your Lordships' bar, did not attempt to maintain any such general position; they limited themselves to contending that such was the law where it was a public trust; for which they cited authorities which they said must be overruled unless that position was maintained. And we think they were justified in so saying; but we also think that there are conflicting decisions which must be overruled if it is maintained.

The first case in which the position was advanced that trustees occupying valuable property, but prohibited from taking any individual benefit from it, were not rateable, seems to have been The King v. the Mayor of London (4 Term Rep. 21), decided in 1790. There Mr. Justice Buller in his judgment says, "Now it has been objected that they are not liable to this rate, because they hold it on a public trust; but, in the first place, it does not appear to be the case of a trust at all, and if it did, perhaps the consequence contended for would not necessarily follow." It certainly seems that the doctrine contended for was not at that time, 1790, considered as established.

The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430) was decided in 1792. In the argument the clauses of the act under which the Commissioners held were referred to, and argued on; but Lord Kenyon's judgment does not appear to have proceeded on the ground that their effect was to prohibit the payment of poor-rate. He says, "The trustees have a bare naked trust, not coupled with any interest. If any interest resulted, either to the Commissioners or to the owners of the adjoining land after the public purposes of the act were answered, these tolls might have been rated. But it is admitted that all the money which is collected under this act of parliament must be expended for the purposes of the act, and therefore, upon the ground upon which the Court proceeded in The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053), namely, that there was no occupier, these Commissioners are not liable to be rated."

The counsel for the parish and township in the cases at your Lordships' bar did not attempt to deny that this decision was in favour of their opponents; they admitted (and we think quite properly admitted) that the decision was against them, but they denied that it was law. The counsel for the Mersey Board were fully justified in relying on this case, as entitling them to the benefit of Lord Kenyon's judgment; but we think that when they proceeded to argue that the decision acquired additional authority because it was acquiesced in, they fell into a fallacy. When the Court of Queen's Bench has decided in favour of a rate, those who are rated may, if they are so advised, bring replevin, and (subject to the question whether replevin lies in such case) may carry the case up to the House of Lords; and, therefore, where a decision in favour of a rate is not disputed further, it may properly be said to be acquiesced in. But when the Court of Queen's Bench has decided against a rate, and quashed it, there is no way whatever in which the parish officers can raise the question again; and acquiescence in a decision cannot add any weight to it, when there is no possible way of disputing it.

The next cases to be found in the reports in which any similar point arose were those of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70) in 1827. It appears that in 1806 the Liverpool Sessions made an order excluding the Liverpool Docks from a rate for the relief of the poor of the parish of Liverpool, subject to a case intended to obtain the opinion of the Court of King's Bench on the question whether the Corporation of Liverpool were rateable as occupiers of the docks; and that in 1808 the order of Sessions was confirmed, but under what circumstances does not appear.

The late Lord Abinger was counsel for the parish, both in that case and in the case of 1827; and the attorneys of the Corporation of Liverpool in 1827 could not be ignorant of the circumstances attending the confirmation of the order of Sessions in 1806. Yet on the argument in the case, reported in 7 Barn. & Cress., neither side alludes to what, if a decision at all, must have been precisely in point. It seems, therefore, probable that, though the rule confirming the order in 1808 is not drawn up as by consent, the former case was compromised, and that there was no decision of the Court in 1808.

However this may be, there can be no doubt that the Court of King's Bench, in 1827, acted upon the authority of The King v. Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430); Lord Tenterden saying, in The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), "Here the trustees were not occupiers in the ordinary sense of the word, and no profit was received for the use of any person;" and Mr. Justice Bayley saying, "The principle of this decision is applicable to the case of The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70). There the surplus tolls remaining over and above the expenses of supporting the navigation were to be applied to the repairing and maintaining of bridges and highways. Those were public purposes, and as no part of the monies received could be applied to private purposes, those monies were not rateable in the hands of the trustees."

There is no dispute that those two decisions, if they are to be followed, are decisive in favour of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, at least in the first of the cases at your Lordships' bar, and reduce the case of The Overseers of Birkenhead (2 El. & B. 148) to that point mentioned in your Lordships' third question.

The next case to which it is necessary to call attention is that of The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), decided in 1836. In that case the governors of the Bristol poor had taken property for the purpose of putting out their poor there. A rate had been imposed on them in respect of this occupation, and was levied by distress. The governors of the Bristol poor brought replevin for the purpose of questioning the validity of this rate. In the judgment of the Court the point raised is said to be "whether the plaintiffs were such occupiers of the property as to be rateable to the poor." And the decision was that they were. The Judges who decided this case probably did not suppose that they were deciding anything inconsistent with the decisions in The King v. Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430), and The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), which appear not to have been cited on the argument, or brought to their notice. But we do not see how the cases can stand together. The governors of the poor of Bristol were as much bare naked trustees having no personal interest in the occupation of this property as the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice; and if the one set of trustees were on that ground not occupiers, we do not see how the others could be occupiers: and if the application of the surplus funds of the Weaver Navigation to the bridges and highways of Cheshire, so as to be in relief of the county rate, was a public purpose rendering the trustees of that navigation not rateable, it is difficult to see why the application of whatever value was derived from the lands occupied by the governors of the Bristol poor to the maintenance of the poor of Bristol, and so in relief of the poor-rate of the city of Bristol, was not a public purpose also. We think that in this case the Court of King's Bench, probably without being aware of it, came to a decision inconsistent with, and therefore shaking the authority of, The King v. Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430), The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70).

The decision in The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1) has been repeatedly acted upon, and never questioned that we know of. As the decisions in this case, and those which followed it, were decisions in favour of the rate, and consequently might have been questioned in replevin, the acquiescence in them does add something to their authority.

The Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76.) restricted the power of the municipal corporations named in Schedules A. and B. to that act, over what had been their private estates, and compelled him to pay the net proceeds into the Borough Fund, which was applicable first to the payment of the existing debts of the corporation, and then to the corporation expenses; and the surplus, if any, for the public benefit of the inhabitants, and the improvement of the borough. The Court of Queen's Bench, in The Queen v. The Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), decided, in 1839, that the effect of this enactment was to render the corporations no longer liable to be rated in respect of any property occupied by them. The reason given by the Court for this decision was that they found "the principle settled by the decisions already made, and felt it to be their duty to act upon them, and not upon the apprehension of any inconvenient or unforeseen consequences, to question or weaken their authority." They proceed to state the cases of The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), and say that, "We feel it to be impossible substantially to distinguish these cases, and especially the latter, from the present. The extent and approximation to something like national benefit are in kind, and almost in degree, the same. The public in the one case is the same town of Liverpool, in the other the county of Chester." The Court do not explain why the same argument did not avail in The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), where the city of Bristol was held not to be the public; but they did not intend to depart from that decision, and in the same year acted upon it, in The Queen v. the Guardians of Wallingford (10 Ad. & E. 259), in which latter case an attempt but, as it seems to us, not a successful one, is made to reconcile the decision with that in The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435).

Mr. Justice Crompton, in The Queen v. Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), stated that the decision in The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) created at the time great surprise. We think, however, that the conclusion come to by the Court in that case does logically follow from the decisions in The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), and that the Court in that case had to choose whether they would consider it a reductio ad absurdum, and say that decisions leading to such a conclusion must be wrong in principle, or to say that, the decisions being binding on them, they must hold that the conclusion was not wrong. They adopted the latter course, apparently not at that time perceiving that it was inconsistent with the principle of their own decision in The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1). A few years later, the Court of Queen's Bench, in several cases to be presently cited, adopted the former course, and the question now pending in your Lordships' House seems to us to be, in substance, which set of decisions are to be followed in future?

The effect of the decision in The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) was immediately nullified by the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 48; but that enactment did not declare the decision erroneous. On the contrary, the act was couched in language which, though not declaring the decision to be law, indicates that the framers of the act thought that it was law; and the fact that an act couched in such terms was passed by the legislature affords an argument, of more or less weight, that the error of the Court, if it was one, was acquiesced in, and had become communis error.

This is, we think, the latest authority in point of date relied on by the counsel for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

The next case in order of date was The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787), in 1845. In the judgment of the Court the conflicting cases are cited. The Court does not attempt to reconcile them; but observes that in all the cases where the occupation was held to be of such a public nature as to exempt the property from rateability, "the public, as such, unlimited by the bounds of county, borough, or parish, had a direct interest in the benefit which the application of the funds produced," and that the case then before them did not come within that principle. The passage here cited has been repeatedly quoted with approval as giving the true principle of exemption. It does include all the cases already cited, in which the occupation was for the purposes of government. But the principle thus laid down cannot be made to embrace either The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), where the funds were applicable to the relief of the county rate of Cheshire, or The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), where the funds were brought into the borough fund in relief of the borough rate in that particular borough.

In The Queen v. the Overseers of Longwood (13 Q.B. Rep. 116; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 65), in 1849, the Court of Queen's Bench, acting upon the principle laid down in The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787), held that the Commissioners of the Huddersfield Water Works were rateable to the relief of the poor.

All the cases which we have hitherto cited were decided before Lord Campbell took his seat upon the Bench. It is right to notice this, for it has often been supposed, and indeed was said in the argument at your Lordships' bar, that the decisions in his time, on the subject of the exemption from rates, were innovations introduced in consequence of his strong individual opinion that the exemptions from rateability had been carried further than was warranted by law or reason; but we think that the cases which we have cited shew that before he came upon the Bench, that opinion had been entertained and acted upon, and that in consequence the decisions had got into such a state as to be inconsistent with each other; so that it had become necessary to overrule one set of the inconsistent decisions, unless the law was to be administered without any reference to principle, deciding each case as it arose, according as the facts might be supposed to approximate more nearly to those in the one set of decisions or the other.

Several cases were decided in Lord Campbell's time which closely resembled that of the Huddersfield Commissioners (The Queen v. Longwood), and which were decided in the same way without rendering it necessary to go further than had been done in that case, until, in 1852, the case of The Overseers of Birkenhead v. the Trustees of Birkenhead (2 El. & B. 148) arose. Mr. Justice Crompton was a party to that decision, and, in The Tyne Improvement Commissioners v. Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), he has given some account of the deliberations on that case (though his observations were misunderstood by the reporter), and he repeated it during the argument in the Exchequer Chamber of the case at bar. It appears that this learned Judge was at first startled at being called upon to act on a principle in direct opposition to the considered decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), though he had always thought that decision wrong; and that he was the more unwilling to act in direct contradiction to that case, because the legislature, in the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 48, when enacting that the decision should no longer be practically operative, did not express any disapprobation of the principle of the decision, but rather used language seeming to assume that it was good law; and he doubted whether the case should not be followed, though not approved of, leaving it to the legislature to correct it. The rest of the Court thought that the time had come when the Court could no longer halt between two sets of decisions, but must follow that which was law; and Mr. Justice Crompton ultimately agreed with them. Lord Campbell, in his judgment (perhaps out of deference to the doubts which Mr. Justice Crompton had at first entertained), seeks to avoid expressly overruling the previous decisions; and suggests that, perhaps, The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430) and The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) may be distinguishable on the ground that the private acts in those cases were construed by the Courts as amounting to a prohibition to pay poor-rate. But the counsel on both sides at your Lordships' bar agreed that no such distinction could be maintained; and we think that neither Lord Kenyon nor the Court of King's Bench in Lord Tenterden's time proceeded on any such ground. And in the subsequent cases of The River Lea Navigation (19 J.P. 919) and The Tyne Improvement Commissioners v. Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), in 1859, no such distinction was made. The Court of Queen's Bench in that last case acted upon the broad principle that though, where the property was occupied for public purposes, "such as," says Lord Campbell, "a post-office or a military store dépôt, where the purposes for which the property is occupied are purposes created by the Government of the country," there was no rateable occupier, the occupation of a public dock was not an occupation for such public purposes, and that the Commissioners occupying such a dock were rateable in respect of the value of that occupation, estimated according to the rule laid down in the Parochial Assessment Act, unless an exemption was conferred by some subsequent statute; and that the enactments in the Tyne Improvement Acts as to the application of the rates received (which are in substance the same as those in the Liverpool Acts), did not amount to such an exemption; and Mr. Justice Crompton, after stating his former doubts when the Birkenhead case was argued, said that he now thought that case (2 El. & B. 148) laid down the proper rule. This, we think, must be considered as the rule now acted upon in practice in the Court of Queen's Bench.

Such being the state of the authorities, it seems to us no longer possible to support the decisions relied on by the counsel for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. We quite agree that it is very desirable to adhere to decided cases, though this principle may be carried too far. It has been forcibly remarked by an American author of repute (1 Phillips on Insurance, 393.—Note g.) that where the objection to the decisions is "inconsistency with admitted fundamental principles, it is an adhering to an inconsistency and contradiction, and tends to reduce jurisprudence from a science to an aggregation of dogmas." Still the inconvenience caused by the unsettling the law and disturbing what was quiet is so great, that we agree that even a Court of error should be slow to reverse decisions which, though originally wrong, have long been uniform. When such is the case, it may often be proper to persevere in the error, and leave the remedy to the legislature. It may be that, if the attention of the Court of King's Bench had in 1836 been called to the case of The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), before they decided The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), this principle, which is strongly laid down in Crease v. Sawle (2 Q.B. Rep. 862), would have led them to decide The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1) otherwise than they did. But all this inconvenience has been already incurred; the recent decisions have been such as to disturb the quiet state of things, and a decision of your Lordships' House affirming The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and the non-rateability of the Liverpool Docks must reverse the decision in The Tyne Commissioners v. Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 131), and render the docks in the Tyne rateable. And such a decision, though not necessarily reversing the numerous decisions based on The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), by which poor-houses and gasworks and waterworks in the hands of public trustees have been held rateable, must greatly shake their authority and disturb a principle of rating now generally adopted throughout the country. The balance of convenience, if that be a legitimate consideration, is now in favour of adhering to the more recent decisions. And if we view the case on principle, without regard to the decisions either way, it seems to us clear that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board ought to be rated.

The counsel referred to many expressions in the local acts, shewing that the Mersey Docks were thought likely to confer great public benefit, and to be very advantageous to the commerce of this country; and there is no doubt that that expectation has been realized, and that these docks are of great public benefit; but not more so than the docks in the river Thames, all of which are in the hands of private companies, and are undoubtedly rateable.

The rate is imposed, not in respect of the value of the benefit conferred on the public, or that portion of it which uses the dock, but is on the occupiers of the docks in respect of the value to them derived from the payments taken for that use. And we think it impossible to point out any real distinction in this respect between the occupation of a dock formed by a company under an act of parliament incorporating the Companies Clauses Act and the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and the occupation of the Mersey Docks by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

A company forming a dock under an act of parliament incorporating these acts is bound to maintain the docks, and to keep harbour masters and other officers there, and to allow the public to use the dock on payment of the rates, and to allow Her Majesty's vessels to use it without making any payment; and by these means they confer a benefit on the public; the company, by virtue of its occupation, receives the rates on shipping using the docks, and the amount thus received is applicable to keeping up the docks, and then to paying interest on the loans, the amount of which is limited, and then in paying dividends on the share capital; and it is common to have a maximum limit put on the rate of the dividend; when that maximum dividend is reached, the rate must be lowered. It is indisputable that a company thus occupying a dock is an occupier, and rateable as such. Now if, without in any way altering the mode in which the docks are enjoyed by the public, or altering the rates leviable, or changing the harbour-masters and others who manage it, we change the name of the body who occupy it from that of "the company" to that of "the board"; and if, instead of "the company" paying to the shareholders a maximum dividend on their capital, the "board" pay to the same individuals the same identical sums, but call them "interest on bonds" instead of "maximum dividend on share capital," what difference does this make? If The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) is to be supported, it makes this difference, that what was formerly an occupation in respect of which the company was rateable has by this change of name, without any change in the thing, become an occupation for public purposes, for which the board is not rateable. If the decision in The Tyne Commissioners v. Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 131) is to be supported, the change in name makes no difference in the rateability.

We think the latter the correct view of the law, and therefore we answer your Lordships' first question in the affirmative.

We now proceed to answer the second question put by your Lordships. And we are of opinion that there is nothing in the matters referred to in your Lordships' questions to exempt the board from being rated in respect of their occupation.

We have already, in answering your Lordships' first question, given our reasons for thinking that the purposes to which the rates are applicable are not such as to exempt them from rateability; and we are further of opinion that the effect of the statutes applicable to the Liverpool Docks is not such as to exempt them from the payment of poor-rate. There are no negative words prohibiting the application of the rates to payment of the poor-rate. And we think, in conformity with the decision in The Tyne Commissioners. v. Chirlton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), that enactments directing that the revenue shall be applied to certain purposes and no others are directory only; and mean that after all charges imposed by law on the revenue have been discharged, the surplus or free revenue, which otherwise might have been disposed of at the pleasure of the recipients, shall be applied to these purposes.

We have only, therefore, to consider the reasons on which the Court of Exchequer Chamber based their decision in the first of the present cases; and with very great respect for those who concurred in that judgment, we think that they acted on a principle sound in itself, but not applicable to the case before them.

Where an act of parliament has received a judicial construction putting a certain meaning on its words, and the legislature in a subsequent act in pari materia use the same words, there is a presumption that the legislature used those words intending to express the meaning which it knew had been put upon the same words before; and, unless there is something to rebut that presumption, the act should be so construed, even if the words were such that they might originally have been construed otherwise. And if the decision in The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) had been that certain words used in the former acts had amounted to an exemption from poor-rate, and those same words had been repeated in the subsequent acts, it would, on this principle, have been a fair inference that the legislature intended by using the same words to give the exemption. But this is not the case here. The legislature had by former acts conveyed to the trustees the docks to be held for certain purposes. The Court of King's Bench had decided that, as an incident of law, those who held land for such purposes were not rateable to the relief of the poor. When the legislature again in fresh acts used the same language, it shewed that they intended to convey the land to be occupied for the same purposes; and that if the law did annex non-rateability as an incident to such an occupation the legislature had no objection. But it did not afford any argument that the legislature intended to annex that incident in case it should be discovered that it was not annexed by law. And the clauses enacting that the warehouses should be rated carry this argument no further.

During the course of the argument at your Lordships' bar the Lord Chancellor put the case of an express recital in the act, to the effect that it had been decided in The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) that the dock trustees were not liable to poor-rate in respect of land occupied by them, and that it was expedient that no such exemption should be given to them in respect of the occupation of new warehouses acquired under the new act, and then after recital an enactment in the terms in which it is now expressed. And he asked the counsel at your Lordships' bar two questions; First, whether such a recital could be construed to amount to a declaratory enactment that the decision in The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) was good law? Secondly, whether the acts framed as they were could have a greater effect than they would have had if framed with such an express recital? The counsel for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board were not able to give any answer to those questions that would support the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. Mr. Justice Blackburn (the only Judge who, being a party to the decision in the Exchequer Chamber, was also present at the argument at your Lordships' bar) admits that he cannot answer them, and his inability to do so has led him to change the opinion which he entertained when in the Exchequer Chamber. We have no reason to believe that the other Judges who joined in that judgment have changed their opinion. We have most sincere deference for their judgment; and as we have had no opportunity of hearing what answer they would have made to the way the case has been put in your Lordships' House, it is with diffidence that we have formed our opinion that they have misapplied the ground of their decision; but entertaining that opinion, we are bound to express it.

We therefore answer your Lordships' second question in the negative.

The answers which we give to the first and second questions put by your Lordships in effect answer the third question. In our opinion the liability to poor-rate is imposed on the Board by the general law, and not by virtue of the sections of the act referred to. We therefore answer your Lordships' last question in the negative.

BYLES, J.—In answer to your Lordships' first question, I am of opinion that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are not occupiers within the true meaning of statute 43 Eliz.

No doubt they are occupiers in the strict legal sense of that word, that is to say, they are in possession of the land, and are the proper parties to bring an action of trespass. But the sense in which your Lordships use the word "occupiers," is the sense in which it is used in the earlier leading cases on the subject, and that sense must be borne in mind in order to understand those cases.

I conceive that the occupation, to be an occupation within the statute, must be a beneficial one. The rate is to be raised "according to the ability of the parish," and "by taxation," both which expressions import, first, that the occupation is to produce profit or pecuniary benefit to the occupier himself, or some one whom he represents, and secondly, that each assessment is to be in proportion to that benefit. This construction is fortified by the consideration that the statute, when it was passed, authorized an assessment in respect of personal as well as of real property.

Accordingly, such has been the construction of the statute from the earliest times; indeed, it may be said that such was the contemporaneous exposition. The date of the statute is 1601. It was stated at your Lordships' bar that the first edition of Dalton's Justice was published a year or two after that date, and that the author in that edition says, that the overseers are to raise the rate by taxing the occupiers, "proportioning them to an annual benefit." I have not had access to the earlier editions of this work, but certainly those words are repeated in the fifth edition published in 1635.

It seems, therefore, plain from the object of the act, from its words, and from the earliest exposition, that the occupier must in order to be rateable enjoy a beneficial occupation.

It is not essential that this occupation should be for the individual benefit of the occupier himself; it may be for the benefit of another; it may be for the benefit of a plurality of other persons,—of a considerable number of other persons,—or even of a number not certainly defined, but limited by locality or other circumstances. Yet I conceive that if the property be occupied for the benefit not of a number of individuals more or less defined, but for the benefit of the public at large, then it is not rateable. This conclusion seems to me to be the result of a long series of authorities.

I do not rely on the exemption of the Crown; for that exemption would take place on the principle that the Crown is not bound by an act of parliament, unless named therein. But even this exemption is merely personal, for tenants of the Crown occupying for their private benefit are rateable.

Whether occupiers for the service of the general Government are exempt on the ground that they represent the Crown may be doubtful. It should rather seem that they are exempt, because they occupy for public purposes. Thus the Birmingham Post Office was held not rateable, Lord Campbell treating it as clear, but expressing regret "that property taken for public purposes is not rateable,"—Smith v. the Guardians of Birmingham (7 El. & B. 483). Upon the same ground an occupation by the Horse Guards, Lord Amherst v. Lord Sommers (2 Term. Rep. 372), was held not rateable; Mr. Justice Buller and Mr. Justice Ashhurst laying it down as law not only that the possessions of the Crown were not rateable, but that the possessions of the public were not rateable, and that in the case then before them the plaintiff was exempt, "because he was like a trustee for the public, deriving no benefit for himself."

The exemption is not confined to premises occupied for the purposes of the general government; it extends to occupations for the purposes of local government also. Thus buildings occupied by the local police, "held," say the Court, "for public purposes,"—The Justices of Lancashire v. Shelford (El. B. & El. 230); a shire hall—Hodgson v. the Local Board of Carlisle (8 El. & B. 230); the county courts—The Queen v. Manchester (3 El. & B. 336; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 48) a county gaol—The Queen v. Shepherd (1 Q.B. Rep. 170; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 44); reformatory schools supported by voluntary subscriptions open to several counties, and within the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86—Shepherd v. the Churchwardens of Bradford (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 252), are all exempt from poor-rates.

The exemption extends to trusts and charities for the benefit of the public at large, though entirely unconnected with Government. Public hospitals are exempt. St. Luke's Hospital was held not rateable on the ground that there was no beneficial occupier—The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053), so was St. Bartholomew's Hospital (4 Burr. 2435). I conceive that the exemption of hospitals and other charities stands on the ground, not that they are charities, but that they are public charities, and that there is no beneficial occupier except the public; and so the Court of Queen's Bench held when they decided that Bethlehem Hospital was not rateable—The King v. Bethlehem Hospital (10 Q.B. Rep. 868; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89); so also they held in a recent case—The Queen v. Stapleton (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 17); and the Court of Common Pleas also in the case of Shepherd v. the Churchwardens of Bradford (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 252). Both Courts in these two cases draw a distinction between private and public charities, holding the first rateable and the last not rateable. "The premises," say the Court of Queen's Bench, in the first case, "are occupied for the purposes of a highly laudable charity, but one of a strictly private nature." The same distinction was taken by the Court of Queen's Bench in other cases, particularly The Queen v. the Licensed Victuallers' Society (1 Best & Sm. 76), and The Queen v. the Baptist Missionary Society (10 Q.B. Rep. 884; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 194).

On the same ground of dedication to public purposes repose also the exemption of churches and other places of religious worship. Even before the recent statute churches and chapels were exempt from rates, if no profit to individuals was actually made by letting the pews—The King v. Woodward (5 Term Rep. 79); The King v. Agar (14 East, 256). So that it is a mistake to suppose that the exemption of churches and chapels depends merely on the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 30. That statute, which applies to church-rates as well as poor-rates, and probably with an original and especial view to the former, extended the then existing exemption by exempting from rates all places dedicated exclusively to public religious worship, even when the pews are let, and profit is thus made of the building.

In The King v. the Mayor of London (4 Term Rep. 21), where the question arose whether certain trustees of a barge-way and toll-gate should be rated, Mr. Justice Grose says, that "to exempt themselves from the rate, the trustees should have shewn that they were trustees for the public." In The King v. Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430) the property was held not rateable, because all the money collected must be expended for what Lord Kenyon calls the public purposes of the act.

The history of the property now under your Lordship's consideration in many ways confirms the position that property occupied for public purposes is not rateable; from the earliest construction of the Liverpool Docks in the time of Queen Anne down to the year 1806, they had never been rated; but in 1806 an attempt was made to rate them. The Sessions quashed the rate, and the Court of King's Bench (whether by consent or otherwise does not appear) confirmed the order of Sessions. The attempt, however, was repeated about twenty years after, in 1827, and the case was then fully argued. The statutes were brought before the Court; those statutes directing then as now that certain burdens should be discharged, and that after their discharge, the tolls should be lowered. The Court of King's Bench held that there was no beneficial occupation in any person, and confirmed the order of Sessions, striking out the assessment—The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. Dowl. & Ry. 780).

At the same time The King v. the River Weaver Navigation (Ibid. 70) was argued and decided in the same manner. "The surplus tolls of the navigation," said Bayley, J., "remaining over and above the expenses of supporting the navigation, are to be applied to the building and maintaining of bridges and highways. These are public purposes, and as no part of the monies received can be applied to private purposes, those monies are not rateable in the hands of the trustees."

These cases were followed by The Queen v. the Corporation of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), in which the law was again held to be clear, that property dedicated to public purposes was not rateable; and the doctrine was applied to the property of the municipal corporation of Liverpool situate within the precincts of the borough of Liverpool, because the General Municipal Corporation Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 76, had directed that all the surplus funds of the borough should be appropriated for the public benefit of the inhabitants and the improvements of the borough. In the next year the Court of Queen's Bench decided, on the same grounds, that the property of a municipal corporation was not rateable though situate without the precincts of the borough—The Queen v. Exminster (12 Ad. & E. 2; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 108). In both these cases all the previous decisions were canvassed and confirmed; the foundation of the judgment in both cases being the acknowledged proposition that property dedicated to public purposes is not rateable. The only question was, whether the benefit of the inhabitants of a particular borough, they being but a section of the public, was a public or a private purpose, and in both cases it was held that the property of a municipal corporation was property dedicated to public purposes, and not rateable.

These decisions caused the statute 4 & 5 Vict. c. 48. to be passed, the language of which is not only very strong to shew that the legislature itself considered that property dedicated to public purposes was and is not rateable, but seems to me to create a statutable bar to holding that even property owned and occupied by municipal corporations is rateable in cases beyond the scope of the enacting clause. I forbear to comment minutely on the language of the statute because of the length to which the observations would extend, but almost every line is deserving the attentive consideration of your Lordships. Two observations, however, I must be pardoned for making: first, the statute is not a declaratory, but an enacting statute; secondly, so far from reflecting on the correctness of the then recent decisions, it adopts and affirms them in certain cases, at the end of the proviso to the 1st section. The statute there continues the exemption from poor-rate in cases where the area of the borough and the area covered by a single poor-rate are co-extensive, because in such a case there is no reason for interfering with the existing law. To put the case in the clearest light: suppose, what has actually happened in some boroughs, and may be the case in many, that the value of the corporate property renders a borough rate unnecessary; and suppose that there is an entire poor-rate for the borough, which is also not an uncommon case (either because the borough includes but a single parish, or because the management of the poor in the borough is consolidated by a local act); in such a case I conceive that the municipal property is still by the express words of the statute not only exempt, but exempt not because the statute so enacts, but because it had been exempted by law before the act passed, and the exemption is recognised and continued.

The language, therefore, of the statute 43 Eliz., the whole current of the authorities I have cited to your Lordships, and many others with which I refrain from fatiguing your Lordships, as well as the language of the recent statute, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 48, seem to me to shew that land occupied for public purposes is not rateable.

On the other side, great reliance was placed by the appellants on the case of The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1.). But that case seems to me reconcilable with the position that where the general public are the occupiers the property is not rateable, for in that case only a section of the public were the occupiers, that is to say, the representatives of the poor of a particular district. Indeed, this distinction between the former cases and the case of The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1.) is drawn by the Court of Queen's Bench itself in The Queen v. the Wallingford Union (10 Ad. & E. 259). To what extent the property rated is occupied for the public at large is and always must be a question of degree, where it is extremely difficult to draw the line, and where it is likely there will be conflicting decisions.

The conflict of the case of The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1.), if any, is with The Queen v. Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) and The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Exminster (12 Ad. & E. 2; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 108), where property was held not rateable. But even with respect to this apparent conflict it may be observed, that the occupation was in The Queen v. the Corporation of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) for the benefit of all the inhabitants of a district, and in the case of The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1) it was only for a portion of the inhabitants, that is to say, the poor of the district. And if your Lordships have to choose between these authorities, I have already called your Lordships' attention to the fact that The Queen v. Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) and The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Exminster (12 Ad. & E. 2; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 108) are recognized by the legislature as law, and are continued in some cases as the then existing law up to this moment by the authority of the statute.

The decision in The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1) was followed as to the Taunton Market in The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787), as to the Huddersfield Waterworks in The Queen v. Longwood (13 Q.B. Rep. 116; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 65), and as to the Harrogate Waterworks in The Queen v. the Harrogate Commissioners (15 Q.B. Rep. 1010; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 25).

These cases are all subject to the same observation as the case of The Bristol Poor v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1). The question was whether the occupation was for the public at large or for the partial benefit of a section of the public—see the observations of the Court of Queen's Bench in The Queen v. St. George the Martyr, Southwark (10 Q.B. Rep. 852; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 129).

The decision in The Overseers of Birkenhead v. the Trustees of the Birkenhead Docks (2 El. & B. 148) is really no authority on this point, because it proceeded entirely on the ground that there did not then appear to be, as now there is, a statutable obligation to reduce the tolls when their produce should exceed the expenses. It is quite true, however, that the Court, or at least the Lord Chief Justice, did indicate a wish to depart from the authorities as to the rateability of property dedicated to public purposes.

That case was followed by The Tyne Commissioners v. the Overseers of Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 131), which was decided by Lord Campbell and Mr. Justice Crompton, on the ground that the parties benefited were only a particular section of the public, viz., those who used the docks. But Mr. Justice Wightman seems to rest his judgment on the ground that it did not appear that there could not be a surplus revenue; and Mr. Justice Hill, though he assents to the conclusion, does not give his reasons, which, for anything that appears, may have been the same as those which influenced Mr. Justice Wightman.

I cannot help thinking that these recent authorities, when the precise point decided in each case, and the ground on which the judgment proceeded, are carefully examined, will be found as authorities not to be at variance with the position that an occupation clearly and entirely for the benefit of the whole public is not rateable. But, whatever weight may be attributable to some of them, or more properly to the expressions of some Judges, it seems to me very slight compared with the weight which ought to be attributed to the antiquity, number, and consistency of the authorities which shew that overseers cannot usurp the authority of Parliament in taxing the general public.

Then comes the next inquiry, is the property now under consideration occupied for the benefit of the public at large?

Primâ facie it should seem that it is so, for not only have all the Queen's subjects a right to use the docks at their free will and pleasure, paying their fair contribution to the expenses and nothing more, but all persons whatsoever, from what quarter of the globe soever they may come.

It is objected, first, that the use of the docks is not for all the public, but only for a section of the public, that is to say, for as many of them as have invested their capital in ships, or barges, or boats.

It might also be said that a navigable river cannot be a public highway, because it is only for those who have invested their capital in ships, or barges, or boats; or that a public turnpike-road, or, indeed, any public highway, is not a public carriageway or bridleway, because, when used as a carriageway or bridleway, it is only for those who possess or use carriages or horses.

It is objected, further, by the appellants, that the incumbrances on the docks have the effect of making them rateable. It is contended, as interest and a portion of the principal of the debt is annually paid to the bondholders out of the produce of the tolls, that, to this extent at least, there is a beneficial occupation by the board in trust for the bondholders; because it is said that if a tenant from year to year occupied the property and received the tolls without paying the instalments of the principal and the periodical interest of the debt, he would be willing to pay a rent, and that this theoretical rent is the criterion and measure of the rateable value of the occupation.

But I conceive that no tenant could be supposed to receive the tolls without paying the charges. The tolls are appropriated to the payment of the expenses, including charges of construction and repair, and never can by law exceed that limit. As soon as the tolls do exceed it, they are by law to be reduced. If the amount now paid every year to the bondholders had been actually incurred for construction and repair in that year, it is plain there could be no rent. But the payment made in each year is still but the cost of construction and repair proportioned to that year, and spread over several years and averaged. If the fact that the expenses have not been incurred within the year created a distinction, then a bricklayer's or mason's bill not paid within the year but charged on the next or following years would make the land in those years rateable. It can make no difference that the creditor is not the bricklayer or mason himself, but the assignee of the debt due to the bricklayer or mason.

It is quite true that when land is let to a tenant, the value of the occupation to the occupier is alone considered in estimating its rateable value, and charges on the reversion are not regarded and are not deducted. But the payments made out of the tolls in discharge of debts and interest in the case now before your Lordships are not charges on a supposed reversion; they represent what are in ordinary cases expenses annually incurred to enable the land to command the rent. They are like tithes, or tithe commutation rentcharge, which must be paid by occupier to prevent the tithe owner from entering; or like contributions to a sea wall to prevent the land from being overflowed; or like the annual or periodical expenses for repairs; all which are to be deducted in estimating the annual letting and rateable value of property (see 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103).

It may, indeed, be said that the expenses incurred in permanently improving land, e. g., in building a house on the land, are additions and not deductions from the rateable value, though the annual average repairs of that house when built are so. But when a private house is built, the disposable annual income derived from the land is increased, and therefore the rateable value of the land is augmented. But in the case before your Lordships the disposable annual income from the docks is not, and never can be, augmented; for the tolls always must be reduced to such a point as to leave no disposable income.

The objection of the appellants that these charges are to be treated like mortgages or charges on the reversion of ordinary property, and not to be regarded in estimating rateable value, seems inconsistent with itself, for the argument rather seems to shew that they are to be regarded, not, indeed, as a deduction, but as causing an addition to the value, and that the docks when incumbered with debt are rateable, and when free from incumbrance are not rateable.

Again, if these docks are rateable on the ground of the debts and interest owing by them and secured upon them, then it will follow that in the case of turnpike-roads which are involved in debt (at least in those cases where the soil is in the Commissioners, as sometimes happens), the road will be rateable to the poor, because, being involved in debt, the bondholders receive interest.

It is objected, lastly, by the appellant that there is no substantial distinction between docks made by a joint-stock company and the docks now under consideration.

But if there be no legislative limit imposed on the tolls, or on the profits of the joint-stock enterprise, then the two cases are widely and obviously different. For in the case of a joint-stock company the land used for the undertaking may produce profit to the company, and on that ground would be clearly rateable. And even if the limits of profit be fixed by the legislature by imposing a maximum of tolls, still, in the case of a commercial joint-stock company, whatever margin of profit is left to the shareholders over and above the ordinary rate of interest on floating capital, confers a rateable value on the land.

On this principle and to this extent it is that a railway or any other joint-stock company is rateable in respect of its occupation of land. You take the gross income and deduct expenses, including in the deductions not only interest on the floating capital, but even tenants' profits thereon; and what is left after these deductions is profit to the shareholders, and that profit constitutes the rateable value of the railway. No one ever heard of augmenting the rateable value of a railway or other property by the sum payable as principal or interest on its debentures. What the shareholders receive for their profit derived from the occupation of the land forms the theoretical rent, and therefore the rateable value of the land; not what the creditors receive for their debts or interest.

In the Liverpool Docks there are no shareholders, and no profit can ever be received by any one; all that can be done is to keep down interest and pay the debts, neither of which payments constitute profit to any one. Whatever proportion of the tolls is not wanted for this purpose must, as already observed, be immediately taken off.

However, in a case of this nature, probably authority rather than general reasoning ought to decide the question. I do not understand your Lordships to ask, and therefore it would be officious and presumptuous to express any opinion on the effect of the precedents cited, in binding your Lordships as the supreme tribunal. But I conceive that a Judge sitting either in one of the superior Courts of law, or even in the Exchequer Chamber, would consider himself concluded by authority in answering your Lordships' first question. And for confirmation I venture to refer your Lordships to Mr. Justice Crompton's language as to the effect of the decision in pronouncing his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber. He says, "with regard to the former decisions, I think that neither a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction nor a Court of error ought to interfere in such a case." And independently of the respect due by our system of law to precedent, a Judge would have to consider some of the consequences which must follow from adopting, at this late period, a new construction of the statute of Elizabeth.

If a dedication to public purposes be consistent with rateability, then, for the future, public hospitals, like St. Bartholomew's Hospital, St. George's Hospital, the London Hospital, St. Thomas's Hospital, and other establishments of the like nature in the metropolis and throughout the kingdom with a multitude of other public charities, become at once subject to poor-rates. Lunatic asylums like St. Luke's or Bethlehem in the metropolis, and county lunatic asylums, also become assessable at their letting value; though in many instances the exemption of such institutions is recognized by acts of parliament, providing that land taken for the purpose shall retain its rateability to the extent of the value of the land without the building upon it. Churches and chapels (but for the rent statute), would, even where the pews are not let, have become rateable; for property is to be rated, not at what a tenant does give, but at what he would give for it in its actual condition (6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96). County gaols, county reformatories, county courts and courts of justice, not only in counties and cities, but in the metropolis also (not, indeed, in Westminster Hall, because that is one of the Queen's palaces), may become rateable. The property of the Crown in the occupation of the Crown, will, no doubt, still be protected from rateability; but old questions, now at rest, will re-appear as to other buildings occupied for public purposes, like the Horse Guards, the Admiralty, many buildings and residences at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, Milford Haven, and Greenwich, the British Museum, the National Gallery, Greenwich Hospital, the Custom House, the General Post Office, burial grounds, many of the apartments in Somerset House, the premises occupied by the Poor Law Commissioners and other public bodies, public bridges, public turnpike-roads, and the soil of many navigable rivers, if not of public highways themselves. In many of these instances money has been expended and money borrowed on the faith of precedent, the law having been considered as settled by its authorized expounders for so many years.

In the case now before your Lordships, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Hill, in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, new docks have been constructed, and large sums of money borrowed on the faith of the decisions in this and other cases.

If the fact that the indebtedness of the Board and the application of their revenues to the payment of principal and interest makes them liable to be rated, then, as I have already said, I think the principles on which the railways and other joint-stock enterprises throughout the kingdom have hitherto been rated will be unsettled.

In answer to your Lordships' second question, if at the time of the passing of the acts enumerated in the question it had been clear, on authority and principle, that the Liverpool Docks were rateable, then, I think, the words contained in the sections referred to would not have exempted them from rateability.

But that is almost an impossible supposition; for had that been so, such enactments could never have found their way into a succession of statutes. I conceive that these enactments are to be read, like every other written instrument, with reference to the existing and surrounding facts. Those facts are, that from the time of the first establishment of the docks in the reign of Queen Anne they had never been rated, except on two occasions, on both of which occasions they had been pronounced exempt from rates by the Court of Queen's Bench. Those two decisions had been acquiesced in, and acted on for fifty years since the first, and thirty years since the last decision. No one can doubt, I think, that the successive penmen who drew the acts, and all the parties to them, the Board, the Corporation, and the several parishes, took it to be clear, first, that an occupation not beneficial was not rateable, and secondly, that the docks (as distinguished from the warehouses) were not rateable on that ground. The opinion of the draughtsman of itself goes for little or nothing; but that opinion (in the presence of parties interested to dispute it) passed unchallenged five times through both Houses of Parliament. I think that circumstance amounts to a recognition by Parliament of the law, that a beneficial occupation is necessary to rateability, and that the occupation of these docks by the Mersey Board is not beneficial. It will, moreover, be observed that these acts are not mere private acts, but public acts, and not merely public in a technical sense, but upon a matter affecting the general public.

I think, further, that the enactments disclose evidence of a bargain to which was needed and obtained the sanction of Parliament between, first, the lenders of money; secondly, the Board and their predecessors in estate; thirdly, the parochial authorities of Liverpool; and fourthly, the general public; the effect of which bargain is that a certain portion of the property is to be rateable, and the residue not rateable. And that opinion seems to have been entertained by the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

I may add, in conclusion, that the Court of Queen's Bench twice, and the last time after argument before four of the most eminent Judges who ever presided in that Court, had held these docks not rateable. And at this moment there stand the unanimous decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench in 1827; the unanimous decision of the Court of Common Pleas in 1862; and the unanimous decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in error from the Common Pleas, to the same effect.

In answer to your Lordships' third question, I am of opinion that the act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 162, ss. 26, 27, does not impose on the board any liability to poor-rates, which, but for those clauses, would not exist.

The words should seem, primâ facie to regard charges or liabilities upon the land, such as debts, and perhaps easements. It was stated at your Lordships' bar that there are from twenty to twenty-four charges on the land, properly so called, and independent of poor-rates, to which the words in that sense would be applicable. But the poor-rate, which, as I have already reminded your Lordships, originally affected personal property in the same way as real property, has repeatedly been held to be no charge on the land at all, but only on the person who occupies, in respect of the profits of his occupation—Case v. Stevens (Fitzgibbon, 298); Theed v. Starke (8 Mod. 213); Stonehouse Bridge (8 Mod. 356), Earl of Bute v. Grindall (2 H. Black. 265), Rowls v. Gells (Cowp. 453).

Moreover, the poor-rate is a personal charge which exists or does not exist, according to the character of the occupier, as he is or is not a person liable to be rated. Suppose these general words in a grant to the Crown, or in a deed conveying land to trustees of a court of justice, or of a church, it is plain that they would not impose on the grantee a liability to poor-rate if he were exempt from rates. Or suppose them to exist in a statutable conveyance to the Crown, to which the Crown is a party, e. g., for fortifications; or in a statutable conveyance to any other clearly exempted occupier, I conceive that the words would not impose poor-rates on occupiers not otherwise liable to pay.

Again, the act of the following year, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90. s. 3, while incorporating the General Lands Clauses Act, excepts section 133. of that general act, which excepted section provides for the preservation of the liability to poor-rates and land-tax in certain cases. But section 5. of the local act preserves the land-tax, but is silent as to the poor-rate; shewing, as I conceive, that the legislature intended to preserve the land-tax, but not the poor-rate.

Lastly, the act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 162. is an act for consolidating the docks at Liverpool and Birkenhead into one estate, and vesting the control of them in one public trust; and it would be singular if one portion of the property should be rateable, and one not rateable, under precisely similar circumstances. And this observation is strengthened by remembering that where such a distinction exists (as in the case of the warehouses), it is created by express words.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the questions raised in this appeal depend in a great measure on the inquiry—What is the occupation of real property which is liable to be rated under the 1st section of the act of the 43 Eliz. c. 2?

Independently of the decided cases, several of which are irreconcilable with each other, it would seem to be easy to answer this inquiry; and, having regard to the Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96), it may be said, in answer, that, "Occupation to be rateable must be of property yielding, or capable of yielding, a net annual value, that is to say, a clear rent over and above the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the property in a state to command such rent." It is in this sense that I understand the words "beneficial occupation" wherever it is said that to support a rate the occupation must be a beneficial one. For, on principle, it is by no means necessary that the occupation should be beneficial to the occupier. It is sufficient if the property be capable of yielding a clear rent over and above the necessary outgoings.

The only occupier exempt from the operation of the act is the King, because he is not named in the statute; and the direct and immediate servants of the Crown, whose occupation is the occupation of the Crown itself, also come within the exemption. But this ground of exemption does not warrant many decisions which have held that property used for public purposes is not rateable. So, also trustees, who are in law the tenants and occupiers of valuable property upon trust for charitable purposes, such as hospitals or lunatic asylums, are, in principle, rateable, notwithstanding that the buildings are actually occupied by paupers, who are sick or insane.

If the matter were res integra, I could not concur in the decision of Lord Mansfield, in the case of St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053), in which he is reported to have said, that mere trustees cannot be esteemed occupiers, or rated as lessees, or with his conclusion in the case of The King v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital (4 Burr. 2435). But, with a slight verbal alteration, I entirely agree with the remark of the learned Judges in the present case, that if Lord Mansfield meant that the persons in the legal occupation of valuable property are not rateable, if they occupy in a merely fiduciary character, it is a position which cannot be maintained.

To these observations and decisions of Lord Mansfield, that which appears to me to be the erroneous doctrine of several subsequent decisions is to be attributed. This is plain on an examination of Lord Kenyon's judgment in the subsequent case of The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430). Lord Kenyon refers to the decision in the case of St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053), and adopts the position that trustees, who have a bare naked trust, not coupled with any interest, are not liable to be rated; and he uses language which, with the decisions of Lord Mansfield, has introduced the notion, that if valuable property be in the possession of trustees, who are bound to apply the whole of the proceeds to public but not Government purposes, that is, in works or purposes for the better accommodation or use of the public, they are not liable to be rated.

There is nothing in the act of Elizabeth, or in the reason of the thing, to warrant this conclusion. No exemption is thereby given to charity or to public purposes, beyond that which is strictly involved in the position that the Crown is not bound by the act. And it is a remarkable fact, that whenever these opinions of Lord Mansfield and Lord Kenyon have not been presented to the Court of Queen's Bench, the Judges have adopted the correct view of the statute. Thus, in The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), decided in the year 1823, and in the case of The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), decided in 1827, the Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 430) was cited and relied on; and the Court of Queen's Bench adopted the language of Lord Kenyon and followed his decision. But in the case of The Governors of the Bristol Poor v. Waite (2 El. & B. 148), decided in 1836, the Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 430) does not appear to have been referred to; and the Court recurred to the correct view of the statute of Elizabeth, and held that the governors of the Bristol poor, who had taken some buildings and land on lease for the occupation of their poor, although they were bare trustees, and held for a public purpose only, were such occupiers of property as to be liable to be rated to the poor. This case, in its turn, has been followed in other decisions as an authority; and it might have been supposed that the authority of the Salter's Load Sluice case

(4 Term Rep. 430) and its two satellites, The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), had come to an end. But in the year 1839, the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of The Queen v. the Corporation of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), returned to its old allegiance; and again set up the authority of The King v. Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70). This last case of The Queen v. the Corporation of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) was decided on the principle that since the Municipal Corporation Act the property of a municipal corporation is held upon trust for the purposes of the borough fund; and, therefore, that the corporation of Liverpool were bare trustees of the property in question for public purposes. The mischief of this decision was remedied by the act of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 48; but, unfortunately, that act did not declare the law.

Some subsequent decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench have been marked with much timidity. They have, in effect, departed from the grounds of the decisions in the Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 430) and its attendant cases; but have, at the same time, attempted, by very questionable distinctions, to save whole the authority of those cases. Thus, in the cases of The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787) and The Queen v. the Overseers of Longwood (13 Q.B. Rep. 116; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 65) there is an attempt to distinguish between the interest of the unlimited public and the interest of the public limited by the bounds of a county, borough, or parish.

At last, in the case of The Tyne Commissioners v. Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131), the Court of Queen's Bench recurred to that which is, in my opinion, the true principle, namely, that the only ground of exemption from the statute of Elizabeth is that which is furnished by the rule, that the Sovereign is not bound by that statute; and that consequently, when valuable property (that is, property capable of yielding a net rent above what is required for its maintenance,) is sought to be exempted on the ground that it is occupied by bare trustees for public purposes, the public purposes must be such as are required and created by the Government of the country, and are therefore to be deemed part of the use and service of the Crown.

If this be the true criterion of exemption from rateability where the property is valuable, it is clear that the Mersey Docks are liable to be rated.

In this country, many works tending greatly to the convenience and benefit of the public, and in that sense public works, are the result and creation of private enterprise, being made or performed by money subscribed by the public, on the terms, or in the hope of receiving such interest out of the proceeds of the works as will, in the judgment of the subscribers, make the investment a profitable one. Such is the condition of the Mersey Docks, which are in truth property used and occupied for the profit and benefit of a number of persons; and it is the same thing in substance as if the docks had been demised by the subscribers to the trustees on the terms of maintaining the docks and paying to the subscribers a rent equivalent to the interest on their bonds.

I am therefore clearly of the same opinion, with the majority of the learned Judges, that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are occupiers of the docks and harbour within the true meaning of the word "occupier" in the act of Elizabeth.

The answer to the second question put to the learned Judges is, in effect, a mere consequence of the answer to the first question; for it cannot be pretended that the statute of Elizabeth has been repealed, either expressly or impliedly, by any of the statutes which apply to the Liverpool Docks, or that the liability of the trustees as occupiers, which is the result of the true interpretation of the act of Elizabeth, has been discharged or altered by anything contained in the local statutes. On this head it is unnecessary to say more than that I concur with the observations of the majority of the learned Judges in their elaborate opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn.

The result is, that I humbly move your Lordships to reverse the order of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of Jones v. the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, but to affirm it in the case of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, I concur with my noble and learned friends in thinking that judgment ought to be given for the plaintiffs in error.

I have given full attention to the opinions of the learned Judges who assisted us at the hearing; and concurring as I do, in that delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, on behalf of himself and four of the other five Judges, I do not feel it necessary to go into the question at length. That very able opinion seems to me to exhaust the subject.

By the statute of Elizabeth, the overseers are directed to raise the money necessary for the relief of impotent poor by taxation of (inter alios) every occupier of lands in the parish.

That the defendants in error are occupiers of lands in the parish of Liverpool cannot be doubted, and so, unless there be something to exempt them, they are rateable.

The argument on their behalf has been, that though they are occupiers, their occupation is not a beneficial occupation; and the statute, it was contended, contemplated only such an occupation as is beneficial to the occupier, or to some person or persons for whose behoof the occupier is occupying.

If by beneficial occupation is meant any occupation of something valuable, something in its own nature beneficial to some one, I think it is fair to consider that word as impliedly included in the statute. It was not meant to impose the duty of contributing to the relief of the poor on any one merely because he might be the occupier of a barren rock, neither yielding nor capable of yielding any profit from its occupation.

But I can discover nothing, either in the words or in the spirit of the act, exempting from liability the occupier of valuable property, merely because the profits of the occupation are not to be enjoyed by him, or by any one on whose behalf he is occupying, but are to be devoted to the benefit of the public.

In the opinion of the five Judges, delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn, that learned Judge has traced with great care and accuracy the progress of the decisions on this subject; and I should be merely wasting the time of the House if I were to proceed to go over again what has been so well done by him. The Court seems to me to have fallen into error in the time of Lord Kenyon, if not in that of Lord Mansfield, in proceedings which unfortunately were incapable of being questioned in a court of error. The decisions so made were followed in similar proceedings in the time of Lord Ellenborough and Lord Tenterden. The doctrine on which they rested was shaken in some cases which occurred when Lord Denman was Chief Justice, and eventually were in substance overruled when Lord Campbell presided in the Court of Queen's Bench.

In these circumstances, thinking, as I do, that there is nothing in the statute of Elizabeth expressly or impliedly exempting from rateability the occupier of valuable property merely because the benefit of the occupation is to go to the public, I think your Lordships ought not to consider yourselves fettered by any decisions of the Courts below, but that you ought to lay down the law as you think it ought to have been laid down if this question had arisen before any of those decisions had been pronounced. I therefore concur in the motion of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

To avoid all misconception, I wish to add, that there are certain cases to which the observations I have made do not apply. The Crown not being named is not bound by the act. It follows, therefore, that lands or houses occupied by the Crown, or by servants of the Crown, or for the purposes of the Crown, are not liable to be rated; and I conceive that it is from a confusion between property occupied for public purposes and property occupied by servants of the Crown that this mistake has arisen. This principle exempts from rates, not only royal palaces, but also the offices of the Secretaries of State, the Horse Guards, the Post Office, and many similar buildings. On the same ground, police courts, county courts, and even county buildings occupied as lodgings at the assizes for the Judges, have been held exempt. These decisions, however, have all gone on the ground, more or less sound, that these might all be treated as buildings occupied by servants of the Crown and for the Crown, extending in some instances the shield of the Crown to what might fitly be described as the public government of the country. In none of these cases was exemption conceded on the ground contended for in the present case. And I cannot but think that the error which has crept into the decisions has arisen from confusing cases like the present with those in which the interests of the Crown or its servants were concerned.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, it is impossible in entering upon the consideration of these appeals to refrain from an expression of surprise that there should arise at the present day, after more than two centuries and a half from the time of the passing of the act, a necessity for interpreting any part of the 43 Eliz. c. 2; and yet, from the numerous cases which have been cited in the argument at your Lordships' bar, it is evident that the exact meaning of the important word "occupier" in the rating clause of that act must be regarded as hitherto an unsettled question.

Those who have established the liability of the docks to be rated to the poor-rate have, with respect to the Liverpool Docks, to contend against the authority of a decision, probably in 1808, but certainly in 1827, upon the very subject in question in one of these appeals. The latter decision was expressly founded upon a case determined more than thirty years before, and which has since been regarded and acted upon as an unquestionable authority. Under these circumstances, the counsel for the parishes might expect that the House would feel the same reluctance to disturb these decisions as was expressed by Lord Chief Justice Tindal in Crease v. Sawle (2 Q.B. Rep. 862), and would say with him, "It would be extremely inconvenient, and indeed mischievous, to overrule a class of cases which have been much discussed and sanctioned by many eminent Judges, and which are now constantly acted upon, because we might not feel perfectly satisfied with the reasons assigned for their decision. If we could permit ourselves to disregard these authorities on that account, we might feel disposed on that ground to reject others which have put a construction on the 43 Eliz. c. 2. which we were by no means sure it ought to bear if we were now for the first time called upon to explain the meaning of its language."

Mr. Justice Crompton, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Jones (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 239), said, "With reference to the former decisions, I think that neither a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction nor a Court of error ought to interfere in such a case. If there is any hardship, it must be left to the legislature." By this last observation the learned Judge seems to have considered that this House, as well as the Courts of original and appellate jurisdiction, ought to yield implicitly to the authority of long-established decisions. But the same reasons for acquiescence do not apply to the different tribunals. The Courts rightly abstain from overruling cases which have been long established, because, if they did so, they would only disturb without finally settling the law. But when an appeal from any of their judgments is made to this House, however they may be warranted by previous authorities, the very object of the appeal being to bring those authorities under review for final determination, the House cannot, upon the principle of stare decisis, refuse to examine the foundation upon which they rest. This would, in my opinion, have been the duty of your Lordships, even if the current of the decisions had been uniform; but as various cases have been decided which, with all the endeavours to reconcile them, must still be regarded as conflicting and contradictory, it is absolutely necessary to determine what for the future shall be considered to be the law with reference to rating docks, and works of a similar character.

The 43 Eliz. c. 2. enacts, "That the overseers are to raise by taxation of every inhabitant, &c., and of every occupier of lands, houses, &c., in such competent sums as they shall think fit, according to the ability of the parish," the requisite fund for the purposes of the act.

The words, "to rate in such sum as they shall think fit," do not mean—as Lord Chief Justice Tindal says, in Marshal v. Pitman (9 Bing. 601)—that they are to have a power to rate arbitrarily, but "to rate the occupier according to the value of his occupation, the inhabitant according to his visible personal property." Or, as was said in Early's case (2 Bulst. 54), the overseers are to make their taxations and assessments well and truly, and in an equal manner, according to the visible estates, real and personal, of the inhabitants within their town.

Primâ facie, therefore, a liability to the rate would seem to attach upon every occupation from which benefit is derived; and no occupier can claim an exemption unless he can find it in the act itself, or it arises from some principle of law applicable to all cases.

With respect to exemption arising from the act itself, it is obvious that as the occupier is to be assessed according to his ability, if he derives no benefit of any kind from his occupation, he has no ability in respect of it, and consequently cannot be rateable. The other exemption, which does not arise from the act itself, but which is founded on a general principle of law, applies only to the Crown, which, not being named in the act, is not bound by it.

I am unable to find any grounds of exemption from liability to the poor-rate, either in the act itself, or in any principle of law apart from the act, except the two which I have mentioned; and there is nothing to indicate the intention of the legislature that lands and houses occupied for what in some of the cases is rather loosely called "public purposes," as contradistinguished from private benefit, should not be liable to the rate.

Lord Campbell, in the case of The Birkenhead Dock Trustees v. the Birkenhead Overseers (2 El. & B. 148), says, that the exemption on the ground of public purposes takes its origin from the marginal note to the report of the case of The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430). If this is so, it is a remarkable fact, that in following that case as an authority, the Courts should have been misled by confining their attention to the marginal abstract, which certainly conveys a very imperfect if not an inaccurate idea of the grounds of the decision. The term "public purposes" is only employed by Lord Kenyon in the Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 430) incidentally. The reason given for the judgment, is the absence of beneficial occupation. His Lordship says, "The Commissioners have a bare naked trust, not coupled with any interest." And again, "Upon the ground upon which the Court proceeded in The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053) there was no occupier," by which he must have meant no beneficial occupier, for he adds, "The Commissioners were mere trustees to superintend the execution of the act, without any personal advantage." This reference to the case of St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053) shews that the leading idea in the mind of the Court was the want of a beneficial occupier, although there does not seem to be a very close analogy between the case of an hospital supported by voluntary subscriptions, from which no person who could be regarded as an occupier derived any pecuniary benefit, and the receipt of tolls as a compulsory incident to the occupation by the Commissioners of the Salter's Load Sluice.

The first case in which an occupation for "public purposes" was expressly stated as the ground of exemption from liability to poor-rate is The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), to which the principle of the decision in the case of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7

B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) (the judgment brought into question by this appeal) was held to be applicable.

In the case of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) Lord Tenterden proceeded on the ground of there being no beneficial occupation, with respect to which he said the case of The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430) is decisive. But in The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70) Mr. Justice Bayley said, "The surplus tolls remaining over and above the expenses of supporting the navigation were to be applied to the repairing and maintaining of bridges and highways. Those were public purposes, and as no part of the monies received could be applied to private purposes, these monies were not rateable in the hands of the trustees."

In The King v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), the Court followed the cases of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), without expressing any opinion as to the grounds of these decisions, observing, "That they felt it to be impossible substantially to distinguish the case before them from these cases, and especially from the latter, and that if they found the principle settled by decisions already made, they felt it to be their duty to act upon them, and not upon the apprehension of any inconvenient or unforeseen consequences to question or weaken their authority."

In the case of The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Exminster (12 Ad. & E. 2; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 108) the Court adhered to their decision in The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), without any further explanation of the grounds of their judgment.

But in a more recent case, The Queen v. St. George's, Southwark (10 Q.B. Rep. 852; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 129), Lord Denman said, "Whether a person is rated as occupier, holder or possessor of the premises, or as using them, the occupation, holding, possessing or using them must be beneficial to the parties so rated. It has been settled, by several cases, that the possessors or occupiers, as trustees of property otherwise rateable, the profits of which they were bound by act of parliament to apply to public or charitable purposes, were not rateable to the poor in respect of such property." Now, although Lord Denman, in the case of The Queen v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435), seems to hint at some distinction between the cases of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) and The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), yet it would appear (especially from his last-mentioned observations) that he considered them to rest upon the same foundation, and that the counsel on both sides at your Lordships' bar were correct in saying that there was no case decided upon the ground of public purposes which was not resolvable into beneficial occupation. But if this is so, it will be impossible to accept the explanation by which decisions apparently inconsistent with the judgment in The King v. Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430) and the cases which followed it have been attempted to be reconciled with them.

To these cases it is necessary now to turn. The first of them which broke in upon the series of decisions hitherto considered is the case of The Governors of the Poor of Bristol v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1). In deciding this case as they did, the Judges were probably not aware that they were disregarding the authority of previous decisions, as the Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 430) and the other cases founded upon it are not noticed in the argument or in the judgment. But in The Queen v. the Guardians of the Wallingford Union (10 Ad. & E. 259), where those cases were cited, the Court followed the case of The Governors of the Poor of Bristol v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), without any attempt to reconcile it with what had been previously decided.

In the case of The Queen v. Badcock (6 Q.B. Rep. 787), however, Lord Denman, in giving judgment, reviewed the authorities which appeared to be conflicting, on the one side the series which followed The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), and on the other that which commenced with The Governors of the Poor of Bristol v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), and observed that in all the first class the public, as such, unlimited by the bounds of county, borough or parish, had a substantial and direct interest in the benefit which the application of the funds produced; in the latter the ratepayers, or at most the inhabitants of certain parishes, were alone concerned in the benefit, direct or indirect. This distinction was afterwards approved of and adopted by Mr. Justice Coleridge in the case of The Queen v. the Commissioners of Harrogate (15 Q.B. Rep. 1010; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 25).

The attempts thus to reconcile the discordant decisions will be regarded as having been completely unsuccessful, when it appears that in the first class, instead of all the cases being instances in which the public at large, "unlimited by the bounds of county, borough, or parish," had an interest, there are found the cases of The King v. the Trustees of the River Weaver Navigation (7 B. & C. 70), in which the surplus funds were applied for the general purposes of the county of Chester, and of The King v. the Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (9 Ad. & E. 435) and The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Exminster (12 Ad. & E. 2; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 108), in which the public beyond the bounds of the borough had no interest in the benefit produced by the application of the funds. And the distinction fails altogether if the term "public purposes," as distinguished from "private purposes," is to be resolved into the question of beneficial occupation, because it would then appear to be immaterial whether the public purposes, which exclude the idea of private benefit, were of a local or of a general character.

The desire of the Court, however, not to be bound by the former decisions, and yet not to be compelled expressly to overrule them, is exhibited in a very striking manner in the case of The Queen v. the Harrogate Commissioners (15 Q.B. Rep. 1010; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 25), where it was held, that in order to exempt property from liability to poor-rate on the ground of its occupation for public purposes, the benefit must be exclusively public, and that if the occupation was in some degree beneficial to the whole public, yielding additional benefit also to a limited district or community, the property was rateable; as if it could make any difference in point of principle when the occupation is for public purposes, that one portion of the public derives a greater benefit from the application of the funds produced than the rest.

After these fruitless endeavours to reconcile the decisions, a case arose in which it seemed absolutely necessary to determine whether The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), and the cases which followed it, were to be submitted to as authorities for the future, or were to be set aside and disregarded. In the case of the trustees of The Birkenhead Docks v. the Overseers of Birkenhead (2 El. & B. 148), the question to be decided was, whether the Commissioners of the Birkenhead Docks were liable in respect of their occupation to be rated to the poor-rate. It certainly requires some ingenuity to discover any difference between the Birkenhead Docks and the Liverpool Docks, the latter of which had been decided in the case of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) not to be rateable. But Lord Campbell held, that the cases were distinguishable. He said that "the decision in The King v. the Commissioners of Salter's Load Sluice (4 Term Rep. 430) could be rested only on the clause in the local act, which directed the tolls to be applied and disposed of for the several uses and purposes of the said act, and to no other use and purpose whatsoever." The question was, whether "this amounted to a prohibition to apply the tolls to the payment of the poor-rate, and adopting this construction he added, "we think that the decision in the Liverpool case (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780) can only be supported by similar reasoning."

It is clear, however, that the cases in question were not decided on any such ground, and it could have been assumed by Lord Campbell only from his desire to escape from the necessity of submitting to them, by suggesting a distinction without denying their authority. That distinction was, that in the Birkenhead case (2 El. & B. 148) the obligation to lower the tolls, which was much relied upon in the Liverpool case (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780), was entirely wanting. It might have been supposed that the decision of the Birkenhead case (2 El. & B. 148) having proceeded upon this ground, when the subsequent case of The Tyne Improvement Commissioners v. the Overseers of Chirton (1 El. & El. 516; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 131) was brought before Lord Campbell and the Court of Queen's Bench, in which case the local acts for making a dock, expressly required the Commissioners, "in the event of any surplus remaining after the appropriation of the rates to the purposes of the act, to lower the rates to the extent of such surplus," he would have adhered to the distinction, and have held the case to be governed by the authority of The King v. the Inhabitants of Liverpool (7 B. & C. 61; s. c. 9 Dowl. & Ry. 780). But instead of taking this course, he said that "to hold the dock exempt from rateability they should have to overrule The Birkenhead Dock Trustees v. the Birkenhead Overseers (2 El. & B. 148), and that the only distinction between the cases was that in the Birkenhead case (2 El. & B. 148), the Commissioners had power to raise the rates again after having reduced them."

In this unsatisfactory state of the authorities it is evident that the two classes of decisions which have been subjected to this examination cannot stand together, and that it is necessary for your Lordships to determine which of them is agreeable to law. It must not be overlooked that in favour of the exemption of the docks from liability to poor-rate there is the recital in the act of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 48, which strongly indicates the opinion of the legislature that the cases which had held the property of municipal corporations not to be liable to poor-rate, had been rightly decided. But, as Lord Campbell said in The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Houghton (1 El. & B. 510; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89), "a mere recital in an act of parliament, either of fact or of law, is not conclusive, and we are at liberty to consider the fact or the law to be different from the statement in the recital." The question of course depends upon the true meaning of the word "occupier" in the 43 Eliz. c. 2. The words of the act are as general as possible: "every occupier according to his ability." And Lord Denman, in the case of The Governors of the Poor of Bristol v. Waite (5 Ad. & E. 1), seems to give a correct description of the effect of those words, when, after adverting to the meaning of the term "beneficial occupation," he says, "Without affecting the precision of an exact definition, it would probably be nearer the truth to say, that a presumptive liability arising from occupation is to be explained away in each case." It is impossible not to agree with the observations made by his Lordship in the case of The Queen v. Sterry (12 Ad. & E. 84; s. c. 4 P. & D. 122), that "no one can review the numerous decisions" (which cases somewhat like the one then before him had occasioned) "without regretting that the Court was ever induced to depart from the simple test, which the subject-matter of occupation would in every case have afforded. Whether the occupation was in respect of private or public or charitable purposes, it would have been wiser to have disregarded, and whenever the subject-matter was found productive to any one, to have rated the actual occupant in respect of that produce." I cannot help thinking that the test here suggested was the one intended by the legislature. By the act, the taxation is to be on every occupier "according to the liability of the parish." The productive occupation of the several occupiers within the parish make up its aggregate ability. If an occupier derives no benefit of any description from his occupation, it forms no part of the general ability of the parish, but if it is productive (although not profitable) there is nothing in the act which requires the overseers to follow the produce in its subsequent application. The receipt of it constitutes the visible ability of the occupier. As was said, by Lord Tenterden, in The King v. the Inhabitants of St. Giles's, York (3 B. & Ad. 579), "If any profit be made, the application of it when made is immaterial as to the question of 'rateability.' This seems to be the true distinction which ought to have guided the decisions, and not that between private benefit and public purposes, from the adoption of which all the contrariety in the cases on the subject of beneficial occupation has arisen.

It is to be observed, that the term "beneficial occupation" is nowhere to be found in the act of Elizabeth, and it must have been used in the different cases as synonymous with "ability." In this sense the decisions with regard to St. Luke's and St. Bartholomew's Hospitals, and to chapels and rectory-houses where no pew-rents are received, are perfectly intelligible. In none of them could any person in the character of occupier be said to derive any benefit from the occupation. But that the absence of private benefit is no ground of exemption appears from the cases in which trustees of chapels who received profit from letting the pews, although they applied it entirely to the purposes of the chapel, were held rateable; and in the recent case of The Queen v. Sterry (1 El. & B. 510; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89) the trustees of a school, purchased from funds raised by charitable subscriptions and bequests, were held rateable in respect of the school, because no child was admitted to the school without an annual payment of 12*l.*, although the average annual expense with respect to each child was 20*l.*

The Salter's Load Sluice case (4 Term Rep. 480) gave the key-note to all the subsequent decisions, which held that the prima facie liability of an occupier no longer existed when it was shewn that the profits connected with his occupation were applicable to public purposes. Lord Kenyon, in founding his judgment upon The King v. St. Luke's Hospital (2 Burr. 1053) must have intended to decide that in the case before him there was no beneficial occupier, although he did not advert to the distinction that in the case of St. Luke's (2 Burr. 1053) there was nothing received by any one by reason of the occupation, while the Commissioners of the Salter's Load Sluice were empowered to take tolls for the navigation which was vested in them.

The exemption of an occupier, whose occupation is applicable to public purposes, was thus almost incidentally introduced; and, having been so, it was accepted, without much consideration, in the subsequent cases. At last, some decisions having taken place which were hard to be reconciled with each other, it became necessary to define with some precision the true principles which ought to govern cases of this description. The distinction was then proposed between general and local public purposes. The difficulty, not to say the impossibility, of reconciling the cases by a distinction of this sort, has been already shewn. If, as before observed, the ability of the occupier means the personal benefit derived from his occupation, it is as much excluded where the profits of his occupation are applicable to limited public purposes as where they are to be applied to the benefit of the public at large.

I am of opinion that, under the words of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. every occupier of a tenement yielding profit is within the rating clause of the statute, although the tenement be a public work for the general good of the realm, and the profit be directed to be applied exclusively to its maintenance.

Having thus expressed my opinion that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are liable to be rated for the Liverpool as well as for the Birkenhead Docks, it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the different acts of parliament, by which the trustees were expressly made liable to parochial rates "in respect of warehouses to be built in like manner as the same are or would be payable in respect of warehouses the occupancy of which is beneficial." The provisions of these acts certainly appear to indicate the opinion of the legislature that without them the warehouses would have been exempt from liability to poor-rate as part of the docks enjoying that exemption. But if this liability existed before, the acts cannot have the effect of taking it away (not by express enactment, but) by mere implication.

It is quite true, as Mr. Justice Byles has said, that the act of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. clxii. having consolidated the docks at Liverpool into one estate, and vested the control of them in one public trust, it would be singular if one portion of the property should be rateable and one not rateable under precisely similar circumstances. This undoubtedly would be the result if the decisions of the two cases appealed against were to stand; and the remark exhibits in a striking manner the impossibility of reconciling the decisions which, on the one hand, have exempted the Liverpool Docks from liability to poor-rate, and on the other have rendered the Birkenhead Docks liable to it.

By reversing the judgment in the case of the Liverpool Docks, and by affirming the judgment in that of the Birkenhead Docks, the decisions will at last be brought into uniformity, and the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2. will, in my opinion, receive its proper construction, and have its consistent effect and operation.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—My lords, I concur with my noble and learned friends in the opinions they have expressed.

The order of the Court of Exchequer reversed in the case of Jones v. the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and affirmed in the case of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

Nov. 17, 1865.

WIGAN, appellant, v. STRANGE, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 31; L. R. 1 C.P. 175; 13 L. T. 371; 14 W. R. 103;
12 Jur. N.S. 9.

Stage-Play—Music and Dancing—Licence—25 Geo. 2. c. 36.—6 & 7 Vict. c. 68.

THEATRE.—The respondent was the proprietor of a house of public resort, licensed for music and dancing under 25 Geo. 2. c. 36, and afforded therein to the public an entertainment of the following nature: there were an orchestra, stage and scenery, as in a theatre; a body of female dancers descended from rocks on to the stage, and danced with daggers in mimic warfare; this dance ended by some standing over others as if in triumph, and retiring on the approach of another set of female dancers with palm-leaves; the dancers then formed an avenue to receive another dancer, who danced a pas seul; and the whole concluded by a grouping of all the dancers with palm-leaves and other stage properties:—Held, that whether or not this was a stage-play requiring a licence under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. was a question of fact and not of law.

Held, also, by the majority of the Court, that if they had been obliged to decide the question of fact, they should have concluded that this was such a stage-play.

This was a case stated by one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates. under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the Court.

CASE.

This was a summons under the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. ss. 2. and 23 (Theatre Act), on a complaint by Horace Wigan against Frederick Strange, that he the said Frederick Strange, on the 20th of May, 1865, at a certain house and place of public resort, called the Royal Alhambra Palace, Leicester Square, in the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in the county of Middlesex, did unlawfully have and keep the said house and place of public resort for the public performance of stage-plays, without authority by virtue of letters patent from Her Majesty or any of her predecessors, and without licence from the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's household for the time being.

On the hearing, at the Police Court, Great Marlborough Street, on the 2nd of June, 1865, the following facts were proved.—

The Alhambra has an extensive and lofty interior, to which in evenings the public is admitted on payment at the doors. It is a place of public resort not licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, but is licensed for music and dancing by the county Justices, under the 25 Geo. 2. c. 36. What would be the pit in an acknowledged theatre is there a large space occupied by tables, at which refreshments are served. In the place where boxes are in an acknowledged theatre are places resembling private boxes and balconies, with a reserved part like stalls, all which are for the use of spectators. There is an orchestra with a full band of musical performers, a stage and proscenium, lighted by foot and side lights, a curtain called a tableau curtain, wings and grooves for scenes to stand in, lowered from above and fixed below. There are side-scenes composed of many pieces, with drops and flies. There are various platforms, so supported and inclined as to enable persons to come down from a considerable height at the back of the building to the stage, and which are painted to represent rocks. A cascade of water falls among them from a place 30 feet high; on the wings and scenes at the back are painted palm-trees; the whole representing an oriental landscape, with a waterfall among rocks. Sixty or seventy females, dressed in the ordinary costume of ballet-dancers, came down through a large opening at the top of the platform, painted as rocks, and danced down them to the stage; they were not dressed alike; some had gold tissue skirts over white; those who first descended danced on the stage in a serpentine figure, so as to occupy the whole front of the stage till all had come down. When all were down, they defiled to the right and left; four were placed on each side in front of the proscenium with property, namely, sham musical instruments, in their hands, supposed to be playing them to the dancers. The dancers began to dance the pas des poignards, each lady, armed with two daggers, charging through each other's ranks, striking right and left with the daggers in mimic warfare, then advancing in front as far as the foot-lights. This performance of the dagger-dance ended in several of the females standing over others, as if in triumph, and retiring, when others came forward, holding property, namely, sham palm-leaves, in their hands, and danced, waving them, and formed an avenue, as expecting an arrival. Then a lady dancer, who at regular theatres would be called a première danseuse, passed down the avenue formed by the other dancers, who retired while she performed a pas seul with gestures. The other dancers then formed groups, placing the palm-leaves so as to represent the opening of a flower. Others had a property called a palisade, and danced with it so as to represent a basket of flowers. Several more pas seuls, having been executed by the première, the rest went through other evolutions, and the performance concluded. That performance is in the theatrical profession called a ballet divertissement, and could not be presented without the stage accessories above described; without them it would be mere rehearsal.

A witness from the Lord Chamberlain's office, called a Reader of Plays, styled it an entertainment of the stage. A ballet of action has a story. A ballet divertissement has none, but cannot be performed without pantomimic action and gestures. It is not confined to the steps of the dancers. Dancing quadrilles on the stage would be without such gestures. This dagger-dance was brought out originally at Drury Lane Theatre, being then danced by Almas in an Egyptian scene, as at the Alhambra in an Oriental. A ballet divertissement can be described, so as to enable a copy of the directions for it to be sent to the Lord Chamberlain, according to 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. s. 12. The ballet of 'Ondine,' with all its details, has been so described. The Lord Chamberlain has not required copies of the directions of such ballets to be sent in till recently. He has interfered at the Italian Opera, where complaints have been made of the costumes of the female ballet-dancers.

On the 11th of January, 1865, I convicted the defendants on nearly similar evidence, after considering the 10 Geo. 2. c. 28. s. 2, and 25 Geo. 2. c. 36. s. 2—The King v. Handy (6 Term Rep. 286), Gallini v. Laborie (5 Term Rep. 242). That conviction was quashed by the Middlesex Quarter Sessions in April, 1865.

The complainant being dissatisfied with that result applied for the present summons on evidence of another performance at the Alhambra at a later date, which the Magistrate did not feel competent to refuse, and granted the summons above set forth. After hearing counsel for the defendant, the Magistrate thought it his duty to act in conformity with the decision of the superior Court, videlicet, the Quarter Sessions for Middlesex, though entertaining a different opinion, and dismissed the summons, but on request by the complainant granted him a special case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. for the opinion of this Court.

The question for the opinion of this Court is, whether the performance above described was legal without the licence of the Lord Chamberlain.

If this Court shall be of opinion that the Magistrate ought to have convicted the defendant, the parties seek that the summons shall stand, and that this case be remitted to make such order as to this Court shall seem fit.

Tindal Atkinson, Serj. (Bosanquet with him), on behalf of the appellant.—The question is whether a certain ballet performance at the Alhambra requires the licence of the Lord Chamberlain under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. s. 2. The history of the legislation on this subject will be found in a note to The King v. Neville (1 B. & Ad. 489). The old statute relating to dramatic performances is the 10 Geo. 2. c. 28, which limited theatres to Westminster; but the numerous applications for theatres in other places, and consequent multiplication of local statutes, led to the passing of the 28 Geo. 3. c. 30, which gave to Justices in other places the same powers of licensing as the Lord Chamberlain had in Westminster. These statutes were repealed by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, under which the appellant contends there ought to be a licence from the Lord Chamberlain. The respondent will contend that a licence under 25 Geo. 2. c. 36, the statute relating to music and dancing, is sufficient. It is submitted, however, that Gallini v. Laborie (5 Term Rep. 242) is on all fours with the present case; there it was held that a ballet was a stage performance within 10 Geo. 2. c. 28. But The Queen v. Handy (6 Term Rep. 286) will be relied on by the other side; that case only decided that tumbling was not within the statute, and there is a manifest distinction, because in tumbling there is nothing dramatic. In De Begnis v. Armistead (10 Bing. 109; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 214) the ballet seems to be put on the same footing as the opera. In the case of Day v. Simpson (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 680; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 149), though only reflections were presented, yet, as the action was dramatic, the performance was held within the statute. Again, in Russell v. Smith (12 Q.B. Rep. 217; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 225) it was held that a song might be dramatic within the statute. It is apprehended that 25 Geo. 2. c. 36. does not apply to dancing by hired performers but only to dancing by the public themselves. The definitions of "ballet" given in the Encyclopædia Britannica and in Webster would include such a performance as that described in the case. So would the definition of "pantomime" given by Ogilvie. The performance in the present case was essentially dramatic; there was a representation of the triumph of peace over vengeance, with all the accessories of the stage. Unless this kind of performance is within the act, there is no summary way of stopping immoral dances, and the object of the statute is frustrated.

Poland, on behalf of the respondent.—The respondent has a licence for music and dancing under 25 Geo. 2. c. 36, and this is sufficient. It is said on the other side that this statute was not intended to apply to paid performers, but it is submitted that it applies to an entertainment of dancing provided by the owner of the place, and authorizes public dancing, whether by the public or by performers, and this was conceded in argument in Clarke v. Serle (4 Esp. 25). Again, in Guaglieni v. Matthews (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 116), Cockburn, C.J. said, "I quite agree that it is not necessary that the public should themselves dance to bring the case within the statute." In Gallini v. Laborie (5 Ibid. 242) there was neither a licence under the one statute or the other, and so the performance was illegal in either view. This is pointed out by Lord Kenyon, in the case of The Queen v. Handy (6 Term Rep. 286), as the reason why the matter was very imperfectly considered. In 10 Geo. 2. c. 28. "stage-play" is defined, and in the definition in the present act, "melo-drama," "burletta," and "pantomime" are added, and it is important to observe that the word "ballet" is omitted from both; from the latter even where the words were added. A ballet with a whole plot, regularly carried out, might perhaps be a stage entertainment; it is not requisite here to contend that it would not, for here there is no such plot. Again, it is impossible to send a copy under section 12, for a copy of a dance cannot be sent, but only a description.

[BYLES, J.—But you may say the same as to a pantomime.]

That consists of a tale and a regular plot, till the transformation scene. The case of Lee v. Simpson (3 Com. B. Rep. 871; s. c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 105) shews it is something with a story, and the observations in the judgment apply here.

[ERLE, C.J.—That case only shews that the law of copyright applies to the words only, and not to the comic parts.]

"Stage-play" is the governing word in the statute. As to Day v. Simpson (18 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 680; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 225), there was a regular plot regularly carried out. So in Thorne v. Colson (3 Law Times, N.S. 697) there was a story acted. Lastly, the question is one of fact for the Magistrate to decide, and that decision should be in plain terms, as there is an appeal to the Quarter Sessions.

Tindal Atkinson, Serj., in reply.—The facts contained in the case are a complete answer to the contention that there is no plot; there is a difference between dancing by the public and such dancing as this.

[BYLES, J.—The difference between mute action and mute acting.]

That is so; here it was mute acting, like a pantomime.

ERLE, C.J.—This is a proceeding against the respondent for representing a stage-play without a licence from the Lord Chamberlain. The Magistrate refused to convict, and has stated the facts, and asked the opinion of this Court as to whether he ought to have convicted, and requested us to send the matter back to him if so. After an attentive consideration, it seems to me that the question is one of degree, and is therefore more a question of fact than of law. Subject to a doubt as to whether I can appreciate the scene without having seen the performance itself, as I can best understand the facts stated by the Magistrate, I am inclined to think that his decision was right, and that there ought not to be a conviction. But the question is one of degree. As to where dancing ceases to be lawful and becomes a stage-play, I cannot give a definition. In the old statute, 10 Geo. 2. c. 28, the words were, "interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein"; and in the case before Lord Kenyon doubt was expressed as to what came within that statute. In the statute 25 Geo. 2. 36. the legislature seems to have provided an agreeable entertainment for those who, on the score of expense, or for other reasons, do not attend the performances at the theatres, by allowing at houses of public resort music and dancing, if the Magistrates license them. The defendant in literal terms is by his licence confined to music and dancing, and it is contended that he has added such ingredients of a dramatic performance as to make his entertainment an entertainment of the stage within the meaning of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. A great deal has been said about the danger that will ensue to the interests of morality if such an entertainment as this is held not to be within the statute. As to the cause of morality, I do not see how it is in danger; no interest of morality is at stake, but the simple question is, whether this cheap amusement is to be continued or stopped; whether or not the respondent is entitled to give an entertainment which certainly might be given at a theatre. Dancing and music are clearly lawful without the Lord Chamberlain's licence, but a stage-play is not. The statement of the case enters into a very minute detail of the number of women, a descent from rocks by female dancers, the appearance of a dancer of a superior order, and a dance with daggers and palm-branches. If nothing more than this appeared, I could not say that this was in the nature of a stage-play, but the Magistrate adds, that the dagger-dance ended by some of the females standing over the others, as in triumph, and retiring, when others came forward with palm-leaves. This is very near to a dramatic performance, and a line is to be drawn. The Magistrate uses two terms of art, a ballet divertissement, where there is no train or ideas or story, but only an agreeable entertainment, and a ballet of action, which has a story, and which may contain all the emotions of tragedy or comedy. I could not pretend to give an opinion on this statement whether, as a matter of fact, this entertainment fell within the one class or the other; and certainly if I am asked as a matter of law, I cannot as a matter of law say it is a stage-play.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. A difficulty has been put as to whether it is not impossible to tell the exact nature of the entertainment here described without seeing it. I can get over this however to a certain extent, but I am unable to say, shortly of laying down a definition, that this was an entertainment of the stage. My first impression was that a representation on the stage was the test. But on consideration, I think it is rather a matter of fact than of law. As a matter of fact, I thought, and still think, that this is an entertainment of the stage, but I cannot say it is so as a matter of law, and therefore I cannot say the Magistrate ought to convict. A consideration of the words of the statute shews the force of the argument of Russell in The Queen v. Handy (6 Term Rep. 286). On some stages one has seen performances of the highest order of genius, on others the mere performances of a booth. Again, one has seen on the highest stages the performance of a Paganini and of a Van Amburgh and his lions. We cannot therefore construe the statute and decide the present case to be within it by the simple consideration of whether what is described in the case is what is represented ordinarily on a stage. The words "entertainment of the stage" are to be construed, I think, to include performances ejusdem generis with tragedy, comedy, &c., entertainments of a dramatic character. Now a ballet with a connected story would, I think, be an entertainment of the stage; a mere dance on a stage might not be so. An instance might be given on the one hand of a statue represented on the stage with no story; this would not properly be a dramatic entertainment. On the other hand, Tarantella, where there is an actual representation of a complete story and plot put on the stage, would be one. Reading the case by the best light I can, I certainly think that this entertainment was of the latter class. There were not merely the accessories of the stage, but there were persons who may be taken to represent a combat, a triumph, and a reconciliation under a superior influence. But yet a person looking at it before the principal danseuse appeared, might regard it as only accessory to that, so that its principal characteristic would not be dramatic. I can conceive this, and, therefore, I think that whether it comes within the statute or not is a question of degree. For these reasons (though with great deference to my Lord), as to the question of fact, I own I should have agreed with the Magistrate if I had been obliged to adjudicate on it; but as to the question of law, I agree with my Lord.

BYLES, J.—This is a question of degree, and it is very difficult to draw the line. I conceive that ordinary dancing would not be within the statute, whereas a representation by dumb show (as a pantomime) of the events or actions of human life would be, and not the less so because the actors perform while dancing. Here there is a descent from rocks, an attack, a success, and a reconciliation, with all the theatrical accessories, and as a question of fact, therefore, I should think that this entertainment was within the statute; but whether it is as a matter of law is another thing.

KEATING, J.—I agree in the conclusion which has been arrived at, that this is a question of degree, and resolves into one of fact. I agree with my Lord as to the difficulty of drawing a line. It is not, however, necessary to do so in consequence of the conclusion we have arrived at. But as the rest of the Court have expressed their opinion on the question of fact, I will express mine, and I am bound to say that, if I had to decide, I should have thought that this performance was within the statute, and was a dramatic representation, for the reasons given by my Brothers Willes and Byles, and, with all deference to my Lord's opinion, I concur with them. Here there was a representation by pantomimic gestures, short and few perhaps, but still amounting to a dramatic representation of the triumph of peace over war, or some similar event. I therefore take the same view as to the facts as my Brothers Willes and Byles, but I agree with my Lord as to its being a question of degree, and therefore of fact.

Judgment for the respondent.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

June 6, 9, 23, 1865.

PEARSON, appellant, v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL, respondents.

SAME v. SAME.

35 L. J. M.C. 36; 3 H. & C. 921; 13 L. T. 180.

Statute, Construction of—17 & 18 Vict. c. ci. (Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854), sections 97, 99, 101, 103.—Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43.) section 53.—Local Government Act, 1858, (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98.) section 34.—“Building”—Penalty for building before Approval of Plan by Local Board, and for using a Dwelling-house without their previous Consent.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.—The 53rd section of the Public Health Act, 1848, (which requires certain particulars to be stated for the approval of a local board by any person intending to construct any building) was repealed by the 34th section of the Local Government Act, 1858.

The 101st section of the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854, enacts, that in addition to the particulars required by the 53rd section of the Public Health Act, 1848, the person intending to construct any building shall furnish the local board with a plan on a certain scale, and that the plan shall not be carried into execution until approved by the local board.

The 99th section of the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854, enacts, that every house to be built or rebuilt at the corner of any street shall have a back yard or back area thereto, if the local board shall deem it right, of such dimensions as they shall determine, and every house to be thereafter constructed on vacant ground, not being at the corner of a street (and not being the site of any house erected thereon immediately previous to such construction), shall have a back yard or other vacant ground and area open from the ground upwards, of not less than 8 feet, extending from the main building for the whole length of such building, provided that within that space or area the pantry, coal-house and privy, not exceeding 9 feet in height, and not covering more than 48 superficial feet of the above area, may be there constructed.

Under one of the by-laws, which the board were authorized to make by the 34th section of the Local Government Act, 1858, fourteen days' notice was required to be given to them by any person intending to build, together with a plan shewing a section of the building and the space around; during which fourteen days the board should either approve of the plan or alter it, as they should think fit; and any plan not altered during that period is to be considered approved.

On the 21st of October the appellant laid a plan before the board, shewing sufficient spaces at the side of his proposed building, provided the 99th section did not oblige him to have a certain open space at the back. On the 22nd the surveyor of the board informed him that, as there was not sufficient space at the back, the plan was not approved of by the works committee, but was referred to a sub-committee. The proceedings of the works committee were approved of on the 24th of October, within the fourteen days; and the appellant was further informed, on the 19th of November, that the sub-committee had inspected the site of the building, and that the decision of the works committee of the 21st of October was confirmed. The appellant, notwithstanding, proceeded with his building.

Held, that the appellant in so doing had committed an offence under the 101st section.

The 97th section of the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act enacts, that any building built or rebuilt after the commencement of the act, except on the site of a building used immediately before as a dwelling-house, &c., shall not, without the previous consent of the local board, be used as a dwelling-house, except during such time as there is adjoining to it or occupied therewith a street or a clear open space in and to the full extent of the front thereof, of not less than 20 feet in width.

The 103rd section enacts, that if any sewer, drain, privy, cesspool, ashpit, building or work be made or suffered to continue contrary to any of the provisions of this act, or if any person, without the consent of the local board, make, rebuild, clear out, unstop, or in anywise alter any sewer, &c., which has been ordered by them not to be so made, &c., every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding 5l., and for every day after the first day during which the offence continues, a sum not exceeding 10s.

The appellant having been found, on the facts stated, to have committed an offence under the 97th section,—Held, by Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B. and Channell, B., that though the appellant was guilty of an offence under the 97th section, he was not liable to the penalty, because "using a building as a dwelling-house" is neither "making" a building, nor "suffering it to continue," within the meaning of the words in the 103rd section.

Held, by Martin, B., that the offence prohibited by the 97th section was clearly intended by the legislature to be subject to the penalty imposed by the 103rd section, and that the appellant was therefore rightly convicted.

CASES stated by the Police Magistrate of the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

FIRST CASE.

At a petty sessions holden at the police court for the said borough on the 3rd and 13th of February, an information was preferred by the respondents against the appellant, under the 101st section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. ci. (the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854,)—charging that he did, on the 22nd of November, 1864, at the said borough, being “the person intending to build” certain houses in Villa Place, there situate, and having furnished to the respondents a correct plan of such proposed buildings, as required by the statute in such case made and provided, unlawfully commence such buildings before the said plan had been approved of by the said local board,—was heard and determined by me, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before me of the said offence, and I adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 40s., and also the sum of 14s. for costs; and that if the said several sums should not be paid forthwith, the same were to be levied, &c.

The appellant was charged, before me, by the respondents, with two offences. The offence charged in the first summons was, that, having furnished to the respondents a plan as required in the 101st section of the said act, he had carried into execution and commenced the buildings referred to in such plan before the plan was approved by the respondents. The exact words of the 101st section are: “That, in addition to the particulars required to be stated for the approval of the local board by the 53rd section of the Public Health Act, 1848, there shall be furnished to such board by such person intending to build or rebuild any house, or construct any building, a correct plan or plans of the proposed building, drawn to a scale of not less than 1 inch to every 8 feet of the work, shewing the particulars required by the said act and this act, and which plan shall not be carried into execution nor the building commenced until the same plan shall have been approved by the local board.”

The second summons, to which it is also necessary to refer, was for an offence against the 99th section of the same act, and charged the appellant with having neglected to provide yards or areas, of the dimensions required by that section, at the back of the houses built by him, being the same houses or buildings mentioned in the first summons. The words of the 99th section are: “That every house to be hereafter rebuilt, and every house to be hereafter built at the corner of any street or place shall have a back yard or back area thereto, if the local board shall in such case deem it right that any such back yard or back area should be made, and in that case such back yard and back area shall be of such dimensions as the local board shall determine, and every house to be hereafter constructed on vacant ground (not being situate at the corner of a street or place, or not being the site of any other house erected thereon immediately previous to such construction) shall have a back yard or other vacant ground and area, open from the ground upwards, of not less than 8 feet, extending from the main building for the whole length of such building; provided that within that space or area the pantry, coal-house and privy, not exceeding 9 feet in height, and not covering more than 48 superficial feet of the above area, may be there constructed.”

I find that the plan produced, now annexed to this case, was deposited by the appellant at the office of Mr. Sharpe, as surveyor of the local board, on the 20th of October, 1864, and that it was a ground-plan and shews sections of rooms. That it was laid before the works committee of the board on the 21st of October, and was not approved, and was referred by the works committee to the streets and lighting sub-committee. I find also that on the 22nd of October, 1864, Mr. Sharpe gave to the appellant a notice in writing, produced before me (not under the seal of the board), in the following words:

“Sir,—I beg to inform you that your plan for the erection of four houses in Villa Place was presented to the works committee yesterday; but it appearing that there would be no open space of 8 feet behind such houses, it was resolved that such plan be not approved, but referred to the streets and lighting sub-committee. I am, yours, obediently,

"J. Fox Sharpe, Surveyor."

I also find that the said proceedings of the works committee were confirmed by the local board on the 24th of October, 1864, and I find that on the 18th of November the minutes of the proceedings of the sub-street committee were brought before the works committee and confirmed.

I also find that Mr. Sharpe, the surveyor, gave the appellant a notice, under the seal of the board, dated the 19th of November, 1864, in the following words:

"Sir,—I beg to inform you that the streets and lighting sub-committee, to whom your plan was referred for the erection of certain houses in Villa Place, having inspected the site, it was resolved—that the decision of the works committee of the 21st of October last, that such plan be not approved, 'be confirmed.' I am yours, obediently,

"J. Fox Sharpe, Surveyor."

Notwithstanding the notice of the 22nd of October and the 19th of November, the appellant, about the 22nd of November, commenced his buildings, and this having been brought before the works committee, legal proceedings were, on the 2nd of December, authorized by the works committee against him. I find also that these proceedings of the works committee were subsequently, on the 29th of December, 1864, confirmed by the local board.

In this case I find that by-laws in the year 1860 in fact made by the local board, and confirmed by the Secretary of State, under the power contained in the 34th section of the Local Government Act, 1858,—the 5th and 6th of which by-laws are as follows:

5. "Fourteen days at least before beginning to dig or lay out the foundations, &c. the person intending to build shall give notice thereof, with a plan, &c. shewing the structure of the walls, and the space about the building for securing a free ventilation of air, &c. to the local board, and whoever offends against this by-law shall forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, and also 40*s.* for every day during which the offence is continued."

6. "During that period of fourteen days, the board shall either approve the plan and section, or alter the same as they think necessary for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1848, and the statutes incorporated therewith, and any plan which is not altered during that period shall be considered as approved by the local board."

And I find, also, that on certain occasions after the passing of such by-laws, buildings may have been authorized by the board to be made in accordance therewith, but I do not find that any such authority has been given within a considerable period now last past; I find also that a person who called on behalf of the appellant at the surveyor's office, prior to the commencement by the appellant of the buildings in Villa Place, received from the clerk at such office a paper copy of the by-laws similar to that annexed to this case, but was expressly told that such by-laws were "not the regulations of the board," which must guide the appellant in the buildings in Villa Place, then about to be undertaken by him; and I find, further, that such copy of the by-laws was not furnished to him by or by the authority of the respondents.

And I find also that the printed regulations of the board as to buildings are entirely distinct from the by-laws, and that it is stated by the appellant, on the particulars delivered by him to the board when he deposited his plan, and now annexed to the said plan, that the printed regulations of the board had been delivered to J. P. Marshall, and that such J. P. Marshall was the agent of the appellant. I find also that such regulations as to plans are in accordance with the provisions of the Hull Improvement Act, section 101, and not in accordance with No. 6. of the by-laws. I find also that the local board did proceed in this case solely in pursuance of the 101st section of the Local Improvement Act, and did not act, nor ever had any intention of acting, under the by-laws. And I find that the appellant was fully aware when he commenced his buildings in Villa Place that the plan deposited by him was objected to by the local board, and did not receive its approval because it did not shew that there would be a back yard or other vacant ground or area behind each building, such area being alleged by the local board to be necessary under the 99th section of the Improvement Act; and I also find that there is no evidence before me indicating that the appellant did believe at the time he commenced his building in Villa Place aforesaid that the course to be pursued by him as to the depositing and approval of his plans was regulated by the by-laws.

In reference to the offence charged under the 99th section of the Hull Improvement Act, I find that the appellant's buildings have no back yards, or back vacant ground or back area of any kind, but that there is a vacant space at the side of each house, 16 feet by 8 feet, the depth of the house being 16 feet, and that such open area is covered by buildings to the extent of 40 feet, such building not exceeding 9 feet in height.

I find therefore that the appellant has left the full open space named in the Hull Improvement Act at the side of each house, but has left no space at the back. The local board contend such open space must of necessity be at the back to insure a compliance with the law; if such was the intention of the legislature, the expressions used in the 99th section of the Hull Improvement Act do not convey that meaning in a clear manner. In an earlier part of the same section both the terms "back yard" and "back area" are made use of; but in the latter portion of the section the words are, "shall have a back yard or other vacant ground and area open, &c.," which may well admit of the construction that "such other open ground and area" may be at the side, as in the plan deposited by the appellant, and not at the back.

I find the appellant guilty of having committed an offence under the 101st section of the Hull Improvement Act by attempting to carry his plan into execution before it was approved. As to the offence charged under the 99th section, I was not satisfied that the appellant had not complied with the literal requirements, and therefore I find him not guilty of that charge.

The questions upon which the opinion of the Court of Exchequer is desired are: Whether, upon the above statement of facts I came to a right decision on the 99th section; and whether (without regard to the correctness of whether I am right or not in my decision as to the construction of the said 99th section) I am right in my decision that in point of law the plan of the defendant was not approved by the board, and that the appellant may be legally convicted under the 101st section of the Hull Improvement Act for commencing his buildings before his plans had received the approval of the board.

T. P. Thompson, for the appellant, contended that the matter was not within the 103rd section, for the word "building" there must be confined to buildings ejusdem generis as those mentioned immediately before, and that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to convict the appellant, or to adjudge him to pay any penalty; that the appellant did not commit any offence against the provisions of the 99th section, for though the word "back" is found associated with "yard" in the 99th section, it is not found with "other vacant ground"; that he had committed no offence against any of the respondents' by-laws; that the plan of the appellant's proposed buildings (not having been altered by the respondents during the period of fourteen days after it had been furnished to them by the appellant) must be considered to have been approved by them within the meaning of the said local act and of the respondents' by-laws, by which the respondents were bound; and that, as the 101st section of the local act provided that further particulars should be stated, in addition to those required by the 53rd section of the Public Health Act, and as the 53rd section of the last-mentioned act was repealed by the act of 1858, the 101st section of the local act was entirely inoperative as to such further particulars, and did not apply to the case. He cited Whitmore v. Wenlock,¹ Powell v. Farmer (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 71), The King v. Mosley (2 B. & C. 226), and Brown v. Holyhead Local Board (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 25; s. c. 1 H. & C. 601).

On the other side,

Mellish (with him was Philbrick) contended that the 101st section of the act of 1854 was, at the time of the alleged offence, unrepealed and existing, and that on the facts the appellant clearly was guilty of an offence against the same; that the 53rd section of the Public Health Act, 1848, was, at the time of the alleged offence, unrepealed and existing law in Hull, by virtue of the Hull Improvement Act; that the last-mentioned act is to be read as if the incorporated sections of the Public Health Act were repeated at length therein, and that such enactments are not repealed or affected by the general words of the Local Government Act; that, even if the 53rd section of the Public Health Act were repealed, the appellant was properly convicted under the 101st section of the local act, the repeal of the former section in no way involving a repeal of the latter; that the by-laws referred to by the appellant were in no sense binding in or applicable to the present case, and, even if they were, that they could not override the express provisions of the 101st section of the local act; that in any view of the by-laws the respondents could elect to proceed, and were justified in proceeding, under the powers of the 101st section of the Local Government Act Amendment Act, 1861, section 29; that on the facts the appellant was aware that the by-laws were not the regulations for buildings prescribed by the respondents; that there being sufficient evidence that the respondents had not approved of the appellant's plan before he commenced building, there is nothing in point of law which would compel a decision contrary to the facts; that on the facts the appellant was guilty of an offence under the 99th section of the local act, the houses in question having no back yards or areas; and that, on the proper construction of the 99th section, the back yard or vacant space must be at the back, and extend along the whole length of the building, and spaces at the sides neither literally nor in spirit satisfy the section, which requires a free and uninterrupted space for the circulation of air and ventilation behind all houses, and that therefore the appellant was rightly convicted under the 103rd section.

MARTIN, B.²—My Brother Channell and myself are both of opinion that the Justice was right, and that the conviction should be affirmed. Now the charge against the defendant was that he had commenced a building before a plan, which he had submitted to the local board, had been approved of by them, according to the 101st section of the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854. For the purpose of understanding that act, we must have recourse to an act for promoting public health, passed in the year 1848. This seems to be the first of these acts, and the 53rd section of it enacts, that fourteen days at least before beginning to dig or lay the foundations of any new house, the person intending to do so shall give to the local board of health a notice of his intention, together with a level of the cellars or lowest floor, and the situation of the house, and a variety of other matters, and until that notice is given, the building or rebuilding of any house is prohibited; then the 101st section of the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854, enacted that in addition to the particulars required to be stated for the approval of the local board by the 53rd section of the Public Health Act, 1848, there shall be furnished to such board by the person intending to build any house a correct plan of the building, drawn to a certain scale, and which plan shall not be carried into execution nor the building commenced until the same plan shall have been approved of by the local board. Then by the Local Government Act, 1858, section 34, it was enacted that the 53rd section of the Public Health Act should be repealed, and in lieu thereof it was enacted,—That every local board may make by-laws with respect to certain matters, that is to say, the level of streets, the structure of walls, the sufficiency of space with respect to drainage; and then the section says, that they may further provide for the observance of the by-laws by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans with their secretary by persons intending to construct buildings, and as to inspection by the local board, provided that no such by-laws shall affect any building which shall be erected before the date of the act.

(1) 13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 55 (same case nomine Whitmore v. Bedford, 5 M. & G. 9), per Tindal, C.J. and Maule, J.

(2) This first case was argued before Martin, B. and Channell, B., who proceeded to give judgment on the 9th of June, immediately after the conclusion of the argument in the second case.

The local board of Hull acted upon that power, and made by-laws which were approved of by the Secretary of State on the 14th of August, 1860. The 5th and 6th by-laws enact that fourteen days at least before the beginning to dig or laying the foundation for a new building, the person intending so to build shall give to the local board a written notice thereof, together with a plan and section of the intended building, shewing the structure of the walls and space about the building for securing a free circulation of air, and the proposed arrangements for ventilation, together with the intended drainage of the building, and the water-closets, privies, ashpits, and cess-pools in connexion with the building, and that whoever offends against the by-laws shall forfeit to the local board a sum not exceeding 5l., and a further penalty not exceeding 40s. for every day during which the offence is continued after notice from them in writing in this behalf. And that during such period of fourteen days the local board shall either approve the plan and section or alter the same as they think necessary for the purposes of the Public Health Act, 1848, and the statutes incorporated therewith, and any plan or section which is not altered during that period shall be considered approved by the local board.

Now what took place in this case was, that upon the 21st of October the appellant, who proposed to build certain houses within the jurisdiction of this Hull Act, laid a plan before the respondents shewing four houses proposed to be erected, and spaces which were sufficient within the 99th section of the Hull Improvement Act, provided it was not obligatory upon him to have certain open spaces at the back. Those open spaces were sufficient in size, but they were at the side of the houses.

Now, that being done, upon the 22nd of October a letter was written to him by the surveyor of the Hull local board to this effect: "Your plan for the erection of four houses in Villa Place was presented to the works committee yesterday; and it appearing there would be no open space behind such houses, it was resolved that such plan be not approved of, but be referred to the streets and lighting sub-committee." It is also found that the proceedings of the works committee were confirmed by the local board on the 24th of October, 1854, which was within the fourteen days. Whether the result of the watching and lighting sub-committee was in opposition to the committee who caused the letter of the 22nd of October to be written we do not know; but after the expiration of the fourteen days what was done by the sub-committee was approved by the works committee, and that was again approved by the local board itself. The appellant thought fit, notwithstanding the letter informing him thereof, to proceed to build, and the question is, has he committed an offence within the 101st section?—and we are of opinion that he has.

Now the points made for the appellant were, first, that the 101st section of the local act was in effect repealed. We think that is not so, for the board is to be furnished with other particulars, in addition to those required to be stated for the approval of the local board by the 53rd section. It seems to us that the repeal of the 53rd section does not at all affect the absolute enactments of the 101st section. The result of repealing the 34th section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98. is, that though it be repealed, by-laws may be made in lieu thereof; and such by-laws were made. At first it was supposed that those by-laws had not been acted upon. I own it seems to me that the by-laws have been complied with almost to the letter. It is contended that it was not enough for the respondents within fourteen days to state that they disapproved of the plan; but that they ought also to have altered it. Now how by possibility could they alter it? It was impossible to do that; and it seems to me it was quite sufficient for them to say, "We disapprove, and we insist that your open space should be at the back of the house, and not at the side; and inasmuch as you have no means of giving an open space at the back of the house, when we tell you that, we tell you that no alteration can be made in it, and that in our judgment, if this house is permitted to be erected in the way you propose, it will be a contravention of the act." I own, it seems to me they have complied with this by-law in the only way in which they could have complied with it. If they could have altered the plan so as to have shewn an open space at the back, it may be they ought to have done so, although it would have left the intermediate space between the two proposed buildings unoccupied. In my judgment they have substantially complied with the by-law, and within fourteen days of the deposit of the plan they have altered it by stating their disapproval of it—"We will not permit this open space to be at the side, but we will insist upon it being at the back."

It was argued for the appellant that the 99th section does not enact that the yard or open space shall be at the back. One would desire in a matter of this kind that everything really should be enacted in such language that those who run may read, and it is unfortunate that there were any such words introduced as "vacant ground or area," which have raised this discussion. I think the act ought to be construed, with a view of ascertaining what was the real meaning of the legislature, taken with the circumstances, and then of acting upon it so as to impose a penalty in respect of that not being done which the legislature has enacted should be done; and I should say that the open space should be at the back of the house, because it was to extend from the main building for the whole length of the building; and that, coupled with the 97th section, what the legislature really desired was that there should be an open space of 20 feet in front and at the back, so that there should be a thorough ventilation. In my judgment, therefore, there was an offence against the 101st section, and I think it is clear that the building was made contrary to the provisions of this act, for it was made contrary to a provision which enacted that before anything was done it should be approved of by the local board.

I think, when the local board had the jurisdiction, which is clearly given to them in this case, to exercise a judgment with respect to the matter, that the appellant had no right in the face of that disapproval to go on and erect this building; and, if the local board were wrong, I suppose the appellant could have proceeded in the Court of Queen's Bench to compel them to act in pursuance of the statute. I do not think he had a right to take the matter into his own hands, and in direct defiance and disapproval of the local board to proceed to build.

For these reasons I think the conviction of the Justice was correct, and that we ought to answer so much of his questions in the affirmative, and in support of this conviction. It is not necessary for us to give an absolute conclusive judgment upon the 99th section; and it would require a very strong argument to convince me that the respondents are not right, and that the vacant ground and area must be at the back.

CHANNELL, B.—I agree with my Brother Martin in thinking that the conviction in this case should be affirmed. The information charges that the appellant, being a person intending to build certain houses described in the information, furnished to the respondents a correct plan of such proposed building, as required by the statute; but that he unlawfully commenced such building before the said plan was approved of by the said local board. The question is, whether the appellant, on the facts before us, can be said to have been guilty of that offence so as to render himself liable to a penalty.

Now the penalty, if imposed at all, is imposed by the 103rd section. I will consider presently the question whether the words of the 103rd section are large enough and distinct enough to hit the offence which the information charges against the appellant. But the offence under the act charged in the information is that of commencing the building before the plan which the appellant had submitted to the board of health had been approved of by them. That seems to me to render it necessary to consider the two sections of the act together, the 101st section and the 99th section. Now, it was said that the 101st section had dropped altogether, that the machinery contemplated by the 101st section could no longer be carried out, and that it must be considered as now excluded from our consideration, on the ground that the 101st section provided that, in addition to certain particulars required to be stated by the 53rd section of the Public Health Act, there should be also furnished such other particulars as are required by the Hull Improvement Act. Then it was said that by an act which passed in the year 1858, the 53rd section of the Public Health Act had been repealed, and that the necessary and unavoidable consequence of the repeal of the 53rd section was to render entirely nugatory the 101st section of the Hull Act, so far as that act required additional particulars to be delivered. I cannot accede to that argument. It appears to me that of the particulars which were delivered, the plan required to be delivered by the 101st section was one, and one which the Board of Health had not approved of; then the case is so far an offence under the act, although a doubt may arise as to how far the provisions of the Board of Health Act are preserved and continued stringent and operative by virtue of the by-laws that were made.

Now, then, we must consider the 99th section, and, if I were called upon to give a decisive opinion upon that point, I should adopt the argument suggested for the respondents, namely, that this pointed to a yard at the back of the house, and not to an open space at the side. I agree that with respect to the words "shall have a back yard," there, "yard" is associated with the word "back"; but when we come to the next words, "or other vacant ground," we do not find the words "at the back," and so far as that goes, it gives rise to the doubt that has been forcibly pressed upon us for the appellant. But, although those words, so far considered, let in a little doubt and difficulty, they are, to my mind, considerably (if not entirely) cleared up by the other words to be found in the next line, "extending from the main building for the whole length of such building." I, therefore, agree that when we look at the other clauses of the act, which seem to throw some light upon the subject, it was intended to provide for a yard or open space at the back, and not for one at the side. This is giving a construction to the act which would tend to carry out its main object, viz. the erection of many houses in the same line, fronting what may be called a street,—houses adjoining and contiguous to each other; and I think the object of the act will be best attained by holding it to apply to the area or yard at the back.

Supposing that to be the construction of the act, the case is still attended with some doubt and difficulty; but it seems to me that the offence which this information charges is established as against the appellant, because the matter was one upon which the board of health had a right to express their opinion; and if they had a right to take this matter into their consideration, and disapproved of the plan, then it appears to me that the offence charged in the information is sufficiently established to call upon us to support the conviction.

Then comes in the still further question, namely, was the plan, in point of fact, disapproved of? I do not propose to repeat what my Brother Martin has said upon the subject; but it appears to me upon the facts that there was a notification to the appellant that the plan which he had sent in to the board of health was one which they would not approve of. One argument for the appellant was, that, applying the provisions of the by-laws, the plan was not disapproved of within fourteen days, but that it must be taken to have been approved of. I think there is sufficient evidence to shew that a competent body of competent authority did, within fourteen days, disapprove of the plan submitted, although it was sent to another committee to consider; the concurrence of the second body in the disapproval of the first, could not, in my opinion, render the disapproval communicated by the first other than a disapproval within the section.

There is only one other question to be considered, namely, whether, supposing an offence upon these facts is made out, there is any section in the act which enables the Magistrate to convict summarily in the penalty. I am not at all blind to the force of the argument for the appellant as to the meaning which ordinarily would be attached to the word "building" in the 103rd section. I concur in the view that the word "building" could not properly receive that construction which the respondents contended for, in order to support this conviction. If I were limited to the view to be gathered from the 103rd section only, I should certainly feel the force of the argument; but admitting the maxim of noscitur à sociis in construing words such as "building," I feel quite at liberty to go into the earlier sections of the act, and not to limit the word "building" simply to that interpretation which ought to be put upon it if I looked only at the words which precede it in the 103rd section. I think the 96th, 97th and 98th sections fully entitle us (without infringing the ordinary rule of construction) to put a larger construction upon the word "building" than would apply solely to the 103rd section. There is much weight also in the argument suggested for the respondents, that in a given order the statute proceeds to deal with the different matters,—sewers in one, drains in the other, and so on; and, lastly, "buildings"—buildings implying much more, and involving the 96th, 97th and 98th sections; and, therefore, we are clearly entitled to hold that the word "building" carries with it that meaning which would support this information. I come to this conclusion with satisfaction to myself, believing that it does not infringe any well-known settled rules of law, and that we are carrying out what I cannot doubt was the intention of the legislature.

MARTIN, B.—We are of opinion (whether he was right or wrong in his decision as to the construction of the 99th section) that the Justice's decision is, in point of law, right; and that the appellant's plan was not authorized by the board; and that he was legally convicted under the 101st section for commencing to build without the consent of the board.

Conviction affirmed.

SECOND CASE.

At a petty sessions, holden at the said police court, on the 17th day of March, 1865, an information preferred by the respondents against the appellant, under the 97th section of the said Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act, 1854, charging that the appellant did, on the 9th day of March, 1865, at the borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, unlawfully cause to be used as a dwelling-house, a certain building in Villa Place, within the district of the respondents, without their previous consent, there not being, or adjoining or belonging thereto, or occupied therewith, either a street or a clear open space in and to the full extent of the front thereof, not less than 20 feet in width, was heard and determined by me; and upon such hearing, the appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and I adjudged him to pay the sum of 10s. and costs, and in default of payment, &c.

If the Court should consider it desirable, it may be assumed that I find all the facts found by me in the case submitted to the Court, as to the offence under the 101st and 99th sections of the act, as facts also found in this case.

The facts found by me as to the case under the 97th section are as follows. The words of the 97th section of the act are: "That any building after the commencement of this act built, or any buildings after the commencement of this act rebuilt, except on the site of a building used, immediately before pulling down thereof, as a dwelling-house, or any part thereof respectively, or any building before the commencement of this act built, and not then used as a dwelling-house, or any part thereof, shall not, without the previous consent of the local board, be used as a dwelling-house, except only during such time as there is adjoining or belonging thereto or occupied therewith either a street or a clear open space in and to the full extent of the front thereof, and of not less than 20 feet in width."

I find that the appellant has recently built four dwelling-houses in Villa Place, not on the site of any dwelling-house previously pulled down; that legal proceedings have recently been taken by the respondents against the appellant for commencing such four houses before the plan of such houses had received their approval. That subsequently to the conviction of the appellant in such proceedings, the appellant completed his houses and has since caused the same to be used as dwelling-houses without the previous consent of the respondents. I find, also, that there are houses in Villa Place opposite to the four houses recently erected by the appellant, and that such opposite houses were built prior to the passing of the Hull Improvement Act, 1854, and have been continuously and are now occupied by different tenants. I find, also, that Villa Place is entered from the Hessle Road, and such entrance for the space of 56 feet is 10 feet 6 inches wide, and bounded on the west side by a dead wall, and on the east side by the west end of a dwelling-house which faces the Hessle Road; that Villa Place commences at the end of such 56 feet from the Hessle Road, and previously to the erection of the said four houses by the appellant consisted on the west side of a row of ten houses, and on the east side of open palisadings which were the boundaries of gardens belonging to certain houses which were in a parallel line to, but at a distance of 60 feet and upwards from, the row of houses on the west side of Villa Place; that from such palisades to such row of houses on the west side of Villa Place there was a space of 17 feet; that there are no houses on the east side of the said space of 17 feet in a line with such palisades, except those recently built by the appellant; that such 17 feet space is bounded on the west side by the said row of ten houses, and on the east side by the palisades and boundaries of the said gardens, and by the said four houses built by the appellant, which are in a continuation of the line of such palisades; that part of such 17 feet is appropriated as gardens or inclosures in front of the said row of ten houses on the west side of Villa Place of the width of 4 feet, which said gardens are bounded on the east for the whole length of such ten houses by an iron railing set in stone, and part of such 17 feet is appropriated as a flagged footway, of the width of 2 feet or thereabouts, adjoining such iron railing for the whole length of such row of houses, and the remainder of such space of 10 feet 6 inches bounded on the east in part by the said palisades in front of the gardens, on the east side of such road, and in the other part by the said four houses built by the appellant. I find, also, that at the end of such ten houses farthest from Hessle Road there is a wall built partially across such space of 17 feet to the extent of (the said small 4 feet gardens and flaggings) 6 feet or thereabouts, leaving a gateway of the width of 10 feet or thereabouts (in continuation of the road, 10 feet 6 inches wide, already described), through which carts and carriages can pass to the parts beyond; that at present the parts beyond are not built upon on the west side, and carts and carriages passing through such gateway as aforesaid can turn so as to go back to the Hessle Road; but I have no evidence before me as to the ownership of such parts beyond, nor as to the right of carts and carriages having business at any of the houses in Villa Place to pass through such gateway for the purpose of turning as aforesaid.

Upon these facts, I decided that there was neither a street, nor a clear open space adjoining or belonging to the said four houses or occupied therewith, in and to the full extent of the front thereof, and of not less than 20 feet in width, the only space in front thereof (including garden, flagging and roadway) being only 17 feet from the appellant's dwelling-houses to the opposite dwelling-houses.

The questions for the Court are: First, whether upon the above statement of facts there was, in point of law, adjoining or belonging to the said four houses, or occupied therewith, a street; secondly, whether, if so, it is necessary that such street, to the full extent of the front of the said four houses, should be of not less than 20 feet; thirdly, whether upon the above statement of facts, I was right in my decision that, in point of law, an offence has been committed by the appellant by causing his houses to be used without the previous consent of the respondents.

This case was argued, on the 9th of June (previously to the judgment in the first case), before Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., and Channell, B., by—

T. P. Thompson, for the appellant, who contended that the case was not within the 103rd section, for "using a building as a dwelling-house" was not "making" it, or "suffering it to continue," within the meaning of the penalty clause, and that therefore the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to convict the appellant; that the appellant had committed no offence under the 97th section of the act, as that part of the section under which he had been convicted does not apply to the user of buildings built for dwelling-houses; that there was no evidence (nor was it found as a fact) that the appellant used any of the houses as dwelling-houses; that Villa Place was a street within the meaning of the exception in the 97th section, and that it was not necessary for the purposes of that exception that the street should be 20 feet wide; and that, the plan of the appellant's buildings not having been altered by the respondents during fourteen days after they had received it from the appellant, they must be considered as having approved of it, and as having given their consent to it. He commented on the hardship of restraining a man thus in the use he might make of his property, citing the words of Pollock, C.B., in Shiel v. the Mayor of Sunderland (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 215).

Mellish (with whom was Philbrick), for the respondents, contended that there was not, on the facts found in the case, a street in front of the appellant's four houses, such as is required by the act; that, even if there was a street, it was not of the width required by the 97th section; that, on the facts found, the appellant had caused his houses to be used contrary to the provisions of the 97th section.

[The Court intimated that they were clearly of opinion that the appellant had committed an offence under the 97th section.]

That being so, the appellant was rightly convicted in the penalty, for the words in the 103rd section were clearly intended by the legislature to include all offences enumerated in the previous sections to the 103rd, and, among them, the offence of which the appellant has been guilty under the 97th section.

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered as follows on the 23rd of June.—

BRAMWELL, B.—In this case my Lord Chief Baron, my Brother Channell

and myself are of opinion, I believe I may say on the same grounds, that our judgment should be given for the appellant; that is to say, that the conviction cannot be sustained. I may say that every point was disposed of upon the hearing, except one, upon which we think judgment should be given for the appellant.

The matter may be very shortly stated. The offences under the 97th section of the Kingston-upon-Hull Improvement Act are not comprehended in the penalty clause, the 103rd section. The offence under the 97th section, which the appellant has committed, is an offence of "using as a dwelling-house, without the consent of the local board, a house without a street or clear open space, to the full extent in front thereof, of not less than 20 feet in length." Of that he has been convicted; and we think the penalty clause does not apply to it, for this reason: the penalty clause says, "any sewer, drain, privy, cesspool, ashpit or building" (which, we think, would apply to a house) "to be made, or suffered to continue, contrary to any of the provisions in this act," then the person shall be subject to a penalty. We think that the expressions there shew that there can be no "suffering to continue" contrary to the act, except there be a "making" contrary to the act, and that if a person could not be liable to the penalty of 5l. for every such offence, neither can he be liable every day, after the first, during which it continues, to a sum not exceeding 10s. In other words, we think there is no offence within this section, unless it is an offence where the building can be "made" contrary to the act, as well as "continued," and where the offender, or some offender, would be liable for an original making, as well as the same offender or some other for a continuing. We think—I was going to say with some confidence—that the using of a building as a dwelling-house without this prescribed space is certainly not a making (and it could not be a making within the 103rd section), and therefore cannot be a continuing contrary to the provisions in the 103rd section of that act. We think, therefore, that the penalty clause does not apply to that offence of which the appellant has been convicted, and the only proceedings that can be taken against him are those which can be taken in the case of a man infringing an act of parliament where no specific penalty is provided for the offence.

CHANNELL, B.—I concur in the judgment just delivered. It is the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron and myself, as well as of my Brother Bramwell. I wish only to add this: that I have given the case great attention, and it has been one to me of a very anxious kind; but, having decided as we did upon the argument, that the appellant had committed an offence against the act (under the 97th section), I was extremely desirous, if I could, to concur in the view which my Brother Martin has taken, because, having decided the appellant to be guilty of the offence, it would be most desirable to bring him under the 103rd section, so as to hold him liable to the penalty, and not to leave him (as he is now left) to the process of an indictment because his offence is not within the 103rd section. But, for the reasons upon which the judgment mainly proceeds, I confess I think that the language of the 103rd section is not large enough to include this case, and I am therefore obliged to concur in the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron and my Brother Bramwell.

MARTIN, B.—I own I very much regret this decision, as it seems to me to be the result of a most astute verbal criticism upon a clause in the act which was clearly intended, as it appears to me, to cover this case. It is merely held not to do so in consequence of an alleged defect of language in it. The facts are these: It is made an offence, by the 97th section of the Hull Improvement Act, to use as a dwelling-house, without the consent of the local board, a house which has not adjoining to it a street or open space of not less than 20 feet. That is the offence, and the statement of the learned Magistrate which was submitted to us, shews clearly that this was a house of that character, and was directly contrary (and admittedly contrary) to the plain enactment of the legislature. The question is, whether or not the building, by using this house as a dwelling-house, is a building "made or suffered to continue," contrary to the terms of the section imposing the penalty. I think it was. It seems to me that if it was used as a dwelling-house, it was thereby made a building for dwelling in, contrary to the statute, and that if a part had been an office or an outhouse, or anything of that sort, and if it had been converted into this dwelling-house, and had not this required space of 20 feet before it, it would be thereby made a building, that is to say, a building for dwelling, which would be contrary to the act.

I am satisfied the legislature intended to impose a penalty upon all offences contrary to the provisions contained in the sections from 88. to 102. inclusive, and in my judgment it would be mercy to the appellant and to others similarly circumstanced so to hold, rather than subject them to the peril of indictments to be preferred and to be carried on at the expense of the town of Hull. I am quite prepared to hold that the offence was within the 103rd section³; and it appears to me, therefore, that I should affirm the conviction.

Judgment for the appellant.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 8, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. THE INHABITANTS OF THE PARISH OF ST. LEONARD, SHOREDITCH.

35 L. J. M.C. 48; 6 B. & S. 784; L. R. 1 Q.B. 21; 13 L. T. 278; 14 W. R. 55;
12 Jur. N.S. 292.

See R. v. Stepney Guardians, [1885] E. R. A.; 54 L. J. M.C. 12; 52 L. T. 959 (C. A.).

Order of Removal—Irremovability—Break of Residence—9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1.

POOR LAW.—A pauper resides in the parish where his or her place of habitation is, whether such habitation consists of a house or lodging or of a place of shelter in the open air.

The residence of a pauper in a parish, within the meaning of the statutes 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1. and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1, is not broken by reason of the involuntary and temporary absence of the pauper from the parish by night, when the pauper has the intention of returning—and does return in the day-time—from day to day.

A pauper lived for more than three years in lodgings in a parish, and then, from want, was compelled to give them up, and wandered, houseless, about the parish. She slept one night on a door-step in the parish, and for the next twenty-one days wandered about, chiefly in the parish, and went at night to sleep at a refuge for the houseless poor out of the parish, returning in the day to the parish:—Held, that her residence was not broken.

(3) The 103rd section enacts that if any sewer, drain, privy, cesspool, ashpit, building or work be made or suffered to continue contrary to any of the provisions of this Act, or if any person without the consent of the local board make, rebuild, clear out, unstop, or in anywise alter any sewer, &c., which has been ordered by them not to be so made, &c., every person so offending shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, and for every day after the first during which the offence continues a sum not exceeding 10*s.*

This was a CASE stated by the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, on an appeal, heard before them, wherein the churchwardens of the poor of St. Dionis Backchurch, in the city of London, were appellants, and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, were respondents, against a warrant or order of removal made by one of the stipendiary Magistrates of the metropolis sitting at Worship Street, for the removal of Sarah Broad, widow, from the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, to the parish of St. Dionis Backchurch. The Sessions quashed the order of removal, subject to a case setting forth the following facts:

The last legal settlement of the pauper was in the parish of St. Dionis Backchurch (the appellants). The only ground of appeal was that the pauper resided in the respondent parish, and in the union in which that parish is included, for three years next before the application for the order of removal. The application for the order of removal was made on the 25th of February, 1864. The pauper had resided at various places in the respondent parish for about sixteen years previous to and until the month of September or October, 1863; but in such month of September or October, in consequence of illness, whilst lodging in the last-mentioned parish, she went into St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in the city of London, but left at her last-mentioned lodging such articles of furniture as she then had, intending to return to it. The pauper remained in the hospital till near Christmas, 1863; and on the day on which she left the hospital she returned to her lodging, and then sold her articles of furniture in order to pay the rent which had accumulated and other debts. She then left her lodging, and resided in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, with the person who bought her furniture, for a week, when, being destitute, she wandered about in the parish of Shoreditch and out of it, and slept on the steps of a house in that parish the night before she obtained shelter in a refuge for the houseless poor, where she slept for twenty-one successive nights, her ticket of admission having been renewed at the end of the first seven days, and again at the end of fourteen days, such renewal being necessary according to the rules of the refuge. The refuge is situated out of the parish of Shoreditch, in the adjoining parish of St. Luke. It is supported by voluntary subscriptions, and is opened during the winter for the purpose of receiving houseless persons, who are sheltered there and are provided with a sleeping place and a ration of bread. During the period of her being thus sheltered, she, in the day-time, wandered about, chiefly in the parish of Shoreditch, until she met a gentleman who knew her, and endeavoured to procure her admission into the Shoreditch workhouse; but she was refused admission there, and then slept for two nights in the parish of Shoreditch, but on again applying was admitted into the workhouse of that parish.

It was contended, on behalf of the appellants, that upon these facts the said pauper was irremovable, by virtue of having resided in the respondents' parish for more than three years next before the application for the order of removal.

It was contended, for the respondents, that the residence had been broken.

The Court of Quarter Sessions were of opinion that the pauper had no intention of permanently leaving the parish of Shoreditch, but that she was driven to do so in the manner herein stated by being destitute and houseless, and they quashed the order of removal.

The question for the opinion of the Court was,—Whether the pauper was irremovable from the respondent parish by virtue of having resided therein for more than three years next before the order of removal. If such question was answered in the affirmative, the order of Sessions, quashing the order of removal, was to be confirmed; if in the negative, the order of Sessions was to be quashed, and the order of removal to be confirmed.

Huddleston, for the appellants, in support of the order of Sessions.—

The pauper resided more than three years in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and there was no break in that residence under the circumstances. The fact that she slept at night at the refuge out of the parish was compulsory, and the day-time of that period she spent chiefly in the respondent parish.

Taylor, for the respondents, in support of the order of removal.—There was a break of residence during the twenty-one days the pauper slept at the refuge out of the respondent parish, because, inasmuch as she had at that time no place of abode, lodgings or otherwise, in the parish, her place of sleeping must be taken to be her place of residence. It is necessary for the continuance of the residence constructively that when the pauper was physically out of the parish she should have had some place of abode in the parish in which she had a right to reside if she had so desired—The Queen v. the Guardians of Stourbridge Union (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 179).

[BLACKBURN, J.—The distinction between that case and this is, that there, during the time constituting the break of residence, the pauper was physically away from the parish; but here the pauper was, during the day-time, wandering about actually in the parish of Shoreditch. COCKBURN, C.J.—The pauper had no place of residence out of Shoreditch to go to. BLACKBURN, J.—Must it not be taken that the pauper's residence in St. Leonard's continued till she acquired another?]

Her place of residence during the twenty-one days was where she slept—namely, at the refuge. Where a man sleeps is his home if he has no other place whereat he has a right to sleep. It is submitted that the pauper by sleeping out of the parish, even if it had been for only one night, having no place of abode at that time in the parish, has broken her residence in the parish.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The place of sleeping is only evidence of residence; but here the pauper slept out of the parish involuntarily and under compulsion, and returned in the day-time to the parish. SHEE, J., referred to Hartfield v. Rotherfield (17 Q.B. Rep. 746).]

The cases of a break of residence in a prison or hospital are met by an express proviso in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1; but for that proviso there would have been break of residence, according to Hartfield v. Rotherfield (17 Q.B. Rep. 746). It is submitted that to establish constructive residence in a parish there must be an intention to return. The absence must be temporary only, and there must be a place in the parish in which residence might rightfully be had at any time during the absence.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think the order of Sessions was right, and that the pauper was irremovable from the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch. To constitute a residence for three years within a parish, within the statutes 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1. and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1, it is not necessary that the residence should be in a house or place appropriated for the purposes of residence. There are, unhappily, people who are obliged to seek a necessary shelter in the open air, or, as has been suggested, under the dry arches of bridges. Such people have no other habitation, and sleep how they best can, and the parish of such habitation is then their place of residence, and for that purpose persons having their place of sleeping in the open air are precisely on the same footing as persons sleeping in a house or within walls. And I think such residence will not be broken by a temporary absence for convenience. In this case, for sixteen years this pauper lived in the parish of St. Leonard's. She was turned out of her lodgings in the parish and then wandered about, chiefly in the parish, without any place to sleep at in the parish. She slept one night on the steps of a house in the parish and then went for shelter and food to the refuge out of the parish, but not with the intention to abandon her parish of St. Leonard's, for she came back to the parish in the day-time, and as soon as she was compelled to leave the refuge she tried to get, and ultimately got, admission into the workhouse of that parish, and continued there until the order was made for her removal. I think that under the circumstances there was no interruption of the residence in St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, any more than there would have been if the pauper had had a house in the parish and left it for a temporary purpose with the intention of coming back to it. It was said in argument that in all the cases where the residence had been held to be constructive, there was a place of residence in the parish during the temporary absence from it; and therefore that as such place of residence was wanting here the residence was broken; but I think that objection begs the question whether there can be a residence by sleeping in the open air. As, however, a residence of that nature is, in my opinion, as much a residence as if it were in a house, and as the absence here was only for a temporary purpose, the pauper has never broken her residence, and is irremovable.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that under the circumstances there was no ceasing to reside. Where a person sleeps is a matter affording an important element in determining where a person resides; but is by no means conclusive on the point.

MELLOR, J.—I agree. Mr. Tayler's argument would lead to the conclusion that the most destitute people could seldom acquire irremovability.

SHEE, J., concurred, and referred to The Queen v. the Directors of Brighton Poor (4 El. & B. 236; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 41).

Order of Sessions confirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

DEARDEN, appellant, v. TOWNSEND, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 50; L. R. 1 Q.B. 10; 13 L. T. 323; 14 W. R. 53.
12 Jur. N.S. 120.

Referred to, London, Brighton and South Coast Railway v. Watson, [1878] E. R. A.; 47 L. J. C.P. 634; 3 C.P. D. 429; 39 L. T. 199; 26 W. R. 856 (C.P. D): affirmed, [1879] E. R. A.; 48 L. J. C.P. 316; 4 C.P. D. 118; 40 L. T. 183; 27 W. R. 614 (C. A.). Approved, Saunders v. South-Eastern Railway Co., [1880] E. R. A.; 49 L. J. Q.B. 761; 5 Q.B. D. 456; 43 L. T. 281; 29 W. R. 56 (Q.B. D.). See Dyson v. London and North-Western Railway, [1881] E. R. A.; 50 L. J. M.C. 78; 7 Q.B. D. 32; 44 L. T. 609; 29 W. R. 565.

Railways Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20.)—By-Law—Construction—Payment of Fare.

CARRIERS.—The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 103. enacts that, if any person travel in any carriage of the company without having paid his fare, with intent to avoid payment thereof, or if any person having paid his fare for a certain distance, knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, he shall forfeit, &c. A by-law was made by a railway company, under the powers of their special act and of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. in the terms following: "No passenger will be allowed to enter any carriage used on the railway, or to travel upon the railway, without having first paid his fare and obtained a ticket. . . . Each passenger on payment of his fare . . . will be furnished with a ticket, specifying the class of carriage and the distance for which, or places for travelling between which, the payment has been made, . . . which ticket such passenger is to shew whenever required by the guard in charge of the train, or some other servant of the company, and which ticket such passenger is also to deliver up before leaving the company's premises, upon demand, to the guard, or other servant of the company authorized to collect tickets. Any passenger not producing his ticket as aforesaid, or not delivering up his ticket as aforesaid, will be required to pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started, and in default of payment thereof shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 40s."

A passenger took at E. a return ticket from E. to S. and back. He travelled to S. and back again to E.; but instead of getting out at E., travelled, without taking a fresh ticket, to N. When he got out at N. he shewed his return ticket to E., and offered to pay the full local fare from E. to N. The company's officer demanded payment of the full fare from S. to N., which the passenger refused to pay.

Held, that under the above circumstances the passenger ought not to be convicted, under the above by-law, for not producing and delivering up a ticket to N., or for not paying his fare from S. to N., in the absence of any intention to defraud.

This was a case stated by Justices of the Peace for the county of Lancaster, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of this Court, under the following circumstances: George Dearden, the above-named appellant, was the station-master of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, at their station at New Church, in Rossendale, in the county of Lancaster. Joshua Townsend, the above-named respondent, is a gentleman residing at the Home, in Rossendale aforesaid. At a petty session holden at Rawtenstall, in the said county, on the 29th of October, 1864, before four Justices of the Peace, an information was preferred by the appellant, as agent for and on behalf of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, against the respondent, for that he, being a passenger in a certain carriage then being on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, did not, on being required so to do by the guard, or other servant of the said railway company, authorized to collect tickets, produce and deliver up, before leaving the company's premises, upon demand, at the New Church Station, in the parish of Whalley, upon the said railway, his ticket as a passenger by the said train, to wit, from the Ewood Bridge Station, upon the said railway, to the New Church Station aforesaid, nor did he, the respondent, pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started, to wit, from Salford, in the said county, on being required so to do; contrary to the by-laws, made pursuant to the several acts of parliament relating to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company. The Justices dismissed the information, on the ground that the by-law given in evidence by the appellant to support the information did not apply to the case; but, upon the application of the appellant, stated and signed the following

CASE.

The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company have duly made and published, under the powers of the said company and of the various statutes relating to the same, divers by-laws for the regulation of their several lines of railway; and by the by-law on which the present charge was framed. "No passenger will be allowed to enter any carriage used on the railway, or to travel therein upon the railway, without having first paid his fare and obtained a ticket, or (as the case may be) without having paid for and obtained a contract or season ticket, giving him authority to travel, during a stipulated period of time. Each passenger, on payment of his fare, or the price of his contract or season ticket, will be furnished with a ticket specifying the class of carriage and the distance for which or places for travelling between which the payment has been made, which ticket (whether a contract or season ticket or otherwise) such passenger is to shew, whenever required by the guard in charge of the train, or some other servant of the company, and which ticket (if other than a contract or season ticket) such passenger is also to deliver up, before leaving the company's premises, upon demand, to the guard or other servant of the company authorized to collect tickets. Any passenger not producing his ticket as aforesaid (whether it be a contract or season ticket or otherwise), or any passenger not delivering up his ticket as aforesaid (if it be other than a contract or season ticket), will be required to pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started, and in default of payment thereof, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 40s."

The company are the proprietors of a line of railway between (amongst other places) the towns of Salford and New Church, both in the county of Lancaster. Upon the said line of railway, and between the stations of Salford and New Church, there is a station called Ewood Bridge, from which last mentioned station the company has been in the habit of issuing return tickets at reduced fares, to Salford and back.

The said respondent, upon the day mentioned in the information, duly took at Ewood Bridge a return ticket, of the first class, thence to Salford and back. He travelled upon the said line of railway to Salford and returned thence upon the return journey; instead of alighting at Ewood Bridge, and delivering up at that station his return ticket, he proceeded, in company with a friend, to New Church aforesaid, without re-booking or obtaining a fresh ticket, or the leave of any of the company's officers. No demand was made upon him at Ewood Bridge by any person for the production or delivery up of any ticket. On arrival of the train at New Church, the respondent produced and delivered up to the authorized servant of the company, his return ticket from Salford to Ewood Bridge, and then tendered to him in addition the full local fare charged by the company for the conveyance of a first-class passenger between the two stations, Ewood Bridge and New Church, but the same was refused.

The respondent did not produce or deliver up any ticket authorizing him to travel to New Church or any ticket whatever other than the said return ticket. The respondent, upon delivering up to the company's servant the return ticket, stated to him (as the fact was) that no other ticket issued by the said company was in his possession. The authorized officer of the said company thereupon demanded from the respondent the amount of the fare from Salford (the place whence the train had originally started) to New Church, which the respondent refused to pay, and has not since paid. The respondent repeatedly offered to the said officer the full first-class fare from Ewood Bridge to New Church, and was always ready and willing to pay the same. There was no intention on the part of the respondent to defraud the railway company, nor was any such intention charged in the information.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether under the circumstances of this case the determination of the Justices in dismissing the said information was erroneous in point of law.

Gray (Pope with him), for the appellant.—The respondent has brought himself within the terms of the by-law. The by-law is intended to apply to the case of a man who does not produce his ticket when properly demanded, whether because he has not got one or from any other cause. Then a man who does not produce a proper ticket is in the same position as one who has no ticket at all. This case, therefore, comes to the same thing as if the respondent had started from Ewood Bridge without a ticket, and thereupon, when he gets out at New Church he does not produce a ticket entitling him to travel to New Church, and thereupon becomes liable to pay his fare from Salford.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If this be the true construction, it is a most unreasonable by-law.]

In The Queen v. Frere (24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 68; s. c. 4 El. & B. 598) a very similar by-law to this was deemed by Lord Campbell to be "an excessively reasonable by-law."

Mellish (Holkar with him), for the respondent.—In the first place, this by-law does not bear the construction put upon it, and, in the second place, if it did bear that construction, it does not apply to the facts of this case. The attempt to make it applicable would raise an important question as to its validity. These by-laws are framed under the powers given in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, by the 108th and 109th sections of that act. The 108th section says that "it shall be lawful for the company from time to time, subject to the provisions in this and the special act contained, to make regulations for," amongst other purposes, "generally regulating the travelling upon, or using and working of the railway;" and by the 109th section, "for the better enforcing the observance of all or any such regulations, it shall be lawful for the company, subject to the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, to make by-laws, and from time to time to repeal or alter such by-laws and make others, provided that such by-laws be not repugnant to the laws of that part of the United Kingdom where the same are to have effect, or to the provisions of this or the special act." Then the general act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 103.) enacts that, "if any person travel, or attempt to travel, in any carriage of the company, or of any other company or party using the railway, without having previously paid his fare, with intent to avoid payment thereof, or if any person having paid his fare for a certain distance, knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance, without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof, . . . every such person shall for every such offence forfeit to the company a sum not exceeding 40s." Now if the construction sought to be put upon this by-law be correct, the by-law has the effect of making that to be an offence without any intention to defraud which the act only makes an offence when the intention to defraud exists, and therefore the by-law would be repugnant to the provisions of that act, and void and illegal on that ground; but my contention is that, in reality, the by-law applies only to a person who has taken a ticket and has it in his pocket or possession, but who will not produce it when required, either because its production would put him to trouble or inconvenience, or because he wishes to use it to travel with again, and is intended to make contumacy of that description punishable by the penalty imposed thereby.

[MELLOR, J.—By-laws are only intended to be made for the convenient regulation of the traffic on railways, and not to give the companies the power to create penal offences.]

Further, when the by-law provides that the company shall provide the passenger with a ticket, which ticket the passenger is to shew, and which ticket he is to deliver up, and then enacts that any passenger not producing his ticket or not delivering up his ticket on demand, shall pay, &c., the language undoubtedly supposes that the passenger has his ticket and will not, for some reason or other, shew it.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the Magistrates were right, and that this was a case in which the penalty could not be inflicted under the by-law in question. On the face of this case, this gentleman, the respondent, was perfectly innocent of any intention to defraud. He took a return ticket from Ewood Bridge to Salford and back, and on his return journey, circumstances occurred which made him wish to continue his journey beyond the station from which he had started. If the by-law, upon its proper construction, were applicable to this case, I should say that it would be bad, as being repugnant to the general act of parliament. That act provides in the 103rd section for this offence, by enacting that, "if any person having paid his fare for a certain distance, knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof,"—such person shall be liable to a penalty. The intention of the person offending is therefore made by the statute an essential ingredient in the offence. But if the company by a by-law were to constitute the same state of facts an offence, and omit the element of intention, I think they would then not be making a by-law subject to the general act, but legislating in a sense repugnant to its provisions.

I am of opinion, however, that the construction which the appellant would put upon this by-law is not the true one, and that Mr. Mellish is right in his contention, viz. that it is meant to apply to persons who have taken a ticket and have it in their possession, but who will not produce it when required. No doubt if a person travelling on this railway will not produce his ticket when demanded by the guard or other authorized person, the company would be right in assuming that he had a ticket and would not produce it, and in requiring him to pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started; but here the respondent produces his ticket, such as had been given him by the company, when demanded. That was a ticket which authorized him to travel from Ewood Bridge to Salford, and back to Ewood Bridge. Then the question comes to this,—whether the respondent was travelling from Ewood Bridge to New Church without having previously paid his fare and obtained a ticket? But that offence is provided for by the statute, and thereupon the question of intention becomes material. The company cannot apply this by-law to such a state of facts as the present. For these reasons I think the Magistrates were right in refusing to convict.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. When the by-law is narrowly examined, it appears not to be applicable to a person who has entered the company's carriage without a ticket. I think the by-law contemplates a person lawfully in the train with a ticket, and says that he is to produce his ticket when required and give it up. The 103rd section of the general act is intended to meet the case of persons travelling without a ticket; but to constitute an offence under that section there must be an intention to defraud. The section under which the by-law is framed gives power to the company to make regulations for various purposes; such as the speed and times of arrival and departure of trains, the loading and unloading of carriages, the receipt of goods, the prevention of the smoking of tobacco and other nuisances, and, lastly, for regulating the carrying on of the traffic on the railway; but it is no part of the intention of that statute to give the company power to create penal consequences to attach to a person travelling innocently without a ticket for part of his journey.

LUSH, J.—I think the Justices were right in saying that the by-law had no application to this case. The statute has provided for the cases of a person travelling without having paid his fare, or, having paid his fare for a part of the distance, proceeding beyond such distance without having paid his fare for the additional distance, and has made a fraudulent intention essential in either case. Now, if the company had made a by-law that if a person should innocently continue in the carriage beyond the distance for which he had paid his fare, he should be subject to a penalty, that would be beyond their power. The power given them is only to make by-laws to regulate and expedite their traffic arrangements. If we read the by-law, the first part provides that no one will be allowed to enter a carriage without having first paid his fare and taken a ticket; then, I apprehend, if a person does so, he may be turned out. All that is left of the by-law is applied to the use which the passenger is to make of his ticket after he has provided himself with one, that is to say, he is to produce it to the guard of the train, or some authorized servant of the company, when required so to do, and if he does not do so, he is to pay the fare from the place whence the train originally started, and, in default, pay 40s. That is, I think, the reasonable construction of the by-law.

*Determination of Justices affirmed.*¹

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 15, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. THE TOWNSHIP OF BOLTON-LE-SANDS.

35 L. J. M.C. 54; 13 L. T. 523; 14 W. R. 177; 12 Jur. N.S. 371.

Pauper—Union—Irremovability—24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1.—9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1.—27 & 28 Vict. c. 105. s. 1.

POOR LAW.—The effect of the statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 105. s. 1, in connexion with 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1, is to render a pauper irremovable from his parish of residence within a union to his parish of settlement in the same union, although his term of three years' residence is computed by the time during which he lived in two or more parishes of the union, neither of which is his parish of settlement.

The decision in the case of The Queen v. Great Salkeld (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 185) is rendered of no effect by the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 105. s. 1.

On appeal to the Quarter Sessions for the county palatine of Lancaster against an order for the removal of Elizabeth Toulmin, widow, and her five children, out of the township of Poulton Bare and Torrisholme, in that county, into the township of Bolton-le-Sands, in the same county, the order was confirmed, subject to the following

CASE.

The township of Bolton-le-Sands and the township of Poulton Bare and Torrisholme are, with the parish of Heysham, members of the Caton (Gilbert's) Union. The place of settlement of the paupers was in the township of Bolton-le-Sands, and they were removable thereto unless they had acquired irremovability from the township of Poulton Bare and Torrisholme.

William Toulmin, the deceased husband of the pauper Elizabeth Toulmin, was settled in Bolton-le-Sands, and went with his wife (now the pauper widow), and their children, to reside in the parish of Heysham, in the spring of the year 1855; and they resided in Heysham without relief till the end of July, 1858, when they went to reside in the township of Poulton Bare and Torrisholme, where they continued to reside without relief until the 3rd of November, 1860. There was an unbroken and continued residence, without relief, for upwards of five years in the parish of Heysham and the township of Poulton Bare. On the 3rd of November, 1860, William Toulmin, being sick, was temporarily relieved by the township of Poulton Bare, and this relief was continued by the same township till about March, 1861, when his sickness became permanent. From March, 1861, until his death, in January, 1863, he was relieved, for himself and family, by the township of Bolton-le-Sands. No part of the five years' residence next previous to the relief had been in the township of Bolton-le-Sands; and since William Toulmin's death.

(1) See Jennings v. the Great Northern Railway Company, 35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 15.

and up to the date of the said order of removal, the pauper Elizabeth and her children have been chargeable to and relieved by the township of Poulton Bare.

If the Court should be of opinion that, under the above facts, the paupers were irremovable, then the order of removal was to be quashed. But if the Court should be of opinion that they were removable, then the order was to be confirmed.

Maule, in support of the order.—It is submitted that the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 105. s. 1.¹ has no application to this case, and that that statute, though no doubt passed to reverse the decision of this Court in the case of The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Great Salkeld (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 185), has not had that effect. Notwithstanding that act, a residence of three years, made up of the time spent in two parishes of the same union, neither of them being the parish of settlement, does not confer irremovability within the ambit of the same union. Such was the effect of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1. and the case of The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Great Salkeld (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 185), and that decision remains so far unimpaired.

F. M. White, for the appellants.—It is submitted that the case of The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Great Salkeld (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 185) is of no authority since the statute of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 105. The actual decision of the question stated for the Court in that case is expressly reversed by that act; therefore, unless the ratio decidendi of that case, as distinct from the immediate decision, is to prevail, this order must be quashed.

Cockburn, C.J.—I think our judgment should be for the appellants. We need not re-consider the judgment of the Court in The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Great Salkeld (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 185) inasmuch as a recent act of parliament (The 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79) has virtually put an end to all these questions. The act of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 105. was, no doubt, passed to obviate what the framer of that act believed to be the effect of that decision; and it is true that the question put to the Court in that case was whether the residence in the parish of settlement should count in the calculation of the three years' residence, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, which in that case had to be made up of such residence in part, and in part of residence in another parish in the same union; but the Court decided on the much larger ground, that when the parish of settlement to which the removal was to take place and the parish of residence in which the irremovability was alleged to have been acquired were in the same union, the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. had no application, and my mind in that case was much impressed with the idea that the doctrine of irremovability proceeded upon the ground of a respect for local ties and attachments formed by residence, which I thought would not have been affected by removability to the parish of settlement within the ambit of the union of the parish in which the residence was, but would have been torn asunder by a removal altogether out of the union.

The legislature, when they passed the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 105, supposed that the decision was based on the ground that, for the purpose of calculating the time necessary to acquire irremovability, there was a distinction between the residence in the parish of settlement and that in the other parish in the union. The Court, however, did not proceed on that ground, but on the ground that irremovability from one union to another union was intended to be established, whilst it did not intend to affect removability amongst the different parishes in the same union. But the enactment in that statute, in meeting what the legislature erroneously supposed to be the effect of the above decision, has virtually decided the present question, though the facts of the case do not bring it expressly within its terms; for it enacts that the period of residence in the parish of settlement, if in the same union, shall not be excluded in computing the time of residence; so that if we were to hold here that the residence in these two parishes in the union did not create irremovability, then we should have this anomaly, that the same period of residence divided between two parishes in the same union would create irremovability if either of those parishes were the parish of settlement, but would not have that effect if neither of them were so. We cannot, therefore, say that the combined residence in the two parishes, neither of them the parish of settlement, did not in this case confer the status of irremovability.

(1) The terms of the 1st section of the act are, "that in case of any poor person heretofore chargeable or hereafter becoming chargeable in any parish comprised in a union, not being the parish of his settlement, the period of time during which he shall have resided in the parish of the settlement, if in the same union, shall not be excluded in the computation of the time of residence required to render him exempt from removal under the statutes above referred to."

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Order quashed.

[BAIL COURT.]

June 14, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. THE OVERSEERS OF CHORLTON-ON-MEDLOCK.

35 L. J. M.C. 56; 12 L. T. 581; 13 W. R. 925.

Parochial Assessments—Re-deposit of Valuation List—Assessment Committee—Overseers—Stat. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103. s. 21.

POOR LAW. RATES AND RATING.—It is the duty of the overseers of a parish, under section 21. of the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862, to deposit the valuation list, after alteration by the Assessment Committee, in the place in which the rate-books are kept, and to give due notice thereof in the same manner as in the case of the original deposit of the valuation list, pursuant to section 17. of the act.

This was a rule for a mandamus to the overseers of the township of Chorlton-on-Medlock to deposit the amended valuation list of the township in the place in which the rate-books were kept.

The valuation list had been duly made and deposited in the first instance, under section 17. of the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862, (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103). Alterations were afterwards made in it by the Assessment Committee, which necessitated its being re-deposited for inspection, under section 21. of the same act.

Mellish, on behalf of the Assessment Committee, contended that section 21. of the statute imposed the duty of re-depositing the list on the overseers.

Bere, for the overseers, shewed cause in the first instance, and argued from the express words of sect. 21, that the committee "shall cause the valuation list, with such alteration or insertion, to be deposited for inspection," that the duty lay on the committee, who should perform it by their clerk.

CROMPTON, J.—By the 17th section of the act, the overseers are to deposit the valuation list in the place in which the rate-books are deposited, and to give notice thereof as in the case of the allowance of a poor-rate. By section 21, the Assessment Committee are to cause the valuation list, after it has been amended, to be deposited for inspection in the "manner hereinbefore provided concerning the valuation list." That is, in the same manner as in the case of a valuation list under section 17, which is by the overseers. The depositing the list, and giving the required notices, are essentially functions of an overseer. It would be inconvenient to have that duty thrown upon the clerk to the Assessment Committee, and I cannot suppose that such was the intention of the legislature. Section 21. impliedly, in my opinion, authorizes the Assessment Committee to cause the overseers to perform these duties. No person but the overseers have any power of meddling with the depository in which the rate-books are kept. The overseers are the persons who under section 21, according to my view of the act, are to make the re-deposit of the altered valuation list, and give the requisite notices, as in the case of the original deposit of the valuation list under section 17.

Rule absolute.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. FISHER.*

35 L. J. M.C. 57; L. R. 1 C.C. 7; 13 L. T. 380; 14 W. R. 58; 10 Cox. C.C. 146.

Malicious Injury—Temporary Damage—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97. s. 15.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner was indicted, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97. s. 15, for maliciously damaging a steam-engine. It was proved that the prisoner had maliciously screwed up parts of the engine so that they would not work, and had reversed the plug of the pump which supplied the engine with water, and that the steam-engine was thus rendered useless and liable to burst:—Held, that the prisoner was properly convicted.

This was a case reserved for the judgment of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved by the Chairman of Quarter Sessions for the western division of the county of Suffolk.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county of Suffolk, held, by adjournment, at Bury St. Edmunds, on the 4th of July, 1865, William Fisher was arraigned upon an indictment framed on the 15th section of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, which charged that he unlawfully, maliciously and feloniously damaged, with intent to destroy or render useless, a certain thrashing-machine, the property of Edward Kersey Green.

At the trial, it was shewn that the engine in question had been under the prisoner's care as engine-driver and servant to the prosecutor, and that on Saturday, the 6th of May, 1865, in consequence of a difference between him and the prosecutor, the prisoner left the prosecutor's service. On the Monday following the prisoner did not come to work; but in the course of the day prosecutor said that he had not a man who could drive the engine, and that he would be glad to take him back. When the prosecutor and his other men went to work the engine, they got up the steam and tried to start it, but found they could not get it to move. They then unscrewed the engine to ascertain the cause, when they discovered that the working parts of the engine had been so tightly screwed up that the steam-power of the engine was not sufficient to set them in motion, and it was proved that this must have been the result of design and not of accident. They also discovered that the plug of the pump which supplies the engine-boiler with cold water had been taken out and replaced, with the wrong side up, so that no water could pass from the pump into the boiler; and this, also, it was deposed, must have been done designedly and could not have been accidental. They further found that the pipe leading from the plug of the pump to the boiler had been stopped up by a piece of stick being thrust up it, so that, even supposing that water could have passed through the plug, it could not have got through the pipe into the boiler. The engine was thus rendered temporarily useless, and it took the prosecutor and his men two hours to get it to work; and it was moreover shewn that if the fire had been kept up the plunger of the pump would have forced the pump off the boiler, and also that the water in the boiler would have become exhausted, and the boiler would have burst, and serious consequences would have ensued. But it was admitted by the prosecutor that when the working parts of the engine had been loosened, the plug taken out and properly replaced, and the obstruction from the pipe had been removed, the engine was just as good as before. Various circumstances tended to shew that these acts had been done by the prisoner. Upon these facts, it was objected, by the counsel for the prisoner, that there had been no offence committed within the meaning of the statute, inasmuch as there had been no actual damage done to the engine. The Court left the case to the jury, and directed them that the preventing the machine from working was "doing damage," and the jury found the prisoner guilty.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., Pigott, B., Shee, J. and Smith, J.

Upon the application of counsel for the prisoner, the Court decided to reserve the question of law, for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, whether, upon the facts stated, the temporary injury to the engine was such a malicious damage as to bring the prisoner under the penalties of the statute, and whether the prisoner was properly convicted.

The prisoner was discharged upon recognizances of bail to appear and receive judgment when called upon.

H. Mills, for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be upheld unless the Court is satisfied that some permanent damage was done to the steam-engine. The plug had only to be taken out and reversed and the engine was as good as ever. There was no evidence of any breaking or cutting. All the cases where persons have been convicted under this act have been cases where there has been some substantial damage requiring repair.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—But the case states that if the plug had not been again reversed the engine would have burst. The reversing the plug is repair.]

If the engine had burst it would have been different. There then would certainly have been damage. In The Queen v. Gray (26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 203; s. c. 1 Dears. & B. 303), which was a conviction under the 1 Vict. c. 85. s. 2, for causing bodily injury to an infant with intent that it should die, it was proved that the prisoner exposed her infant in a field on a cold wet day, with intent that it should die, but the Court held that the conviction could not be sustained, because there was no lesion of any part of the organs of the child. It is clear, therefore, that some injury to the machine ought to have been proved.

Orridge, in support of the conviction, was not called upon to argue.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction was right. The question is, whether the injury which the statute contemplates must be of a permanent kind. We think it need not. In the case of a gun which has been spiked the injury would not be permanent, but the gun would be rendered useless for a time until something be done to it; it may be said to need repair. It is said here that the steam-engine was in no manner injured by what the prisoner did to it; but it needed repair, that is to say, the reversing the plug and loosening the screw, and this would of course take time and labour. It is therefore impossible to say that the machine was not damaged. Indeed, if it had been left in the state in which the prisoner placed it, the evidence is that it would certainly have burst. The several parts of this machine were so misplaced by the prisoner that if the machine had been left to itself it would have been damaged. That in my judgment is doing damage.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. CURGERWEN.*

35 L. J. M.C. 58; L. R. 1 C.C. 1; 13 L. T. 383; 14 W. R. 55; 10 Cox. C.C. 152;
11 Jur. N.S. 984.Distinguished, R. v. Jones, [1883] E. R. A.; 52 L. J. M.C. 96; L. T. 768; 31 W. R. 800.Bigamy—Absence for Seven Years—Knowledge of Accused—Burthen of Proof.

CRIMINAL LAW.—On an indictment for bigamy, it was proved that the prisoner and his wife had lived apart for seven years, and that the prisoner then married again. There was no evidence of the prisoner's knowledge of the existence of his first wife at the time he married again. The prisoner was convicted:—Held, that the burthen of proof that the prisoner did not know that his wife was alive at the time he contracted the second marriage was not on the prisoner, and that the conviction could not be sustained.

This case was reserved by Willes, J.

The accused was tried, before me, at the last Cornwall Assizes, for bigamy, when the question arose whether when a husband and wife had lived apart for seven years and he married again, there being no evidence to shew his knowledge of the existence of his first wife (so to speak), he is liable to be convicted of bigamy, unless he can prove that at the time of the second marriage he did not know of his first wife being alive; in other words, whether the burthen of proof of absence of such knowledge rests upon the prisoner: a question left undecided in The Queen v. Briggs (1 Dears. & B. 98; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 7).

The prisoner was a man-of-war's man. The first marriage was to one Charlotte Curgerwen, on the 1st of September, 1852, at Buryan, in Cornwall. After the marriage, the couple went to Ireland, where the prisoner was then in the Coastguard service, and they lived together until June, 1853, when, in consequence of some disagreement, she left him and returned to her father's house at Buryan. In January, 1854, the prisoner went to Portsmouth, to join a ship-of-war which was proceeding to the Baltic, and was afterwards engaged in the Russian War. Upon that occasion the first wife went to Portsmouth to see the prisoner off, and after doing so, she, in or about March, 1854, returned to her father's house, where she remained without seeing or corresponding with her husband, or, so far as the evidence went, knowing whether he was dead or alive, until shortly before the prosecution. There was no evidence that he had in the mean time ever been near where she lived, or had seen or heard of her or any member of her family, or known whether she was dead or alive. After the war, but at what precise time did not appear, the prisoner returned to England and was again employed in the Coastguard. On the 9th of July, 1862, the prisoner, being then at a Coastguard station at a small place upon the coast of Devon, contracted the second marriage with one Eliza Hardy, and they lived together as man and wife undisturbed until this prosecution. A short time before the prosecution the prisoner was promoted and sent to a station in Cornwall, about 20 miles from where his first wife was living. This led to the proceedings. It appeared, therefore, that the prisoner and his first wife had been living apart for more than eight years at the time of the second marriage, and under circumstances in which it was at the least equally probable that he did not know as that he did know of his first wife being alive, if not, indeed, as I am inclined to think, more probable that he did not know. A statement by the prisoner before the Magistrates was put in, but, fairly construed, it amounted only to an admission of having been married twice, and of his then, that is, when before the Magistrates, knowing that his first wife was alive.

* Coram Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., Pigott, B., Shee, J. and Smith, J.

It was contended for the prisoner that there was no evidence upon which a conviction could properly take place, and that the burthen of proof in the absence of knowledge was not upon the prisoner. Knowing that the question of burthen of proof in these cases was unsettled, I determined in the event of a conviction to reserve these objections, and I directed the jury, in substance, that the fact of the second marriage whilst the first wife was alive made a prima facie case, and that the burthen was upon the prisoner to bring himself within the exception of the statute; and it being clear that the living apart for seven years was proved, they ought to acquit, if they were satisfied that he did not know of his wife being alive within the seven years, and convict if the evidence did not so satisfy them. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and I let him out on bail until the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved was taken upon the propriety of the conviction.

No counsel appeared on either side.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction in this case cannot be sustained. The case, as stated by the learned Judge, is that the accused and his wife had lived apart for more than seven years and that the accused then married again, and that there was no evidence to shew his knowledge of his first wife's being alive at the time he married again, and that the facts shewed that it was equally probable that the accused did not know of his first wife's existence as that he did. The question has been several times raised whether the burthen of proof of the negative is on the accused, or whether the prosecution are bound to prove that the prisoner must have known of the existence of his wife or her husband, as the case may be. In the late edition of Russell on Crimes (1 Russ. on Crimes, 270), by Mr. Greaves, that learned author seems to think the burthen of proof is on the accused. The expression "burthen of proof" is certainly open to objection, and we do not agree in the view of Mr. Greaves. We think it better to follow the rule laid down by my late learned Brother Wightman in The Queen v. Heaton (3 Fost. & Fin. 819), and that by so doing we shall be acting more in conformity with the spirit of the English criminal law.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Conviction quashed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. BEALE.*

35 L. J. M.C. 60; 13 L. T. 335; 14 W. R. 57; 12 Jur. N.S. 12; 10 Cox C.C. 157.

Attempt to carnally know a Girl under Ten Years of Age—Consent of Girl.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner was indicted for unlawfully attempting to have carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of ten years. The evidence was, that the prisoner attempted to have carnal knowledge of the girl, but that she consented to the attempt:—Held, that the fact that the girl consented to the attempt was immaterial, and that the conviction of the prisoner was right.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., B., Shee, J. and Smith, J.

This was a CASE stated for the opinion of the Court, by the Deputy Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions.

Frederick Beale was indicted and tried before me, at the Middlesex Sessions, on the 23rd of August, 1865, for unlawfully attempting to have carnal knowledge of Mary Jane Catherine Green, a child under the age of ten years. The indictment also contained a second count for assaulting the said Mary Jane Catherine Green, with intent to carnally know and abuse her, and a third count for an indecent assault.

Mary Jane Catherine Green proved that she was nearly ten years old; that she lived with her father and mother, and that the prisoner was a lodger in their house. On the day in question she went into his room, when he pulled her between his knees, raised her clothes, took down his trousers, and indecently assaulted her. He hurt her a little, on which she cried out "Oh!" but she did nothing to prevent him, and made no objection to the act. He told her not to tell her mother, and she did not in fact tell of it until some days after, when a discharge was discovered, which the medical man proved to be gonorrhœa. Upon this evidence it was contended by the counsel for the prisoner, that inasmuch as the child had consented to the act done to her, there was no assault in law; an assault implying an act done, with more or less of force used, against the will of the party, and that therefore the prisoner must be acquitted upon the second and third counts, both of which charged assaults. It was also contended, that although it was made a statutable offence to have carnal knowledge of a child under that age, without regard to her consent or non-consent, yet in this case the prisoner, being only indicted for the attempt, could not be convicted upon the first count, because the child could consent to the attempt, although not to the complete offence, and in fact did consent. He cited the recent case of The Queen v. Johnson (10 Cox's Crim. Cas. 114), and contended, also, that upon the authority of The Queen v. Read (1 Den. C.C. 377; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 88), The Queen v. Cockburn (3 Cox's Crim. Cas. 543), and The Queen v. Mehegan (7 Ibid. 145), tender years did not affect the rule.

I directed the jury that if they were satisfied that the girl actually consented to the act being done to her, they should acquit the prisoner; but that "consent" meant a willing mind on her part to allow the act to be done; and that if, from her tender years, not knowing what was being done, she merely submitted without the exercise of any will by her, it would be such an assault in law as would support the indictment.

The jury found the prisoner "Guilty, for that the child was too young to know what it was she was doing, and therefore consented to the act done by the prisoner."

On the application of the counsel for the prisoner I reserved the point, and the questions for the Court are: Whether, upon the facts proved and the finding of the jury that the child consented for the reason stated, the prisoner was rightly convicted of a misdemeanor in attempting to know and abuse a child under ten years of age, as charged in the first count of the indictment, notwithstanding the consent of the child; and also whether he was guilty of an indecent assault.

Prentice, for the prisoner.

F. H. Lewis, in support of the conviction.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction was right. The fact that the girl was a consenting party is quite immaterial. The consent of the girl is immaterial in an indictment charging the commission of the felony of having carnal knowledge; and it must follow that consent is immaterial where the offence charged is the attempt only.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. NAYLOR.*

35 L. J. M.C. 61; L. R. C.C. 4; 13 L. T. 381; 14 W. R. 58; 11 Jur. N.S. 910; 10 Cox. C.C. 149.False Pretences—Obtaining Goods—Intention to Pay—Intent to Defraud.

CRIMINAL LAW.—On an indictment charging the prisoner with obtaining goods by certain false pretences, the jury found that the prisoner did obtain the goods by means of the false pretences, but that he intended to pay for them when it should be in his power to do so, and a verdict of guilty was entered:—Held, that the prisoner was properly convicted.

This was a CASE stated by the Deputy Recorder of the City of Chester.

This prisoner was tried before me at the Quarter Sessions for the city of Chester, on the 14th of July, 1865. There were three counts in the indictment, but the only one which became material was the second, which stated, "That the said Francis Naylor unlawfully, knowingly and designedly did, in a certain letter written by him, the said Francis Naylor, and sent by him to the said Mary Ingram, falsely pretend to the said Mary Ingram that the said Francis Naylor had seen a person named Moss (meaning one Elias Moss, of Roscoe Arcade, in the town of Liverpool, furniture-broker, the said Elias Moss then and long before being well known to the said Mary Ingram as a furniture-broker), and that the said Elias Moss was furnishing a house and wanted two Kidderminster carpets, two felt carpets, and twelve yards of stair carpet, and that the said Elias Moss wanted the said carpets to come by passenger train, by means of which said false pretences contained in the said letter the said Francis Naylor did then unlawfully obtain from the said Mary Ingram two Kidderminster carpets, two felt carpets, and twelve yards of stair carpet, with intent thereby then to defraud, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said Francis Naylor had not then seen the said Elias Moss, nor did the said Elias Moss then want the said carpets, nor did the said Elias Moss want the said carpets or any carpets to come by passenger train, nor had the said Elias Moss then ordered the said carpets, or any carpets whatsoever; to the great damage and deception of the said Mary Ingram, to the evil example," &c.

It was proved that the prosecutrix, Mary Ingram, at the time of the transaction in question, carried on the business of an upholsterer and furniture-dealer at Chester. That for some considerable time prior to the month of January, 1865, the prisoner had been employed by the prosecutrix to procure orders for goods to be supplied by her. That, during the six months prior to the transaction in question, goods to a considerable amount had been supplied by the prosecutrix in consequence of representations by the prisoner that he had received orders for them. That, in the month of January, 1865, the prisoner wrote a letter to the prosecutrix containing the statement set out in the second count, that is to say, that a person named Moss, a furniture-dealer at Liverpool, was in want of some carpets, of sizes and descriptions mentioned in the letter, and that such carpets were to be sent by passenger train to Moss's place of business. In consequence of this letter the prosecutrix forwarded by railway a package containing carpets of the size and description mentioned in the letter, such package being directed to Moss at his place of business at Liverpool, where it arrived in due course. The value of the carpets so sent was 12*l*. Prior to the arrival of the package, the prisoner, who had been previously acquainted with Moss, and also with persons in his employment, applied to one of such persons, stating that he expected a package of carpets from Chester to be sent to Moss's, and requested that it might be permitted to remain there. Permission was given, and after the arrival of the carpets at Moss's the prisoner applied there for them, and they were delivered to him. The statement in the letter that Moss was in want of the carpets was false. Neither Moss nor any person in his employment had had any communication with the prisoner about carpets prior to his writing the letter containing such statement. The prosecutrix, in cross-examination, stated that payments on account had been made to her by the prisoner both prior and subsequent to the transaction in question, and that such payments amounted to 465*l.*, but that the carpets in question had never been paid for. She further stated, on cross-examination, that prior to the transaction in question the prisoner had accepted bills of exchange for her accommodation. She also stated that she expected to receive the price of the carpets from the prisoner, but that she supplied them in consequence of his representation that Moss wanted them, as she knew that Moss was a respectable and solvent person. The jury found, in answer to questions put by me—That the prisoner's statement that Moss wanted the carpets was false to his knowledge; that he made it to induce the prosecutrix to part with the carpets; that the prosecutrix was induced to part with the carpets by reason of such false pretence; that the prisoner at the time he made the pretence and obtained the carpets intended to pay the prosecutrix the price of them when it should be in his power to do so.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., Pigott, B., Shee, J. and Smith, J.

Upon this finding the counsel for the prisoner contended that the jury had negatived the intention to defraud, and, consequently, that the prisoner was entitled to a verdict of not guilty. I entertained some doubt upon the question, and therefore reserved it for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. I directed a verdict of guilty to be entered, but postponed judgment, and the prisoner was discharged upon recognizance of bail to appear and receive judgment.

The question for the consideration of the Court was, whether upon the facts above stated and the finding of the jury, a verdict of guilty or a verdict of not guilty ought to have been entered.

No counsel appeared.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the prisoner was properly convicted.

Conviction affirmed

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.)

May 15, 1865.

LEATHAM v. THE VISITOR AND GUARDIANS OF BOLTON-LE-SANDS, ETC.*

35 L. J. M.C. 62; 6 B. & S. 547; 13 W. R. 785.

Pauper Lunatic—Order of Maintenance—Gilbert Union.

POOR LAW.—When a removable pauper lunatic is adjudged to be settled in a parish in a union formed under Gilbert's Act (22 Geo. 3. c. 83), the order of maintenance ought to be made on the guardians of the particular parish, not on the guardians of the union.

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Byles, J., Keating, J. and Smith, J.

E. R. A. [1866]—VOL. 2

56

Error was brought by the defendants to reverse the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in favour of the plaintiff, on a demurrer.

These proceedings were taken to review the decision of that Court in the case of The Queen v. Bramley (1 B. & S. 732; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 11). Judgment below was given without argument in accordance with that decision. As the case turned on a broad principle of law, and not on any point of pleading, it will be sufficient to state that the plaintiff, the treasurer of the West Riding Lunatic Asylum, sued the defendants, under the name of the Visitor and Guardians of the Poor of the united parishes, townships and places of Bolton-le-Sands, Berwick, Caton, Tatham, &c., in the county of Lancaster, alleging them to be a body corporate formed under the provisions of the statute 22 Geo. 3. c. 83. (Gilbert's Act), to recover from them the cost of the board and maintenance of a removable lunatic pauper who had been sent from the township of Bramley, in the West Riding, to the lunatic asylum under a Justice's order, and who was still maintained in the asylum chargeable to Bramley, and whose place of settlement was adjudged to be in the township of Tatham (one of the defendant's townships) by a subsequent order of Justices, made under the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 97, which directed the defendants, as the guardians of the poor of the Caton Union, to pay to the plaintiff certain weekly sums in respect of the future board and maintenance of the lunatic. The declaration alleged the defendants to be known by the name of the Guardians of the Caton Union.

The fifth plea alleged that the defendants were incorporated under Gilbert's Act.

West, for the plaintiffs in error, the defendants below.—This action cannot be maintained. The Justices had no power to make any order on the defendants under the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 97. Their order ought to have been on the guardians of the township of Tatham, not on the guardians of the union, the union being a Gilbert union, and not a poor-law union. The decision in The Queen v. Bramley (1 B. & S. 732; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 11) is wrong. There is a material difference between the powers and functions of guardians in a poor-law union and of guardians in a union under Gilbert's Act, the 22 Geo. 3. c. 83. The guardian of a parish in a Gilbert union is not a union officer, but a parish officer—The Queen v. the West Riding (7 El. & B. 15; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 41). In a poor-law union he has no functions as a parish officer, but acts only as a member of the board of guardians. In a Gilbert union there are no guardians of the union; but the guardians are guardians of the parishes in the union. These meet in a board for certain specific purposes. This lunatic, being a removable pauper, ought to be maintained by the township of Tatham; but if this order is good, and the defendants' board has to pay the plaintiff, the board has the power of compelling the township of Tatham to repay the amount. Under the Gilbert Act, the board are to provide funds for the support of a workhouse and of the poor maintained in it. And this common charge is to be apportioned by the board on the parishes, but the guardian of each parish is to provide clothing and give out-relief to the poor of his own parish. The maintenance of a lunatic not in the house would be out-relief. The 97th section of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. is carefully framed to meet the different cases. It directs that the order of maintenance is to be made, first, on "the guardians of the union to which the parish in which such lunatic is adjudged to be settled belongs": that applies to a poor-law union; secondly, on "the guardians of such parish in case the parish be in a union": that branch of this sentence meets the case of a Gilbert union. The third branch directs it to be made on the guardians of the parish when one parish is large enough to be a union by itself. The fourth case is where there are no guardians, and then the order is to be made on the overseers.—(He was stopped by the Court).

Temple, for the defendant in error, the plaintiff below.—The judgment below and the decision in The Queen v. Bramley (1 B. & S. 732; s. c. 31 Law

J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 11) were right. Section 97. of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. directs the order to be made on the guardians of the union, when there is one. The interpretation clause, section 132, expressly states that the term "union" includes a Gilbert union as well as a poor-law union. It would be a very strong construction to give two different meanings to the word "union" in the same sentence. It may be that the statute empowers the Justices to make the order either on the guardians of the union or of the parish, if the parish be in a union. Under the older act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 126, the Justices had an option of making the order on the treasurer of the union or on the overseers of the parish in the union—The Queen v. Tyrwhitt (12 Q.B. Rep. 292; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 141). The construction of section 97. of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. cannot depend on the mode in which an order made under it is to be obeyed. That act does not refer to the funds for the maintenance of the poor in any way. These are provided under different acts. This statute merely adds another set of paupers to be provided for. There are provisions in the 33 Geo. 3. c. 35. s. 3. for forming a common fund for the maintenance of certain paupers. The Lunatic Act in effect makes lunatics chargeable to that common fund, as if they had been paupers sent to the workhouse. He cited also The Queen v. Priest Hutton (20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 226).

West was stopped in reply.

ERLE, C.J.—This is an action brought by the treasurer of a county lunatic asylum, against the visitor and guardians of a Gilbert union, for non-payment of the expenses of maintaining a pauper lunatic in a county asylum. It is brought to enforce payment under an order of Justices made under the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 97, which orders the defendants, by the name of the Guardians of the Poor of the Caton Union, out of any monies which may come into their hands, as such guardians, to pay the expenses of maintaining the pauper lunatic. The plea which raises the point for adjudication is a plea that the defendants are a corporation under Gilbert's Act, and that the order is void unless it is authorized by the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 97. As we read that section, it empowers the Justices to make an order upon four classes of persons who are to pay: first, on the guardians of the union to which the parish of settlement belongs; secondly, on the guardians of the parish in case such parish be in a union; thirdly, on the guardians of the parish if it be under a separate board of guardians; fourthly, upon the overseers of a parish not in a union, or under a board of guardians. There are three kinds of guardians referred to. If there are none of these, the order is to be on the overseers. Here, the order has been made on the defendants, as if they had been guardians of a union incorporated under the New Poor Law Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 76, and it is an order to pay out of the union funds. We are of opinion that the order ought to have been made on the guardians of the parish, it being a parish in a union under Gilbert's Act. The words in the second clause of the sentence, that the order is to be on the guardians of the parish in case such parish be in a union, means, in our opinion, in case such parish be in a Gilbert union. The section provides specifically for the case of guardians of a union and of guardians of a parish. I know no officer or guardian of a parish liable to have an order made upon him specifically, except a guardian under Gilbert's Act and a guardian of a parish where the parish is under a board of guardians, pursuant to the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 76, being too large a parish to require being united with another parish. I think we are bound to hold the order to be a void order. If the case had stood merely on the words of the statute, and there had been nothing substantial in the objection, I should have used all my powers to prevent the objection from prevailing. But having given the best attention that I can to this statute, 22 Geo. 3. c. 83, known as Gilbert's Act, it appears to me that it has created a guardian of a parish having duties to perform specifically in that parish, and has authorized him to meet with other guardians of other parishes in monthly meetings. It has fixed and limited their specific duties while they are acting together. Neither of the specific sources of money, under Gilbert's Act, is applicable to the discharge of the cost of the future maintenance of this lunatic. The great object of the statute 22 Geo. 3. c. 83. was to ameliorate the condition of the poor, and to provide a union house in which they might be maintained. Section 24. points out the duties of the guardians and the funds out of which expenses are to be paid. By the earlier part of that section provision is made for the general expenses which are to be contributed to by each parish according to the average of the sums expended by each on account of their poor during the three preceding years. This rate is to be applicable to the permanent expenses. In respect of the current expenses of the house the parishes are to contribute in proportion to the number of paupers sent from each. The guardians have no power to order the parishes to contribute, except in accordance with these proportions, and the demand for payment is to specify ground upon which the demand is made. The schedules 15. and 16. point out how the two proportions of the expenses are to be adjusted. If an order were to be made under the Pauper Lunatic Act, it should be made upon the parish and be provided for by the parish. It would be an order which has no application to the general body of guardians, and could not properly be paid out of any fund, in the nature of a union fund, over which the general body of guardians have control. I have not heard during the argument where the defendants could get funds to pay the costs of this litigation, or the costs of the future maintenance of the pauper. The guardians cannot call for such money as part of the permanent expenses of the house, nor as for the maintenance of a pauper in the union house. We ought not to make them liable to a judgment which they have no means of satisfying except by taking the union house or the beds of the paupers. The statute 33 Geo. 3. c. 35, cited by Mr. Temple, appears to me very much to confirm the view which we have taken, inasmuch as it directs that there should be something in the nature of a union fund; for, by section 3, it directs that casual poor persons who have no settlements should be entitled to relief. It then specifically created, for the first time, a union fund, and orders their relief to be paid out of the expenditure for general purposes. It creates a new charge on the union. The statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103. s. 5. makes the cost of irremovable pauper lunatics a charge on the union fund; and refers, I take it, to the union fund created by the statute 33 Geo. 3. c. 35. s. 3. I am confirmed in this view by the provisions of section 102. of the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, which, repealing section 5. of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, directs that the cost of irremovable pauper lunatics should be chargeable on the common fund of the union, where the parish from which the lunatic is sent is in a union. The word "union" there comprises poor-law union and Gilbert Union; and in that section the word "union" is used without any limitation. The cost of a pauper lunatic who is not irremovable falls on the parish to which he belongs; but the cost of maintaining an irremovable pauper lunatic, in the case of a Gilbert union, is, we think, to be paid out of the union fund created by the statute 33 Geo. 3. c. 35. The difference of the intention of the legislature in section 97. and section 102, with respect to the parties who are to pay, is appropriately expressed by the change of language in the two sections.

The other JUDGES concurred.

Judgment reversed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 20, 1865.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE HASTINGS POOR LAW UNION, appellants, v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF ST. JAMES, CLERKENWELL, MIDDLESEX, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 65; 6 B. & S. 914; L. R. 1 Q.B. 38; 13 L. T. 362; 14 W. R. 175; 11 Jur. N.S. 977.

Referred to, R. v. Norwich Incorporation, 1874, 30 L. T. 704 (Q.B.).

Poor—Settlement—Renting a Tenement—6 Geo. 4. c. 57.

POOR LAW.—A house was hired quarterly at a yearly rent of 25l., to be paid on the 29th of September, 25th of December, 25th of March, and 24th of June; a quarter's notice to be given by either party:—Held, that this was a renting of a tenement for a whole year within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 57, and that a pauper having occupied the same and paid rent for a year, gained a settlement, upon the authority of The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35).

This was a SPECIAL CASE stated by consent and by order of a Judge, under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, after notice of appeal had been given to the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, against an order dated the 8th of February, 1865, and made under the hands and seals of two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the county of Middlesex.

By this order, after reciting an order whereby the said lunatic, John Hazel, had been removed to the Middlesex County Lunatic Asylum, and had been maintained there from the date of the said removal until the 31st of January then last past, and that the said Justices had inquired into the last legal settlement of the said John Hazel, it was adjudged that the last legal settlement of the said John Hazel was in the parish of St. Clement, in the borough of Hastings, in the Hastings Poor Law Union, in the county of Sussex. And the said guardians of the Hastings Poor Law Union were by the said order ordered to pay to the guardians of the poor of the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, certain sums therein specified for the costs of the removal of the said lunatic to the said asylum, and of his maintenance there.

The particulars of the settlement relied on were, that in or about the year 1856, the said John Hazel went to settle upon and inhabit a tenement, being a separate and distinct dwelling-house, in George Street, in the parish of St. Clement, in the said borough of Hastings, which he hired of one George Welland, at the rent of 25l. a year, and that he held, occupied, and resided therein under such yearly hiring thenceforward for six whole years, and paid rent for the same to the amount of 10l. in each year, and was assessed to and charged with and paid his share towards some one or more of the public taxes or levies of the said parish of St. Clement, in respect thereof, and resided therein forty days and upwards after the payment of some one or more of such taxes or levies in each year.

The grounds of appeal put in issue the sufficiency of the hiring or renting for the purpose of conferring a settlement. The facts are these: The said John Hazel, in July, 1856, applied to George Welland, as the agent of William Welland, to become the tenant of the house No. 62, George Street, in the said parish of St. Clement, Hastings, and an agreement was then signed, which was as follows:

“An agreement between William Welland and John Hazel.—William Welland agrees to let, and John Hazel agrees to hire, the house No. 62, George Street, quarterly, at a yearly rent of 25*l.*, to be paid on the 29th September, 25th December, 25th March, and 24th June; taxes to be paid by tenant; to be left in tenantable repair; a quarter's notice to be given by either party.

“ John Hazel,

“ (For William Welland) George Welland.

“ Hastings, July 25th, 1856.”

It was admitted by the appellants that John Hazel occupied the said house under the said agreement for six years, and resided therein, and was assessed to, and paid rates and taxes in respect thereof, so as to gain a settlement in the said parish of St. Clement, if the said agreement constituted a yearly hiring, or renting, of the said house for the term of one whole year, within the meaning of the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 57. s. 2. The rent for the house was always paid quarterly.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the said agreement constituted such yearly hiring or renting of the said house for the term of one whole year? If the Court was of opinion that it did, the order of Justices was to be confirmed. If the Court was of the contrary opinion, then the order was to be quashed.

Poland, in support of the order (Nov. 8).—The question is, whether, upon the terms of the agreement under which the tenement was let and taken, as set out in the case, the pauper bonâ fide rented that tenement for the term of one whole year; the occupation had undoubtedly been sufficient. In The Queen v. the Inhabitants of St. Giles without Cripplegate (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 3; s. c. 4 B. & S. 509), the hiring of the tenement was at a monthly rent, and terminable at a month's notice, to expire on either of the quarter days; and it was held to be a yearly hiring. The ground of that decision was, that the renting of a tenement for an indefinite period and an occupation for a year constituted yearly tenancy, and that it was an indefinite tenancy, because neither the stipulation as to notice to quit nor the reservation of monthly rent made it a monthly tenancy. For the same reason, the tenancy in this case is not quarterly, and therefore is yearly. (He was then stopped.)

Hurst, for the appellants.—In the case cited, and in all these cases that might be cited against the respondents, there is an absence of any words in the agreement for the tenancy to shew the character of the tenancy, and therefore it was held to be indefinite, and then the occupation for a year imparted to it the character of a yearly tenancy. Here the agreement describes it as an agreement to hire “ quarterly.” That expression fixes the character of the tenancy. The further words, “ at a yearly rent of 25*l.*,” is merely a mode of computing the rent. In Doe d. King v. Grafton (21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 276), an agreement, by which a yearly rent was reserved, payable “ quarterly,” and for a six-months' notice in writing to quit at the expiration of such notice, was held to create a tenancy, not for a year, but until one of the parties should give to the other six months' notice. Yet that was more of a yearly hiring than this.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35), where the pauper took a house at twenty guineas a year, the rent to be paid weekly, and either party to be at liberty to give three months' notice from any quarter-day, and at the expiration thereof to determine the tenancy, the Court held that that was a renting for one whole year; and Mr. Justice Bayley, delivering the judgment of the Court, says, “ A taking at an annual rent, though the rent is to be paid weekly, is primâ facie a yearly tenancy; if there be no proviso about quitting at three months' notice, there could have been no doubt on the subject, as it would then have been an ordinary yearly tenancy, with the rent to be paid weekly instead of quarterly or half-yearly. What, then, is the legal effect of a tenancy for a year with a proviso for determining it in the middle of the year? Such a proviso does not prevent it from being a yearly tenancy; when the party is in he is in of the whole estate for a year, liable to a defeasance on a particular event.” So that if there is here a yearly hiring in other respects, defeasibility by a quarterly notice does not reduce it.]

It is submitted that here the hiring is expressly stated to be quarterly, which distinguishes it from other cases, and quarterly means from quarter to quarter, as yearly means from year to year. According to The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35), the tenant must have been in of an estate for a year; but here there was no such estate, and he was in only for a quarter.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Certainly, the agreement in that case does not start with saying that the pauper took the house “weekly.” Nor do I recollect that in any of the cases of settlement by hiring and service, where the hiring was deemed to be yearly when the wages were made payable weekly, that the contract started with saying, “I engage you on a weekly hiring.”]

In Wilson v. Abbott (3 B. & C. 88) the Court would not infer a yearly hiring. The King v. the Inhabitants of Warminster (6 Ibid. 77) is in point to shew that the hiring of a servant at weekly wages, though for an indefinite period, is not a yearly hiring, and The King v. Dodderhill (3 M. & S. 243) shews that such a hiring is a weekly one. So, it is submitted, here the tenancy was a quarterly one.

Poland, in reply, referred to The Queen v. the Churchwardens, &c. of Willesden (3 B. & Sm. 593; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 109), where the agreement of tenancy was for three months at a yearly rent, with a three months’ notice to quit, and it was held to be a yearly tenancy after the expiration of the first three months, the tenant having held over after such three months.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered (Nov. 20) by—

SHEE, J.—In this case the question is, whether John Hazel, a pauper, had acquired a settlement in St. Clement’s, Hastings, by renting a tenement for the term of one whole year, within the meaning of the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 57. The pauper actually occupied the premises for six years under an agreement in the following terms: “William Welland agrees to let, and John Hazel agrees to hire, the house No. 62, George Street, quarterly, at a yearly rent of 25*l.* to be paid on 29th September, 25th December, 25th March, and 24th June; taxes to be paid by tenant; to be left in tenantable repair; a quarter’s notice to be given by either party.” The language of the agreement, speaking as it does of a yearly rent, and mentioning the four quarter days, shews that the parties contemplated that the tenancy would probably continue for a year; but it was in the power of either party to put an end to the tenancy by a quarter’s notice, and we think that the use of the word “quarterly” shews that it was intended that the notice might terminate at the end of any quarter; so that it was at the option of either party, by giving a proper notice, to terminate the tenancy before the end of the year. If we were now for the first time construing the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 57, we should not be disposed to hold that this was a hiring for a whole year, as there is great force in the argument that the true construction of the statute is that the tenancy must be such as must endure for a whole year; but in The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35), though it was forcibly contended in the argument that such was the true construction, the Court, consisting of three most eminent Judges, Bayley, Holroyd and Littledale, decided, after taking time to consider, that “a taking at twenty guineas a year, the rent to be paid weekly, and either party to be at liberty to give three months’ notice from any quarter-day, and at the expiration thereof to determine the tenancy, was a taking for a year, unless within the year notice should be given; and that, notice not having been given, the occupation was under a letting for a whole year within the meaning of statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 57. This case was followed by this Court in The Queen v. the Churchwardens, &c. of Willesden (3 B. & Sm. 593; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 109). In that case there was an obscurely worded agreement. Mr. Justice Wightman, in his judgment, states its effect to be "a demise for three months certain from the 25th of December, 1859; but that, if the parties should go on as landlord and tenant after that time, it should be a yearly tenancy at the rate of 18*l.* a year, payable monthly and determinable by giving three months' notice;" which Mr. Justice Wightman thought "might be given at any time, and need not be a notice expiring at any particular time." "Then," said he, "the pauper, having occupied for more than a year, has rented a tenement for the term of one whole year within the meaning of statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 57." Mr. Justice Crompton seems to have inclined to think that the construction of the agreement was that the notice to quit must expire at the end of the year (on which reading of the agreement the present question would not arise); but he expressed no dissent from the view of Mr. Justice Wightman, and no disapprobation of The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35). In The Queen v. St. Giles, Cripplegate (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 3; s. c. 4 B. & S. 509), the case of The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35) was again followed. There the letting was of a house "from 25th March, 1858, at the monthly rent of 1*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*" . . . "One month's notice, to expire either on the 25th March, 25th June, 25th September, or 25th December, shall be a good and sufficient notice on either side" for the tenant to deliver up possession. Though the rent was expressed to be monthly, it was clear from the agreement, and the notice to quit, that the tenancy was intended to be more than a monthly one. The Court say, "To what other conclusion can we come than that it was a hiring of the tenement indefinite as to duration, but terminable at a month's notice on either side on any of the specified quarterly days? and the house having been actually occupied under that hiring for upwards of two years, it appears to us to have been an occupation under a hiring for a whole year." No case was cited, nor are we aware of any, in which the authority of The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35) has been questioned; and on this state of the authorities we feel ourselves bound to hold that though a tenancy is terminable by a notice to quit within a year, yet if the terms of the hiring are such that the parties contemplated that the tenancy would, unless the notice was given, endure for a year or more, and it does endure for a year, it will be sufficient to confer a settlement.

We do not intend to decide that a weekly tenant at a weekly rent who by payment of rent becomes a tenant from week to week, so long as both landlord and tenant please, gains a settlement at the end of fifty-two weeks, as having held under a letting for a whole year. We think that the decisions only apply to cases where it appears from the terms of the letting that the parties contemplated originally that the holding would endure for a year, though it might be put an end to before the expiration of the year. In the present case, indeed, the parties say that the house is to be let "quarterly"; and if the agreement stopped there, the inference would be, that they did not contemplate that the holding would continue for a year; but they proceed to say that it shall be at a yearly rent, payable on the usual four quarter-days. This seems to us to shew, quite as strongly as anything in the agreements in The King v. Herstmonceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35), The Queen v. the Churchwardens of Willesden (3 B. & Sm. 593; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 109) and The Queen v. St. Giles, Cripplegate (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 3; s. c. 4 B. & S. 509), that it was contemplated by the parties that the holding would continue for a year or more, though it might be put an end to before the expiration of a year. And the word "quarterly" will, we think have sufficient effect given to it by using it to shew that it was intended that the quarter's notice might terminate at the end of any quarter without giving it the effect of nullifying these expressions. Had the word "quarterly" been omitted, and the words "ending on any quarter-day" been inserted at the end of the agreement, the effect of the agreement would have been precisely the same, both as to the continuance of the holding and the mode in which it was to be determined. The case would have then been identical with The King v. Hertsmenceux (7 B. & C. 551; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. M.C. 35); and we think that we ought not to make nice distinctions between the effects of agreements, according to their words, when the intention of the parties, as expressed by the words used, and the legal effect of the agreements, are identical. It is important that points arising on settlement law, when once determined, should not be again disturbed except on the most urgent grounds, and we should therefore not feel justified in overruling the three cases already decided on this subject, although we may doubt the correctness of the original decision. The order should, therefore, be affirmed.

Order affirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

THE WAKEFIELD LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH, appellants, v. THE WEST RIDING AND GRIMSBY RAILWAY COMPANY, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 69; 6 B. & S. 794; L. R. 1 Q.B. 84; 13 L. T. 590; 14 W. R. 100; 12 Jur. N.S. 160.

Distinguished, Muir v. Hore, [1878] E. R. A.; 47 L. J. M.C. 17; 37 L. T. 315 (C.P. D.).

Jurisdiction—Interested Justice—Railways Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20.) ss. 3, 145.—Conviction.

MAGISTERIAL LAW.—By a provision in the Railways Clauses Act, a Justice of the Peace, who has summary jurisdiction given to him in certain matters under that act, is not to be interested in such matter:—Held, that the insertion of the clause to disqualify an interested Justice from acting was intended to have no greater effect than would have been supplied by the common law without it; and therefore it was competent for the parties at the hearing of an information before an interested Justice to waive the objection, and so render an order made by such Justice valid and binding upon them.

This was a SPECIAL CASE stated, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, for the opinion of this Court upon the validity of an order made by them at petty sessions, upon an information laid by the appellants against the railway company (the respondents), under the Railways Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20. s. 58), for not obeying an order of Justices directing the repair of certain roads which had been damaged by the respondents in the course of making their railway, under the West Riding and Grimsby Railway Act, 1862. The information and complaint against the company for disobeying the order to repair was laid on the 7th of November, and heard on the 17th of November, 1864, when the above Justices dismissed the summons.

With respect to the original order to repair, it appeared that on the 13th of January, 1864, the appellants laid an information before John Baiff, Esq., a Justice of the Peace of the West Riding, against the respondents, under the above 58th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, charging the respondents with having, in the course of making their railway, used and interfered with and thereby damaged certain roads, and a summons was thereupon issued by that Justice to the respondents, and both parties appeared on the 1st of February, 1864, at Wakefield, before Colonel Smyth and H. W. Stansfeld, Esq., two Justices of the Peace for the West Riding; and those Justices made an order, by which they ordered the respondents to repair some of the roads mentioned in the information. Upon the hearing of the information on the 1st of February, 1864, it was objected to the proceedings, amongst other things, that Colonel Smyth, one of the Justices, was interested in the matter of the above information, because he was a proprietor in the Aire and Calder Navigation Company, and, as such, was a ratepayer within the district of the appellants; and, further, that the company were not liable to repair the roads in question, because they had not themselves made the railroad, but had let the making of it to contractors, who by their sub-contractors or servants had executed all the works. This last objection only was, however, then relied upon, and the Justices made the order, subject to a case thereon to be stated for this Court, which, after argument upon that point, ordered the judgment of the Justices to be affirmed. (See this case reported on this point sub nom. The West Riding and Grimsby Railway Company, appellants, v. the Wakefield Local Board of Health, respondents 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 174.) The respondents refused, however, to obey this order, and on the 12th of August, 1864, a complaint was made before the Mayor of Wakefield against the respondents for disobedience of the order of the 1st of February, and a summons was issued thereon, which came on to be heard on the 22nd of August, 1864. The respondents did not appear, and Col. Smyth and H. W. Stansfeld, Esq., who were again the Justices present, convicted and sentenced them to a penalty of 5*l.* a day. The respondents appealed against that conviction, to the West Riding Quarter Sessions, held in the October following, when it was contended by them that the order and conviction were invalid by reason of Col. Smyth, one of the Justices making the order, and joining in the conviction, being an interested person within the meaning of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and by reason of the summonses of the 13th of January, 1864, and the 13th of August following, being both signed by Justices who were ratepayers of the borough of Wakefield, and therefore without jurisdiction. The Quarter Sessions quashed the order, subject to a case for the Court of Queen's Bench. No case had, however, been taken upon that order. The information and proceedings, the subject of the present case, were then taken by the appellants.

Upon the hearing of such information before the petty sessions the respondents, amongst other things, objected that the original order was void for want of jurisdiction in the convicting Justices, and the Justices determined to dismiss the information, being of opinion that the original information and summons on which the order was founded were respectively void for want of jurisdiction in the Justice acting in the matter, the said Justice being at the time a ratepayer within the district of the said local board of health, and interested within the provisions of the Railways Consolidation Act, 1845, and that the order of the 1st of February, 1864, was not a lawful order, because Col. Smyth, one of the Justices making the same, was interested within the meaning of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and therefore had not jurisdiction to make it, and because the question of jurisdiction in the same Justice was not raised by the case previously stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, wherefore the validity of the said order in this respect cannot be said to have been confirmed by the decision of that Court.

The first question asked was, whether the said order of the 1st of February, 1864, was under the circumstances a valid order? or whether the Justices had power to decide upon its validity or invalidity as respects the parties making it?

(The argument with reference to the effect of the former judgment of the Court on the case submitted to them upon the power of the respondents to proceed is omitted, inasmuch as the judgment of the Court now proceeded entirely upon the other point.)

Cleasby (Maule with him), for the appellants.—The question is, whether the order of the 1st of February is valid or invalid, on the ground that one of the Justices who made it was interested in the matter, and therefore the order was made without jurisdiction. The Railways Clauses Act (8 Vict. c. 20. s. 145.) provides, that "Every penalty or forfeiture imposed by this or the special act, . . . the recovery of which is not otherwise provided for, may be recovered by summary proceeding before two Justices; and on complaint being made to any Justice he shall issue a summons requiring the party complained against to appear before two Justices at a time and place to be named in such summons, and every such summons shall be served on the party offending either in person or by leaving the same with some inmate at his usual place of abode; and upon the appearance of the party complained against, or in his absence, after proof of the due service of such summons, it shall be lawful for any two Justices to proceed to the hearing of the complaint, and that although no information in writing or in print shall have been exhibited before them; and upon proof of the offence, either by the confession of the party complained against, or upon the oath of one credible witness or more, it shall be lawful for such Justices to convict the offender," &c. By section 3. (the interpretation clause), "The word 'Justice' shall mean Justice of the Peace acting for the county, city, borough, liberty, cinque port, or place where the matter requiring the cognizance of any such Justice shall arise, and who shall not be interested in the matter; and where such matter shall arise in respect of lands being the property of one and the same party, situate not wholly in any one county, city, borough, liberty, cinque port, or place, shall mean a Justice acting for the county, city, borough, liberty, cinque port or place where any part of such lands shall be situate, and who shall not be interested in such matter," &c. Then, if made without jurisdiction, on that ground it is nevertheless such an objection as might be waived, and was waived by the respect at the hearing on the 1st of February.

Temple (H. Lloyd with him), for the respondents.—The order of the 1st of February was a nullity; for being made by an interested Justice, it was as if made by a person who was not a Justice at all. This is an objection which cannot be cured by agreement between the parties. It is admitted that, at common law, if the parties do not object to the acting Justice being interested, knowing of his interest, they are precluded afterwards; but it is submitted that the effect of the above enactment is to make the want of interest a condition precedent to the validity of any act of a Justice, and so not merely declaratory of the common law.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think there should be judgment for the appellants. That portion of the interpretation clause which requires that the Justice should be a person who was not interested in the matter would have been intended by the known principles of law, and would, therefore, appear to have been inserted out of abundant caution, unless, perhaps, the legislature thought that if they had stopped short after the earlier part of the definition it might have been contended that expressio unius was exclusio alterius, and that it was not intended to make interest a disqualification. But if they had intended to have prevented the Justices from acting, although the parties expressly waived the objection, they would have expressly said so. To read this enactment in the way it is now contended for, would produce the absurdity that a Justice if he became interested in the matter would cease to be a Justice. It, therefore, appears to me that the parties might submit themselves to Col. Smyth's jurisdiction, and although they might have objected, in the first instance, to his jurisdiction on the ground of interest, yet they cannot be allowed to take their chance of a decision in their favour then, and now, when they find it against them, seek to avert it by the present objection.

LUSH, J. concurred.

Judgment for the appellants.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

SANDERS, appellant, v. BALDY, respondent.35 L. J. M.C. 71; 6 B. & S. 791; L. R. 1 Q.B. 87; 13 L. T. 822; 14 W. R. 177;
12 Jur. N.S. 334.Game—1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. ss. 3-23—Cumulative Penalties—Using Engine to take Game out of season.

GAME.—The 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 23. imposes a penalty on a person who uses an instrument for the purpose of taking game not being authorized so to do for want of a game certificate:—Held, that an uncertificated person who set a trap for the purpose of taking partridges or pheasants in the month of March, was liable to be convicted under that section, notwithstanding the 3rd section of the same act.

The penalties imposed by the 23rd section of 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. are cumulative upon those imposed by the 3rd section of that act.

CASE stated by Justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 48.

At a Petty Sessions holden at Hailsham, in Sussex, on the 5th of April, 1865, before two Justices, an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent, under 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 23,¹ charging the respondent that he on the 13th of March, 1865, did unlawfully use a trap for the purpose of taking game, he, the respondent, not being authorized so to do for want of a game certificate, contrary to the said statute, whereby he had forfeited a sum not exceeding 5*l*. The Justices heard and dismissed the information.

The respondent was servant at a farm adjoining to a plantation situated in a parish within the jurisdiction of the Sessions, and the appellant was game-keeper to Sir C. W. Blunt, to whom the plantation belonged. The respondent was seen on Monday, the 13th of March, 1865, to set a trap in the plantation, which (as the Justices found) was for the purpose of catching partridges or

(1) 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. s. 3. And be it enacted, that if any person whatsoever shall kill or take any game, or use any dog, gun, net, or other engine or instrument for the purpose of killing or taking any game on a Sunday or Christmas-day, such person shall, on conviction thereof before two Justices of the Peace, forfeit and pay for every such offence such sum of money, not exceeding 5*l*., as to the said Justices shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction; and if any person whatever shall kill or take any partridge between the 1st of February and the 1st of September in any year, or any pheasant between the 1st of February and the 1st of October, in any year, or any black game (except in the county of Somerset or Devon, or in the New Forest in the county of Southampton), between the 10th of December in any year, and the 20th of August in the succeeding year, or in the county of Somerset or Devon, or in the New Forest aforesaid, between the 10th of December in any year and the 1st of September in the succeeding year, or any grouse, commonly called red game, between the 10th of December in any year and the 12th of August in the succeeding year, or any bustard between the 1st of March and the 1st of September in any year, every such person shall, on conviction of any such offence before two Justices of the Peace, forfeit and pay for every head of game so killed or taken such sum of money, not exceeding 1*l*. as to the said Justices shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction; and if any person with intent to destroy or injure any game shall at any time put or cause to be put any poison or poisonous ingredients on any ground, whether open or inclosed, where the game usually resort, or in any highway, every such person shall, on conviction thereof before two Justices of the Peace, forfeit and pay such sum of money, not exceeding 10*l*., as to the said Justices shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction.

Section 23. And be it enacted, that if any person shall kill or take any game, or use any dog, gun, or net, or other engine or instrument for the purpose of searching for, or killing or taking game, such person not being authorized so to do for want of a game certificate, he shall, on conviction thereof before two Justices of the Peace, forfeit and pay for every such offence such sum of money, not exceeding 5*l*., as to the said Justices shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction: Provided always, that no person so convicted shall by reason thereof be exempted from any penalty or liability under any statute or statutes relating to game certificates, but that the penalty imposed by this act shall be deemed to be a cumulative penalty.

pheasants. The Justices, however, dismissed the information on the ground that the case did not come within the 23rd section, inasmuch as the respondent could not be said to have used the trap for the purpose of taking game not being authorized so to do for want of a game certificate, as that enactment could only apply to a case where a person might have been authorized if he had had a certificate; but here no certificate could have authorized the taking of partridges or pheasants at the time of the year of this occurrence, therefore the prisoner could not be said to be unauthorized by reason of the want of such certificate. They also thought that the 3rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. was the enactment intended to meet the case of taking game out of season.

The point of law raised for the consideration of the Court was, whether upon the facts stated the information was rightly laid and the respondent liable to the penalty imposed by the 23rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. for using an instrument for the purpose of taking game without a certificate, and should have been convicted.

Hannen, for the appellant.—There ought to have been a conviction. The first part of the 3rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 32. relates to taking, or using an instrument with intent to take game on a Sunday or Christmas Day, and the second part relates only to the actual taking or killing within the prohibited seasons, and is intended for the protection of game. The 23rd section is intended for the protection of the revenue, and applies irrespective of the time of year. The penalty imposed is intended to be cumulative. The game certificate is a personal licence to kill game, which expires on the 5th of April in every year, and is irrespective of any time of year. The statute prescribes the prohibited seasons. A person is liable to a conviction under the 23rd section notwithstanding he may also be liable under the 3rd section.

Counsel did not appear for the respondent.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think the penalties imposed by the 3rd and 23rd sections of the act are cumulative. They are two substantial and distinct offences. One is for killing game out of season, and the other is for the protection of the revenue. The respondent is liable to the penalty.

LUSH, J., concurred.

Judgment for the appellant.

Case remitted.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 15, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF THE TOWNSHIP OF BILSTON.

85 L. J. M.C. 79; 6 B. & S. 908; L. R. 1 Q.B. 18; 13 L. T. 327; 14 W. R. 88;
12 Jur. N.S. 139.

Poor-Rate—Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 1.)—Net Annual Value—Deductions—Water-Rent.

RATES AND RATING.—A voluntary payment, by a landlord, to water-works of water-rent for the supply of water to a hereditament occupied by his tenant, and rateable to the poor, is not a tenant's rate, or an expense necessary to maintain the premises in a state to command their probable annual rent, within the meaning of the Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 1), and ought not to be deducted from the gross estimated rental of the premises, in order to ascertain their net annual value under that act.

This was a SPECIAL CASE, granted by the Staffordshire Quarter Sessions on the hearing of an appeal against an order of Justices made in Special Sessions, confirming a poor-rate, under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 6, which rate was assessed on a gross estimated rental of a house at 11*l.*, and a rateable value of 9*l.*

The appeal was heard at the Staffordshire Epiphany Quarter Sessions, 1865, when the Court found that the gross estimated rental of the house in respect of which the rate was made was 9*l.* 2*s.*, and that in order to arrive at the net rateable value the appellant was entitled to a deduction of several sums as outgoings, which the overseers ought to have allowed, under the 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 1. and, amongst them, the sum of 11*s.* 4*d.* for "water-rent," which deductions would reduce the net rateable value to 4*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*; and in accordance with such finding, the Court of Quarter Sessions reduced the gross estimated rental to 9*l.* 2*s.*, and the net rateable value to 4*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*; subject, as to the latter sum, to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, as to whether the sum of 11*s.* 4*d.* for "water-rent" was properly included in such deduction.

The township of Bilston is supplied with water partly from pumps and partly from works constructed by a company, incorporated as the Dudley Waterworks Company, under an act of 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. xlii., and it was in the option of owners or occupiers of the houses in the township to accept or refuse the water supplied under that act.

By the Bilston Improvement Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. xcvi.), it was part of the duty of the Bilston Improvement Commissioners to supply water for domestic purposes to such owners, occupiers, &c. of any house in a street where water-pipes were laid as should require the same, at certain rates. The scale of charges for the quarterly supply of water by the Improvement Commissioners was published by order of the Commissioners, in November, 1863.

The water was supplied by pipes from the mains to the houses. About one-half of the inhabited houses were supplied with water from these waterworks, and paid rent for the same to the Commissioners; and as to these, it was a matter of arrangement between the landlord and the tenant to which of the two the water was supplied, and by which of the two the water-rent was paid. The inhabitants of these houses to which there was no supply from the waterworks procured their water from their own wells or other sources. In the present instance the water was supplied from the waterworks. The landlord paid the sum of 11*s.* 4*d.* per annum as the water-rent, and the occupier had nothing to do with it.

The appellants contended that this payment for water was a deduction from the rental to which they are entitled under the Parochial Assessment Act. as being an expense necessary to maintain the premises in a state to command such a rent.

The respondents contended that inasmuch as it was optional with the owner and occupier of the house whether they would take their supply of water from the Commissioners or obtain it from other sources, it was not a necessary expense or outgoing, which they ought to allow as a deduction from the rateable value. And the question was left, so that if the Court should be of opinion that the deduction ought to be allowed, the rate was to stand as reduced, viz. at 4*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*; if on the contrary, an addition of 11*s.* 4*d.* was to be made to the sum to which the rateable value was reduced by the Quarter Sessions.

M'Mahon (D. D. Keane with him), for the respondents.—It is submitted that the sum proposed to be deducted for "water-rent" comes within either the denomination of a "usual tenant's rate and tax," or an "expense necessary," under the circumstances of the house and township in question, to "maintain the premises in a state to command such rent," within the 6 & 7 Will 4. c. 96. s. 1. That section enacts, that "no rate for the relief of the poor in England and Wales shall be allowed by any Justices or be of any force which shall not be made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to be let from year to year, free of all the usual tenant's rates and taxes and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent." The "water-rent," if not a tenant's rate or tax, is an expense necessary to maintain the rent.

[MELLOR, J.—The payment of the water-rent is not compulsory on the tenant. COCKBURN, C.J.—You might as well say that the cost of gas in a man's house or of candles is necessary to maintain the rent.]

The rent would be lower if it were not for this payment. He referred to The Queen v. Halldare (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 17).

A. S. Hill, for the appellants, was not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think our judgment should be for the appellants. The question we have to decide is, whether the water-rent is to be deducted from the gross estimated rental. We think it ought not to be so deducted. It is neither a tenant's rate or tax, nor an expense necessary to keep the house in a state to command its present rent. The cost of food or light is an expense as necessary as this of water for that purpose; but no one would think of claiming such deductions as those.

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Judgment for the appellants.

Rate amended accordingly.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 15, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. SPURRELL AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. M.C. 74; L. R. 1 Q.B. 72; 13 L. T. 364; 14 W. R. 81;
12 Jur. N.S. 208.

Poor—Appointment of Overseers—43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1.—Householder.

POOR LAW.—A householder in a parish to be liable to serve the office of overseer must occupy as tenant of the premises. A servant who occupies a tenement of his master, in part payment of his services and as subservient to and necessary for the performance thereof, and not merely as a matter of convenience, is not a householder within the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1; and an appointment of two overseers for a parish, of whom he is one, is a bad appointment.

This SPECIAL CASE for the opinion of this Court was stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions of Norfolk, upon the hearing of an appeal against an appointment of overseers made by the Justices in the petty sessions holden for the hundred of Garrow, in the county of Norfolk, and dated the 28th of March, 1864, whereby the said Justices appointed John Spurrell and William Walker to be overseers of the poor of the parish of Pudding Norton in that hundred, for the ensuing year, under the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1¹.

(1) 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1: "The churchwardens of every parish, and four, three or two substantial householders there, as shall be thought meet (having respect to the proportion and greatness of the same parish and parishes, to be nominated yearly [on the 25th of March, or within fourteen days next after (54 Geo. 3. c. 91.)] under the hands and seals of two or more Justices of the Peace of the same county, whereof one to be of the quorum, dwelling in or near the same parish or division where the same parish doth lie, shall be called overseers of the same parish."

The order appealed against was as follows:

"Norfolk, to wit.—We, whose hands and seals are hereunto set and affixed, being two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the county aforesaid (one whereof is of the quorum, as the statute in that case directs), do hereby nominate and appoint John Spurrell and William Walker, substantial householders within the parish of Pudding Norton, in the county aforesaid, to be overseers of the poor of the said parish, together with the churchwardens thereof, until the 25th day of March next ensuing the date hereof and fourteen days afterwards, unless other overseers shall be previously appointed in their stead. Given under our hands and seals this 28th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1864.

"D. L. Astley (L.S.)

"Richard Phayre (L.S.)"

The appellant John Spurrell is tenant under William Boycott and other trustees under the will of John Morse, deceased, of a farm of 812 acres, together with a farm-house and premises and a cottage adjoining, and forming part of the said premises, but 50 yards or more from the farm-house, at one entire rent, such cottage being a separate and distinct tenement. The farm is co-extensive with the parish of Pudding Norton, and the said John Spurrell resides with his family and servants in the farm-house which, excepting the cottage above mentioned, is the only human habitation in the parish. The appellant William Walker is farming bailiff to the said John Spurrell, and looks after the men. He is a weekly servant, and receives 14s. a week wages, and occupies the above-mentioned cottage (which is furnished with his own furniture) rent free, in part payment for his services; and but for the cottage his wages would be higher. No poor-rates are paid for the parish of Pudding Norton, but the said John Spurrell pays to the treasurer of the Walsingham Union, which comprises the said parish, the county rate in respect of the said farm, premises and cottage.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that William Walker was not "a substantial householder" within the meaning of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1. The Court of Quarter Sessions gave the following judgment: "We find that under the circumstances of this case both appellants were substantial householders within the meaning of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1, and we confirm the order, subject to a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench."

If this Court should be of opinion that William Walker is a substantial householder within the meaning of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1, then the order appealed against, and the order of Quarter Sessions confirming the same, were to stand, otherwise they were to be quashed.

The parish of Pudding Norton was united with other parishes to form, and formed, the Walsingham Union under the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 76. s. 26, and was made a contributory to the common fund of that union, under section 28. of the same act.

By the General Consolidated Orders of the Poor Law Commissioners, art. 82,² the guardians of a union are to make orders on the overseers of every parish in the union for such sums as they may require for the relief of the poor and contribution to the common fund, and other expenses chargeable by the guardians on the parish.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 9.³ came into operation on the 25th of March,

(2) By the General Consolidated Order of the Poor Law Commissioners, art. 89, "The guardians shall make orders on the overseers or other proper authorities of every parish of the union from time to time for the payment to the guardians of all such sums as may be required by them for the relief of the poor of the parish, and for the contribution of the parish to the common fund of the union, and for any other expenses chargeable by the guardians of the parish: and in such orders the contributions shall be directed to be paid in one sum or by instalments on days specified, as to the guardians may seem fit."

(3) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 9. recites, "That it is also expedient to alter the mode in which the contributions of parishes to the common fund of the union in which they are comprised are now calculated": and enacts, "that after the 25th of March next the several parishes comprised 1862, and its effect was materially to increase the sum chargeable to the parish of Pudding Norton as its contribution to the common fund of the Walsingham union; and on the 30th of March, 1864, an order of contribution to the common fund of that union for the sum of 11l. was made on the overseers of Pudding Norton by the guardians. The above-mentioned appointment of overseers for the parish of Pudding Norton was then appealed against to the Quarter Sessions.

Denman (A. S. Hill with him), on behalf of the respondent Walker.—The respondent Walker is a substantial householder within the meaning of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1. It is admitted that if he be not, the appointment of him and Spurrell to be overseers is a bad appointment. For it was held in The Queen v. Cousins (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 87) that the statute of Elizabeth, which mentions four, three or two substantial householders, cannot be construed to include one, when the least number mentioned is two; and that as in order to work out the acts relating to the poor there must be two overseers, the appointment of one (it appearing that there is no other appointment of another) is bad; and the Court quashed such appointment, although it appeared that there was in the parish but one inhabitant householder, who had been appointed. But Walker was a weekly servant and lived in the cottage, and the case uses the expression "rent free." He had his own furniture in the cottage, and although he did not pay rent eo nomine, he paid it indirectly through the deduction in his wages. It was a separate tenement, and his master had no right without his permission in the house. When this case was before the Court on a former occasion in a different form, Crompton, J. was inclined to think that Walker was a householder—In re Overseers of Pudding Norton (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 136). The Queen v. Stubbs (2 Term Rep. 395) shews that Walker was a substantial person so as to satisfy the terms "substantial" in the statute. He is a householder whether he occupies as weekly tenant or yearly tenant. The consequences of determining that either of these persons, who are the only householders in the parish, is not liable to serve the office of overseer of the poor, will be to exempt this parish from contributing to the support of the poor of the union.

Mellish (Bulwer with him), for the appellant, against the order.—The occupation of Walker was the occupation of a servant and not of a tenant, and an occupation quà servant does not make him a householder. It is the ordinary usage for gamekeepers and gardeners to occupy a cottage on the master's premises, and their wages are regulated accordingly. It cannot be contended that such an occupation would at the end of twenty years, without any payment of rent or acknowledgment of title, confer in effect a title in fee simple under the Statute of Limitations as against the master, yet such a result would follow if their occupation is that of tenant and not servant. The occupation is compulsory for the purposes of service.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Is it not rather for the convenience of both parties?]

In Bertie v. Beaumont (16 East, 33) the occupation of a farm labourer, a weekly servant, in a cottage of his master without paying rent, but having less wages on that account, was held to be the occupation of a servant; and in any union already formed or hereafter to be formed under the provisions of the 4 & 5 Will. 4. c. 76, shall contribute to the common fund thereof, in proportion to the annual rateable value of the lands, tenements and hereditaments in such parishes respectively assessable by the laws in force for the time being to the relief of the poor, and in no other manner, whether the lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall be actually rated or not, and whether the rate levied shall be collected in full or upon any composition: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the liability of any parish comprised in any such union in regard to any charge lawfully created in the said union, and secured upon the poor-rates of all or any of the parishes comprised therein, which shall have been created at any previous time to the said 25th of March; but the same shall continue to be charged and payable in like manner as it would by law have been charged and payable if this act had not been passed; provided also, that nothing herein contained shall apply to any contribution which shall be in arrear from any parish in such union on the said 25th of March, but the same shall be recoverable and shall be applicable in the same manner as if this act had not been passed."

therefore in law the occupation of the master though the latter allowed the man less wages on account of the convenience to him of the occupation. In The Queen v. Kelstern (5 M. & S. 136) the occupation of a house and garden by a farm labourer for certain wages per annum and the house and garden and other advantages, was held to be the occupation of a servant, and not an independent occupation so as to confer a settlement, although the house was a hundred yards from where the master lived, because the occupation was necessarily connected with the service. In The Queen v. Minster (3 Ibid. 276) the distinction taken is, that if the occupation is connected with the service and necessary for the performance of it, it is the master's occupation, and not the servant's; but if it be not connected with the service, it is the servant's occupation and will confer a settlement. The Queen v. Stubbs (2 Term Rep. 395) turned upon the meaning of the word "substantial," and not "householder." In The Queen v. Cheshunt (1 B. & Ad. 473) the Sessions found that the pauper occupied the cottage at a weekly rent; yet it was held, that he did not gain a settlement, inasmuch as his occupation was referable to his character of servant and not of tenant; and Lord Ellenborough there said, "If the Court should hold in this and similar cases that the legal relation of landlord and tenant subsisted, it would become necessary to turn such persons out of possession by the regular proceedings in ejectment, and every gentleman having twenty or thirty cottages in which his labourers resided, would be compelled on any change of their service to have recourse to such means." In Clarke v. the Overseers of St. Mary, Bury St. Edmund's (26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 12), a hall-keeper of the Guildhall of the borough, who exclusively occupied a house and paid rates and taxes, but no rent, and whose occupation was in part payment for his services, was held to occupy as servant and not as tenant. It would be sufficient in an indictment for burglary to lay the property of Walker's house in the name of Spurrell—Brown's case (2 East, P.C. 501). Mr. Justice Crompton in In re Pudding Norton (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 87) simply decided that this objection to the appointment could not be taken by certiorari.

Dénman, in reply.—The Sessions have found substantially that Walker was a householder in spite of the agreement with Spurrell.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—He is a householder if he occupies as tenant, but not if his occupation is that of his master.]

In Hughes v. the Overseers of Chatham (1 Lutw. 51; s. c. 5 Man. & G. 54) the question was, whether Burton occupied a house as tenant within the 2 Will. 4. c. 45. s. 27. His house was situated in the dockyard at Chatham. He was a master ropemaker, and as such had the house as his residence. He paid no rent in money for it, but had it as part remuneration for his services. No part of it was used for public purposes, the office in which he performed his public services being away from it. If he had not been allowed the house, he would have had an allowance for a house in addition to his salary. He was held to occupy as tenant. Lord Chief Justice Tindal says, "There is no inconsistency in the relation of master and servant with that of landlord and tenant. A master may pay his servant by conferring upon him an interest in real property, either in fee or for years, at will, or for any other estate or interest; and if he do so, the servant then becomes entitled to the legal incidents of the estate as much as if it were purchased for any other consideration. But it may be that a servant may occupy a tenement of his master's not by way of payment for his services, but for the purpose of performing them. It may be that he is not permitted to occupy as a reward in the performance of his master's contract to pay him, but required to occupy in the performance of his contract to serve his master."

[COCKBURN, C.J.—That is the distinction that presses upon me; but the Sessions have not found distinctly whether the occupation of this cottage was subsidiary to and a part of the service, or whether this agreement was merely subordinate to it.]

The Sessions say the occupation was "in part payment for the service," and that means he paid his rent in service instead of money, as Lord Ellenborough puts it in Bertie v. Beaumont (2 Term Rep. 395). Lastly, a man may be a householder without being a tenant.

COCKBURN, C.J.—With reference to the last point, I think a man cannot be a householder within the true construction of that statute who has not an independent occupation. But I do not think that where a man occupies as servant he can be said to be a householder at all, inasmuch as his occupation is the occupation of the master. But when we come to the question, whether in this case there was the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties, or whether the occupation was simply that of servant, the facts do not seem to me sufficiently found by the Sessions, for one essential element in the consideration of that question is omitted, namely, whether this occupation was an occupation for the purpose of and necessary to the service or not. If the occupation were necessary to the service, then, I think, it is the occupation of the master, although it is said that the remuneration which the servant receives is the less on account of his having the advantage of the premises of the master for the purpose of his habitation. On the other hand, if the occupation be not necessary to the service, then the fact that the occupation is part of the remuneration for the service will not render that occupation less an occupation quâ tenant than it would have been if the man had paid rent. It may be that it happens to be convenient both to the master and to the servant; that the servant requiring some place of habitation, he shall by agreement with the master, instead of receiving so much for his wages, out of which wages he would have to find himself a separate habitation, inhabit some premises of the master as part of the remuneration for his service. That is only an equivalent for the wages. He would be receiving in the one instance the whole amount of his wages, and out of those wages he would have to find himself a habitation, for which he would have to pay rent; but in the other he inhabits premises of his master, and instead of paying his master the rent, the master deducts it from the wages. It does not, therefore, follow that because the relation of master and servant happens to exist between the parties, and by a subordinate arrangement the servant occupies premises of the master rent free as part of the wages which he would otherwise receive if he paid the rent, the occupation may not be an occupation quâ tenant independent of the master. The question is, whether the occupation is simply in part remuneration for his services, or whether it is subservient and necessary to the services. That is a question of fact, which it is essential that the Sessions should inquire into and ascertain, and the case must go back to them for that purpose. After this expression of our opinion the Sessions will probably have no difficulty in coming to a decision.

MELLOR, J., SHEE, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Case remitted to the Sessions.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 28, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. STRUGNELL.

35 L. J. M.C. 78; 7 B. & S. 124; L. R. 1 Q.B. 93; 13 L. T. 433; 14 W. R. 193;
12 Jur. N.S. 269.

Referred to, R. v. Haywood, 1866, 14 L. T. 600 (Bail Court).

Theatre—Stage-Play—Hiring of Public Room—6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. ss. 2, 7, 11, 16.

THEATRE.—The appellants hired from the owners, for six consecutive nights, a public room, which was not duly licensed as a theatre. They published playbills, announcing that plays would be performed on these nights in the room. One of them took money at the door from those who witnessed the performances:—Held, that the appellants could not be convicted under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. s. 2, for “having and keeping” an unlicensed theatre; but that they could only be convicted under s. 11, for acting or allowing parts to be acted in an unlicensed theatre.

Upon appeal to the Quarter Sessions for the borough of Grantham, against an order of two Justices of the Peace, convicting the appellants under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68. s. 2, the Sessions quashed the conviction, subject to the following

CASE.

At a Court of Quarter Sessions for the borough of Grantham, held on Tuesday, the 11th of April, 1865, before the Recorder, Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor appealed against an order of two Justices of the Peace for the borough, on the 6th of February, 1865, which order is as follows :

Borough of Grantham. } Be it remembered that, on the 6th day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1865, at Grantham, in the said borough, Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor are convicted before the undersigned, two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said borough, for that, on the 31st day of January last past, the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor did have and keep a certain public room in the Exchange Hall, situate in the borough aforesaid, for the public performance of stage-plays, without authority by virtue of letters patent, or licence from four Justices of the Peace for the said borough, and for that on the 1st day of February instant, the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor did have and keep the same room for the same purpose without such authority as aforesaid, and for that on the 2nd day of February instant the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor did have and keep the same room for the same purpose without such authority as aforesaid, and for that on the 3rd day of February instant the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor did have and keep the same room for the same purpose; and we adjudge the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor for their said offence on the 31st day of January last past to pay the sum of 2s. 6d., for their said offence on the 1st day of February instant to pay the sum of 2s. 6d., for their said offence on the 2nd of February instant to pay the sum of 2s. 6d., and for their said offence on the 3rd day of February instant to pay the sum of 2s. 6d., which said several sums of 2s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 2s. 6d., and 2s. 6d. are to be paid and applied according to law; and we also adjudge the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor to pay the sum of 9s. 6d. for their costs in this behalf; and if the said several sums be not paid forthwith, we order that the same be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor; and in default of sufficient distress, we adjudge each of them the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor to be imprisoned in the castle or gaol at Lincoln, in the county of Lincoln, there to be kept to hard labour for the space of three calendar months, unless the said several sums and all costs and charges of the said distress and of the commitment and conveying of the said Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor shall be sooner paid. Given, &c.

It was proved in evidence :

1. That Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor, in the month of January, 1865, hired a large public room within the borough of Grantham, known as the Exchange Hall, for the public performance therein of stage-plays.

2. That Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor paid to the secretary of the Exchange Hall the sum of 7l. for the use of such public room, for six consecutive nights, commencing on the 30th of January last.

3. That such public room was not duly licensed for the performance of stage-plays by virtue of letters patent, or licence from four Justices of the Peace of the borough, or otherwise.

4. That Edmund Rosenthal and Marian Taylor caused to be issued and published playbills, announcing that on the several nights mentioned in the order certain stage-plays would be performed, that is to say: on the 31st day of January, 1865, "The Bohemian Girl" and "Prince Amabel"; on the 1st day of February, 1865, "Il Trovatore" and "Ixion"; on the 2nd day of February, 1865, "Lurline" and "Ixion"; on the 3rd day of February, 1865, "Lucia di Lammermoor" and "Ixion"; and such stage-plays were accordingly publicly performed by Edmund Rosenthal, Marian Taylor and other persons on the several days mentioned in such order.

5. That the said Marian Taylor received at the door of the entrance of the said public room money from the public who attended to witness the stage-plays publicly performed.

No witness was called on behalf of the appellants. On the part of the respondents it is argued that, under the circumstances before stated, the appellants had or kept a house or other place of public resort for the public performance of stage-plays, without authority by virtue of letters patent, or without licence within the intent and meaning of the 2nd section of the act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, but no case or authority is quoted in support of such argument.

On the part of the appellants it is argued that they did not have or keep a house or other place of public resort for the public performance of stage-plays, without authority or licence as aforesaid, within the intent and meaning of the 2nd section of the said act, but that the owners of the Exchange Hall were the persons who so had or kept the same; and in support of such argument the case of Davys v. Douglas (4 Hurl. & N. 180; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 193) is cited, and the 7th and 11th sections of the said act are relied on.

J. W. Mellor, for the appellants.—The appellants did not "have or keep" the hall for the public performance of stage-plays, within the meaning of the act. The words "have" and "keep" refer to a permanent interest, such as that of an owner or occupier. Here the secretary is the person liable, as he is the actual and responsible manager of the premises. If it were otherwise, he could profit by a contravention of the statute without being liable to any penalty. The appellants could only have been convicted under section 11, which imposes a specific penalty on every person who for hire shall act or present, or cause, permit, or suffer to be acted or presented, any part in any stage-play in any place not being a patent theatre, or duly licensed as a theatre. This liability is made plainer by section 16; in every case in which money or other reward shall be taken or charged, directly or indirectly, or in which the purchase of any article is made a condition for the admission of any person into any theatre to see any stage-play, every actor shall be deemed to be acting for hire.

[LUSH, J.—The licence seems to be granted to the house, and not to the individual.]

Mellish and Cave, for the prosecutors.—The persons liable under section 2. of the act are those who cause the play to be performed, and who hire premises for that purpose. It was the object of the legislature that the licensee should be the director of the performance. Therefore, by section 7, the licence is to be granted to the manager or responsible person for the time being. The possessor of a licence is ordinarily called the "manager." In The Queen v. Stannard (1 Leigh & Cave, 349; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 61) an indictment under the statute 25 Geo. 2. c. 36. s. 8, for keeping a disorderly house, proof that the prisoner was the owner of the house, and let the rooms to weekly tenants, with the knowledge that they would be applied to the purposes of prostitution, though he occupied no part of the house, nor kept the key, or reserved to himself any right of entry, was held insufficient to support a conviction.

[MELLOR, J.—There the landlord, if he had wished, could not have got in.]

It is submitted that the owner of the hall was in the same position as the prisoner in the case cited. They referred to Rich v. Basterfield (2 Ld. Raym. 1197) and Shutt v. Lewis (5 Esp. 128).

MELLOR, J.—We are both of opinion that the Recorder was right, and that the conviction by the Justices was erroneous. I should certainly have thought it unfortunate if the act of parliament had contained no section enabling Justices to exercise control over persons in the situation of the appellants, and to restrain them from acting with impropriety or contrary to good manners. But it appears to me that this control is provided for by the 11th section. This section applies to persons who have no permanent interest in the places where they perform. Now, if the appellants had chosen to invite a stranger to bring out any play in these rooms, the secretary, I apprehend, would have interfered and said, "No, we did not allow you to use these rooms that you might let them out to others." This shews, I think, the true relation subsisting between the parties. They were only performing by the permission of the secretary, and do not come within the 2nd section, which refers to one who has a permanent interest in a theatre, or who is the responsible manager of it. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the Magistrates were wrong.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the act seems to be to maintain a proper control over places for the performance of stage-plays. It imposes a penalty on the owners or occupiers of an unlicensed theatre, and upon those who cause a play to be acted in any such place. Now, the persons convicted were neither owners nor occupiers of the hall. They had no interest in it; all they did was to pay for the use of it for six nights for the purposes of their entertainment. This seems to me a case regulated by the 11th section. The appellants caused stage-plays to be presented in an unlicensed theatre. When I find that there is a separate section distinctly alluding to persons of the description of the appellants, I think that it would be straining the language of the 2nd section to say that a person who has the use of a public room for an evening entertainment "has and keeps" it, within the meaning of the 2nd section. The licence, according to the provisions of another section (section 7), is to be granted to the actual and responsible manager of the theatre for the time being. When the responsible manager has procured a licence, he may allow other persons to perform within the building. But any such person who has the use of this building for a few entertainments by night is not required by the statute to take out a licence. The order of Sessions must be confirmed.

Order of Sessions confirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 8, 1865.

THE LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH OF CHATHAM EXTRA, appellants, v.
THE ROCHESTER PAVEMENT AND ROAD COMMISSIONERS, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 81; L. R. 1 Q.B. 24; 13 L. T. 273; 14 W. R. 51; 12 Jur. N.S. 47.

Commissioners of Turnpike Trust—Local Act, 9 Geo. 3. c. xxxii.—Paying off old Charge on Rates and Tolls—"Hereafter Borrow"—Sinking Fund—12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 79, s. 4.

HIGHWAYS.—Certain Commissioners of a turnpike-road and for other purposes, under a local act of parliament, were empowered to borrow sums of money for the purposes of the act, on the credit of certain rates, assessments and tolls, and did so borrow at interest at the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum. Afterwards, by the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3, where such Commissioners should "hereafter borrow, charge or secure any sum or sums of money on the credit of the tolls arising on such road," they should, "out of the tolls of such road and in priority to all other payments thereout, except the interest of such monies as aforesaid, . . . set apart a sum of 5l. per cent. per annum on the amount of money so borrowed, charged or secured." The Commissioners, with a view to get the money at a cheaper rate, by reason of the inducement of this sinking fund, called in the old securities and obtained the money at 4l. per cent.—Held, that they were not entitled to set apart the sinking fund under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3, as the money raised to pay off the old charges was not "hereafter borrowed" within the meaning of that act.

Semble—that the power to create a sinking fund under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3. was confined to cases where the money was borrowed on the credit of the tolls alone of a turnpike-road, and could not be extended to a case like the present, where the security consisted of rates, assessments and tolls—Blackburn, J. dubitante.

This CASE was stated pursuant to the statute of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by Justices of the Peace for the county of Kent.

At a Special Sessions for the highways, holden for the north or Rochester division of the lathe of Aylesford, in the county of Kent, the Commissioners of the Turnpike Trust, under the statute 9 Geo. 3. c. xxxii, intituled, 'An Act for paving, cleansing, lighting and watching the high streets and lanes in the parish of St. Nicholas, within the city of Rochester and parish of Strood, in the county of Kent, and for making a road through Star Lane across certain fields adjoining thereto to Chatham Hill, in the said county,' (hereinafter called the respondents) exhibited an information pursuant to the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, (which has since been periodically re-enacted,) alleging that the funds of the said turnpike trust were insufficient for the repair of the said turnpike-road lying within the district called Chatham Extra, in the parish of Chatham, in the said division and county; and thereupon the Sessions made an order that the sum of 100l., part of the rate or assessment levied or to be levied for the repair of the highways in and for the district of Chatham Extra in the said parish of Chatham, should on the 1st of August, 1865, by the said local board of the said district (the appellants), be paid to the said respondents, to be wholly laid out in the actual repair of such part of the said turnpike-road as lies within the said parish of Chatham and district of Chatham Extra.

The Commissioners were empowered under 9 Geo. 3. c. xxxii, to cause the streets of St. Nicholas, Rochester and Strood, to be paved, cleansed, lighted and watched, and to open, make and keep in repair a road from Star Lane, in the city of Rochester, across Chatham Hill, to the old road from London; and they were empowered to make every year a rate upon all occupiers of houses or tenements within the parishes of St. Nicholas and Strood respectively, and to erect a turnpike-gate at the end of the new road next Chatham Hill, and another gate at or near the Angel Inn, in Strood, and no other gate upon any of the said streets or roads, and to take at such gates the tolls specified by the said act.

The Commissioners were also empowered at any meeting, to borrow and take up at interest any sum or sums of money upon the credit of the rates, assessments and tolls payable by virtue of the said local act, and to assign over the same, or any part or parts thereof, by any writing or writings under their hands and seals, to any person or persons that should advance or lend their monies thereon, as a security or securities for the several sums that should be borrowed and the interest thereof as aforesaid. Provided, that after the first meeting no money should be borrowed upon the credit of that act unless fourteen days' notice should be given in manner therein directed, and no preference was to be given to any creditor in respect of priority of advancing such sums, but all to be creditors in equal degree one to another. And it was enacted, that all monies raised or collected by virtue of the said local act should be vested in the said Commissioners, and should be applied for the purposes of the same act and to no other purpose, without declaring that any one of such purposes should have priority or preference over another or others of such purposes, except that the expenses of passing the act should be paid out of the first money so raised.

The new road was made and has been maintained to the present time by the respondents, and the turnpike-gates set up and maintained as directed by the said local act, and tolls continue to be taken thereat, and rates are annually made and collected in St. Nicholas and Strood, and the streets and lanes of the two parishes are kept paved, lighted and cleansed pursuant to the said local act. The whole of such income is treated as a common fund, and has been applied to all the payments to which the trust is liable.

The Commissioners from time to time borrowed money for the purposes of the said act, amounting to upwards of 10,000*l.*, which has been reduced, by occasional payments of principal, to its present amount of 8,000*l.*

The great bulk of this loan was borrowed in 1769 and 1770 (except 200*l.* borrowed in 1823), at 5*l.* per cent. per annum interest, and sums were paid off from time to time, so that in 1853 the principal, secured by the assignment of tolls, &c., was 9,800*l.*, and the Commissioners believing that the money could be had at a lower rate, accordingly advertised for a loan of that amount at 4*l.* per cent. interest, to be secured on the tolls and rates of the trust. Among the holders of the original assignments of 1770, creditors to the amount of 2,200*l.* offered to continue such at the reduced rate of interest, and new capitalists came forward, whose tenders were accepted for 7,500*l.* more, making together 9,700*l.* The remaining 100*l.* was paid off absolutely from funds in hand. All the original assignments were in April 1853 delivered up and cancelled, as well as those of creditors who lowered the rate of their interest and continued otherwise creditors as before as those of the creditors who received their principal money and relinquished all claim. And new assignments to the amount of 9,700*l.* were executed to all the creditors, whether new or continuing, without distinction. Since 1853 assignments to the amount of 1,700*l.* have been paid off without any preference, reducing the total secured debt to the present sum of 8,000*l.*, at interest of 4*l.* per cent., and 6,800*l.* of this present debt is due to creditors who had no claim on trust till April, 1853; the remainder, 1,200*l.*, is due to those who then exchanged old assignments for new ones.

Each assignment was by deed to secure 100*l.*, and witnessed that the Commissioners named or empowered by the said act, by those presents assigned and transferred the rates, assessments and tolls payable by virtue of the said act, to the assignee, his executors, administrators and assigns; to have, hold, receive and take the same, and the money to be collected and received thereby, until the said sum of 100*l.*, with interest for the same, should be fully paid and satisfied.

There are in the two parishes of St. Nicholas and Strood highways not under the Commissioners of this trust, and in respect of the repair of such highways rates are made by the ordinary surveyors of highways.

The new road had for several years been falling into an inferior condition in consequence of the inability of the funds of the trust to meet the expense of repairing, and it was estimated by the surveyor to the respondents to require about 120*l.* in the current year to keep in a proper state of repair that portion which lies within the district of Chatham Extra.

The estimated revenue and expenditure for the year 1865, founded principally on the actual receipts of tolls and rates at the maximum rate in St. Nicholas and Strood, and payments of 1864 in respect of interest on the sinking fund of 5*l.* per cent. on the 8,000*l.* and repairs, shewed a deficit of 378*l.* for repairs, &c. of the turnpike-road in the four parishes.

It was contended, by the appellants, that the respondent Commissioners could not lawfully set aside 5*l.* per cent. per annum on the 8,000*l.* principal remaining unpaid on the assignments until after payment out of the revenues of the trust of not only the interest on that principal and other liabilities and annual expenses of the trust, but also the necessary expenses of the repairs of such road, inasmuch as the debt, if any, being an old debt, created before the passing of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. (Aug. 1, 1849,) the powers of that act were not available, and the Commissioners were left to apply those of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79. They would then find sufficient funds from their tolls and rates to pay the interest and all other liabilities, and also to repair the roads, their sole deficit being then in the sinking fund, for which (being postponed to all other payments) there would remain to be set apart only about 25*l.* instead of 400*l.*, and that such a deficiency in means for raising a sinking fund could not be made good by contributions from highway rates; and further, the appellants say, that unless the debt of 8,000*l.* is an old debt created before 1849, the existing assignments are void as being for money raised for other purposes than those of the local act of 1769. So that in either case the 5*l.* per cent. on capital cannot be set apart for a sinking fund until after providing for repair of road out of the income of rates and tolls.

The respondents contended that they, as Commissioners of this turnpike trust, were authorized under the acts 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79, to set apart 5*l.* per cent. of the principal of their secured debt after payment of interest only, and that thereupon, if the income of the trust should be insufficient to defray the cost of repairs of the road, the deficiency was to be provided for by contributions from the monies applicable to the repairs of the highways of parishes through which the turnpike-road passes. They alleged that the present debt both in form and substance was a new debt created since the 1st of August, 1849. After the old assignments, to the amount of 7,600*l.*, have been actually paid off in cash, and the remaining twenty-two securities (2,200*l.*) satisfied by being exchanged for new assignments (made the same as to the new lenders) in April, 1853, that the new loan was for the purposes of the act and highly beneficial to the trust in reducing the amount annually required for interest.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, whether the estimated deficiency of the respondents' revenues, as shewn in this case arises lawfully under the provisions of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87, so as to authorize an order for contributions from parochial or district highway funds towards the maintenance and keeping in repair of the road within this turnpike trust, or whether the respondents are bound to provide for the maintenance and repair of such road and other payments prior to setting apart the sinking fund of 5*l.* per cent. per annum on the principal debt, and prior to defraying the charge of lighting the parishes of Strood and St. Nicholas, Rochester.

Mellish (F. Smith with him), for the respondents, in support of the order.—The material questions are whether, in taking the accounts, the Commissioners who managed the road were entitled to take credit for a sum of money which they had set apart for a sinking fund to pay off the debt of the road, and that depends upon the question whether the money borrowed on the security of the tolls was borrowed before or after August, 1849. If before that period of time, the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 71. applies, and the repairs must be paid for before a sinking fund is set apart, and the order would be wrong; but if since, the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3. applies, and the sum to be set apart for a sinking fund takes precedence of the repairs, and the order would be right. Another question arises out of the transaction in April, 1853. When the old assignments of such of the old creditors as continued creditors on the new footing were exchanged for fresh assignments, and new assignments were executed to the new creditors—namely, whether the debt of each of those parties stands on a different footing one from the other. But if the whole of the debt is deemed to have been created before August, 1849, that question cannot arise, as the order is bad for the whole amount for which it is made.

[BLACKBURN, J.—If the transaction in April, 1853, can be made to be in law merely a transfer of the old debt and interest for the purpose of reducing the interest, that would imply that the purpose was the same purpose as before.]

The material act is the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3.¹ It is submitted, then, that any one of those persons who lent their money in 1853 would have a right to complain if the sinking fund is not set apart, because they lent it at a lower rate of interest upon the faith of that provision. The 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79, s. 4,² will be relied on by the other side. But that act does not touch a case

(1) 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3. enacts, "That in every case in which the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike-road shall hereafter borrow, charge, or secure any sum or sums of money on the credit of the tolls arising on such road, such trustees or commissioners shall, out of the tolls of such road, and in priority to all other payments thereout, except the interest on any such monies as aforesaid, and on any other monies remaining owing on the security of the said tolls, set apart a sum of 5*l.* per centum per annum on the amount of money so borrowed, charged, or secured; and when and so often as the sums so set apart as aforesaid shall amount to the sum of 200*l.*, the trustees or commissioners of the road out of the tolls of which such sum has arisen shall, at any general annual or other meeting of such trustees or commissioners, apply such sum in the payment of a proportionate part of the monies borrowed, charged, or secured as aforesaid, and then remaining unpaid, to the creditors of the tolls of such road, and shall, twenty-eight days, at least before such general annual or other meeting, cause notice to be given of such meeting, and of the purposes thereof, so far as the same relate to the application of the said sum, in some newspaper usually circulated in the county or counties in which such road is situate; and at such meeting such trustees or commissioners shall apply such sum, or a portion thereof (as the case may require), in or towards the discharge of monies owing on the security of the tolls of such road, to the creditor who shall, by proposal in writing transmitted to the clerk of such trustees or Commissioners before such meeting, have offered to accept the lowest composition in respect of such monies, and shall apply the surplus (if any) of such sum, after payment to such creditor as aforesaid, or a portion of such sum (as the case may require), in or towards the discharge of monies owing on the security of the said tolls, to the creditor who by proposal as aforesaid shall have offered to accept the next lowest composition in respect of such monies, and so in like manner until the sum shall be exhausted; and if two or more creditors by proposal as aforesaid shall have offered to accept an equal rate of composition, it shall be lawful for such trustees or commissioners to determine by lot the preference between or amongst such creditors, or to pay such composition rateably between or amongst such creditors, as such trustees or commissioners think fit; and if there be no such proposal as aforesaid, or there be any surplus of the sum after applying the same, so far as may be necessary, in or towards the discharge of the monies to which such proposals as aforesaid relate, such trustees or commissioners may apply the said sum rateably amongst the creditors, or may pay the same to such of them as may be determined by lot, as such trustees or commissioners think fit."

(2) 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79. s. 4. enacts, "That where the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike road had before the passing of the said act borrowed, charged, or secured any sum or sums of money on the credit of the tolls arising on such road, and any such money shall remain unpaid and unsatisfied at the time of the passing of this act, such trustees or commissioners shall, out of the tolls of such road, after payment thereof of the interest on any monies owing on the security of the said tolls, and such sums as may be required to be set apart under the said recited enactment, and all other annual liabilities (if any) of their trust, and the necessary expenses of the repairs of such road, and of the salaries of their officers, and all other necessary expenses of their trust, set apart a sum of 5*l.* per centum per annum on the amount of principal money so borrowed, charged, or secured before the passing of the said act, and remaining unpaid and unsatisfied as aforesaid, or such lesser sum as may from time to time remain after such payment as aforesaid; and when and so often as the sums so set apart shall amount to the sum of 200*l.*, the trustees or commissioners of the road out of the tolls of which such sum has arisen shall apply such sum in or towards payment of the monies so borrowed, charged, or secured as aforesaid, and then remaining unpaid, in manner provided by the said act with respect to the application of money arising from the sums set apart as therein mentioned, in or towards the discharge of monies borrowed, charged, or secured after the passing of such act: Provided always, that it shall be lawful for one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, if upon like the present, which is within the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. That statute must be read as if the other had never passed.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The question comes to be this, whether the borrowing anew at a reduced rate of interest to pay off the old debt, if it can be considered to create a new debt, is a borrowing within the 12th section of the 9 Geo. 3. c. xxxii., by which the power to borrow from time to time for the purposes of that act as being within the scope of the powers given by that act. But that section must have been intended by the legislature to apply to the borrowing of further sums, and not to the mere substitution of one debt for another. It could not have been intended to give this power to create a sinking fund in a case like the present, where the funds are sufficient to pay the interest and repair the road; but when the sum is set apart from the sinking fund, it becomes impossible to satisfy one or other of those exigencies.]

They get the money cheaper.

[BLACKBURN, J.—They borrow at a cheaper rate, but at the same time throw a burthen upon another body. It might be equitable if you are about for the first time to raise a sum of money for the improvement of a road to make the parish liable; but surely it would not be so where there is a debt already contracted and the form of the debt merely is changed.]

The new creditors lent their money on the faith of the advertisement and the sinking fund, and its being a new loan.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Is it not the duty of a person going to lend his money to a body of trustees to inquire whether it is a fresh loan, or the transfer of an old loan?—for if in form it is not a transfer, it is in substance. It is not a borrowing for fresh works. Your argument appears to me to put the lender in the position of a person who has taken a bill of exchange for value, and to say that as he has advanced his money and got a formal assignment of the tolls, he has a right to assume that the trustees had the power to create this new debt, and so entitled himself to this sinking fund.]

There are cases which shew that where there are certain forms which are conditions precedent. Commissioners and such bodies are bound by their seal, which is conclusive evidence against them that they are acting under proper resolutions and matters of that sort.

[BLACKBURN, J.—With reference to those matters that is so. The Commissioners here had power to raise the 9,800*l.* for the purpose of lowering the interest on the old debt. Then, if the lenders were fixed with knowledge of such power, the hardship that they expected to lend their money on the credit of the tolls would go. Was it not their duty to inquire before they lent their money, what you were borrowing it for?]

Bovill (Prentice with him).—The 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79. s. 4. applies to this debt; and, further, this second borrowing was not for the purposes of the first act. The purposes for which the power to borrow was given were to make a new road, repair the road, and light and pave the streets. There was no obligation to pay off the old debt.

COCKBURN, C.J.—If the Commissioners had money in their hands to pay off the debt, then paying it off would be one of the purposes of the act.]

If this second borrowing were also to be within the act of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. then there would be a power of giving priority to such as should lend at that time over any portion of the old lenders who might not be paid off, which would be contrary to the provisions of the original act. Further, the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. s. 3. was only intended to apply where there were trustees the application of the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike-road he see fit so to do, by order in writing under his hand, to authorize such trustees or commissioners not to set apart any sum as hereinbefore required, or to set apart a less sum per centum per annum than the sum hereinbefore mentioned; and it shall be lawful for such Secretary of State from time to time to vary or revoke any such authority, and such order shall be binding on such trustees or commissioners: Provided also, that where provision is made under any local act for forming a fund for the discharge of the monies borrowed, charged, or secured on the tolls of any turnpike-road, this enactment shall not extend to the trustees or commissioners of such road."

of the trust simpliciter, and not where they had other powers as well, and they are only entitled to set apart this sinking fund out of the tolls, and no mention is anywhere made of a fund composed of tolls, rates and assessments; therefore it cannot have been intended that the sinking fund should have been set apart out of this common fund. This is, without doubt, a turnpike-road, and is none the less so because the tolls may be applied to other purposes than the repair of the road, and they form part of a common fund derived from other sources—The Trustees of Sunk Island Turnpike Road v. the Surveyors of Highways of the Parish of Patrington (1 Best & S. 747; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 18). The borrowing was a borrowing before the year 1849, and therefore within the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 79; and if it was a new borrowing it would not be within the powers of the Commissioners.

Mellish, in reply.—With reference to the non-applicability of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87, where the trust is not a turnpike trust simpliciter, and the tolls are to go to a common fund, there seems no difficulty in setting apart a sum from the tolls for the sinking fund before paying them over to the common fund.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the appellants are right, and that this order must be quashed. The first question is, whether the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. applies to the present case. If it does, it would be the duty of the Commissioners, out of the fund which comes to their hands, to assign 5l. per cent. of the amount for the formation of the sinking fund before they proceed to pay the interest of the money borrowed, or to expend the necessary amount for the repairs of the road; but I think that act does not apply.

The trustees, under an act of parliament, were empowered to borrow money upon the credit of the rates and tolls levied under the powers of that act, and they did borrow a sum of money at interest of 5l. per cent. They were ultimately advised that they could obtain the amount which they required, or some portion of the money, at a lower rate of interest, namely, 4l. per cent., and they advertised for persons to advance the money on the same security, on the assignment of the tolls and rates under the Act of Parliament of 1849, and they obtained the money. The 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. enacts, that "In every case in which the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike-road shall hereafter borrow, charge, or secure any sum or sums of money on the credit of the tolls arising on such road, such trustees or commissioners shall, out of the tolls of such road, and in priority to all other payments thereout, except the interest on any such monies as aforesaid, and on any other monies remaining owing on the security of the said tolls, set apart a sum of 5l. per cent. per annum on the amount of money so borrowed, charged, or secured." Those words, taken in their literal signification, would apply to the present case, because this was money borrowed after the passing of that act; but inasmuch as it was a sum of money borrowed not for any fresh purpose, not by way of making fresh roads, or being expended in any improvement that might come within the scope of the act of parliament, but as it was merely a sum borrowed to pay off the previously existing debt, it appears to me, that it was merely a substitution of a new debt for an old debt, and the legislature never could have contemplated such a case, or intended that that should come within that enactment of this statute. It might be that the funds arising from the tolls here, combined with the rates, might be adequate to pay the interest of the money borrowed, and to maintain the repairs of the road, and yet sufficient might not be left after those two most essential objects had been complied with to constitute a sinking fund. I imagine that the legislature did not intend to alter the existing state of things with reference to a case like the present, where the money had been borrowed previously to the passing of that act, and where no new charge had been created, but simply a new one substituted for the old one, but to provide that where any monies should be borrowed after the passing of that act to carry out the objects of the trust, a sinking fund should be established for the purpose of paying the debt. It cannot be contended here that the Commissioners are bound under that act to set aside a sum of 5*l.* per cent. on the amount due, which comes to 400*l.* a year, and to do that before they pay the interest of the money due and the expenses of the repairs of the road. If they are not bound to do that, then it is admitted on both sides that there is a sufficient fund for the repairs of the road after the payment of the interest, without calling upon the appellant's parish to contribute. I own, besides taking that view of the first question, that I cannot see my way to the conclusion that the act of parliament in question can be applicable to the present case.

It is not absolutely necessary to express an opinion on the second question; but I cannot help thinking that where an act of parliament speaks of money borrowed upon the security of the tolls of a turnpike trust, and then goes on to say that where money is borrowed upon the security of such tolls, a sum shall be set apart out of such tolls by way of creating a sinking fund to pay off that money, that cannot be applied to a case where money has been borrowed, not on the credit of the tolls, but on the tolls plus rates. The creditor, in the two cases, is in a very different position. The tolls are precarious, and the income arising from them may fail; but the rates in a populous parish of the town are certainly a good security, and the creditor who has such a security as that is in a different position from the creditor who has only security on the tolls. But whether that be so or not, inasmuch as, according to the local act of parliament, no distinction is made between rates and tolls, and the money is authorized to be borrowed, and has been, upon the assignment of the rates as well as the tolls, it seems to me that the act of parliament which relates to tolls simply, and provides for a sinking fund to be created out of those tolls, without anything more, is not applicable to such a case. I think, therefore, that in deciding on the first point, it is not necessary to decide the second; but I entertain a strong opinion on the second point that that act of parliament cannot apply. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the order of the Justices was wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have come to the same conclusion on the first point on which our judgment is based, namely, that I think, under the circumstances, the debts do not come within the meaning of the act of 1849, so as to make a sinking fund have priority to the repairs of the road. If that be so, then the present case is one in which the order should not have been made. Upon that point, and on that point only, I base my opinion that the order ought to be quashed. The act of 1849 enacts, that in every case in which the trustees and commissioners shall hereafter borrow or secure any sum or sums of money on the credit of the tolls, they shall set apart a sinking fund out of the tolls before they discharge any other charges upon them. The act of 1850 extends that enactment to a case in which money has been borrowed before the act of 1849, and causes a sinking fund to be set aside out of the tolls after the repairs of the roads and other charges have been met. The difference of those two cases can only become of practical importance when the turnpike trust, as far as the turnpike-road is concerned, is in a state of insolvency. For so long as the turnpike-roads trustees have a sufficient amount to keep the roads in repair, and set aside the sinking fund, it is utterly immaterial whether they set it aside before or after. What was the state of the law at the time the act was passed? Now, turnpike-roads are all public highways, and as such, if the turnpike trustees are able to keep them in repair, they are bound to do so, and if they are not, the parish is to contribute: and the consequence of causing a sinking fund to be taken out of the tolls before the payment of the expenses of repairing the roads would be to accelerate the time when the parish will become liable. But the question really comes to this practically—shall the increase of the sinking fund be delayed, or, shall it be set apart at the expense of the parishes? In that view of the matter, it would be right and proper for the legislature to say, whenever there is any fresh thing to be done for the turnpike-road, and money to be borrowed for fresh purposes for the benefit of the parish, that the parish will have to give a first security for the sinking fund, because that will be a new matter. But where the debts have been already incurred without the parish being liable, it is not right and proper to make the parish give security for the sinking fund for parishes, or to meddle with the bygone debts, but leave them as they were before, and only deal with future borrowings. Now comes the question of what is the meaning of a hereafter borrowing of any sum or sums of money? I think this can only mean a new charge, and I think where money is already borrowed and charged, and there is merely a transfer to fresh creditors for the purpose of diminishing the quantity of interest, I do not think that that is a charging the tolls with any fresh charge; it is merely continuing an old charge; consequently, I think that in such a case as I have mentioned that it is merely an old charge continued to a new person, and it does not come within the act of 1849, though I think it is within the act of 1850. Now, in the present case, the form was gone through of the old creditors being paid off and a new assignment made of the debt: and was that new assignment such as to make it a new borrowing? It is quite plain, as the case is stated, that it is the old charge continued on, although in the hands of new persons, to reduce the rate of interest. A good deal was said in the argument that that was beyond their power. I cannot think there is any doubt that if parties are to continue borrowing a sum of money, and they, having borrowed, find that they can get it at a reduced rate of interest, I do not think that they do go beyond their power in getting it, if there is no hardship and they do it fairly. In substance, it is merely a continuation of the old debt; therefore I think it does not come within the act of 1849, but, subject to the other point, it would come within the act of 1850. Now, as to the other point to which my Lord has adverted. This is money borrowed, not on the security of the tolls, but on the tolls and the rates. The Commissioners of the turnpike-roads are not only Commissioners of the roads, but they are Commissioners for paving and lighting. Upon that point I do not think it necessary to express any opinion: if it were, I should take time to consider; but my inclination of opinion, at present, is contrary to my Lord's. My inclination of opinion is, that these words are within the act of parliament, although the borrowing is not only upon the tolls, but upon other matters. But that is merely intimation of opinion, and, if it were necessary, I should take more time to consider it. If that ever becomes a material question, it will be raised on mandamus, when it could be taken to Error to be decided. As it is, the present case will be decided without an appeal.

MELLOR, J.—I agree with my Lord and my Brother Blackburn as to the first point. Admitting the literal construction of the words of the statute to be what Mr. Mellish says, yet, when one comes to look at the whole context of the two statutes, I think we have an interpretation that is reasonable and satisfactory. It is this: that money which had been borrowed before the act of 1849 and secured upon the tolls, though it may be reasonable, owing to a change of circumstances, that a sinking fund should be provided, yet still as that would have an effect upon the interest of the parish at large, it is not, as it appears to me, to have in that case any priority to money borrowed after, because there the money is borrowed on the credit of the thing as it stood, and the money has not therefore to be raised, and there is no necessity to hold out special inducements to obtain the money. I think, as this was simply money raised for the purpose of paying off the old charge (and that is the real key to the construction of this act of parliament), the Commissioners are not to increase the charge or the incumbrance of the tolls except upon the terms of the act of 1849. If there be no increase of the charge, or enlargement of the obligation, but a simple substitution of money borrowed at 4*l.* per cent. to pay off money borrowed at 5*l.* per cent., I can see no reason in justice why the construction contended for by Mr. Mellish should prevail. Without saying more on that point, I entirely concur in the conclusion which has been come to by my Lord and my Brother Blackburn. But, with regard to the second point, I confess I agree with my Lord, and I cannot help thinking that the case does not apply to this act of parliament. The great object of the act of parliament is lighting, watching, cleansing, improving, and incidentally making a new road, and for that purpose rates are to be levied on certain parishes and tolls taken at particular gates, and, according to the whole form of the statute, they become one common fund, and are applicable to the various purposes of the act, not merely to the repair of the road alone, but lighting and watching, and various other things, which are the principal objects, as it appears to me to be, contemplated by the act of parliament, the road itself being comparatively a subordinate matter. At all events, it is not put forward as the important object of the act itself. That being so, when we come to look at the terms of the 12 & 13 Vict., we find they are, in every case in which the trustees or commissioners of any turnpike road shall hereafter borrow, charge or secure any sum or sums of money on the credit of the tolls; that is to say, in the case in which the charge and the security is upon the credit of the tolls, then priority is assigned. But then it says, "and on monies remaining owing on the security of the said tolls, set apart a sum of 5l. per cent. per annum on the amount of money so borrowed, charged or secured." Then, again, when we come lower down, we find a section which says what is to be the application of the monies. It says they shall pay such sums, "and the payment of a proportionate part of the monies borrowed, charged or secured, as aforesaid, and then remaining unpaid to the creditors on the tolls of such road." Now here, these persons are not creditors of the tolls "of such road" alone, but the first security they have is according to the words of the statute which empowers the commissioners to make the road, which says, "they may borrow and take up at interest any sum or sums of money upon the credit of the rates, assessments and tolls." Therefore, it appears to me, these persons are not creditors of the tolls only, but creditors of the rates, assessments and tolls, and it appears to me that the working out of the sinking fund would be attended with great hardship, and would alter very much and very materially the position of the parish. As it appears to me, it is not intended really to apply to a case where the main security, or where the security may, or a considerable portion of it may, consist of a right to charge and assess lands and tenements of a permanent character, and which are not precarious like tolls. I think, for these reasons, that the act of parliament does not apply, and that it is not necessary to go further. I agree with my Lord and my Brother Blackburn on the first point upon which I have based my judgment; but I have thought it right to express an opinion in accordance with what my Lord has given, thinking that that is the fair construction to be put upon the act of parliament.

SHEE, J.—I agree that the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 87. has reference only to a new charge made after the passing of the act, or to further charges made after the passing of that act, and I also entirely agree with what has fallen from my Lord and my Brother Mellor on the second ground.

Order quashed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Nov. 11, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. REDMAN.*

35 L. J. M.C. 89; L. R. 1 C.C. 12; 13 L. T. 303; 14 W. R. 56; 10 Cox C.C. 159;
11 Jur. N.S. 960.

Threat to accuse to procure Sale of a Mare.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner was convicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. of threatening to accuse of an abominable crime, thereby to extort money. It was proved that the prisoner went to the prosecutor and threatened to accuse his son of an unnatural offence with a mare, unless the prosecutor would buy the mare for 3l. 10s.:—Held, that the conviction was right.

CASE stated by Willes, J.

Henry Redman was tried before me at the last Wilts Assizes (under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 47), for threatening a boy's father to accuse the boy of an abominable offence upon a mare, with intent to extort money from the father. The prisoner charged the boy with an abominable offence upon a mare in the prisoner's possession. Before giving information against the boy (which he afterwards did, when the charge was dismissed as groundless), the prisoner went to the boy's father and stated to him that the offence had been committed, and that if the father did not buy the mare of him and pay him 3l. 10s. for her, he would accuse the boy. The father refused, saying that the prisoner was a liar and wanted to get rid of the mare.

The prisoner pursued the same course to the boy's master, who treated his attempt in the same way.

No evidence was given as to the value of the mare, but there was the above evidence of the prisoner's desire to get rid of her.

The boy was called, and denied the charge, which was a most improbable one.

I told the jury to find the prisoner guilty, if he threatened the father to make the charge for the purpose of putting off the mare and forcing the father under terror of the threatened charge to buy and pay for her at the prosecutor's price.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and I directed that he should remain in custody until the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved was obtained upon the question whether the case was within the statute.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

Bowen, in support of the conviction, was not heard.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction was right.

WILLES, J.—I reserved the point, not because I entertained any doubt, but because the point was new and the prisoner was not defended by counsel.

Conviction affirmed.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., Pigott, B., Shee, J. and Montague Smith, J.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 20, 22, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. THE JUSTICES OF THE PARTS OF LINDSEY.

35 L. J. M.C. 90; 6 B. & S. 892; L. R. 1 Q.B. 68; 13 L. T. 524;
14 W. R. 179; 12 Jur. N.S. 814.

Highway District Acts—Notice fixing Time for First Meeting of Highway Board—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 6.—25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 10.—27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 10.

HIGHWAYS.—By the 54 Geo. 3. c. 91. s. 1. overseers of the poor are to be appointed on the 25th of March, or within fourteen days after, and by the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 6. the same date is fixed for the appointment of surveyors of highways. By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 10. waywardens are to be elected at the time when surveyors would have been chosen before the act. By the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 10. the first meeting of the highway board is to be appointed for a time not more than seven days after the time fixed by law for the election of waywardens:—Held, that after a provisional order directing the election of waywardens, a final order, fixing the first meeting of the highway board for the district for the first Thursday after the 25th of March was good, and did not unduly curtail the time for the election of waywardens.

By a provisional order of the Quarter Sessions at Kirton for the Parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln, on the 20th of October, 1864, certain parishes, townships and places were constituted a highway district, under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, to be called the Isle of Axholme Highway District, and it was ordered that waywardens should be elected for each of these parishes, townships and places.

This order was confirmed by a final order of the same Sessions, on the 7th of April, 1865, directing the first meeting of the highway board to be elected for the Isle of Axholme Highway District to be held at the police-station at Epworth, in the district, on the first Thursday after the 25th of March, 1866, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Keane obtained a rule, in Trinity Term, 1865, calling upon Justices in and for the Parts of Lindsey to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to remove the final order, on the ground that the time fixed by it for the meeting of the highway board was fixed contrary to law and in violation of the statutes 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 10, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 6. and 54 Geo. 3. c. 91. s. 1. (Two other grounds on which the rule was obtained were abandoned.) The affidavits in support of the rule stated the facts as above; and it appeared, from an affidavit of the assistant clerk to the Magistrates, that the parishes, townships and places in question were within the petty sessional division of the hundred of Manley; and that during the last eight years it had been the general custom for parishes and townships within the division, and appointing surveyors of highways, to elect the surveyor on the 25th of March in each year; and if an election took place after that day, it was almost invariably on the 26th or 27th of March. Only six instances of elections after these last dates could be discovered by the clerk, and these were on the 28th, 29th and 31st of March.

Hayes, Serj. and J. W. Mellor shewed cause (Nov. 20).—The order is valid. By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 6. reg. 5. the provisional order may, and the final order shall, state the time for the first meeting of the highway board, not being more than seven days after the first election of waywardens. This is repealed by the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 10, which provides that the time appointed must be not more than seven days after the time limited by law for the election of waywardens. By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 10. the waywardens are to be elected at the same time as surveyors would have been before the act; that is, according to the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 6, on the 25th of March, or if that day should fall on Good Friday or on Sunday, then on the next day following, or within fourteen days next after the 25th of March. But there is nothing to shew that provision ought in all cases to be made for delay in the election of waywardens. Ample time, according to the usual practice, has been secured for their election.

[MELLOR, J.—It might happen that waywardens would be unable to attend the first meeting, because the election did not take place till after it.]

The first meeting could always be adjourned if it came on before the time for the election. This could be done under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 40.

Keane and Cave, in support of the rule.—The order is bad. The time which it fixes for the first meeting of the waywardens is inconvenient, as it unduly abridges the time within which they may be elected. The 26th of March would not be more open to objection than the day actually named; but if the former day had been fixed for the meeting, the waywardens could hardly have been elected so as to attend it. Moreover, the time for nominating the overseers of the poor will be limited, as the nomination must take place at the time appointed by the order for the meeting of the waywardens.

Cur. adv. vult.

MELLOR, J. (Nov. 22) delivered the judgment of the Court.¹—In this case a rule nisi was obtained by Mr. Keane for a certiorari to remove a final order made at the Quarter Sessions holden at Kirton, for the parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln, on the 7th of April last, whereby it was ordered that a certain provisional order of the 20th of October, 1864, the confirmation of which had been duly respite to these sessions, should be finally ordered to be confirmed, and the same was confirmed. By which final order it was also ordered that the first meeting of the highway board to be elected for the Isle of Axholme highway district should be held at the police-station at Epworth, in the said district, on the first Thursday after the 25th of March, 1866, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Two objections which had been made to the order were abandoned by Mr. Keane during the argument, and the only point remaining for consideration was the appointment of the day for holding the first meeting of the highway board, which, it was alleged, was fixed contrary to law, and in violation of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 10, the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 6. and the 54 Geo. 3. c. 91. s. 1.

By the 54 Geo. 3. c. 91. s. 1, overseers of the poor are to be appointed on the 25th of March, or within fourteen days next after it. By the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 6. it was enacted, that the inhabitants of any parish maintaining its own highways should, at their first meeting for the election of overseers of the poor, proceed to the election of one or more persons to serve the office of surveyor in the said parish for the year next ensuing; and that in any parish in which there is no meeting for the nomination of overseers of the poor, the inhabitants contributing to the highway-rate shall meet at the usual place of public meeting on the 25th of March, and if that day should fall on Good Friday or on Sunday, then on the day next following, or within fourteen days next after the said 25th of March in every year. Such were the provisions for the election of surveyors of highways at the time of the passing of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, which gave large powers to Justices in Quarter Sessions to form highway districts for the more convenient management of highways. The first thing to be done was to make a provisional order constituting the highway district, which was, in order to its validity, to be confirmed at some subsequent Court of General or Quarter Sessions to be held within a period of not more than six months. By section 6. of that act, various regulations were enacted as to the making, confirmation, and approval of the orders for forming a highway district; and by regulation 5. it was provided, "that the provisional order might, and that the final order should, state the time, not being more than seven days after the first election of waywardens, and the place at which the first meeting of the board was to be held." This regulation was repealed by the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 10, and in lieu thereof it was enacted, that "the first meeting of the highway board, after the formation of a district, shall be held at such time as may be appointed by the provisional or final order of the Justices, so that the time appointed be not more than seven days after the expiration of the time limited by law for the election of waywardens; or in case of a special day being appointed for such election as thereafter mentioned, be not more than twenty-one days after that day." Provision for the election of waywardens is made by section 10. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, in the same manner as surveyors of the highways would have been chosen or appointed if the act had not passed; and section 7. of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. makes provision for places, in which, previously to the passing of the provisional order forming a highway district, no surveyor had been elected, and no provision made by the previous Highway Act of 1862.

(1) Mellor, J. and Shee, J.

In the highway district for the Isle of Axholme the election of waywardens will have to be made at the time and in the manner in which surveyors of highways were formerly elected for the various parishes forming part of that district, viz., on the 25th of March, or in case that fall on Good Friday or Sunday, then on the day next following, or within fourteen days next after the 25th of March. The final order constituting this district orders that the first meeting of the highway board for the Isle of Axholme highway district shall be held at the police-station at Epworth, in the said district, on the first Thursday after the 25th of March, 1866, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. Under these circumstances, Mr. Keane contended that the order is bad, inasmuch as it unduly circumscribes the time allowed by law for the election of waywardens for the several parishes within the district, and indirectly limits the time for the nomination of overseers of the poor in parishes in which the surveyors of highways were formerly elected at the same meeting at which overseers of the poor were elected. On the other hand, it was contended, by Serj. Hayes, that the order was clearly within the power of the Justices at Sessions to make, inasmuch as the time appointed for the meeting was not more than seven days after the expiration of the time limited by law for the election of waywardens, and that there was nothing to compel the parties to postpone such meeting for fourteen days after the 25th of March, and to fix it on one of the seven days thereafter.

We have come to the conclusion that, although it would have been better to have postponed the day of meeting to one of the seven days after the expiration of the time limited by law for the election of waywardens, yet, inasmuch as the day actually appointed allows a reasonable and sufficient time for the various elections of waywardens to take place, according to the practice which has prevailed in the district for the last eight years in the election of surveyors of highways, we see no reason for quashing this order. It seems that no real inconvenience will result from our supporting it, and although, as we have already said, it would have been more prudent for the Sessions to have appointed a later day, we cannot fail to observe that the 5 & 6 Will 4. c. 50. s. 6. directs the inhabitants to meet for the election of surveyors of the highways on the 25th of March, and if that day should fall on Good Friday or Sunday, then on the day next following, or within fourteen days next after the said 25th of March. In order to entitle the applicants to have this order quashed, they ought to shew that the Court of Quarter Sessions were bound to appoint a day after the expiration of the time limited by law for the election of waywardens. This they have failed to do, and we are therefore of opinion that the rule should be discharged, with costs.

Rule discharged.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Jan. 20, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. SHERLOCK.

35 L. J. M.C. 92; L. R. 1 C.C. 20; 13 L. T. 643; 14 W. R. 288;
12 Jur. N.S. 126; 10 Cox. C.C. 170.

Refusal to Assist a Constable in the Execution of his Duty—Indictment—Sufficiency of.

CRIMINAL LAW. POLICE.—An indictment against a person for refusing to aid and assist a constable in the execution of his duty, and prevent an assault made upon him by prisoners in his custody on a charge of felony, with intent to resist their lawful apprehension is sufficient without stating how the apprehension became lawful; and if it state a refusal to assist, without the further allegation that he did not, in fact, aid and assist.

The prisoner was tried at the Quarter Sessions for the county of Sussex, held at Lewes on the 2nd of July, 1865, and convicted; whereupon the following CASE was reserved for the opinion of this Court. The following is a copy of the indictment which was preferred and found against him:

Sussex, to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath present that heretofore, and before the committing of the offence hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 25th day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1865, Isaac Brown and James Brown were in the custody of James Newnham and George Parsons, constables of the East Sussex constabulary, and James Baldwin, a peace officer, in the parish of Rotherfield, in the said county of Sussex, upon a charge of felony, and the said Isaac Brown and James Brown committed an assault upon the said constables and breach of the peace, with intent to resist their lawful apprehension. And the jurors further present, that the said constables, there being a reasonable necessity for them to do so, called upon Caleb Sherlock, the defendant, for assistance in order to prevent the said assault and a breach of the peace. And the jurors aforesaid further present that the defendant Caleb Sherlock did unlawfully, wilfully and knowingly refuse to aid and assist the said constables in the execution of their duty, or to prevent an assault and breach of the peace, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her Crown and dignity.

The defendant's counsel submitted that the indictment was bad upon the following points: 1. The record did not shew lawful apprehension of the two Browns. 2. That there could not have been an assault to prevent apprehension, the Browns being already apprehended. 3. That the record does not state that the refusal to assist was on the same day and year as the assault, nor that it was the same assault; and that the merely stating a refusal is not sufficient without an allegation that he did not aid and assist.

The Chairman did not withdraw the case from the jury, and the defendant was convicted, and ordered to pay a fine to Her Majesty of 5*l.*, which amount the defendant deposited with the deputy clerk of the peace pending the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

The opinion of the Court was requested whether the defendant was lawfully convicted upon the above indictment.

No counsel appeared.

Per Curiam.—We have considered this case, and think that the conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Jan. 20, 1865.

THE QUEEN v. RICE AND WILTON.

35 L. J. M.C. 93; L. R. 1 C.C. 21; 13 L. T. 382; 14 W. R. 56;
12 Jur. N.S. 126; 10 Cox. C.C. 155.Disorderly House—Disorderly Conduct inside but not outside of the House.

DISORDERLY HOUSE.—A conviction on an indictment for keeping a disorderly house will be supported, although there is no evidence of any indecency or disorderly conduct being perceptible from the exterior of the house.

The following CASE was stated by the Deputy Recorder of the city of Chester.

The defendants were tried at the Quarter Sessions for the city of Chester, on the 14th of July, 1865, upon an indictment which stated that they "unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain common, ill-governed and disorderly house, and in the said house, for the lucre and gain of them, the said Peter Rice and Mary Wilton, certain persons, as well men as women, of evil name and fame, and of dishonest conversation, then and there unlawfully and wilfully did cause and procure to frequent and come together, and the said men and women, in the house of them, the said Peter Rice and Mary Wilton, at unlawful times, as well in the night as in the day, then and there to be and remain, drinking, tippling, whoring and misbehaving themselves, unlawfully and wilfully did permit, and yet do permit, to the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen, there inhabiting, being, residing and passing, to the evil example of all others offending, against the peace, &c.

It was proved that the prisoners acted as master and mistress of a house at Chester; that the house was frequented by prostitutes, who were constantly in the habit of bringing men there for the purposes of prostitution, and that this was done with the knowledge and assent of the prisoners. It was further proved that when a prostitute brought a man to the house for such purpose, such prostitute and man were allowed by the prisoners to have the use of a bedroom in the house either for a whole night or for a shorter period; that when such prostitute and man occupied the room for a whole night the sum of 5s. was charged by the defendants, and paid by the prostitute or man to the defendants for the use of the room. When occupied for a shorter period the sum of 2s. 6d. was charged by and paid to them. There was no evidence that any indecency or disorderly conduct was perceptible from the exterior of the house.

It was contended by the counsel for the defendants that there was no proof that the house was so conducted as to be a common nuisance, and consequently that the indictment was not proved. He declined to address the jury, stating that he could not contest the truth of the facts above stated. I directed the jury to find a verdict of guilty, which was entered, but judgment was postponed until the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved could be obtained; and the defendants were discharged on recognizance of bail to appear and receive judgment.

The question for the consideration of the Court is—Whether upon the facts so proved the defendants were guilty of an indictable offence as charged in the indictment.

No counsel appeared.

Per Curiam.—We have considered this case, and think that the conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

Jan. 20, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. FANNY SCHMIDT.*

35 L. J. M.C. 94; L. R. 1 C.C. 15; 13 L. T. 679; 14 W. R. 286;
12 Jur. N.S. 149; 10 Cox. C.C. 172.

Approved, R. v. Villensky, [1892] E. R. A.; 61 L. J. M.C. 218; [1892] 41 W. R. 160 (C.C.R.).

Receiving Stolen Goods—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 91.—Stolen Goods ceasing to be Stolen at the Time of Receipt.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner was convicted of feloniously receiving stolen goods under the following circumstances: The goods were stolen, and sent by the thief in a parcel by railway, addressed to the prisoner. A policeman belonging to the railway company, from information he had received, examined the parcel at the railway station at the place of its destination, and stopped it. It was called for by one of the thieves on the day of its arrival, and refused to him. A porter of the company, the next day, by the direction of the policeman, took it to a house which the thief who had called for it designated, and it was there received by the prisoner:—Held, by Martin, B., Keating, J. and Lush, J., that the conviction was wrong, as the goods had ceased to be stolen goods, within the statute, at the time of the receipt by the prisoner—Erle, C.J. and Mellor, J. dissentientibus.

The prisoner had been indicted and convicted with four men, named respectively Daniels, Scott, Townsend, and White, at the Court of Quarter Sessions held at Chichester, for the Western division of the county of Sussex, on the 20th of October, 1865.

The four men were indicted for having stolen a carpet-bag and divers other articles, the property of the London, Brighton and South-Coast Railway Company, and the prisoner, Fanny Schmidt, for having feloniously received a portion of the same articles, well knowing the same to have been stolen. With respect to the conviction of the female prisoner, the Deputy-Chairman, before whom the trial was had, stated the following CASE for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved:

The evidence adduced, so far as it related to the question submitted, was, in substance, as follows:

On the 28th of July last two passengers by the prosecutors' line of railway left a quantity of luggage at the Arundel station, which luggage was afterwards stolen therefrom. On the 29th of July a bundle, containing a portion of the stolen property, was taken to the "Augmering station," on the same line of railway, by the prisoner Townsend, and forwarded by him to the female prisoner, addressed "Mr. (sic) F. Schmidt, Waterloo Street, Hove, Brighton." The bundle was transmitted to Brighton in the usual course on Sunday morning, the 30th. Meanwhile, the theft had been discovered, and shortly after the bundle had reached the Brighton station a policeman (Carpenter) attached to the railway company opened it, and having satisfied himself that it contained a portion of the property stolen from the Arundel station, tied it up again, and directed a porter (Dunstall), in whose charge it was, not to part with it without further orders.

About 8 p.m. of the same day (Sunday, 30th) the prisoner, John Scott, went to the station at Brighton and asked the porter (Dunstall) if he had got a parcel from the Augmering station in the name of Schmidt, Waterloo Street. Dunstall replied "No." Scott then said, "It is wrapped up in a silk handkerchief, and is directed wrong. It ought to have been directed to 22, Cross Street,

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Martin, B., Keating, J., Mellor, J. and Lush, J.

Waterloo Street." Dunstall, in his evidence, added, "I knew the parcel was at the station, but I did not say so, because I had received particular orders about it."

The four men were apprehended the same evening in Brighton, on the charge for which they were tried and convicted.

On Monday morning, the 31st of July, the porter Dunstall, by the direction of the policeman (Carpenter) took the bundle to the house, No. 22, Cross Street, Waterloo Street, occupied as a lodging-house and beer-house by the female prisoner and her husband (who was not at home, and did not appear), and asked if her name was Schmidt; on ascertaining which he left the bundle with her and went away. Carpenter and another policeman then went to the house, found the bundle unopened, and took the prisoner to the Town-hall. All the prisoners were found guilty. As to the female prisoner, the question was reserved for the opinion of this Court, whether the goods alleged to have been received by her had not, under the circumstances stated, lost their character of stolen property, so that she ought not to have been convicted of receiving them with a guilty knowledge within the statute.

Pearce, for the prisoner.—When the goods reached Schmidt's hands, they were not stolen goods within the meaning of the statute. In consequence of the conduct of the company, the goods had lost that character. Carpenter not only opened the bundle, but delivered it to Dunstall with special directions. In consequence of the railway company having re-exercised acts of dominion over it, the property had re-vested in them, and the subsequent delivery to Schmidt was voluntary. In the indictment, the property is only laid in the railway company; there is no count laying it in the consignor or consignee. The case is not distinguishable from The Queen v. Dolan (1 Dears. C.C. 436; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 59). In that case the goods were found by the owner in the pocket of the thief. The owner sent for a policeman, who took the goods, but subsequently returned them to the thief, who was sent by the owner to sell them where he had sold others. The thief went to the shop of the prisoner and sold the goods, and gave the money to the owner. The prisoner was convicted of receiving the stolen goods: but the Court held the conviction to be wrong. That case overruled the previous decision of The Queen v. Lyons (Car. & Mar. 217).

Hurst, for the prosecution.—This case is distinguishable from The Queen v. Dolan (1 Dears. C.C. 436; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 59). The real owner of the goods here was the passenger. As against the owner, the railway company had no title.

[MELLOR, J.—They merely open it to see what it is, and then transmit it to its address.]

Yes; therefore that is no resumption of the possession by the owner. When the goods were in the hands of the policeman they were in custodia legis. When he let them go, parties were in statu quo they were before he interfered; and the prisoner received the goods from the railway company, as she would have done if he had not intervened.

[MARTIN, B.—Is that so? Goods are in the possession of a policeman, and he, wishing to get a person to commit a crime, gives them to the prisoner. The receipt is from the policeman?]

In a certain sense it may be so.

[MARTIN, B.—In every sense it is so. The goods had been lawfully intercepted. ERLE, C.J.—I think it is the ordinary case of a detective watching. MARTIN, B.—Dunstall went for the purpose of getting Schmidt to commit a crime. ERLE, C.J.—Suppose a thief sends a stolen basket by a messenger to a person who intends to receive it guiltily, and a policeman stops the messenger and looks at it on the way, and says to him "Go on," surely that would not prevent the subsequent receipt from the messenger being a guilty one. MARTIN, B.—Here the policeman clearly took possession by virtue of his right as police constable.]

The prisoner really received the goods from the company, and not from the policeman.

[MELLOR, J.—The address to which they were sent was the address to which the thieves wished them to be sent. MARTIN, B.—No, Dunstall was not the agent of the thieves, but of the policeman, if he was the agent of anybody. KEATING, J.—I observe, however, that the address was changed at the request of Scott.]

That shews that Dunstall was the agent of the thieves.

[ERLE, C.J.—Burglars often have been convicted of stealing property in the custody of a lodging-house keeper. MELLOR, J.—The question asked of us is, whether they had not lost their character of stolen property, and I certainly do not see how they had. LUSH, J.—If the true owner had brought an action for non-delivery, would the fact that they were stolen be any defence?]

No, certainly not; therefore the property remained in the passenger and was not diverted. The argument for the prisoner really comes to this, that if a policeman finds stolen property in the hands of an innocent agent, and does not take possession of it, or prevent the agent from delivering it, yet the discovery alone divests the property of the character of stolen goods.

Pearce, in reply.—The railway company took possession of the goods. The interference was first on Sunday. The thieves were taken into custody on that day, but the goods were not delivered till the Monday.

ERLE, C.J.—I think the conviction is right. The question on which we differ is, as to whether the goods had lost the character of stolen goods. I think that in this case the company were acting as the bailees of the thieves, and as innocent agents.

MARTIN, B.—There was no receipt here by the prisoner adverse to the true owner. I think the conviction wrong upon that ground, but it is wrong also upon the formal ground, that here the property is laid in the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company; and assuming that to be true the receipt also was from them.

KEATING, J.—I agree with my Brother Martin, that the conviction is wrong. It seems to be admitted that if the goods had got back for any time into the custody of the true owner the conviction would be wrong. I think then that there is no distinction in principle between the ownership of the railway company and of any other owner. We can know of no owner except those mentioned in the indictment. I can see no distinction between this and Dolan's case (1 Dears. C.C. 436; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 59). The felonious transitus was at an end.

MELLOR, J.—I agree with the Lord Chief Justice. The indictment truly alleges the property to be in the company at the time it was stolen; but there was a new bailment from the thieves. I think, further, that the policeman only inspected the goods and did not take possession. I agree with the decision in Dolan's case (1 Dears. C.C. 436; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 59); but in the present one I think the goods did not get back to the possession of the true owner.

LUSH, J.—I agree with my Brothers Martin and Keating, on the ground that the goods were delivered to the true owner. If the railway company had acted throughout as innocent agents, the felonious transit would have continued; but in fact they discovered the theft and no longer intended to forward them as agents for the thieves. The goods having got back into their possession with that knowledge, they could have had no defence against the true owner.

MARTIN, B.—I wish to add, that I think the policeman was wrong in acting as he did.

Conviction quashed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 8, 1865.

THE QUEEN, on the prosecution of DODD AND SOUTHAN, appellants,
v. THE OVERSEERS OF BILSTON, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 97; L. R. 1 Q.B. 16.

Distinguished, Smith v. Birmingham Corporation, [1883] E. R. A.; 52
 L. J. M.C. 81; 11 Q.B. D. 195; 49 L. T. 25; 31 W. R. 788 (Q.B.D. Div.).

Poor-Rate—Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96. s. 1.)—Local Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. xxx.)—Small Tenements—Usual Deductions—Composition.

RATES AND RATING.—The net annual value of hereditaments rated to the poor-rate is, by the Parochial Assessment Act, to be ascertained by the rent at which the same would let from year to year, "free of all the usual tenant's rates and taxes," &c. By a local act, the owners of small tenements were empowered to compound for the poor-rate in respect of such tenements by the payment of one-half of such rate only:—Held, that the deduction for usual tenant's rates and taxes must be made at the full sum allowed for other similar property not in composition, and not according to the sum actually paid by way of composition.

This was a SPECIAL CASE stated by the Staffordshire Quarter Sessions, upon the hearing of an appeal before them, brought by Messrs. Dodd and Southan against a poor-rate duly made and allowed on the 24th of May, 1864, and confirmed by Justices in Special Sessions on the 12th of August, 1864. Mr. Dodd was rated as owner of a small tenement in Bilston upon a gross estimated rental of 7l. 16s. 3d. and a rateable value of 6l. 5s. Mr. Southan was rated as owner of another small tenement in the same place upon a gross estimated rental of 6l. 11s. 3d. and a rateable value of 5l. 5s.

The Sessions found that the gross estimated rental of each of the houses was 6l. 10s., and their rateable value 4l. 13s. 7d. each, and reduced the rate accordingly, subject, as to a further reduction, to the following

CASE.

Messrs. Dodd and Southan are the owners of the houses which are the subject of the above assessment, and which are let at 2s. 6d. per week, giving an annual rental of 6l. 10s.; and one-fifth of that sum, or 1l. 6s., is to be taken as the sum ordinarily deductible for rates and taxes, and 1l. 3s. 5d. for repairs and other deductions allowed by the Parochial Assessment Act.

By the 10 & 11 Vict. c. xxx., entitled "An act for better assessing the poor-rates, highway rates, county and police rates, and other parochial and local rates, on small tenements in the several townships of Wolverhampton, Bilston, Willenhall and Wednesfield, in the county of Stafford," it is enacted, "That the owner of every tenement within the several townships of Wolverhampton, Bilston, Willenhall, and Wednesfield, being the union of Wolverhampton, in the parish of Wolverhampton, in the county of Stafford, which may be assessed to the poor-rate and other rates mentioned in the act at any annual sum under 6l. 10s. rateable value, which said annual sum of 6l. 10s. shall be ascertained according to the provisions of an act, 6 & 7 Will. 4. c. 96, entitled 'An Act to regulate Parochial Assessments,' shall hereafter be rated and pay such several poor-rate, highway rate, county and police rate, and the local rates aforesaid in respect of such tenements, instead of the actual occupiers thereof." And it is further enacted, "That in all cases where any owner shall have been or shall be liable to be rated in pursuance of this act in respect of any such tenement as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such owner to give notice to the officer authorized to make or collect any such rate of his intention to compound for the same by payment of a reduced rate, whether such tenement be occupied or not; and that in every such case every such owner shall thenceforth, until he shall give like notice for determining such composition, be liable to pay one-half of such rate only; and all such compositions shall be entered into the rate-book of such officers, and such owners shall be thenceforth rated accordingly."

The houses which were the subject of this appeal were within the provisions of that act, and were in composition, the owner paying the rates, but compounding for and paying in respect of them only one-half of the sum which would be payable in respect of the said houses if they were out of composition. The appellants contended, that although these houses were in composition, they were entitled to the same deduction for rates and taxes as was allowed in respect of other property which was not in composition, and that the gross rental of 6*l.* 10*s.* ought to be reduced by one-fifth for rates and taxes and by the amount necessary for repairs, namely, 1*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, which would leave the rateable value at 4*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.* The respondents contended that, inasmuch as houses in composition only pay half rates and taxes, the owners of such houses are only entitled to one-half of the deduction, one-half of the rate being the sum actually paid by them, and that the proper deduction in respect of such houses, therefore, is only one-tenth of the gross rental, instead of one-fifth; and this deduction, together with that for repairs, of 1*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.*, would leave the rateable value at 4*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.*, as found by the Court of Quarter Sessions.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the owners of the houses the subject of this appeal were entitled to the same amount of deduction for rates and taxes in respect of such houses as was allowed to the occupiers of houses not in composition.

If the Court should be of opinion that they were not so entitled, the rateable value of each of the houses was to stand as reduced by the Court of Quarter Sessions, viz., at 4*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* If the Court should be of opinion that they were entitled to the same amount of deduction for rates and taxes in respect of such property as was allowed to the occupiers of property which was not in composition, then the rateable value of each of the houses was to be reduced by a further reduction of 13*s.*

A. Staveley Hill, in support of the order of Sessions.—By the Parochial Assessments Act (6 & 7 Will. c. 96. s. 1.) all usual tenant's rates and taxes are to be deducted; and by that is meant such rates as are usually paid by the particular tenant; and it is submitted that here the quantum of the composition is the rate usually paid by the tenant of the house now in question. He referred to the Wolverhampton Water Rates Act, 1847. The 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99. s. 4. contains a similar provision.

Keane (M'Mahon with him), for the appellants, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The Parochial Assessment Act is anterior to the local acts, which appear to me to be immaterial to the present question. The Parochial Assessment Act provides that in fixing the amount of net annual value of hereditaments rated to any rate a deduction should be made of the usual tenant's rates and taxes from the rent. The composition is for the mutual convenience of parties, and a landlord puts himself in the place of the tenant; but that does not affect the question under the Parochial Assessment Act. Independently of the local act, the landlord, to claim the benefit, must be considered to stand in the place of tenant, and the deduction to be made must be in respect of what the tenant would have to pay, and not in respect of the amount of composition.

BLACKBURN, J.—The Parochial Assessment Act says, that to ascertain the net annual value of hereditaments to be rated, there shall be taken "the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes," &c. Then, the Wolverhampton Poor-Rates Bill, 1847, says, in section 5, that, in all cases where any owner shall be liable to be rated in pursuance of that act in respect of any small tenement, it shall be lawful for such owner to give notice to the officer authorized to make or collect any such rate of his intention to compound for the same by payment of a reduced rate, whether such tenement be occupied or not, and that in every such case every such owner shall thenceforth, until he shall give like notice for determining such composition, be liable to pay one-half of such rate only. But that does not make the composition an element in ascertaining the rateable value. It is not to be a different rate because the landlord has claimed to pay a composition.

MELLOR, J. and SHEE, J. concurred.

Judgment for the appellants.

Rate to be amended.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Nov. 16, 1865.

THE MINERVA LODGE v. GLADSTONE AND OTHERS, JUSTICES OF LIVERPOOL.

Ex parte O'DONNELL.

35 L. J. M.C. 99; L. R. 1 Q.B. 274; 14 W. R. 83.

The Friendly Societies Act, 1854 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), was repealed by the Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60).

Friendly Societies—18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. ss. 23, 24.—Money in Hands of an Officer of Society who executes an Assignment—Assignee—Complaint.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY.—The Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. s. 24.) gives summary power to Justices to order an officer, a member of a friendly society, or his assignee, who by false representation or imposition may obtain possession of any monies, &c. of such society, or having the same in his possession, may withhold or misapply the same, or may wilfully apply any part of the same to purposes other than those expressed in the rules of such society, to deliver up such monies, &c. or repay the money applied improperly:—Held, that this section does not give the Justices power to make an order on an assignee for the benefit of the creditors of an officer of such society, for repayment out of his effects of a sum equal in amount to the balance of the society's monies in the hands of such officer at the time he made the assignment, such balance not consisting of specific monies, and the amount having come into the possession of the assignee solely in his representative character.

This was a motion for a rule calling upon certain Magistrates of Liverpool to shew cause why they should not hear an information laid by the Minerva Lodge Friendly Society, through their treasurer, against Isaac Storey, under the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. s. 24.

From the affidavits used, it appeared that Isaac Storey was the surviving assignee of the estate and effects of John Jones, an insolvent, under a deed of assignment, dated the 13th of January, 1865. John Jones had been for eighteen years previous to the 20th of December, 1864, the treasurer of a duly-certified friendly society, called the Minerva Lodge, No. 1661, of the Liverpool district, and of the Manchester Unity of Independent Order of Odd-Fellows. On that day Jones resigned his office as treasurer, and then had 73*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, the monies of the above friendly society, in his hands, and still had the same at the time of the execution of the assignment to Storey and the co-assignee, for the benefit of the creditors of John Jones. John Jones was a full member of the society till the day of his death, and died without paying over the money. Hugh O'Donnell was appointed treasurer of the friendly society to succeed Jones, and on the 23rd of February, 1865, he gave Storey and the co-assignee notice, under the 23rd section¹ of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, demanding of them the above sum of 73*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* Storey's co-assignee died on the 12th of March, 1865; but he had not, nor had Storey since, paid over the sum of 73*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, although he had received sufficient sums out of the estate to enable him to do so.

A summons was obtained against Storey by O'Donnell, on behalf of the society, which came on to be heard on the 24th of May, 1865, before the then sitting Magistrates for Liverpool, Robert Gladstone, John Johnson Still and Christopher James Corball, Esqs., who refused to hear the information then preferred by O'Donnell against Storey, for that having such monies in his possession he withheld the same contrary to the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. s. 24, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction, because the treasurer of the society could not identify the monies.

(1) By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. s. 23, "If any person already appointed or employed, or hereafter to be appointed or employed, to or in any office in any friendly society established under this act or under any of the acts hereby repealed, whether such appointment or employment was before or after the legal establishment of such society, and having in his hands or possession, by virtue of his office, any monies or property whatsoever of such society, or any deeds or securities belonging to such society, shall die, or become bankrupt or insolvent, or have any execution or attachment or other process issued against him or any part of his property, or shall have any action or diligence raised against his lands, goods, chattels, or effects, or property or other estate, heritable or movable, or shall make any assignment, disposition, assignation, or other conveyance for the benefit of his creditors, the heirs, executors, administrators, or assignees of every such officer, and every other person having or claiming right to the property of such officer, and the sheriff or other person executing such process, and the party using such action or diligence respectively, shall, upon demand in writing made by the treasurer or by the trustee or any two of the trustees of such society, or any person appointed at some meeting of the society to make such demand, deliver and pay over all such monies, property, deeds, and securities belonging to such society to such person as such treasurer or trustees shall appoint, and shall pay, out of the estate, assets, or effects, heritable or movable, of such officer, all sums of money due which such officer shall have received, before any other of his debts are paid, and before any other claims upon him shall be satisfied, and before the money directed to be levied by such process as aforesaid, or which may be recovered or recoverable under such diligence, is paid over to the party issuing such process or using such diligence; and all such assets, lands, goods, chattels, property, estates and effects shall be bound to the payment, discharge and satisfaction of such claims."

Sect. 24. "If any officer, member, or other person, being or representing himself to be a member of such society, or the nominee, executor, administrator, or assignee of a member thereof, or any person whatsoever, by false representation or imposition, shall obtain possession of any monies, securities, books, papers, or other effects of such society, or having the same in his possession, shall withhold or misapply the same, or shall wilfully apply any part of the same to purposes other than those expressed or directed in the rules of such society, or any part thereof, it shall be lawful in England for any Justice of the Peace acting in the county or borough in which the place of business of such society shall be situated, upon complaint made by any person on behalf of such society, to summon the person against whom such complaint is made to appear at a time and place to be named in such summons; and any two Justices present at the time and place mentioned in such summons shall proceed to hear and determine the said complaint, in manner directed by the act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43; and in Scotland every such offence may be prosecuted by summary complaint at the instance of the Procurator Fiscal of the county, or of the society, with his concurrence, before the sheriff; and if the said Justices or sheriffs respectively shall determine the said complaint to be proved against such person, they shall adjudge and order him to deliver up all such monies, securities, books, papers, or other effects to the society, or to repay the amount of money applied improperly, and to pay, if they think fit, a further sum of money not exceeding 20*l.*, together with costs not exceeding 20*s.*; and, in default of such delivery of effects, or repayment of such amount of money, or payment of such penalty and costs as aforesaid, the said Justices or sheriffs may order the said person so convicted to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding three months: provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the said society, or in Scotland Her Majesty's Advocate, from proceeding by indictment against the said party; provided also, that no person shall be proceeded against by indictment if a conviction shall have been previously obtained for the same offence under the provisions of this act."

Holker, in support of the motion.—The Justices have power, under the 24th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, to order Storey, as assignee of Jones, a member and treasurer of the society, to repay the 73*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* as money withheld or applied improperly by him as such assignee. Storey here has monies of the society in his possession, and has withheld the same, and is therefore within the 24th section.

[MELLOR, J.—The 24th section points to the case of a person obtaining or keeping wrongful possession of monies belonging to the society, by misapplying or wilfully applying the same contrary to the rules. The 23rd section points to a case like the present, where the monies have come to the assignee's hands in a legitimate manner. LUSH, J.—What words are there in the 24th section to give the Justices power to order the assignee to give priority to the payment to the society?]

They may order him to repay the amount.

[LUSH, J.—But that is only where the money has been applied improperly.]

The money would have been applied improperly if the assignee had paid debts before the society's claims.

MELLOR, J.²—I think this rule must be refused. The 24th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63. seems to me to apply to cases where the monies have been obtained or are withheld improperly by the officer himself, or by some personal act of his assignee. That section cannot apply to a person who has come into possession of the money merely in his representative character and not through any wrongful act of his own.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think that the 24th section only applies to the specific monies, books, papers and effects belonging to the society, and means that after an order made under that section for their re-delivery and default in obedience to that order, then the assignee, &c. shall be liable to be punished under that section.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think that the 24th section applies to a case where the specific money is in the hands of an assignee, executor, &c., who neglects to deliver them up after order made.

Rule refused

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

Jan. 24, 1866.

ABLERT, appellant, v. PRITCHARD, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 101; 1 H. & R. 274; L. R. 1 C.P. 210; 14 L. T. 16;
14 W. R. 331; 12 Jur. N.S. 211.

Turnpike—Liability of Threshing Machines to Toll—Conflict of General and Local Acts.

HIGHWAYS.—A local turnpike act (26 Vict. c. lix.) imposed certain tolls on "waggons and carts," and by the interpretation clause included in these words threshing-machines. By the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 4. all the enactments, provisions, matters and things contained in the act are to extend to existing and future turnpike acts, unless expressly referred to and varied, altered or repealed; and by s. 32, implements of husbandry are exempted from toll. By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 77. s. 19, the powers, &c. in the former act are to extend to every local turnpike act as if repeated in it. By the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38.

(2) Cockburn, C.J. was absent through ill health.

s. 4. and the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 135. s. 6, implements of husbandry in the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. are to include threshing-machines:—Held, that within the area of the local act, the provisions of the general acts as to threshing-machines were superseded, and that such machines within such area were liable to pay toll.

This was a SPECIAL CASE, stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the Court, and the following are the material facts.

An information was laid before a Justice of the Peace for the county of Monmouth, by the respondent, against the appellant, under the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32, charging the appellant with having, on the 16th of June, 1865, as collector of tolls at the Cross Buchan Gate, on the Abergavenny turnpike-road, demanded from the respondent toll for a steam-engine and threshing-machine although exempt from toll as being agricultural implements.

It appeared that the respondent was in charge of a threshing-machine, drawn by three horses, and a steam-engine, also drawn by three horses, which he was taking along the said road to a certain farm, to be there used for hire for threshing corn, and that the appellant had demanded and taken toll for the same, though the respondent had claimed exemption. The turnpike-road and gate were within the turnpike district comprehended in 26 Vict. c. lix., 'An act to continue the Abergavenny Turnpike Trust excepting certain roads, and for other purposes.' By section 2. of that act it was enacted, that 'the word "cart" and the word "waggon" respectively should mean and include all carts, waggons, &c. . . . and threshing-machines' By section 17, the following tolls were authorized: "For every horse or other beast drawing any waggon or cart (except waggons or carts going for or returning laden with lime only), 6d."; "for every horse or other beast drawing any waggon or cart going for or returning laden with lime only," 4d. or 6d., according to the breadth of the wheels; "for every horse or other beast drawing any waggon or cart laden with timber," 1s. or 9d., according to the breadth of the wheels. And the only other places in the act where either of these words were used were section 21, which provided that the tolls for all horses or other animals drawing any stage-coach or other stage-waggon, van, caravan, cart or other stage-carriage, carrying or employed for the purpose of carrying passengers or goods for hire, should be paid every time of passing; section 22, which provided that all horses and animals drawing any stage-coach, omnibus, waggon, van, caravan or other stage-carriage, carrying or employed for the purpose of carrying passengers or goods for hire, in respect whereof the tolls should have been paid at any toll-gate, should, upon a ticket denoting such payment being produced, be permitted to pass once toll free on the same day through any other toll-gate which such ticket would free in the case of horses or animals drawing any other carriage; and section 24, which provided that the tolls should be demanded, taken and be payable before the carriage, cart, waggon, beast or cattle should be permitted to pass through any of the toll-gates.

It was contended, on behalf of the appellant, that by virtue of this act she was entitled to demand the toll; and on behalf of the respondent, that he was exempt by virtue of the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32, which provides, "that no toll shall be demanded or taken by virtue of this or any other act or acts of parliament on any turnpike-road, . . . for any horse, beast or other cattle or carriage employed in carrying or conveying, having been employed only in carrying or conveying on the same day, . . . any ploughs, harrows, or implements of husbandry, . . ."; and of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38. s. 4, and the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 135. s. 6, which provide that "implements of husbandry," in the said section, shall include "threshing-machines," because, by the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 4, it is enacted, that "from and after the 1st of January, 1823, all the enactments, provisions, matters and things in this act contained shall extend and be deemed, construed and taken to extend to all acts of parliament now in force, and to all acts which shall hereafter be passed for making, widening, turning, amending, repairing or maintaining any turnpike-road or roads in that part of Great Britain called England, save and except where any other commencement is particularly directed by this act, and as to such enactments, provisions, matters and things as shall be expressly referred to, and varied, altered or repealed by any such act or acts as shall be hereafter passed."

The said Justice was of opinion that the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32. should have been expressly referred to in the local act in order to make horses drawing a threshing-machine liable to toll, and that as, in his opinion, this had not been done, the appellant ought to be convicted, and he convicted her accordingly.

The question now was, whether this determination was correct.

Gray, for the appellants.—The question turns on the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 4, and is simply whether by virtue of that section the exemption contained in section 32. of that act is in force on the Abergavenny Turnpike Roads, notwithstanding the provision of the local act. It is submitted that it is not; for, first, it must be borne in mind, that the exemption as to threshing-machines is not contained in the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126, but in a subsequent act, which extends the meaning of "implements of husbandry"; and that at the time when the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. was passed, the carriage of a threshing-machine along a turnpike-road was unknown, such an event only occurring in quite recent times, in consequence of the invention of steam threshing-machines to be carried as a commercial speculation from one farm to another, and be used instead of the farmers' own implements of husbandry, properly so called. Now in construing acts of parliament, the question always is, what is the "intention of the legislature"?—Williams v. Pritchard (4 Term Rep. 2), Lyn v. Wyn (Bridgman's Judgments, 122); and the above considerations shew that in passing the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. the legislature had no intention of exempting threshing-machines, and that section 4. does not apply to threshing-machines for the first time mentioned in the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38. But, secondly, if it does, the local act "expressly refers to" the 3 Geo. 4 c. 126. s. 32; as, if a threshing-machine be an implement of husbandry within that section, there could hardly be a more express reference to the section than by specially naming this particular machine, and imposing a toll on it. And the later and local act is the one which ought to prevail. For although the machinery here adopted is somewhat different to that now used for incorporating the Lands Clauses and similar general acts with local and personal acts, the one applying the general act to the local one by a clause in the former, the other by a clause in the latter, the principle is the same, and it is always held in the latter case that the special provisions of the special act are to prevail. And, thirdly, even if the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 4. applies to threshing-machines, and the local act does not expressly refer to section 32, yet it is incompetent for the legislature to say that no later act shall affect the provisions of the act they are passing, unless such later act is worded in a particular way. A parliament may make regulations for their guidance in conducting business, as, for instance, that a bill shall not be brought in a second time in the same session; but, notwithstanding, if they disregarded this rule, this would not vitiate the statute passed in contravention of it. The same would be the case if the legislature, for instance, passed an act to say all future acts should be in Latin; a subsequent one in English would, notwithstanding, be of full force. So here, it was utterly incompetent for the legislature, in the time of George the Fourth, to say that no future parliament should be able to affect the act then passing, however clearly the intention might appear from the future act, unless such act used certain express terms and references. And the question, therefore, is, what was the intention of the legislature in passing the 26 Vict. c. lix.? and that is quite clear, for there are express words. It is true that it has said that acts pari materia are to be read together as one act, and as if passed at one time; but we still cannot lose sight of the fact, that the acts were passed at different times, by different bodies of men, and therefore we must look to the intention of the later body in interpreting the meaning of the words used by them. And even if it be said that the legislature is to be considered to have had the previous act in its mind, that still is in favour of the present contention, because this shews that they intended, notwithstanding, to overrule the former enactment.

H. James, for the respondent.—First, a threshing-machine is an implement of husbandry, and the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38. is merely declaratory, and therefore the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 4. does apply to threshing-machines. Secondly, the local act does not expressly vary and repeal the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32. By the 9 Geo. 4. c. 77, which has not been referred to, this provision is repeated in the local act exactly as if it were part of it. This being so, what is the effect of having this general provision for exemption, and this special provision for imposing toll in the same act? Which is to prevail? Now the intention of the general act as shewn by the recital in section 4, was uniformity, and Lord Denman, C.J., in The King v. the Trustees of the Northleach and Witney Roads (5 B. & Ad. 978), says, that its effect "is to incorporate the statute with all particular acts, . . . and if they are inconsistent . . . the latter must be considered not continued; otherwise the very evil would ensue which that act was intended to prevent, viz. the want of uniformity in the laws regulating turnpike-roads throughout the kingdom." Again, the words of the local act are not directory, but only permissive. And, further, where there is a clause imposing toll on the public, and another giving an exemption, we ought to construe the act in favour of the exemption, especially if it be one in favour of husbandry—Hickinbotham v. Perkins (3 Moore, 185). Thirdly, it is quite competent for the legislature to make such a provision as is contained in the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 4. It is quite true that one parliament cannot fetter another in one sense, because the latter can repeal the acts of the former; but if they do not, such acts are in force; and if a former act says this act shall apply in a particular way, and unless certain things be done, and the legislature does not repeal it, the legislature must be taken to approve of it. And this prospective legislation is now in general use, and has been fully recognized, as in the case of the Lands Clauses Act, and various other acts of general application, and where by some oversight a conflict arises, then, as was said in Middleton v. Croft (Cases temp. Lord Hardwicke, 826), "subsequent acts of parliament in the affirmative only are never taken to be a repeal of former acts, unless there be negative words, or a plain contrariety between the two acts, so that there is a plain indication in the latter of an intention to repeal the former."

Gray, in reply.—Unless the appellant's construction be adopted, words must be struck out of the local act, for there is no section, but the section as to tolls, to which the interpretation clause can apply; and full effect is always to be given to all words. The words of the general act, are no doubt, incorporated; but where a conflict arises, the words of the particular act must prevail; this has always been held to be the case where the Companies' Clauses and similar acts conflict with local and personal acts. And if a contrary intention is not plainly discoverable, the words of a later act are to prevail over those of an earlier one—The Queen v. St. Edmund's, Salisbury (2 Q.B. Rep. 84; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 138) and The Dean of Ely v. Bliss (5 Beav. 582; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 351).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the appellant. Upon first reading the case, I was strongly of opinion that the Justice was right; but on consideration of the statutes and the rules of construction, I have been compelled to alter my opinion. The question is, whether a threshing-machine is liable to toll under 26 Vict. c. lix. By section 17. of that act, tolls may be demanded for horses and other beasts drawing "waggons and carts," and by section 2, these words are to include

"threshing machines." If there were nothing else, there would be an express enactment, that a toll may be demanded for a threshing-machine; and I am unable to give effect to these words, if I hold that a threshing-machine is exempt from toll. A difficulty has been raised from the words of previous statutes, exempting implements of husbandry. By 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 23, "no toll shall be taken by virtue of this or any other act or acts of parliament on any turnpike-road . . . for any horse, beast or other cattle or carriage employed in carrying or conveying . . . implements of husbandry." And in furtherance of an intention to obtain uniformity, by section 4. of the same act, it is provided that "all the enactments, provisions, matters and things in this act contained shall extend . . . to all acts of parliament now in force, and to . . . be passed hereafter, for making, &c. . . turnpike-roads, . . . save and except, . . . as to such enactments, &c., . . . as shall be expressly referred to, and varied, altered or repealed by any such acts as shall be hereafter passed;" and by 9 Geo. 4. c. 77. s. 19, it is provided "that all the powers, authorities, claims, penalties, forfeitures, matters and things contained" in the former act "shall extend . . . to every local turnpike act, . . . as if the same were repeated and re-enacted in the body of such local turnpike act, and were made part thereof." And therefore, coupling these statutes with 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38. s. 4. and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 135, s. 6, which provide that the words, "implements of husbandry," in 3 Geo. 4. c. 126, shall include threshing-machines, we have a universal act for all England which as directly exempts threshing-machines from toll as the local act for the Abergavenny roads imposes toll on them. Which, then, is to prevail? I am of opinion, that where there is a universal enactment, applying to all England, and a special enactment applying specially to a limited locality, as here to the Abergavenny district, the universal enactment is to be limited by the special one. It is said that in order to be effectual, the Abergavenny Road Act ought expressly to refer to the provision of the general statute; whether this be so or not, I am of opinion that it does, for it specially refers to the exempted matter referred to in the former act, and the only way of giving effect to its words is to hold that it limits the general statute. It may be also observed, that threshing-machines are a modern invention, not alluded to until 14 & 15 Vict. c. 38, and are generally a commercial speculation, and owned by persons who are not occupiers of land, or within the purview of 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. I do not, however, rely on this consideration; but narrow my decision to the words of the statutes.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons already given by my Lord. It is impossible for us, on considering the Abergavenny Road Act, to adopt any other conclusion; for if we did, we should have to strike out special words. It is contended, that, in order to repeal the exemption as to implements of husbandry, in 3 Geo. 4. c. 126, it is necessary not only to mention the particular implements on which the toll is to be imposed, but to proceed further, and put in a non obstante clause. If this were so, great difficulties might present themselves; but the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. is not framed on any such intention; it says that all "matters and things" contained in it shall extend to future acts, unless such "matters or things" are "expressly referred to and varied"; one matter contained is the liability of implements of husbandry, and that is expressly mentioned in the Abergavenny Road Act. It is said that this implement of husbandry is only mentioned in the interpretation clause; but we must read the exposition given by the statute, wherever the interpreted words occur. I must, therefore, abandon my first impressions, which were that the Justice was right. It is clear that there are not only express words in the local statute, but words expressly repugnant to those of the general one.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the same reasons. It is impossible otherwise to give any meaning to the words of the local statute.

An attempt has been made to incorporate the exemption contained in the previous general act, but there is a conclusive answer; we are to see what the intention of the legislature is as disclosed in the act, and there is no difficulty in holding that, by the express words in this act, it was intended to repeal the previous act as respects threshing-machines. I am of opinion that the decision of the Justice should be reversed; though I must say that he might reasonably come to the conclusion he did.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not necessary that there should be words repealing in terms the provision as to threshing-machines. Section 4. of the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. says, that "the provisions, matters and things" contained in it, shall extend to future acts, "unless expressly referred to and varied, altered or repealed." Is there any such express reference? We find the name of one implement of husbandry mentioned in the local act, viz., a threshing-machine, and a toll imposed in respect of it, and therefore one matter contained in 3 Geo. 4. c. 126, the non-liability of implements of husbandry, is expressly referred to and varied. I have some doubt whether this was intended; but we are not to speculate, but must look to the words of the statute, and they are too strong to be got over.

Judgment for the appellant.

Jan. 17, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. THE INHABITANTS OF LEE.

35 L. J. M.C. 105; L. R. 1 Q.B. 241; 13 L. T. 704; 14 W. R. 311;
12 Jur. N.S. 225.

Poor-Rate—Gas-Works—Meters, Retorts, "Purifiers," Steam-Engines, Boilers, Gas-Holders

RATES AND RATING.—A gas company was rated to the poor-rate in respect of the following articles:—meters soldered to the leaden service-pipes on the premises of consumers, but not fixed in any way so as to interfere with their removal; retorts, or instruments for the production of gas, distinct and severable from the foundation or basement floor of the company's premises, but attached to the floor by hardened fire-clay; "purifiers," or massive iron vessels standing on a brick base, but not fixed to it, though connected on one side with pipes passing through the soil from the retorts; "steam-engines" fastened by screw-bolts to a stone base fixed in the soil, and capable of being detached by unscrewing the bolts; boilers set in brickwork fixed in the soil; gas-holders, or vessels of plate-iron for storing gas, not fixed in any way, but placed so as to rise and fall in circular tanks excavated beneath the soil, and easily moved for the purpose of repairs. According to the practice and course of business in letting gas-works, the tenant would have to take to and find capital for all the articles above enumerated:—Held, that the retorts, purifiers, steam-engines, boilers and the movable part of the gas-holders appeared to be attached to the inheritance, for the permanent improvement of it, and ought to be included in the value of the premises for the purpose of rating; but that the meters must be excluded, as they could not be considered as part of the gas-works, and never were so attached to the houses as to lose the character of chattels.

Appeal to the Quarter Sessions of Kent against a poor-rate for the parish of Lee. In this rate the appellants were assessed as follows :

Name of Occupier.	Name of Owners.	Description of Property Rated.	Name or Situation of the Property.	Estimated Extent.	Gross Estimated Rental.	Rateable Value.	Rate at 8d. in the Pound.
				Yards.	£.	£.	£. s. d.
Phoenix Gas Company.	Themselves.	Line of Pipes.	Throughout the Parish.	15,230	1,539	1,213	40 8 8

At the hearing of the appeal the rate was amended as hereafter stated, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following

CASE.

The appellants are a gaslight and coke company, incorporated by 5 Geo. 4. c. lxxviii. (amended by the 27 & 28 Vict. c. clxx.), for the purpose of the manufacture of gas and its supply to parts of the metropolis and its suburbs. It possesses three stations or establishments for the manufacture of gas, in the parishes of St. Mary, Lambeth, St. Saviour's, Southwark, and St. Alphage, Greenwich, respectively, and two for storage, in the parishes of St. Mary, Lambeth, and St. George the Martyr, Southwark, respectively, whence the gas is distributed by mains and pipes in the various parishes of the consumers' houses.

The stations are fitted with all the apparatus necessary for the manufacture and storing of gas. This apparatus, hereinafter more particularly described, and the buildings of the stations, have been from time to time placed by the company upon land purchased by them for the purpose, and of which they are absolute owners, with the exception that a small part of their offices at Bankside is rented by them from other persons. The gas having been manufactured in the establishments above mentioned, is distributed to the various parishes through mains laid beneath the surface of the streets. From the mains it is distributed by service-pipes to the houses of the consumers and to the public lamps. The service-pipes lead to the meters which are used for measuring the gas supplied to the consumers, and from the other side of which other pipes convey the measured gas to the burners.

The mains are the property of the company. The public lamps and the service-pipes which supply them are the property of the parishes. The service-pipes which supply private consumers are laid down and belong to the company for the first 25 feet from the main, but beyond the 25 feet they are laid down and repaired at the expense of the consumers. The meters are not in all cases at so great a distance as 25 feet from the mains. At or near the place where the service-pipe ends is placed a main tap, by which the gas can be turned off, and which belongs to the consumers. Neither the meters nor the pipes beyond the main taps are on the land of the company. No rent is charged for the use of the meters, but the consumers are charged for the gas consumed as measured by the meters at a certain price per 1,000 cubic feet. The property of the company in Lee parish, exclusive of the meters, consists only of mains and service-pipes. In 1863 the assessment was raised to 1,539*l.* gross and 1,213*l.* net rateable value. Against this increased rating the company appealed, and produced the following statement, and gave evidence to establish the accuracy of the figures therein set forth :

The Phoenix Gas Company in Lee Parish.

Gross Receipts :

Total rental for the gaslight for the year ending Dec. 25, 1863	£143,689
Working expenses (setting them out)	...	£60,872
Less residue products, viz. coke, &c.	...	33,394
			<hr/> 27,478

Wages:
Salaries and commissions	21,537
Office expenses and stationery	2,104
Maintenance of works, retorts, &c., including the expenses not only of repairs but also of re-instatement ...	20,576
Meter repairs and fixing	3,100
Less meter-rent received:
Lighting, cleansing and repairing public lamps	2,981
Stores:
Bad debts and vouchers	715
Law expenses	1,000
Incidental expenses:
Directors and auditors	2,100
Rates and taxes, 5s. 6d. in the pound, on an assessment of 15,429l.	4,244
			85,655
Net receipts			58,034
Occupiers' shares:
Working capital	50,000
Present value of meters	35,000
Present value of retorts	18,000
Present value of fixtures and utensils	97,000
	£200,000
Interest, 5l. per cent. thereon	10,000
Trade profits, 10l. per cent. thereon ...	20,000
Risks and casualties 2l. 10s. per cent. thereon	5,000
			35,000
Gross estimated rental			£23,034
Statutable deductions:
Probable average annual cost of renewals and insurance of buildings and apparatus	2,655
Annual sinking fund for renewal of trade fixtures and utensils	3,000
Annual sinking fund for reproduction of mains and pipes	1,950
			7,605
Rateable value			£15,429
Rateable value of the whole works			15,429
Estimated rateable value of stations (not including the meters, retorts, fixtures and utensils in respect of which above deductions are made)			8,628
Rateable value of mains and pipes			£6,801
As £143,889 : £6,801 :: £5,144 :	£243
gross receipts.	rateable value of the mains.	receipts in Lee.	rateable value of the mains in Lee.

The Court of Quarter Sessions reduced the items set down for law expenses and statutable deductions in the foregoing statement, but found upon the evidence before them that all the other deductions were proper to be made, and amended the rate by reducing the net rateable value of the company's property in the Parish of Lee from 1,213*l.* to 364*l.*

It was contended, on behalf of the respondents, that the deduction which appears in the foregoing statement of a per-centage of 5*l.* per cent. for interest, 10*l.* per cent. for tenant's profits, and 2*l.* 10*s.* per cent. for risks and casualties upon present value of meters, present value of retorts, and "present value of fixtures and utensils," should not be allowed, inasmuch as the matters in respect of which the deduction was claimed, and which are more particularly described hereafter, were fixed to or connected with the land, and, instead of diminishing, increased its value for the purposes of rating.

The meters in all cases are placed on the premises of the consumers. They are not in any way connected with the manufacture, nor are they indispensable, though used for the distribution of gas and the earning of profits. They are maintained in their position by being soldered to the service-pipes, which are made of lead. If the service-pipes were not required to be flexible, soldering would not be necessary, for the meters might be so placed as to remain in position without being fixed in any way. Meters are taken off when they require repair or renewal, or for other causes, and replaced by others, and when repaired are frequently placed in a different house and in a different parish. Their original cost was 45,000*l.*

The retorts are the instruments in which the coals are carbonized and the gas produced; and they consist not merely of the circular pieces of clay to which the heat is applied, but also the arches which contain them, the pipes which permit the gas to ascend from them, the iron faces of them, and the pipes over the arches which convey the gas from them through the purifiers to the tanks, where it is received by the gas-holder. All the parts which are above the floor-level are included in the term "retorts," and the whole of these parts are distinct and severable from the foundation or basement floor, and are not attached to it by mortar or cement, but are packed with fire-clay which hardens by the action of heat, and holds them in their place. The parts of the retorts above the floor-level are very perishable. By the wear and tear caused by the action of heat and other processes of the manufacture of gas, they are soon rendered useless, and require to be renewed every two years. They are, therefore, so constructed as to be removable without difficulty and without injury to the basement on which they rest. The prime cost of the retorts required by the company is 24,000*l.*

Under the word "utensils" are included purifiers, steam-engines, boilers and the movable part of the gas-holders. The purifiers are massive iron vessels, standing on a brick base, but not fixed thereto. They are, however, connected on the one side with the pipes passing through the soil from the retorts in which the gas is produced by screwed bolts fastened into the plates of the purifier, and on the other with main pipes, similarly attached, passing through the soil to the tanks and gas-holders, where the gas is stored for use. The purifiers may be described as groups of hollow cylinders or columns of iron, perpendicularly set up parallel to each other on the brick base, closed at the top by movable lids, retained in their place by their own weight, and rendered gas-tight only by means of their edges resting in a water lute or circular channel containing water, and running round the top of the cylinder. The gas passes from the retorts through the purifiers to the tanks and gas-holders, and in its passage is purified by a chemical process. The present value of the purifiers in the aggregate is 35,000*l.*

The steam-engines are used for driving the machinery, pumps, &c., and are fastened by screw bolts to a stone base fixed in the soil. By unscrewing the bolts the engines can be detached.

The boilers are set in brickwork, which is fixed in the soil. The present value of boilers and engines is 50,000*l.*

The gas-holders are hollow vessels of plate iron, cylindrical in form, open at the bottom, but roofed in with the same materials which are used for storing the gas until required for consumption. They are not fixed in any way; but are so placed that as they fill with, or are emptied of the gas, they rise and fall in circular tanks excavated beneath the surface of the soil, into which the gas passes through the purifiers from the retorts. Around the edges of these tanks are placed iron columns. The gas-holders are fitted on their upper rim or edge with wheels, which run on the columns, and guide the gas-holder in its ascent. In some cases, also, chains are attached to the gas-holder, and pass over the top of the columns. To the other end of these chains can be attached weights, by which the weight and pressure of the gas-holder can be at pleasure regulated. It is usual and necessary at times to take down the gas-holders for repair or other purposes, and they are easily taken down without injury to the foundation or any part of the structure. They do not last more than twenty years. The present value of the gas-holders is 26,500*l.* The balance of the 97,000*l.*, after deducting the present value of the purifiers, steam-engines and boilers, and of the movable part of the gas-holders above described, represents the present value of various trade fixtures, such as pumps and exhausters, which are fixed to the freehold, but under such circumstances, and in such a manner, that, under the law governing the right to remove fixtures, a tenant who, during his term, had erected and fixed them for the purposes of his trade, would during his term have the right to sever and dispose of them. The original cost to the company of the property valued at 97,000*l.* exceeded this sum by 25,000*l.*

It was proved, on the part of the appellants, and found as a fact by the Court of Quarter Sessions upon the evidence before them, that, according to the practice and course of business in letting and hiring gasworks, the tenant would have to take to and find capital for all the property comprised under the heads "meters," "retorts," "tenant's fixtures" and "utensils," and would have to provide 150,000*l.* for that purpose, and that a deduction in respect of such outlay was to be made in estimating according to the provisions of the Parochial Assessment Act, what rent a tenant from year to year would be willing or might reasonably be expected to pay.

The Sessions found that 17*l.* 10*s.* per cent. was a fair per-centage to allow on tenant's capital for interest of money, for his own trouble and skill and for provision against risks, and allowed a deduction at that rate, not only on the 50,000*l.*, which they found to be the amount of working capital which a tenant would require, but also in the further sum of 150,000*l.*

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether it was competent for the Court of Quarter Sessions to allow a deduction by way of tenant's profits in respect of any, and, if any, of which of the matters and things comprised under the heads meters, retorts, tenant's trade fixtures and utensils, the nature of which is above more particularly stated. If the Court of Queen's Bench should be of opinion that in any of the above-mentioned cases it was not competent for the Court of Quarter Sessions to allow a deduction, they should amend the rate accordingly.

Bovill and Mathew, for the appellants.—The gas company are entitled to a deduction from the rate imposed upon them in respect of the value of the different utensils and machinery specified in the case. First, with regard to the meters. The meters are fixed, not on the company's premises, but in private houses. They cannot in any sense be considered as connected with land occupied by the company. If anybody is the occupier of these meters, it is the tenant of the houses where they are used. With regard to the other articles, it is found as a fact in the case that (according to the usual practice in letting and hiring gas-works) a tenant would have to take to and find capital for them. It is like the case of a farm in Surrey, where the rent is materially lessened by the outlay which the incoming tenant has to make for valuations. The proof of this usage and course of business distinguishes the case from The Queen v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 68) and The Queen v. the Southampton Dock Company (14 Q.B. Rep. 587; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 155). In these cases there was no evidence of any such usage or obligation on the part of the incoming tenant to purchase the stock-in-trade.

O'Malley and White, for the respondents, were directed to confine their arguments to the questions respecting the steam-engines, meters, purifiers and gas-holders.—No deduction ought to be allowed in respect of such articles. If the principle contended for by the appellants was established, land only would be rated.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It must be shewn what rent a tenant would give for this land, enhanced as it is by being used as a gas-works.]

In the cases cited, the same subjects of deduction existed as in the present case. The articles in question are as strongly attached to the freehold as what was held to be rateable in those cases. The purifiers stand immovably by their own weight.

[LUSH, J.—The gas could not be made without these purifiers.]

In Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Exch. Rep. 295; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 154) the machines, which were held to be no part of the freehold, were, no doubt, strongly fastened to the floor, but the question in the case was merely whether they were distrainable. Under a local Poor Act in Birmingham, rating lands, tenements and hereditaments within the parish, it was held that the value of steam-engines and other fixed machinery ought to be taken into account—The King v. the Birmingham and Staffordshire Gas-Light Company (6 Ad. & E. 634; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 92). The meters are the property of the gas company, and by means of these meters the company are occupiers of the premises of their customers.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Can Mr. Broadwood be said to occupy the house of any person to whom he lets a piano?]

They also referred to The King v. Hogg (1 Term Rep. 721) and Archbold's Poor Law, 11th ed. 183.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the appellants are not entitled to the substantial deductions from the rateable value of their property which are claimed by them. Whatever doubt hung over the case at the commencement of this discussion has been entirely removed by the arguments which we have heard. I entirely agree to the proposition that we must look not at the position of the actual tenant, and the fact that he has had to pay down an additional sum for machinery and fixtures which are necessary for the working of the gas establishment, but that we ought to consider what would be the rent, taking the whole concern as it stands, that an imaginary tenant would be ready to pay. Everything which is merely a chattel, and would not pass under a demise from the actual to an imaginary tenant, should be of course excluded from our consideration. This being the case, there is really no difficulty in saying what, if any, are the deductions which the company are entitled to have made from the rateable value of their premises. In the first place, I think that the counsel who have last addressed us have entirely failed in shewing that meters are anything more than common chattels. With regard to the rest of the articles, they may, I think, be ranged under two classes, both of which may properly be taken into account as enhancing the value of the building. I am satisfied that the retorts are so permanently attached and annexed to the freehold as to become part of it, and that they must not be dealt with as removable fixtures. They are, therefore, rateable as the entire freehold would be. As for the other items, they seem to me to fall within the principle of the cases cited in the argument, those of The Queen v. the Southampton Dock Company (14 Q.B. Rep. 587; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 155), and The Queen v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 68). In the latter case the Court, in a considered judgment, laid down this rule, "That where things which, though capable of being removed, are yet so far attached as that it is intended that they should remain permanently connected with the purposes of the undertaking, as the railway, or the premises connected with it, and to remain permanent appendages to it as essential to its working, these must be taken to be things increasing the rateable value of the land, and in respect of which the company were not entitled to have a deduction made." That principle applies directly to the present case. No one can doubt that the purifiers and the gas-holders are part of the works which are absolutely necessary for the manufacture of gas, which is the purpose of the undertaking; and that it was intended that they should remain permanently connected with the premises. Now, if the company proposed to abandon their undertaking, and to let their premises, the gas-works, which the lessee would propose to take, and to pay rent for, would not be the land stripped of purifiers, retorts, and gas-holders. These articles are as essential to the manufacture of gas as any fixture upon the premises, however firmly it may be attached to the freehold. There is also another rule which applies to these articles, that in Walmsley v. Milne (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 115; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 97). There the owner of land mortgaged it, and afterwards erected buildings upon it for the more convenient use of the premises in his business of an innkeeper, brewer, and bath proprietor. He affixed a steam-engine and boiler, a hay-cutter, a malt-mill or corn-crusher, and a pair of grinding-stones. The lower grinding-stone was fixed on to the floor of part of the premises by means of a frame screwed to it, the upper one being fixed in the usual way, and the steam-engine, and other articles, except the boiler, were fastened by means of bolts and nuts to the walls or the floors for the purpose of steadying them, but were all capable of being removed, without injury either to themselves or to the premises. (It is possible that some of the articles here, such as the steam-engine, the purifier, and the gas-holders, may be removed without injury to themselves or the premises.) The Court, after saying that it appeared as a matter of fact that all these articles were firmly annexed to the freehold for the purpose of improving the inheritance, and not for any temporary purpose; and that the owner who had mortgaged the premises after having attached these articles to the freehold in the manner described, proposed to take them away as belonging to him, and not passing under the mortgage, go on to say "When the mortgagor (who was the real owner of the inheritance), after the date of the mortgage, annexed the fixtures in question for a permanent purpose, and for the better enjoyment of his estate, he thereby made them part of the freehold which had been vested by the mortgage deed in the mortgagee; and consequently the plaintiffs, who were the assignees of the mortgagor, cannot maintain the present action." So here, we cannot doubt that when these purifiers and gas-holders, and the steam-engine and boiler, which are absolutely essential to the working of the manufactory, were erected, it was intended that they should remain where they were for the benefit of the inheritance. I therefore think that, upon both the grounds which I have specified, the articles in question are so connected with the freehold as to shew an intention that they should remain permanently attached, and that the Sessions were wrong in allowing deductions in respect of them. These deductions must be disallowed, and the rate pro tanto increased.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. By the Parochial Assessment Act, the rateable value of premises is to be determined according to the rent which a hypothetical tenant, making all suitable deductions, would give for the rateable property. The Sessions very properly endeavoured to ascertain the amount of that rent. Now the property in this particular parish is a portion of a larger property belonging to the gas company in this parish and in others. The first thing therefore which the Sessions had to do was to ascertain the rateable value of the whole property of the company, and afterwards to find out what portion of it belonged to this parish. In this endeavour, they could not ascertain the ordinary rent, as it is not usual in practice to let out such property; and they were, therefore, obliged, as is commonly the case, to ascertain for themselves the elements which a tenant from year to year would take into consideration if the premises were let to him. Now it was admitted early in the case that the question which we have to decide is, what rent would a hypothetical tenant give for the whole value of the rateable property, and although the person who actually did occupy would not pay rent for portions of the property which are fixed to the premises so as to become part of them, although capable of removal, because instead of paying rent for these portions he would purchase them, yet it is allowed that we are to consider what is the rent which a hypothetical tenant would pay looking at the premises with these articles of manufacture annexed to them. It was in applying this principle that the Sessions were wrong. I take it to be clear that what the cases have laid down is this: if you wish to know for how much a furnished house is rateable, you must ascertain what is the rent for the house, and what is the rent for the furniture and fixtures; deduct what is paid for the use of the furniture and those things which form no part of the rateable premises, and the remainder will be the rent for which the house is rateable. A question will then arise whether those things in respect of which you purpose to make a deduction are in themselves part of the premises, or, like the furniture, no part of them. Some things are attached to the premises so as to be part of them, although as between the landlord and tenant, and the heir and executors, there is a right to remove them, and of course no allowance can be made for these. Other articles, such as movable furniture, are manifestly not part of what is let, and are the subject of an allowance. But there are intermediate things with respect to which it is sometimes very difficult to decide whether they are part of the premises or not, and to this class the articles in the present case belong. The rule laid down has been, that where things are attached to the premises so as to become part of them, although there may be a right to remove them, they are to be looked upon as part of the premises. But if anything is fastened to the premises so as still to remain a chattel, though fixed and steadied for the purposes of use, it never ceases, to use the phrase in the case of Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Exch. Rep. 295; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 154), to have the character of a movable chattel, though fixed for the purpose of having the enjoyment of it. The ordinary illustration is the case of a mirror, which is screwed to a wall, but still remains a movable chattel, and is no part of the premises. On the other hand, a grate which is built into a chimney, although it is capable of being removed, would still be fixed to the premises so as to be part of them, and, therefore, part of what would be considered as let to the hypothetical tenant, and for which he would pay rent. In Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Exch. Rep. 295; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 154), the Court were dealing with machinery which was fixed, screwed and attached to the premises, and they laid down the rule as being a matter of fact depending upon the circumstances in each case, but principally upon two considerations, first, the mode of annexation to the soil or fabric of the house, and the extent to which it is united to them, whether it can be easily removed, integre, salve, et commode, or not without injury to itself or the fabric of the building; secondly, and this is worthy of attention, on the object and purposes of the annexation, whether it was for the permanent and substantial improvement of the dwelling, in the language of the Civil law, perpetui usus causa, or in that of the Year Book, pour un profit del inheritance, or merely for temporary purposes, or the more complete enjoyment and use of it as a chattel. In the case before them the Court thought that the articles in question were only put up and fastened for the temporary use and enjoyment of them as chattels; but they clearly and distinctly pointed out two important elements for consideration: first, the degree of annexation; and, secondly, the object of the annexation. Was the article attached for the improvement of the inheritance or for the enjoyment only of the article itself?

In the case of Walmsley v. Milne (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 115; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 97), which was similar in its facts to Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Exch. Rep. 295; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 154), the Court of Common Pleas laid down the same rule, and thought the machinery attached to the inheritance for the purpose of improving it, so that it became part of it. So also in the case of The Queen v. the Southampton Dock Company (14 Q.B. Rep. 587; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 155) the same idea is conveyed. There the articles were cranes, turn-tables, and other machinery, which were, in one sense, attached to the premises of the company, by being screwed down, some of them firmly attached, and some not. The Court said that an allowance must be made in respect of those articles which were not attached to the freehold, but that no allowance ought to be made for those things which were affixed to the freehold. The rule laid down for the guidance of the Sessions was this: "The articles may be divided into three classes: first, things movable, such as office and station furniture; secondly, things so attached to the freehold as to become part of it; thirdly, things which, though capable of being removed, are yet so far attached as that they were intended to remain permanently connected with the railway or the premises connected with it, and to remain permanent appendages to it as essential to its working." This phrase, as it seems to me, contains the same idea as that in Hellawell v. Eastwood (6 Exch. Rep. 295; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 154), where quoting from the Year Book, it is said, that one consideration is whether the annexation was pour un profit del inheritance; and in the case in the Common Pleas, where the question is stated to be, whether the articles are for the enjoyment of the inheritance. The idea is throughout the same. The articles may be but slightly annexed, but if this is done for the permanent improvement of the inheritance, they are rateable. Keeping this principle in view, I was at first disposed to think that some of these articles belonging to gas-works were not rightly included in the rate. With the exception of the meters, they are all, although but slightly, attached to the premises. And I think it quite clear that they are, in fact, attached with the view of enhancing the benefit of the premises to which they belong, so as to come within the principle laid down in the cases of which I have spoken. With reference to the meters the case is different. The meters are themselves chattels, except so far as they are attached to the houses in which they are put up. They are attached to the houses by means of a pipe which comes through the wall, and is joined to the meter. If they were attached to the house for the purpose of improving it, they would become fixed property. But it is obvious that the meters are kept as the company's meters, to be used as their chattels for measuring the gas, and were never intended to be for the benefit of the house to which they are to be attached at all. They are, therefore, no part of the inheritance of the company. Mr. White, indeed, endeavoured to shew that a meter occupies part of the space of a house, and, therefore, the company, by means of the meter, occupied part of the house. But, although the meter is firmly fixed to the house, and steadied by being fixed, it does not make the company the occupier of any part of the house any more (as I observed during the argument) than Mr. Broadwood can be said to occupy houses by means of pianos which are hired from him. I therefore, think that meters were properly made the subject of a deduction, and that a proportionate sum ought to be deducted in respect of them.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The sum to be arrived at is the net annual value of these premises, that is, the rent at which they might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free from all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and deducting the expenses necessary for their maintenance in their present condition. What is the rateable subject which is comprised within the premises to be rated here? Now, I apprehend that the premises to be rated are to be taken as they are, with all the fittings and appliances by which the owner has adapted them to a particular use, and which would pass as part of the premises if they were demised to a tenant. That seems to me to express what is laid down in the two cases which have been referred to. Wherever such fittings and appliances have become so far a part of the premises as to pass by a demise of these premises, they form a part of the rateable subject of the inheritance for the purpose of rating. When we have to apply this test to any particular state of circumstances, the question is not what a tenant might remove, not what might be taken in execution under a writ against the owner, but what, as between the landlord and tenant, would pass as part of the premises. In applying this rule, I cannot entertain a doubt that, with the exception of the meters, all the articles which have been the subject of the present discussion would pass as necessarily belonging to the premises. Without the retorts, purifiers, steam-engines and gas-holders, the premises would be worthless for the purpose for which they were erected, and could not be used as a gas-manufactory. They are all of them fixed, and so far annexed to the freehold as to make it plain that they are intended to be permanently placed for the use of the land and buildings as gas-works. The meters are on a different footing. They are not a part of the gas-works, as they are neither upon land occupied by the company, nor fixed in such manner as to be a part of the freehold. I was struck in the early part of the argument with the findings in the case that, according to the practice and course of business in letting and hiring gas-works, the tenant would have to take to and find capital for all the property comprised under the heads meters, retorts, tenant's fixtures and utensils, and would have to provide 15,000*l.* for that purpose, and that a deduction in respect of such outlay was to be made in estimating according to the provisions of the Parochial Assessment Act what rent a tenant from year to year would give. I thought at first that as the tenant would take the premises without making an outlay by purchasing those articles, the rent he would have to pay would be so much less, and would represent the rateable value of the property. But upon consideration, I agree with my Lord and my Brother Blackburn, that this is not a right view of the case. If the landlord agrees that the tenant should pay down a price for part, that is, purchase part of the freehold, it would be absurd to say that its rateable value is diminished. It makes no difference whether the tenant occupies the whole, or whether, by contract between him and the landlord, he purchases the fixed plant which, if not so purchased, would be a part of the permanent premises. I entirely agree in the opinion that, with the exception of the meters, all the rest of the enumerated articles are rateable, and that no deductions in respect of them ought to be allowed.

Deductions disallowed, except in respect of meters; and rate remitted to the Sessions to be amended according to the judgment of the Court.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 24, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. HEATH AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. M. C. 113; 6 B. & S. 578; 12 L. T. 492; 13 W. R. 805.

See, Heath v. Weaverham Overseers, [1894] E. R. A.; 63 L. J. M.C. 187; [1894] 2 Q.B. 108; 70 L. T. 729; 42 W. R. 478 (Q.B.D. Div.). Referred to Dalton Overseers v. North Eastern Railway, [1900] E. R. A.; 69 L. J. Q.B. 650; [1900] A.C. 345; 82 L. T. 693 (H.L.). Discussed, Ferrand v. Bingley Urban Council, [1903] E. R. A.; 72 L. J. K.B. 734; [1903] 2 K.B. 445; 89 L. T. 333; 52 W. R. 77 (K.B.D. Div.).

Poor-Rate—Highway Acts, 1835, 1862 (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. ss. 27, 33; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. ss. 3, 6, 7, 21, 42).—Exemption from Liability to Highway-Rate—District Board—Precept to Overseers of Parish.

HIGHWAYS.—The occupiers of certain lands in a hamlet which maintained its own highways, and was locally situated within, and was assessed to the poor-rate for the township of W, which township separately maintained its own poor, were exempt from liability to contribute to the repairs of the highways in the hamlet before the passing of the Highway Act, 1835. By section 27. of that act all property liable to be assessed to the relief of the poor was made rateable to the repair of highways; but by section 33. all legal exemptions were preserved. After the passing of the Highway Act, 1862, the hamlet was, by an order of Quarter Sessions, combined with the township and other places into a highway district under that act. The highway board for such district issued a precept to the overseers of the township to contribute out of the poor-rates a certain sum for the repair of the highways of the township, now including the hamlet. By section 42. of the Highway Act, 1862, the former act was to be construed as one with that act:—Held, that the occupiers of the lands in question were exempt from contributing to a poor-rate levied by the overseers of the township for the purposes of the relief of the poor, and to meet the precept of the district board as to so much as they assessed in respect of the repairs of the highways; for that substitution of the poor-rate for the highway-rate by the Highway Act, 1862, as the fund out of which the supplies for maintaining the roads have to come, did not take away the former exemption which had been preserved by the Highway Act, 1835.

The Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Chester, upon the hearing of an appeal against an assessment for the relief of the poor of the township of Weaverham, in the same county, and for other purposes chargeable thereon, made the 29th of April, 1864, confirmed the rate, subject to the following

CASE.

The township of Weaverham, in the county of Chester, is one of several townships, which together constitute the parish of Weaverham. Weaverham township, however, is a place separately maintaining its own poor, and for which two overseers are annually appointed, under the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2. s. 1.

The hamlet of Gorstage is locally situate within the township of Weaverham, and has from time immemorial maintained its own highways quite separately and distinctly from the rest of that township, and a surveyor of highways was annually appointed for such hamlet until the date of the order of Sessions hereinafter referred to. Gorstage was not, however, a place separately maintaining its own poor, but has always been assessed to the poor-rate made for the whole township of Weaverham. The appellant Robert Heath is the owner in fee simple of a mansion-house, certain farms and lands situate in the hamlet of Gorstage, called Hefferston Grange, and being formerly part of the possessions of the dissolved monastery of Vale Royal. The said mansion-house, farms and land are now occupied by the appellants Robert Heath, John Gerrard and John Newall. From time immemorial the owners and occupiers of Hefferston Grange have been liable to repair and have repaired at their sole expense a certain road or highway in the hamlet of Gorstage, leading from Acton Bridge to Tarporley, both in the county of Chester, and have in consequence of such liability been exempt from repairing or contributing to the repairs of the other highways in the said hamlet of Gorstage. The occupiers of Hefferston Grange have always been rated in respect of the same to the relief of the poor.

An order of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Chester was made on the 4th of March, 1863, by which, amongst other highway districts, the township of Weaverham was, with certain other places, made into the highway district of the west division of the hundred of Eddisbury.

Since the making of that order of Sessions no surveyor of highways has been appointed, nor any separate highway rate been made for Gorstage; but the highways therein which were formerly repaired by that hamlet have been repaired by the highway board at the expense or on account of the township of Weaverham. For the purpose of obtaining the sum necessary to repair the roads in the said township of Weaverham, including the highways in the hamlet of Gorstage, the highway board of the west division of the hundred of Eddisbury, on the 13th of April, 1864, directed its precept to the overseers of the township of Weaverham, under section 21. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. requiring them to pay the sum of 300*l.*, by two weekly instalments of 150*l.* each, to the treasurer of the highway board, from the poor-rates of their township, towards the repairs of the highways in the township, and the contribution of the township to the common fund of that highway division.

To enable the overseers of Weaverham to pay the first instalment of the said sum of 300*l.* to the treasurer of the said highway board, and to raise the sum necessary for poor-law purposes in the half-year ending the 29th of September, 1864, the overseers made the rate appealed against. It is a rate made upon every occupier of property liable to be rated to the relief of the poor in the whole township of Weaverham. The rate assessed upon each occupier is 1*s.* in the pound: of this sum 4*d.* in the pound, or thereabouts, is the sum necessary to be raised for the payment of the sum of 150*l.*, being the first instalment of the sum required to be paid by the precept before mentioned for the repairs of the highways, and 8*d.* in the pound, or thereabouts, is the sum necessary to be raised for the relief of the poor of Weaverham. Each of the appellants is rated in the sum of 1*s.* in the pound.

The rate was headed "An assessment for the relief of the poor of the township of Weaverham, in the county of Chester, and for other purposes chargeable thereon according to law, made this 28th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1864, after the rate of 1*s.* in the pound." One ground of appeal was, that the appellants (Heath, Gerrard and Newall) were overrated in respect of the said land and premises occupied by them respectively in the said township of Weaverham, inasmuch as the sum rated and assessed by the said rate upon them respectively, included money payable or intended to be paid by the overseers for the repairs of the highways of the township of Weaverham, under the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 21: they, the said Heath, Gerrard and Newall, being legally exempt from all liability to repair the highways of the said township, save a certain part of a certain highway mentioned in another (the third) ground of appeal, and from the performance of statute duty on such highways, and from the payment of any composition in lieu thereof, and from highway-rates.

The third ground of appeal was, that the appellants were exempt, as in the former ground stated, in consideration of their sole liability to repair a certain portion of a highway (now a turnpike-road) within the said township, called "The road from Tarporley to the east end of Acton Forge."

The fourth ground was, that the including in the said poor-rate money payable or intended to be paid for the repairs of the highways, as in the above first-mentioned ground of appeal mentioned, is illegal, inasmuch as the said lands and premises occupied by the appellants are situate in the hamlet of Gorstage, which has from time immemorial repaired, and still is liable to repair, all the highways situate within the said hamlet, except the said part of the said road mentioned in the third ground of appeal, which the appellants are liable to repair as aforesaid.

The fifth ground was, that the hamlet of Gorstage, which is, as in the fourth ground of appeal mentioned, liable to repair the highways therein situate, and in which the said lands and premises are situate, although forming part of the township of Weaverham, has not been combined with the said township by the order of Quarter Sessions, bearing date the 4th of March, 1863, inasmuch as the said township was not either a parish in fact or, as being a place maintaining its own highways, a parish within the meaning of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 3, or of the principal act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 5.

The appellants contended that they were by this rate assessed in too high a sum, and that no portion of the sum of 300*l.* payable under the precept of the West Eddisbury Highway Board should be levied upon them, as they are exempt from contributing to the repairs of the highways in Gorstage, whether that hamlet be separated from or amalgamated with the rest of the township of Weaverham. And that they ought only to be assessed at 8*d.* in the pound, or thereabouts, being the sum necessary to raise the money required for the relief of the poor.

If the Court should be of opinion that the appellants ought not to be assessed in respect of the sum payable under the precept of the West Eddisbury Highway Board, then the sum assessed upon them is to be at the rate of 8*d.* in the pound, or thereabouts, and the said rate is to be amended and reduced accordingly, otherwise it is to stand confirmed.

Mellish (M'Intyre with him) Nov. 18, 1865), for the respondents in the appeal.—The appellants, as occupiers of property rateable to the relief of the poor of the township of Weaverham, were liable to contribute to the repairs of the highways within that township. The hamlet of Gorstage has by operation of the order of Sessions, dated the 4th of March, 1863, ceased to be a place maintaining its own highways, and has become, for the purposes of the Highway Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. ss. 5, 6, 7), part of the township of Weaverham, and the appellants, as occupiers of land situate in the hamlet of Gorstage, are liable to contribute to the repairs of all the highways within the township. The appellants having become free from their liability, ratione tenuræ, to repair a particular road in the hamlet of Gorstage, within the township, are now rateable to the poor-rate and liable to pay rates for repair of the highways of the township generally.—They referred to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, ss. 3, 5, 6, 7, 21, 22, 23, 34, 35, and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. ss. 7, 32, 33, 34.

Temple (Heath with him), for the appellants. It being admitted by the case that the exemption of the appellants and their lands existed down to the passing of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, neither their exemption nor liability is affected thereby. Although section 27. of the principal act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50.) directs generally that all property liable to be assessed to the relief of the poor shall be rated to the highways, yet section 33. of that act preserves legal exemptions; and by section 42. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. the latter act is to be construed as one with the principal act. The intention and effect of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. was not to alter the liability of parishes, individuals or corporations with regard to the repair of highways, or to abolish legal exemptions, or to make the expense of maintaining the highways a charge against the poor-rate, but only to alter the management of highways and to cause the same parish officers (viz., the overseers) who assess and levy the necessary expenses relative to the poor to assess and levy also the necessary expenses relative to the highways—Freeman v. Read (32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 226; s. c. 4 Best & S. 174). A subsequent act of parliament will not control the provisions of a prior statute unless it were intended to have that operation. And where the intention of the legislature is apparent, that the subsequent act should not have such an operation, there even though the words of such statute taken strictly and grammatically would repeal a former act, the Courts of law, judging for the benefit of the subject, have held that they ought not to receive such a construction—Williams v. Pritchard (4 Term Rep. 2), per Lord Kenyon. In that case lands had by a prior act been made “free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever,” and a subsequent statute, which imposed the land-tax in terms large enough to include such lands, was held not to repeal the prior exemption. So an exemption by custom from serving on juries was held not to be taken away by a subsequent Jury Act—The Queen v. Pugh (1 Dougl. 188). By the act of 1862, sections 34. and 35, the liability of persons to repair highways ratione tenuræ is preserved and provided for. The highway rate is included in the assessment appealed against—27 & 28 Vict. c. 191. s. 3, but it can easily be separated, and its relative proportion to the cost of maintaining the poor necessarily must be calculated and known in order to comply with the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 33, which limits the contributions by parishes for highway purposes to certain amounts in the pound and in order to form mortgages of the highway rates—27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 50. and 2nd Schedule to the act. And the overseers must take into consideration the particular circumstances of each case as far as they are visible—The Overseers of Sunderland v. the Guardians of the Sunderland Union (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 121). In making the assessment appealed against, and similar assessments to which the general denomination of poor-rates is given, the overseers are in fact making a highway rate as well as a poor-rate in the strict sense of the word, and should have regard to the law affecting each species of rate. By the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 33, if there had been in this township property liable to highway rates but not liable to poor-rates (timber trees or mines, other than coal-mines, for instance), the waywarden would have raised the amount required by the precept of the highway board out of a highway-rate assessed and levied in the manner and in respect of the property in and in respect of which the same would have been assessed and levied if that act had not passed. In that case the appellants’ exemption must have been allowed; but it cannot have been intended by the act that the allowance or disallowance of the exemption should depend upon the accident whether or not such property existed in the township. The township of Weaverham is not a parish within the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. ss. 3, 6, 7, and therefore Gorstage has not been legally combined with it.

(Mellish referred, as to the last point, to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 8.)

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered, on the 24th of January, by—

LUSH, J.—This was an appeal against a poor-rate for the township of Weaverham, in the parish of Weaverham, in the county of Chester, whereby 1s. in the pound was assessed upon the occupiers of all the rateable property in the township. Of this rate, 8d. in the pound was raised for the relief of the poor, the remaining 4d. being for the repairs of the highways. The ground of appeal was that the appellants were not liable to contribute to the repairs of the highways, and therefore that the rate upon them was excessive, and ought to be reduced. The township is a place separately maintaining its own poor, and it contains within its area the hamlet of Gorstage, which has from time immemorial maintained its own highways. The appellants are occupiers of a mansion-house, and of certain farms and lands within the hamlet, the owners and occupiers of which have from time immemorial been liable to repair and have repaired, at their sole expense, a certain road or highway in the hamlet, and have in consequence of such liability been exempt from repairing or contributing to the repair of the other highways therein, but they have always been rated to the relief of the poor of the township. The Court of Quarter Sessions of the county, by an order made under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, divided the county into highway districts, and, amongst other things, ordered, under section 7, that "in case any township which separately maintains its own poor is divided into any tithings, hamlets, or places, each of which separately maintains its own highways, such tithings, hamlets and places shall be combined, and no separate waywarden shall be elected for such tithings, hamlets and places, and such township shall be subject to the same liabilities in respect of all the highways within it, which were before maintained by such tithings, hamlets and places separately, as if all their several liabilities had attached to the whole township, and one waywarden shall be elected for such township as a whole." By virtue of this order the hamlet became, for highway purposes, merged in the township, and the poor-law parish and the highway parish thus became conterminous. The highway board, for the purpose of obtaining the sum necessary to repair the highways in the township, including those which had theretofore been repaired by the hamlet, issued their precept to the overseers of the township under section 21. of the before-mentioned act, requiring the overseers to pay the sum of 300*l.* to the treasurer of the board. To enable them to pay the first instalment of this sum, and to raise the sum necessary for poor-law purposes, the overseers made the rate against which the appeal was lodged.

It was contended by the appellants, that inasmuch as they were, before the order of Sessions, exempted from highway-rates in the hamlet they are equally exempted from contributing, by means of the poor-rate, to the sum required for highway purposes. On the other hand, it was urged by the respondents that, as the maintenance of the highways in the hamlet is transferred from the hamlet and charged upon the poor-rate of the township, which is and must be raised by an equal pound rate upon all the assessable property in the parish, the exemption which the lands in question before enjoyed is by necessary implication abolished.

Until the passing of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. the fund for maintaining the highways had been raised by a highway-rate upon the parish, township, or hamlet liable thereto. And by the 33rd section of the Highway Act, the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, it was enacted, that "when property, or the owner in respect thereof, has, previous to the passing of this act, been legally exempted from the performance of statute duty, or from the payment of any composition in lieu thereof, or of any highway-rate, the said property and the owners and occupiers thereof shall be exempt from the payment of the rate hereby imposed." That act is still in force, and by the 42nd section of the recent act it is to be construed as one with the latter act, so far as the provisions of the one are consistent with those of the other. Is there, then, anything in the recent act inconsistent with the provision here made for continuing the exemption to which the property had before been entitled? The 21st section enacts, that "for the purpose of obtaining payment from the several parishes within their district of the sums due from them, the highway board shall order precepts to be issued to the overseers of the said parishes, stating the sum to be contributed by each parish, and requiring the overseers of such parish, within a time to be limited by the precept, to pay the sum therein mentioned to the treasurer of the board, and the overseers shall comply with the requisition of such precept by paying the sums to be contributed by their respective parishes out of any monies in their hands applicable to the relief of the poor; but no contribution required to be paid by any parish at any one time in pursuance of this act shall exceed the sum of 10*d.* in the pound, and the aggregate of contributions required to be paid by any parish in any one year in pursuance of this act shall not exceed the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, except with the consent of four-fifths of the ratepayers of the parish in which such excess may be levied, present at a meeting specially called for the purpose, of which ten days' previous notice has been given by the waywardens of such parish, and then only to such extent as may be determined by such meeting; provided, that in any parish where, for a period of not less than seven years immediately preceding the passing of this act, it has been the custom of the surveyors of highways for such parish to levy a highway-rate in respect of property not subject by law to be assessed to poor-rates, the monies payable in pursuance of the precept of the highway board shall not be paid by the overseers, but may be raised and paid by the waywardens of such parish out of a highway-rate, to be assessed and levied in manner and in respect of the property in and in respect of which the same would have been assessed, and levied if this act had not passed." It appears clear to us that the object of the legislature in passing this act was not to alter the liability to highway maintenance, but only to extend the area of management, equalize the costs of repair, and simplify the machinery for providing the necessary funds; and it is plain that if there had been in this township lands liable to contribution to the highways but not to the poor-rate, the lands in question would by virtue of the 33rd section above quoted, be exempted as they were before. If, therefore, these lands are now chargeable, it must be as a necessary consequence, not intended by the legislature of their having in cases like the present substituted the poor-rate for the highway-rate as the fund out of which the supplies for maintaining the roads are to come. But we are of opinion that no such consequence follows.

So much of the rate imposed for both purposes as is raised for the support of the poor must, no doubt, be an equal pound rate upon all the occupiers of property liable to be assessed for that purpose; but that being so, the rate cannot be objected to because so much of it as is raised for the highways is imposed upon only part of the property, the residue not being liable to that charge. The two assessments will appear on the face of the rates, so that the ratepayers may see how much is for the maintenance of the poor and how much for highways, and why one occupier who is liable to both is charged with the aggregate, and another who is liable to one only with that one. There is no inequality in this, for every occupier is equally charged with the burden which belongs to him. This mode of working out the requirements of the act appears to us to have been sanctioned, if not required by the 22nd section. That section enacts, that "where any parish as defined by this act and in this section called a highway parish, is not a parish separately maintaining its own poor, in this section called a poor-law parish, the highway board shall issue their precept or precepts to the overseers of the poor-law parish, or of the several poor-law parishes, if more than one, of which such highway parish forms part, and the precept or precepts so issued shall specify the part or parts of the poor-law parish or poor-law parishes constituting the highway parish in which the sum required by the board is to be levied, and if there be more than one such parish, shall apportion amongst such parts the amounts to be levied in such parish." Where in the cases contemplated by this section the overseers require to raise money for the maintenance of the poor as well as for the highways, they must, in order to comply with the statute, adopt the course contended for by the appellant.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the order of Sessions confirming the rate should be quashed, and the rate amended by reducing the assessment upon the appellants to 8d. in the pound.

Order of Sessions quashed; rate to be amended.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

Feb. 10, 1866.

PEACHE, appellant, v. COLMAN, respondent.35 L. J. M.C. 118; 1 H. & R. 393; L. R. 1 C.P. 324; 14 W. R. 439; 12 Jur. N.S. 273.Referred to, Peplow v. Richardson, 1869, L. R. 4 C.P. 168; 17 W. R. 410 (C.P.).See now, The Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. & 1 Geo. V., c. 24) s. 61.Public-House—Opening on a Sunday—11 & 12 Vict. c. 49. s. 1.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—The appellant kept a public-house outside the Sevenoaks Railway Station, which was a mile from Sevenoaks. On Whitsunday, after the arrival of several excursion trains, and before half-past twelve in the day, several persons were in his house drinking; two were Sevenoaks persons, but the only evidence as to the appellant's knowledge that they were there was his remark (upon his attention being called to them as they left), that he was not aware Sevenoaks persons were there:—Held, that the Justices were not bound to convict him on a charge under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49. s. 1. for having his house open illegally.

This was a case stated by Justices, for the opinion of the Court, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 45.

At a petty sessions held at Sevenoaks, in the county of Kent, an information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49. s. 1, for opening his public-house on Sunday the 4th of June, 1865, for the sale of wine, spirits, and other fermented and distilled liquors, before the hour of half-past twelve, the same not being for refreshment to any traveller or lodger.

Upon the hearing of the said information a constable was called as a witness, on the part of the respondent, and proved as follows:

"On the 4th of June last (a Sunday) I visited the Railway Tavern ale-house, kept by the defendant John Peache, about twenty-five minutes to twelve in the morning. I found several persons there smoking and drinking. I asked Mr. Peache how his house came to be open at that hour, and Sevenoaks people drinking and leaving. I saw some Sevenoaks people there: one a man of the name of Budgen and his son, and another by the name of Morgan, and another elderly person—I did not know his name. I called Mr. Peache's attention to him, and said, 'You do not call him a traveller?' and he replied, 'Oh, yes, he does belong to Sevenoaks.' I saw the persons mentioned leave the house. The elderly person was in the parlour sitting down, smoking. I left him there. When I left I spoke to Mr. Peache, and he said he was not aware that any Sevenoaks people had been in the house. I asked him, 'What are those that have just gone out?' He said, he did not know; he did not see them; he could not tell everybody."

This witness, on cross-examination by the appellant's attorney, said: "Mr. Peache's house is just outside the gates of the railway station. There were not eighteen persons, I should say, in the house. I saw no one eating bread and cheese: I only went into the parlour. I know there are excursion trains on a Sunday. I was there three quarters of an hour before a train had come in."

In reply to a question by the Justices, the witness said, "Before the parties came away I saw Morgan drink ale, and I saw all the other men in the house."

The appellant's attorney admitted that the elderly person above referred to was a Sevenoaks person, who had gone to meet a friend coming by the rail; and he submitted that such person was entitled to be at the appellant's house as described.

And for the appellant, a witness was called, who being sworn said, "I live at Hartsbands, Sevenoaks. I recollect the 4th of June (Whitsunday), I was at Mr. Peache's house on the morning of that day. My father came from Tunbridge, and he and I went down to the train to meet my brother and his wife, who were coming from London. The train was late. It got in about a quarter past eleven, and there were a good many passengers. When we got to Mr. Peache's my brother said he should like a glass of ale, and I and my father drank a glass of ale with him. He called for it. I said, 'He is a traveller; I must not drink it, but he may.'"

This witness on cross-examination said, "I saw no one that I knew. My father must pass my house before he got to the railway station."

It was contended that the appellant had committed no offence. That it was impossible he could personally see all parties who flocked to his house on the arrival of trains, and that he had as he believed supplied refreshment to those persons only whom he believed to be bona fide travellers on the Sunday in question. That it was a common occurrence for parties in the neighbourhood to come to his house with friends who had come in by the train, and whom such parties had gone to meet, but that on such occasions he did not supply such parties but only their friends with refreshments.

It was admitted by the appellant that the proceedings before the Justices were legal and regular, and that if he had committed the offence charged the said conviction was properly made.

The Justices being of opinion that the evidence given before them and above set out brought the case within the operation of the said 1st section of the said act, the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, gave their determination against the appellant and convicted him; but they granted a case, which after stating the above facts concluded as follows:

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this Court is—

Whether the appellant committed an offence against the statute and was rightly convicted of keeping his house open for the sale of wine, &c., before the hour of half-past twelve on the Sunday in question, under the circumstances detailed in the evidence in this case.

The railway station is about a mile distant from Sevenoaks town, where Budgen, the person referred to in the constable's evidence, resides. Sunday, the 4th of June, was Whitsunday, and on that morning a great number of persons came to the Sevenoaks station by the train.

If the Court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand, but if the Court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be quashed.

Hayes, Serj., for the appellant.—The charge is for opening the house, not for selling the liquors; and it is clear on the evidence that the appellant opened the house for the refreshment of travellers, and he was not liable to be convicted even though some of the persons supplied were, unknown to him, not travellers. But further, as far as appears, every person in the house may have been a traveller within the meaning of the statute, and the onus of disproving this lay on the respondent. The present case falls exactly within Taylor v. Humphries (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1).

No one appeared for the respondent.

WILLES, J.—The appellant was convicted under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49. s. 1, for opening his house for the sale of fermented liquors on a Sunday before half-past twelve. It appeared that on Whitsunday he opened his house, which is near the Sevenoaks railway station, before half-past twelve, and that before that hour there were several persons in the house, some eighteen or so.

Of these, the large proportion would seem to have been travellers; but amongst them there were some persons belonging to Sevenoaks. With respect to these latter persons, one, as far as appears, did not have any liquor, and as to the two who had, the only evidence as to knowledge is the remark of the landlord that he was not aware that any Sevenoaks persons had been in the house. These persons went away, and the probability is, that they did so because they were conscious that they ought not to be drinking there; but still the only proof as to whether the landlord knew or not that these Sevenoaks persons were drinking in his house is in his own statement, which is, that he was not aware of it. The question is somewhat peculiarly stated by the Justices, who gave no opinion as to the knowledge of the appellant that Sevenoaks persons were drinking in his house, and perhaps they may have felt that the reasonable conclusion was that the house was opened bona fide, but that these persons happened to be in the house, and went away because they ought not to have been there. I think, however, that the question of the Justices amounts to asking whether they were bound to convict, and as I think they were not so bound, the conviction ought, therefore, in my opinion, to be quashed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot see any evidence that the house was opened except for travellers, or that liquor was sold to any one who was not a traveller. An excursion train had just arrived, and the persons in the house might have arrived by it. They might either have been travellers and going home, or might have come to meet their friends at the train, in either of which cases I think that they would equally be travellers within the meaning of the statute; for if the train were late, for instance, it would be hard that those coming to meet it should not be supplied with liquor.

Conviction quashed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 23, 24, 1866.

CHARLOTTE WINSOR, plaintiff in error, v. THE QUEEN, defendant in error.

35 L. J. M.C. 121; L. R. 1 Q.B. 289; 6 B. & S. 143; 14 L. T. 195; 14 W. R. 423; 10 Cox C.C. 276; 12 Jur. N.S. 91: affirmed, [1866] E. R. A. 2497; 35 L. J. M.C. 161; L. R. 1 Q.B. 390; 7 B. & S. 490; 14 L. T. 567; 14 W. R. 695; 10 Cox C.C. 327; 12 Jur. N.S. 561 (Ex. Ch.).

Indictment for Murder—Discharge of Jury without Verdict—Judge's Discretion—Venire de novo—Prisoner's Life twice in Jeopardy—Discharge of Jury no bar to Second Trial—Sunday Dies non juridicus—Refreshment to Jury after Retirement—Admissibility of Accomplice jointly indicted—Court of Error.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The record shewed that on the trial of W. and H., who were jointly indicted, for murder, the jury, after five hours' deliberation, at five minutes before midnight on Saturday night were discharged by the Judge without giving a verdict, and without the consent of the prisoner or of the prosecution, on the grounds that they had not agreed, and declared they could not agree, upon any verdict, and that all the rest of the assize business was finished, and the Lord's Day was immediately at hand, and that he, the Judge, was required to be in another county on Monday, in the execution of the Commission, and that, for the above reasons, the Judge "decided that it was necessary to discharge the jury." W. was afterwards given in charge to another jury and tried, alone, upon the same indictment, when a verdict of guilty was returned, and judgment of death recorded; H. being admitted as a witness against her without having been either acquitted or convicted on the indictment:—Held, on a writ of error, that the judgment below must be affirmed; that the second trial was legal, since the discharge of the jury on the first trial was no bar to the second; that the discharge of the jury was a matter for the discretion of the presiding Judge alone, and could not be reviewed in a Court of error; that, even if that discretion had been improperly exercised, it would have afforded no bar to a second trial; and (per Blackburn, J.) that in all cases where, on an indictment, there has been no verdict found, or the verdict has been imperfect, the proper course is to award a venire de novo, and try the accused again;—and, semble, that this is applicable to indictments for capital felonies and for misdemeanors alike.

Held, also, that the question of the admissibility of the accomplice as a witness could not be raised on a writ of error; but, semble, that if it could H. was admissible, although the indictment with regard to her had not been disposed of.

Quære—Whether a verdict taken and recorded on Sunday would be valid.

Quære, also—Whether a Judge has the power to order refreshment to a jury after they have retired to consider their verdict.

Writ of error directing the Justices of Oyer and Terminer for the county of Devon, and Justices assigned to deliver the gaol of that county, to send up a certain record.

The record set forth, that at the general session of oyer and terminer held at Exeter for the county of Devon on the 13th of March, 1865, before Crompton, J. and Channell, B., the grand jury presented that Charlotte Winsor and Mary Ann Harris, on the 14th of February, 1865, at the parish of St. Mary Church, in Devon, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did kill and murder Thomas Edwin Gibson Harris, against the peace, &c., and afterwards, at the same general session of gaol delivery, on the 17th of March ensuing, Winsor and Harris severally pleaded not guilty to that indictment, and a jury were impanelled and sworn to speak the truth concerning the premises in the indictment specified. That after the trial had proceeded for some hours, at a late hour on Friday, the Court adjourned till the next day; and that on that day, the 18th of March, the trial proceeded, and the case on the part of the Crown and of the prisoners respectively having been concluded, the Justices charged the jury, who, after the conclusion of the charge, having been then kept together for the space of thirty-two hours or thereabouts during the trial, retired from the bar to consult upon their verdict, and after the further space of five hours, that is to say, at five minutes before midnight in the night of Saturday the 18th of March, the jury returned to the bar and (in the words of the record),

“ Being asked by the Court here whether they have agreed upon their verdict, they say that they have not agreed, and unanimously declare that, after full consideration, they are wholly unable to agree, and cannot agree, upon any verdict to be given by them on the premises aforesaid; and therefore, because it manifestly appears to the Court here that the said jurors, after five hours’ deliberation and such consideration amongst themselves, have not agreed upon any verdict, and declare that they have not agreed and are unable to agree upon any verdict to be given upon the premises aforesaid, and because all other the business of the said session of gaol delivery is finished and completed, and because the Lord’s Day is immediately at hand, and because the said Justices of our said Lady the Queen are required by her letters patent to proceed to and be in Her county of Cornwall on Monday now next ensuing, in the execution of the said letters patent, and because it manifestly appears to the Justices here that, for the reasons and causes aforesaid, it is necessary to discharge the said jury, and the said Justices do decide and adjudge that it is necessary to discharge the said jury, and they do on the ground of such necessity as aforesaid altogether discharge the said jury from giving any verdict upon the premises, and they are accordingly discharged from giving their verdict upon the premises aforesaid. And the said C. Winsor and M. A. Harris are by the Justices here forthwith committed to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Devon, in the common gaol of the county safely to be kept until they shall be thence delivered in due course of law; and thereupon the sheriff is commanded that he have the bodies of the said C. Winsor and M. A. Harris at the next general session of general gaol delivery to be holden for the county of Devon, to answer the premises in the said indictment above specified and charged on them."

The record then stated that at the said next gaol delivery for Devon, held at Exeter on the 26th of July, and duly adjourned till the 28th of July, before Willes, J. and Keating, J. (the commission being set out at length), "come as well the said C. Winsor and M. A. Harris, under the custody of the said sheriff, as the said clerk of assize; and the said clerk of assize, who prosecutes for the Queen, prays of the Court that the said C. Winsor may be tried upon the said indictment separate and apart from the said M. A. Harris, and that the said M. A. Harris may be examined and give evidence on behalf of the Queen upon the trial of the said C. Winsor for the felony and murder aforesaid. And the Court doth allow the said prayer of the said clerk of assize. Therefore let the jury thereupon here immediately come," &c.

The record then stated that Winsor's counsel then and there objected, that in consequence of the proceedings on the said indictment above set forth, Winsor could not be legally tried, and must be discharged from the indictment and inquisition; that the Justices overruled the objection and ordered Winsor's trial to proceed; that the jury were duly impanelled and sworn "to speak the truth concerning the premises in the said indictment specified"; that Winsor's trial was adjourned to the next day, the 29th of July, on which day it proceeded, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty against Winsor, who was thereupon sentenced to be hanged.

The record did not state, but it was admitted as a fact, that Harris gave her evidence against Winsor without having been either acquitted or convicted on the indictment, or a nolle prosequi entered.

Error was assigned by the plaintiff on twenty-four grounds, which were in substance: that on the first trial the jury were discharged without having agreed to a verdict; and this without the consent of Winsor or of the prosecutor; without any fatality or illness or misconduct having occurred in Winsor, in the jury, or the Justices; without the jury being in any way incapacitated from giving a verdict; without any sufficient legal cause; and that the jury ought to have been directed to return a verdict of not guilty, or judgment pronounced for Winsor; that Winsor was wrongly deprived of her right to a verdict or a termination of the first trial: that there was time to conclude the first trial before the Justices were required to be in Bodmin: that the first trial was wrongly adjourned to the next gaol delivery: that there was a discontinuance: that the second trial and the verdict, judgment, and all the proceedings were illegal and void because of the above facts, and because the jury were not correctly sworn; and because Winsor's life was in peril on the first trial for the same murder as that for which she was tried on the second; and because Harris was admitted as approver on the second trial, she having been jointly indicted with Winsor, and neither acquitted nor convicted.

Folkard (with him Collins), for the plaintiff in error.—It is contended that the discharge of the jury on the first trial was wrongful, and that all the proceedings on the second trial were illegal and void for that reason; also that the second verdict was bad, because Harris's evidence was inadmissible. The discharge of the jury on the first trial was irregular and illegal. "A jury sworn and charged in case of life or member cannot be discharged by the Court or any other, but they ought to give a verdict"—Co. Litt. 227, b. "To speak it here once for all, if any person be indicted of treason, or of felony, or larceny, and plead not guilty, and thereupon a jury is returned, and sworn, their verdict must be heard, and they cannot be discharged, neither can the jurors in those cases give a privy verdict, but ought to give their verdict openly in court"—3 Inst. 110, 2 Hale, P.C. 294, n. (a), 1 Chit. Cr. L. 634. "A jury sworn and charged in a capital case cannot be discharged without the prisoner's consent till they have given a verdict"—2 Hawk. P.C., by Curwood, 619. Blackstone says the same: "Unless in cases of evident necessity"—4 Comm. 360. "In capital cases a juror cannot be withdrawn though all parties consent to it"—21 Vin. Abr. 337, Trial X. e. 4, Carthew, 465. Rather than discharge the jury the Judge should have directed them to find not guilty, as in all cases of doubt—2 Reeves's Hist. Eng. Law, 270. He might have carried them about with him in carts, and taken the verdict in another county.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—We do not know the terms of the Commission of those days. The Queen's Bench was ambulatory. It is not shewn that the carrying in carts ever actually happened. Is there any authority that the verdict received in another county would be good?]

The King v. Ledgingham (1 Vent. 97) is a dictum to that effect.

[MELLOR, J.—2 Roll. Abr. 712, cited in that case to support that proposition, does not support that part of it.]

There is also 2 Hale, P.C. 297, and the authorities there cited. Also, Bac. Abr. tit. 'Juries,' G., 1 Salk. 201, 7 Mod. 1, and Morris v. Davies (3 Car. & P. 429). The great object being to insure a verdict, juries were finable if they gave no verdict, but not if they found against evidence—St. John v. Abbot (Barnes's Notes of Cases, 441). A juror ought not to be withdrawn in order that the prosecution may bring further evidence—The King v. Jeffs (2 Str. 984). Whitbred and Fenwick's case (7 How. St. Tr. 315) has always been condemned.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Though very oppressive, it does not follow that the second trial was not perfectly legal.]

Lord Dalemere's case (11 Ibid. 520).

[BLACKBURN, J.—That was considered and disposed of in Kinloch's case (Foster, C.C. 25).]

Horne Tooke's case (25 How. St. Tr. 1), Rookwood's case (13 Ibid. 165, 166, 173), Shield's case (28 Ibid. 647), and The King v. Keite (1 Ld. Raym. 139). In The King v. Kell (1 Crawf. & Dix. 151) the twelve Irish Judges decided that even if the jury were discharged for the illness of the prosecutrix the prisoner could not be tried a second time. It is not necessary to go that length here, and it is admitted that where the necessity arises from the act of God the jury may be discharged—The King v. Scalbert (2 Leach C.C. 620), The King v. Stevenson (Ibid. 546), The King v. Streek (2 Car. & P. 413), The King v. Edwards (Russ. & R. 224).

[MELLOR, J.—Meadow's case (Foster, C.C. 76).]

The King v. Wade (1 Moo. C.C. 86), Mansell v. the Queen (1 Dears. & B. 375; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 4) and The King v. Edwards (3 Campb. 206). Even if the jury could legally be discharged at all, five hours is far too short a time for deliberation. In the other cases they were kept much longer, fifteen or twenty-four hours. Even if the jury could properly be discharged in misdemeanors, they could not in felonies; certainly not in capital felonies.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It is difficult to see any distinction in principle between felonies and misdemeanors in that respect.]

The jury if they cannot agree ought not to be discharged till the end of the assizes—The Queen v. Lecken (3 Crawf. & Dix. 174), The Queen v. Leary (Ibid. 212); and Conway and Lynch v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149) is conclusive in favour of the plaintiff in error. The present case is distinguishable from The Queen v. Davison (2 Fost. & F. 250), Newton's case (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85) and The Queen v. Charlesworth (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25; s. c. 1 Best & S. 460).

[MELLOR, J. referred to an indictment for murder in which he was of counsel for the prosecution, tried before Mr. Justice Coltman at Coventry, when the jury were discharged because unable to agree before the Judge had to leave the town for Warwick. The prisoner was tried a second time at the next assizes before Mr. Justice Maule, without any objection being made by either Judge or counsel, and was acquitted on the merits.]

In many cases it would be a great hardship on a prisoner to be tried twice, and he would be unable to meet the expense of a second trial. If the Judge has a discretionary power to discharge a jury under these circumstances, he might do so in five minutes after the jury have retired. It is not advisable to give such a power to any Judge, and it would be monstrous to give it to Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and Recorders.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Have you any case to shew that even if the Judge's discretionary power is wrongly exercised, that can be reviewed in a Court of Error, except Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149)?]

In Newton's case (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85) Mr. Justice Coleridge said: "I agree with the Judges in Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), in thinking it most desirable that the discretion of the Judge should be subject to review." Instead of discharging the jury the Judge should either have adjourned till Sunday, and then taken the verdict, or till Monday, and meanwhile given the jury refreshment. All ministerial acts are good on Sunday, though not judicial—Com. Dig. tit. 'Temps.' B. 3. Receiving a verdict is a ministerial act. The Exchequer used to sit "sometimes on Sundays"—2 Mad. Hist. Ez. (2nd edit.) 5. So in Morris v. Davies (3 Car. & P. 429); see Rouberry v. Morgan (9 Exch. Rep. 730). Parliament, the highest Court in the realm, sits on Sunday if expedient; and its acts on that day are valid.¹ As to refreshments, it is lawful to give them to the jury—The Queen v. Locke (3 Car. & P. 393) and Doct. and Stud. 271, and 3 Car. & K. 90 (note e).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The bailiff is sworn to keep them without food. Besides, who is to pay for it?]

The second trial was illegal and void, because Winsor was twice in peril for the same offence—The King v. Emden (9 East, 446), The King v. Sheen (2 Car. & P. 634), The Queen v. Drury (18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 189), Campbell v. the Queen (11 Q.B. Rep. 799; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89). It was also void because, wherever there is an imperfect verdict, no new trial can take place—Harrison v. Harrison (9 Price, 89), The King v. Maubey (6 Term Rep. 638). No new trial can be granted in felonies—1 Chit. Crim. L. 630. It was also void because Harris was admitted as an approver, being jointly indicted, not having been either acquitted or convicted. It is true that the record does not state this; but in fact it was so; and on the part of the Crown it was agreed that these facts should be admitted. As to approvers—3 Inst. 129.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Harris was not an approver in the old sense; for approvers were only admitted to give evidence on condition that they pleaded guilty, and if the accomplices were convicted, they were to go free; if otherwise, the approvers were to be hanged instantly.]

Unless a verdict was taken or a nolle prosequi entered, her evidence ought not to have been received—3 Russell on Crimes, (4th edit.), 626, 2 Starkie on Evidence, 11, citing 1 Hale, 305, The Queen v. Jackson (6 Cox. C.C. 525), The Queen v. O'Donnell (7 Ibid 337), The Queen v. Stewart (1 Ibid 174) The Queen v. Archer (3 Cox, 228), The King v. Rowland (Ry. & M. 401), 1 Macnally on Evidence, 56, Child v. Chamberlain (6 Car. & P. 213), The Queen v. Hinks (2 Car. & K. 462), The Queen v. George (Car. & M. 111), Starkie on Evidence (4th edit.), 128. The effect of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, and the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. is to prevent any defendant in an indictment from giving evidence until the indictment is disposed of.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Even if Harris was inadmissible, how can that be matter of error?]

The Solicitor General (Sir R. P. Collier (with him Hannen), for the Crown.

(1) In Newton's case (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85) Rolfe, B. sat twice on Sunday to ask the jury, who had been locked up on Saturday night, if they were agreed; and on the second occasion discharged them—3 Car. & K. 90-92. This was not mentioned to the Court.

It is contended that the discharge of the jury was entirely a matter for the Judge's discretion, and cannot be reviewed here; that if it is reviewable, the Judge was right; that if he was wrong, that is no legal bar to the second trial. It is clear that Coke's rule as to the discharge of juries did not long prevail, for Ferrars's case (Sir T. Raym. 84) and Mansell's case (1 Anders. 103) are at variance with it. Doct. and Stud., 272, is more correct. All the Irish cases are in favour of discharging the jury when the assize is over; and here it was over. The universal practice now is, to try prisoners twice, if the jury have been discharged without verdict—Shield's case (28 Ibid. 647), The King v. Cobbett (3 Burn's Justice (edit. 1845), 974) and The Queen v. Newton (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85). In Gray v. the Queen (11 Cl. & F. 427) the prisoner was tried four times; the jury having been discharged once for illness and twice because unable to agree.

[BLACKBURN, J.—(Having sent for and read the record in Gray v. the Queen (11 Cl. & F. 427).)—The proceedings on the former trials do not appear on the record, and the Lords had nothing to do with them. If they had appeared, the question might have been raised whether there was error in awarding jury process after a previous discharge.]

There cannot be any distinction in principle between felonies and misdemeanors in this respect.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The old law as to all felonies being graver than any misdemeanor is still unchanged, though many of the reasons for the law do not now exist. Some misdemeanors are graver offences than some felonies.]

The only judge of what is a sufficient "necessity" is the Judge who presides. Mr. Justice Erle, in Newton's case (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85), uses the expression "need in a high degree."

[BLACKBURN, J.—I think Mr. Justice Coleridge in that case correctly says, "It cannot be taken to mean necessity in the strict absolute sense of the word. The true question in all cases is, whether the whole circumstances of the case were such as to make the act of the Judge a proper exercise of his judicial discretion."]

In The Queen v. Davison (2 Fost. & F. 250), the Judges were agreed that the Judge's discretion cannot in any way be reviewed. If the discharge is a bar at all, it could be pleaded. It would be absurd to have a jury sitting to decide the issue whether the illness of the jury or the Judge had been such as to justify the Judge in discharging the jury. In Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149) Mr. Justice Crampton outweighs the other Judges, and he is followed in The Queen v. Charlesworth (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25; s. c. 1 Best & S. 460). Again, if the Judge's discretion is reviewable, it is contended he was right. He could not have received the verdict on Sunday, for it is clearly a judicial act, and the authorities cited by the other side are conclusive that such acts on Sunday are void. There is no authority for giving the jury refreshment after retirement.

[MELLOR, J.—The passage in Doctor and Student, 271, draws no distinction between giving the jury refreshment before retiring and after.]

Again, if the Judge was wrong, this is no bar to the second trial. There are no authorities to the contrary except Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), and till that case no such plea can be found. That a venire de novo can issue in felony, after a bad verdict, was decided in The King v. Fowler (4 B. & Ald. 273). See also, per Holt, C.J., in The King v. Keite (1 Ld. Raym. 141; s. c. Skinner's Rep. 667), and Campbell v. the Queen (11 Q.B. Rep. 799; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89). As to Harris's evidence, there is nothing in the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. or the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. to exclude it—see 2 Taylor on Evidence, s. 1223. But this question cannot be raised on a writ of error.

Folkard replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question involved in this case has been so recently before the Court, in The Queen v. Charlesworth (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25;

s. c. 1 Best & S. 460), and has been so fully discussed in the argument during the last two days, that nothing would be gained by taking further time to consider, more especially as there is no doubt in the minds of any one of the members of the Court as to the judgment we ought to pronounce. I have no hesitation in saying that it is within the province of a Judge presiding on a criminal trial, after the jury have retired to consider their verdict, and have remained in deliberation a full and sufficient time, if the jury agree that there is no chance or reasonable expectation of their coming to a unanimous decision, —and in my judgment it is competent to the Judge—in his discretion to discharge them. We are dealing here not with one of the fundamental principles of our law, such as the maxim that the Judges shall decide questions of law and juries questions of fact, or that a verdict to be binding must be unanimous, but with a matter of practice which has fluctuated at different times, and which may be considered to be not even now finally settled. The rule laid down by Lord Coke in his Institutes, if it ever truly expressed the law, was very soon departed from. In a generation or two at least after his time, we find from Hale—an authority of the greatest eminence—that the practice universally prevailed in the administration of criminal justice, where the proof turned out to be defective, to discharge the jury in order that the prisoner might be tried again when the prosecution were better prepared. We find that eminent lawyer and most humane man speaking with approbation of that practice, as one essential in order to prevent the frustration of justice where evidence was absent but might have been forthcoming; and he speaks of the practice as having prevailed for many years. Afterwards, in consequence of the way in which the practice was abused in political trials, and possibly of the great grievance and hardship on an accused person, who, after defending himself on the first trial, might be wanting in the means of defence for the second, the Judges adopted another plan. Not that there appears to have been any judicial decision on the point, but the Judges, in consultation, laid down a rule that in criminal trials, at all events in trials for felony, the jury should not be discharged at the discretion of the Judge; but if that resolution was ever acted on, it was certainly only for a limited time. In Kinloch's case (Foster, C.C. 25), which occurred in the trials under the Commission after the Rebellion of 1745, we find the Judges dissenting from that proposition in the general terms in which it was laid down. In that case the jury having been discharged in order to put the prisoners into a better position, and give them an opportunity of putting on the record a plea which they had not yet pleaded, it was afterwards objected that the jury having been discharged the accused could not be tried a second time, and in the opinion of all the Judges, except one, that was not a sufficient answer; and Justice Foster shewed that the proposition, as laid down in the general terms, could not be supported. Soon after this we have the great commentator on the English law laying down the rule, that juries could not be discharged by the Judge, except “in cases of evident necessity.” Since that time, the question has arisen several times, and the illness of a juror or the illness of a prisoner has been held a sufficient ground for the discharge of a jury, and no one has questioned that the accused might be put upon his trial a second time. In The King v. Cobbett (3 Burn's Justice (edit. 1845), 974), that most learned and cautious Judge, Lord Tenterden, discharged the jury of his own act and in the exercise of his own discretion, after they had been in deliberation fifteen hours; and other cases were cited in which Judges have taken upon themselves to do the same thing. So far from Mr. Folkard's observation being well founded, that it is essential to the pure administration of justice that this discretionary power should be abridged, I think, if you look at the true principle on which justice ought to be administered, the contrary is the fact. Our ancestors insisted on unanimity as the essence of a verdict, but were very unscrupulous as to the means by which they obtained it; whether the minority gave way to the majority, or the reverse, was a matter of indifference. It was a contest between the strong and the weak, the able-bodied and the infirm, which could best sustain the hunger, and thirst, and the other miseries incidental to the situation.

It was said to be competent for the Judges to take a jury, who could not agree, about with them in carts to the confines of the county where the trial was held, or even beyond. I doubt if such a thing ever was done. I doubt the authority of the loose dicta found in the Year Book, and copied servilely afterwards by text-writers into their books; I doubt if they ever were law, and there is certainly no such thing on record. But we now look at trial by jury in a very different way. We do not desire that the unanimity of a jury should be anything except the unanimity of conviction. It is true that one or two jurymen, if they have only doubts, or weak convictions, may be justified in giving way to the majority; but I hold it to be of the very essence of a jurymen's duty, if he has a firm conviction, either in the affirmative or the negative, not to give up his conviction, though the majority may be against him, in order to purchase his own ease or freedom from restraint. That being so, when a reasonable time has elapsed, and the Judge is convinced that unanimity can only be obtained by the sacrifice of honest conviction, why should he put the jury to torture, to the misery endured by men shut up without food, drink, or fire, in order that the minority or the majority (who can tell which?) may give way? So far, then, from this being a mischievous power, I think it is one essential to the upholding of a pure and honest administration of justice by jurymen.

What, then, is there to shew us that this discretion cannot be exercised? We have, no doubt, the case of Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), in which the majority of the Irish Court held that the discharge of the jury after twenty-four hours' deliberation could not be justified in the exercise of the Judge's discretion, and that the prisoners could not be tried a second time. In The Queen v. Charlesworth (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25; s. c. 1 Best & S. 460), I observed that the judgment of Mr. Justice Crampton, who dissented from the rest, carried to my mind perfect conviction. His arguments were overwhelming, and no attempt to answer them was made by the Judges who differed from him.

Since that the matter has arisen two or three times in analogous questions. In The Queen v. Newton (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85), though the decision of the Court was not necessary, yet the question was incidentally considered, and it is impossible to read the judgments of Lord Denman and the rest of the Court, without being satisfied that their view was that the discharge of the jury under such circumstances was no reason why the prisoner should not be tried a second time. A case more directly in point was The Queen v. Davison (2 Fost. & F. 250). It is true that that was a misdemeanor, and this is a felony, but the trial by jury is the same, and the principle of administration is the same, for both classes, and I am utterly at a loss to see any distinction in principle between the two. Now this case is a much stronger one than that of Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), because there, if the discharge of the jury on the first trial was a wrongful exercise of the Judge's discretion, it followed that the accused could not be put a second time on their trial, and a fortiori not a third. In that case all that appeared was that the jury had been twenty-four hours, and, as it was alleged, a reasonable time, in deliberation, and I think that was sufficient. But this case goes further, because not only had the jury been five hours in deliberation, but it was within a few minutes of midnight on the Saturday; and, further, on the Monday the Judges were bound to be at Bodmin, that being the commission day of the assize. Now the Judge was placed in a position of great difficulty in consequence of Sunday intervening. If the next day had been a week-day, for instance, if the trial had concluded on a Friday night, I do not doubt that the Judge would have considered that he ought not to have discharged the jury after so short a space as five hours, for I quite agree with Mr. Folkard, that if we could review the Judge's discretion, five hours was not so long a time that you could fairly assume that the jury would not, by remaining longer in deliberation, come to a unanimous decision. But the intervening day being Sunday, great difficulty presented itself.

The first question which arose was whether the Judge could adjourn to the Sunday, and take the verdict on that day. It is laid down distinctly by Lord Coke and Comyns that Sunday is not a juridical day, and it is idle to contend that the delivering of a verdict by the jury, the receiving it by the Judge, and the recording it—which is also, though the act of the officer, the act of the Court—are not judicial acts. I entertain the gravest doubts whether it would be consistent with the validity of these acts, as judicial acts, to receive and record the verdict on the Sunday.

Then it is said that the Judge might have adjourned till the Monday, and kept the jury confined over the Sunday, and received the verdict on the Monday. But then arises this startling dilemma, that since it would have been impossible, because inhuman, to keep the jury without meat or drink all the Sunday, then the only alternative would have been to give the jury refreshment. There is no authority for saying that this can be done; the authorities rather point the other way. There is no satisfactory authority—for the passage in Doctor and Student does not go that length, and if it did, it is not sufficient to militate against the whole course of practice—which establishes that you can give refreshment to a jury after they have retired to deliberate. The oath administered to the bailiff has a strong tendency to confirm this. He is sworn to keep them without meat, drink, fire, candle-light only excepted, and not to speak with them himself, nor to allow any one else to speak with them without the leave of the Court. Now the exception as to the leave of the Court is as to speaking with them, not as to allowing them meat or drink, and I question very much whether as this system of coercion has been handed down to us by our ancestors, the Judge could take on himself, without the intervention of the legislature (and the sooner it occurs on that point the better), to remove this coercion by a simple act of his discretionary authority in ordering the jury refreshment. The Judge, therefore had the choice of three courses; either to discharge the jury, or to take the verdict on the Sunday, or to keep the jury in confinement till the Monday, allowing them the necessary refreshment to sustain their strength. The Judge, therefore, was placed in a great difficulty. I am not here to review his discretion. I am at a loss to know how I should have acted under the same circumstances. It was a position in which, if the exercise of discretion ever was called for, it was so then; and unless it can be shewn that the Judge had not the discretionary power, it is a case in which we ought not to say that the discretion was improperly exercised.

These are the facts on the record, with this addition, that it was adjudicated by the Judge that a reasonable time had elapsed, and that it was necessary under the circumstances to discharge the jury; and this brings me to the second question, which is,—this necessity being set forth on the record, is it competent to us to review it? I think certainly not. The first question is, how is it to be reviewed? It seems to me to be a mistake to say that necessity is a question of law. It may be a rule of practice that a Judge should not discharge a jury except there is a necessity for it, but that necessity is a conclusion from all the facts of the case. Who ever heard of a Court of Error sitting to determine a question which is purely one of fact, not of law? It was well put by the Solicitor General, that if this can be taken advantage of by stating it on the record, then it might be made the subject of a plea, as in the Irish case. Then a replication would follow, and if the replication was a traverse of the facts, who is to try the facts, the Judge or the jury? It is impossible for us to deal with this as a matter of error. It is a matter for the Judge's discretion, and no exercise of that discretionary power has ever been, so far as I know, made the subject of error. This was the view unquestionably taken by Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Coleridge, and Lord Chief Justice Erle, in The Queen v. Newton (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car & K. 85). It was the clear and unequivocal language of the Lord Chief Baron, of Baron Martin, and of our Brother Hill, in The Queen v. Davison (2 Fost. & F. 250), that the exercise of discretion in such a case is not a matter for review in a Court of Error on error alleged on the record. That was a case of misdemeanor, but there cannot be any distinction in that respect between a felony and a misdemeanor; the principle in the two cases must be the same. It is clear, therefore, that even if this were a case in which the discretion had been improperly exercised (which I am very far from saying was the case) it cannot be reviewed in error. It is true that, as the Judges of old felt, this discretionary power might be abused, and was abused in the times such as, I trust, this country will never see again. But I do not believe that such a discretionary power ever would be abused in future. At the same time men are open to the infirmities of human nature. There might be dishonest and compliant Judges among us, though I trust in God that that will never happen again. You must frame your rules, so far as you can, to keep the administration of justice beyond the possibilities of corruption. But if a rule is essential to the working of the administration of justice, you must trust to the honesty of those to whom that is committed, and to the means you have of punishing corruption. I think, therefore, that this discretion is a very useful and salutary one. I say, first, it was a discretionary authority which the Judge had power to exercise; and, secondly, whether it was properly exercised or not, it is not a matter that can be brought before a Court of error, as error on the record.

It has been urged on us that according to the law of England no man can be put in peril twice on the same charge. I quite agree with that, but we must take that fundamental maxim of the criminal law according to what is meant by it, which is that a man shall not again be put in peril after a verdict has been pronounced, that verdict being one which on a good indictment it was competent for a jury to pronounce. It means that you shall not harass a man a second time if he has once been convicted and sentenced; still less shall you harass him if he has been pronounced not guilty by a jury. But it does not follow that if from any reason a trial has proved abortive, the question shall not be again submitted to the jury and determined.

It was also urged that there was a difficulty about issuing a second jury process. I do not feel the force of that. It cannot be disputed that there are many instances where, a jury having been discharged in the proper exercise of a judicial discretion, a second trial might take place, for instance, in the case of the illness of the prisoner, of the jury, of the Judge himself. In such cases a venire de novo is the proper process for summoning a jury for a second trial, and it follows indisputably that such would issue. If, then, the jury were properly discharged here, it follows, as much in the present case as in those to which I have referred, that that process must issue.

It was also urged that the evidence of the accomplice, the prisoner's partner in guilt, was improperly received. We cannot take that into account. It was urged that the accomplice came forward to give evidence under peculiar circumstances. The prisoners were joined in the same indictment, and on the first occasion were tried together. On the second it was proposed by the prosecution to sever them, in order that Harris might be a witness against the other prisoner. No doubt this did bring about that state of things which the resolution of Judges, as reported in Lord Holt's time, was intended to prevent. Whereas, on the first trial that most important evidence could not be given against Winsor, it was given upon the second, so that the discharge of the jury produced to her that prejudice. We are not, however, dealing with that now. I felt the force of what was said about the fellow prisoner coming forward to give evidence without having been first acquitted, or convicted and sentence passed. I think that was much to be lamented. In all such cases, where two persons are joined in the same indictment, and it is thought desirable to separate them in their trials, in order that the evidence of the one may be taken against the other, in order to insure the greatest possible amount of truthfulness on the part of the person who is giving evidence under such remarkable circumstances, I think it would be far better that a verdict of not guilty should be taken first, or if the plea of not guilty be withdrawn and a plea of guilty received, that sentence should be passed, in order that the mind of the witness may be free from all the corrupt influences which the fear of impending punishment and the desire to obtain immunity at the expense of the prisoner might be otherwise liable to produce. But we are not dealing with that question now: it cannot be brought before us in a Court of error. The evidence is not set forth on the record, and it is only in civil cases that advantage can be taken of it by a bill of exceptions. Whether these circumstances should have any influence elsewhere it is not for us to pronounce an opinion. Therefore, under all the circumstances, being of opinion that the facts warranted the exercise of the judicial discretion, and further, that even if they did not, or, to speak more accurately, if the discretion was injudiciously exercised, it is not a matter for us to review; and overruling all the objections for the reasons I have given, the only course open to us is to pronounce judgment for the Crown.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is a writ of error, and we, sitting here on appeal upon the writ of error can only inquire whether the verdict and judgment were in point of law good or in point of law bad; and I am clearly of opinion that the conviction as it appears on the record was in point of law good. If this matter had now occurred for the first time, or if it had not been recently discussed, I should have wished for more time to consider the case, and to have entered more fully into the authorities than I shall now do; but in fact the matter was exhaustively considered by Mr. Justice Crompton in the Irish case, where he examined all the authorities, and gave a most admirable judgment, which, though it did not convince his brother Judges, has convinced me that he was right and the others wrong. Since that we have in this Court, in The Queen v. Charlesworth (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25; s. c. 1 Best & S. 460), had occasion to consider the subject, and there, except that that was a misdemeanor and this is a felony, the point raised was the same. As I perfectly agree with what my Lord has now said, having listened attentively to him, I do not think it necessary to cite the authorities or to go into the matter at any great length.

I take it that upon the law there is no doubt as to this, that where a person is properly charged with a crime, whether a felony or misdemeanor, and where the prisoner has pleaded not guilty, the first step is to issue a jury process, by which the jury are brought together to try that question; and when they have been brought together, and the trial has begun, the right course, unless there is some reason to the contrary, is, that the jury should return a verdict of guilty or not guilty, if possible. When the jury have once found that verdict of conviction or acquittal the matter has become res judicata, and after that there can be no further trial. If when the jury have found the verdict, a jury process were awarded upon the same indictment to try the matter over again, that would be bad, and the proper remedy would be to bring a writ of error, the error being that whereas there was an acquittal or a conviction, which terminated the whole matter, process had been issued for a fresh jury. If, instead of that, a second indictment was found, it would be necessary for the prisoner to plead autrefois acquit or autrefois convict, as the case might be, but in each case the question would be, had the matter been determined by the jury and become res judicata? It is material to recollect that where there is a second indictment there are the pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict; but, except the very strange pleadings in Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), which were obviously bad for many reasons, though all objections in form were there waived, there never has been a plea to the effect that the prisoner had been given in charge to the jury and that the jury had come to no conclusion, and that that had the same effect in preventing the prisoner being tried again as if there had been a verdict of guilty or not guilty. The fact that that has never been done is to my mind an extremely strong argument that it cannot be done. If, instead of a fresh indictment, the matter proceeded on a venire de novo, and the question were properly raised, as it is here, whether the proceeding to get together a second jury was correct, the question would be, to my mind, the same. Would the fact that the prisoner had been given in charge to the first jury, who come to no conclusion, for the reasons stated on the record, be a bar to the second indictment? If so, the proceedings to summon a second jury would be erroneous, and the verdict bad; but if the facts would have afforded no effectual defence to the second indictment for the same matter, I cannot see how they could furnish an answer in error on the ground that a jury were a second time brought together to try an issue on an indictment which had never been disposed of.

Now as to the reasons—or, rather I should say, the list of cases—that were urged on the other side, there is the dictum—for it is not more—of Lord Coke that a jury once charged with a prisoner in case of life or member ought not to be discharged, but ought to give their verdict and dispose of it. Every one agrees that that, taken merely as a direction as to what should be done, if possible, is quite right; but upon that is founded the argument, that if the first jury did not dispose of the plea of not guilty, no other jury could dispose of it, and therefore no second jury process could issue. I cannot see any reason in that. Down to the Revolution from the time of Hale, that was not acted upon. In The Queen v. Charlesworth (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25; s. c. 1 Best & S. 460) we entered into details in pointing that out. After the Revolution, the practice was very much reprobated, and undoubtedly it had been for some time so strongly urged that the practice was improper of discharging a jury for such reasons as were given on the State trials that there was a general notion that if a trial went off for any reason, that was equivalent to an acquittal. Kinloch's case (Foster, C.C. 25) shewed that that was a mistake. There it was decided, that when the jury had been brought together it was for the presiding Judge, acting in his judicial discretion, to determine whether it was a case for discharging the jury, and this not merely in the case where a jurymen is taken ill, or for some similar reason, but where, as in that case, there was no need to discharge the jury; where it was done because of a mistake which was no defence; where it was done under a mistaken notion by the Judge with the assent of the counsel for the Crown and the prisoner's counsel, for the purpose of allowing the prisoners to plead another plea. In that case, reported in Foster, it was held, that if the Judge did so determine, the discharge of the jury was no answer to the indictment; that the Judge had such a discretionary power, but a power which was to be exercised only when he saw very clearly that it ought to be exercised. I am not aware that down to Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149) that case was ever departed from. It is obvious that in some cases which are not disputed the jury must be discharged, such as where a jurymen falls ill, and it must be for the Judge to determine whether the illness of the jurymen is such that the trial cannot go on. If a jurymen has merely fainted because the court is close, it would be proper to wait a few minutes and proceed; but if he is taken ill so that there is no likelihood of his going on without danger to his life, the jury must be discharged. To put a case, the assizes sometimes, as in Liverpool, last for a fortnight or more, and if the Judge cannot discharge the jury except upon evident necessity, then what must be done if the jury say they cannot agree at the beginning of the assize? Are the jury not to be discharged till the fortnight has expired? Who is to say whether or not the jurymen is likely to recover? The Judge upon the facts and the evidence before him must determine what his duty is, and he determines it as a mixed question of fact and law. So if the jury have been long in deliberation and a verdict has not been obtained, a precisely similar question arises for the Judge. It cannot be said that he is bound to wait till one of the jury falls ill. That would be too barbarous a rule. Nor can it be said that he ought to stop till the moment the jury have said they are not likely to come to a conclusion. We know juries are in the habit of saying they are not likely to agree, but they are advised to talk it over; and whether they talk it over, or whether they are coerced, we know that, finding it unpleasant to be in custody, they do agree; but it must be more or less a question of the Judge's discretion, and I agree with Lord Tenterden that few things are more painful to the Judge than to have a question of discretion to decide. As far as our pleasure goes, we should be glad to have a fixed rule—to save us from all discretion; but it is a matter on which the Judge must exercise his discretion not capriciously but upon the facts.

Then comes the question, can we in a Court of Error review the discretion? In Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149) the majority of the Irish Judges held that they could. I invited Mr. Folkard during the argument to cite any other case, criminal or civil, in which the decision of the Judge upon a discretionary question like this was reviewed in a Court of Error, and he was unable to refer to one. So far as my own knowledge goes, there is none. Could we review that discretion any more than we could review the verdict of the jury? The verdict may have been found against evidence, but that cannot be reviewed in error, because the evidence on which the jury decided cannot be brought up. So where the Judge, on a mixed question of law and fact, decides judicially on the facts and the evidence that it was necessary to discharge the jury, we cannot review the matter. Upon that I am decidedly of opinion that Mr. Justice Crampton was right, and the other Irish Judges wrong. It becomes, therefore, unnecessary to consider whether here the exercise of my Brother Channell's discretion was right or wrong; but I may observe that, under the circumstances, the trial having been protracted till a few minutes before midnight on Saturday, the Judge was compelled to determine about as difficult a question as could be determined. If, as Mr. Folkard suggests, he had waited and kept the jury together as if it were a week-day, and they had returned a verdict on the Sunday, would that have been lawful and right? I do not decide that question, which is not raised here; but I do not think there can be the smallest doubt about this, that to act judicially on Sunday on any business would be indecent and improper, and should never be done if it can be helped. It is on the authorities a matter of the gravest doubt whether a verdict taken on Sunday would not be void in law, so that it might be upset in a court of error. This not being a point before us, I do not give any determination upon it, but it is a question for the gravest consideration; and where a Judge is driven so close to midnight before Sunday, we could never say that if a Judge had the discretion it was an improper exercise of it to avoid that question by discharging the jury. Then it is said he might have adjourned till Monday, and given the jury refreshment during the Sunday. Here, again, I do not mean to decide a question which is not before us. It may be doubtful whether, if the Judge ordered the jury refreshment, it might not vitiate the verdict; or whether the maxim would apply, quod fieri non debet, factum valet, and the verdict be good notwithstanding. Here, again,—where the Judge might well say, “Am I to raise such a difficult and nice question?”—can we say the discretion was improperly exercised? I think, under these difficult circumstances, the Judge did right, but that is not what we have to decide, because the Judge having exercised his discretion in a matter over which he had jurisdiction, that in a Court of Error cannot be reviewed.

Then there remains the further point, on which I shall say very little. Even supposing the Judge was wrong, does his wrongful discharge of the jury itself entitle the prisoner to an acquittal? I think not. The nearest cases to this are those where the jury have found an imperfect verdict. There is no moral guilt in the Judge who receives the verdict and omits to perceive that it is imperfect; but his duty clearly is to say to the jury—“You have not found a complete verdict; answer the other questions of fact;” and when he receives an imperfect verdict, and discharges the jury, it is clear that the Judge makes a mistake. It is equally clear that in civil cases and in misdemeanors where the verdict is not complete, the proper course is to award a venire de novo, and try the case over again. The question has been raised whether a venire de novo could issue in capital felonies. The dictum of Lord Coke, and the doubt founded on it, raised the doubt in The King v. Huggins, which Lord Chief Justice Raymond himself reports, and it is a most authentic report. He says, 2 Lord Raymond, 1584, that in the argument for the Crown it was stated that “in criminal cases writs of venire facias de novo have been granted. That in capital cases a venire facias de novo must go, 1. In cases of mis-trial.”—Such a case was Gray v. the Queen (11 Cl. & F. 427), and there the House of Lords awarded a venire de novo.—"2. For misbehaviour of the jury in giving their verdict." There Lord Raymond refers to a case in the Year Book of Hen. VII., and adds, that was agreed. "3. As to granting a venire facias de novo, after a special verdict found, they were so candid as to own, that though there was search made with the greatest diligence, yet they could not find one instance, nor so much as an opinion of a Judge, except what was said by Lord Chief Justice Holt in the case of The King v. Keite (1 Ld. Raym. 141; s. c. Skinner's Rep. 667), who says, 'I should not be much against a venire de novo.' And this was remembered by some others that heard that opinion." The King v. Huggins, therefore, came merely to this, that the point was argued and gravely considered, but was not determined. In Campbell v. the Queen (11 Q.B. Rep. 799; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89), where the verdict was imperfect, the Queen's Bench decided that, upon an imperfect verdict in a case of felony, a venire de novo should be awarded. That was the order of the Court below. When the case came into the Court of Error, that very learned Judge, Baron Parke, considered the case much with the other Judges, and he—evidently, having The King v. Huggins before him, for he refers to it,—thought that the venire de novo was rightly awarded. He said, indeed, that it was not necessary to decide the question, which was left in grave doubt, whether a venire de novo would issue in a case of felony for a defective verdict; but he pointed out that in the case below there was a misawarding of the jury process, and referred to Gray v. the Queen. It was on this ground that the Court of error affirmed the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench below, that a venire de novo might issue in a case of felony; they did not indeed determine that it would lie upon an imperfect verdict, but they by no means reversed the judgment of the Court below on that point; and, looking at that case of Campbell v. the Queen (11 Q.B. 799; s. c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 89), there is a solemn decision of the Queen's Bench, not reversed or questioned, that a venire de novo will lie in a felony on an imperfect verdict. There is the opinion of the Exchequer Chamber that it was not necessary to confirm that, because there was error in the jury process; but there was no reversal, nor even a shaking of the decision below. I mention this to shew that there is no authority the other way. I quite concur with Mr. Justice Crampton in the Irish case, that the true principle is this, that where, after jury process has been issued, there has not been a verdict decisive either of guilt or innocence, in any case, whether it be from error in the Judge or the fault of the jury, or the Judge improperly discharging the jury, in all cases indifferently, the indictment has not been disposed of, and there ought to be a venire de novo. Consequently I think there was no doubt, after what took place at the first trial, that the case was properly tried a second time.

At the second trial the objection was made that the evidence of the fellow prisoner was received. It is enough to say that that objection does not appear upon the record, and could not be brought into error, for the improper reception of evidence cannot be made matter of error. So far as I can form an opinion on a matter not before us, I do not think she was an inadmissible witness; but she was within the category of accomplices. It would be right to tell the jury to look at her evidence with great caution, and to take into account that she was an accomplice; and I do not doubt that the Judge did carefully direct the jury as to that, and that there was ample confirmatory evidence. It would, no doubt, be much better that where an accomplice is a witness, the objection to that evidence should be made as slight as possible; and, therefore, I agree that it would, as a general rule, be judicious, where the accomplice is indicted with the prisoner, to dispose of the indictment by acquitting or convicting the accomplice before she is called as a witness, so that the temptation to strain the truth should be as slight as possible. But that, I think, is not an objection to the admissibility of the witness, but it only affects the degree of credit which should be given to her.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that our judgment must be for the Crown on all the errors assigned. Though it is a good general rule not to discharge a jury till a verdict is given, and though there are distinctions in the procedure with regard to felonies and misdemeanors, since in misdemeanors the common practice now is to allow a jury to separate, a practice which does not prevail in the case of a felony; yet I think no general rule of that sort can be absolutely binding without leading to manifest absurdity. Now if a Judge is to exercise no discretion, if he is bound, as was said in one of the old dicta, to carry the jury with him to the confines of the county, or rather all round the circuit, still there must be a time at which they must be discharged: and there is something so inexpressibly inconsistent with modern ideas in such a notion as that of a Judge carrying a jury with him to the confines of a county, and then turning them out if they are not agreed, that I apprehend no Judge would do anything so grotesquely absurd. I think the Judge must of necessity have a discretion, because, if not, the business could not go on, and Mr. Folkard appears to deny that what is every-day practice is correct. When a Judge has waited a time which in his opinion is abundantly sufficient, and finds it hopeless to expect that they will agree, what is he to do? As to the taking the jury to the confines of the county, I have disposed of that. Is there then any other course? He might wait till the end of the assizes. My Brother Blackburn has pointed out that in some cases, where the assizes last a fortnight, a monstrous absurdity would arise from that view, that they are to be kept there in confinement. Is there ever to be a period when the Judge is to exercise his discretion? I think there is; and if you admit that, it must be in the Judge's discretion to say when that period has arrived. Now the record states several reasons on which the Judge had adjudicated that it was necessary to discharge the jury, viz., that the jury had been out five hours, and unanimously declared they could not agree; that it was a very short time from the Lord's Day; and that all the business was finished at that place, and that the Judge was required by the Commission to be elsewhere on Monday. Under these circumstances it is impossible to say that the Judge ought to have taken the course pointed out by Mr. Folkard. For the reason given by my Lord, the keeping a jury till the Monday without meat, drink, or fire is perfectly incongruous with modern opinions, and it would be so startling a thing to do, that one cannot help thinking that the Judge must have a discretion not to wait till the jury are placed in circumstances affecting their health, and really endangering their lives.

Again, it is said the Judge might have taken the verdict on the Sunday. I think that too has been abundantly answered by my Lord. First, the prisoner must be present: the Judge cannot take it at his own chambers; he must come into court, and the prisoner must hear the verdict pronounced by the jury, and it must be recorded. All this goes to shew that it is not a ministerial, but a judicial act, and one of the highest importance. Can it then be done on a Sunday? Without absolutely deciding that it cannot, it is open to doubt, and I think it could not.

The next question is, can this discretion be reviewed in a Court of error? I think not. I am clearly of opinion, in the language used by Mr. Justice Coleridge, in The Queen v. Newton (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201; and 3 Car. & K. 85), where the Judges agreed, that the word "necessity," though it has got into the later text-writers as qualifying the old rule, must mean that the circumstances of the case must be such as in the opinion of the Judge to render it proper to exercise his judicial discretion. He must act upon them as they appear to him at the time. Suppose the illness of one of the jury: Mr. Folkard admits that that is a case of necessity. How is that to be reviewed in a Court of error? If the judge determines that it is necessary to discharge the jury because one of them is ill, and that is stated on the record, this Court cannot review it, because the actual fact of the necessity is found by the Judge. The absurdity of putting any other construction on his duty and the power of reviewing it may be shewn in this way. Suppose the Judge says, "I am too ill to proceed; I must discharge the jury." Is a Court of error to say that the Judge was not too ill? Conceive a plea that the Judge was too ill, and decided that he was too ill to continue the trial, and therefore discharged the jury, the question for a jury on the issue joined would be, whether the Judge was ill. Could anything be more indecent or absurd than that a jury should try that question, and whether his discretion was properly exercised?

Upon all these grounds, I think my Brother Channell exercised the most prudent discretion possible, under embarrassing circumstances, and that any other exercise of discretion would have been a matter of grave doubt. But, supposing he exercised his discretion erroneously, is that equivalent to a verdict? Did any one ever hear of such a plea till Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149)? I have never heard of any plea in bar to an indictment of felony, except those of autrefois acquit, autrefois convict, autrefois attain, and pardon. The only other pleas are to the jurisdiction. If it cannot be made out to be a case within one or other of those pleas, it cannot be taken advantage of by any mode of pleading. For all these reasons, I think the Judge has a discretion, and he must exercise it, if at all, publicly before the bar, and under the responsibility of his oath to parliament; and I do not think there is the least danger that any Judge would exercise it arbitrarily, negligently, or corruptly.

As to the course that was taken on the second trial, I entirely agree with my Lord. It did happen as an accident that the prisoner was on the second trial in a different position from that on the first. The accomplice had not been acquitted, nor had she pleaded guilty, and she therefore remained liable to be tried. That is a state of things which it is desirable to avoid. Though I do not think there was any objection in point of law to the admissibility of the evidence, I agree with my Lord's view as to the danger of that course of procedure, which offers so many temptations, especially to an ignorant witness, who is possibly to be tried for her own life, and who is permitted to give evidence, which ought always to be given without fear of any consequences of that sort. On all these grounds, I think our judgment should be for the Crown.

LUSH, J.—After the elaborate judgments given by my Brothers, if this had been an ordinary case, I should have simply stated my concurrence; but considering the importance of the question, I think it right that each Judge should state the grounds for the conclusions to which he comes. I entirely agree in the judgment of the rest of the Court. There are, in substance, two errors relied on by the prisoner. The one on which the greatest stress was laid, divested of all technicality, amounts to this: that the trial at which the prisoner was found guilty was void, that the jury had no jurisdiction to take her in charge or to find a verdict against her, and that the Judge had no jurisdiction to sentence her, because she had before been given in charge to another jury upon the same indictment, who had been discharged from giving a verdict under the circumstances stated on the record. It is alleged that to put a person on his trial a second time under those circumstances is in violation of the well-known fundamental maxim, that a man shall not be twice vexed for the same offence. Is the maxim applicable to civil as well as criminal proceedings? I think clearly there is no distinction between the two. Whenever the rule applies, it applies to both, and the law has furnished its own exposition of the meaning of the maxim by supplying the pleas in a criminal case of autrefois acquit or the converse; and, in a civil case, of judgment recovered, or the converse. The meaning of the rule is, that when the matter has gone to its end, the verdict or judgment shall be a bar to a second litigation upon the same matter. That is the meaning, so far as all the illustrations go, and so far as any dicta can be found in the books about it. Now it is sought to engraft upon that another meaning, that where the first proceedings have become abortive, they should still be a bar to the second proceedings in respect of the same cause. But there is no authority for that, not even one dictum to be found in the books, and it is certainly not within the reason and principle of the law. Even Coke, in that passage where he says that a jury once in charge of a prisoner cannot be discharged, does not intimate that if the jury should be discharged that discharge would be equivalent to an acquittal, and pleaded in bar by the prisoner. Nor is there anything in any of our books to favour that proposition, and it does not appear that that proposition ever was started until the pleas in Conway v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), which is the only authority for it. I must say, with great respect to the majority of the learned Judges in that case, that I cannot go along with them in their ruling; that it seems to be at variance with principle and authority, and I adhere, with the other members of the Court, to the far preferable judgment of Mr. Justice Crampton, and do no violence to the maxim by holding that when the first trial has become abortive, by any means whatever, the proceeding is not legally a bar to a second trial for the same offence. That is enough to dispose of this case, because, if it is not a legal bar, there is an end of the appeal by writ of error.

As that important matter has been much discussed, I desire shortly to state my own views on the question, whether a Judge has the power in a criminal case to discharge a jury where he is satisfied that they are unable and will be unable to agree in a unanimous verdict. If there were no authority one way or the other, it seems to me such a power is necessarily vested in a Judge, because while our law requires unanimity, there must be a time, if the jury continue to disagree, at which they must be discharged. I must say I have read with feelings of humiliation as a lawyer the dictum which has been imported into our text-books and regarded for so long as an authority, that if the jury do not agree the Judges may carry them round the circuit from town to town in a cart. That has been traced up to its source, and I am glad to find it rests on no foundation of judicial decision or actual practice. But even that dictum assumes that a time may come when the jury must be discharged; and so long as unanimity is required, and there is only a limited time for the performance of the duty, the Judge must of necessity have power to discharge the jury at some time or other. If so, who is to be the judge of what is the proper time? It can be no one but the Judge himself. Now it has been the practice in cases of necessity for the Judge to discharge the jury, and to do an act which he is necessarily invested with the power to do. If that be so, and the Judge has bona fide exercised that power, is it a discretion capable of being reviewed in a Court of Error? It seems to me that to say that it is a matter of discretion involves in itself the proposition that it cannot be reviewed in error. The province of a Court of Error is to correct that which is against the law; it cannot be against the law for the Judge to exercise a power which the law gives him. But, to go further, if it were allowable for us to review the decision at which the learned Judge arrived, and to inquire into the case, I agree with my Brother Mellor, that after the Judge had kept the Jury for what was in his judgment a sufficient time, and had exhausted argument and persuasion, and the jury having announced to him that they would be wholly unable to agree, I think that to keep them still in custody under the privations to which they would have been exposed, would be a coercion not justifiable in the present day on the principles on which justice ought to be administered. I think, therefore, that the Judge could not with propriety and prudence have done otherwise than to discharge the jury at that time.

The second ground of error was as to the admissibility of Harris on the second trial. That simply impeaches the propriety of the second verdict; as to that, it is enough to say that in my judgment she was admissible; but whether she was or was not, the admissibility of the evidence is not and cannot be raised on the record, and cannot therefore be treated as a ground of error. For these reasons, I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the Crown.

BLACKBURN, J.—after referring to Mansell v. the Queen (1 Dears. & B. 375; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 4)—Is it necessary for us to fix the day of execution?

COCKBURN, C.J. (after consulting with the rest of the Court, and the Master of the Crown Office)—Our judgment is, that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed, and that the keeper of Newgate gaol present here in Court do re-deliver the plaintiff in error, Charlotte Winsor, to the custody of the Sheriff of the county of Devon and keeper of Her Majesty's gaol for the same county, and that the Sheriff do execution upon the said Charlotte Winsor for the felony and murder, in pursuance of the judgment of the Court of Gaol Delivery for Devon, according to due form of law.¹

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 20, 1866.

THE OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF THE TOWNSHIPS OF HILTON AND WALKERFIELD, appellants, v. THE OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF THE TOWNSHIP OF BOWES AND OTHERS, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 137; L. R. 1 Q.B. 359; 14 L. T. 512; 14 W. R. 368.

Distinguished, R. v. Rhymney Railway, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. M.C. 75; L. R. 4 Q.B. 276; 17 W. R. 530 (Q.B.).

Poor-Rate—General Inclosure Acts—Revenue from Sale of Rights of Shooting—Severance of Right of Shooting over Land and Ownership of Part of the Soil of it.

COMMON RATES AND RATING.—The Manor of B. (except the mines, &c.) was conveyed to trustees in trust to hold the rents and profits for the benefit of the owners of ancient tenements within the manor. By a provisional order, confirmed by an inclosure act, a moor, part of the manor, was converted into a stinted pasture, part of which was allotted to the trustees and part to the owners of ancient tenements, according to the value of the property of each tenant. The provisional order contained the reservation "that the right and interest in all mines, &c., also the right of all manner of game upon the said lands, be not in any way affected or interfered with by this inclosure, and that all persons entitled to such mines, &c. and game having the same rights of entry and other rights as heretofore used and enjoyed":—Held, that the revenue derived by the trustees from the sale of licences to shoot on the moor was not ratable, as the effect of the provisional order was to sever the right of shooting from the soil, and to make it an incorporeal hereditament, unconnected with the ownership, either of that portion of the moor allotted to the trustees or that allotted to their cestuis que trust, the owners of ancient tenements.

CASE stated by Justices under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 43. s. 12.

In the reign of Charles the First the owners of lands and tenements within the manor of Bowes, in the North Riding of York, were customary tenants of the Crown. The manor of Bowes, with its moors, wastes and royalties, was then the property of the Crown, and consisted of portions of the manors or lordships of Middleham and Richmond, in the same county, or of one of them. The whole of the manor was sold by Charles the First to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London. In 1656 the then customary tenants purchased, through the negotiation of a Mr. Hanby, their several tenements of the corporation of London, and took a conveyance of them to trustees. The trustees subsequently conveyed to every customary tenant his land in fee, upon receiving his share of the purchase-money, calculated in the proportion which his customary yearly rent bore to the whole rents of the manor. At the same time the owners of ancient lands or tenements within the manor purchased, through the same negotiation, the manor and its moors, wastes and royalties, with some hereditaments which the Crown had held in its own possession, and the same were conveyed to Mr. Hanby by deed, dated the 4th of August, 1657. The following is a description of the parcels in this deed: "All that the lordship or manor of Bowes, with the rights, members and appurtenances thereof, in the said county of York, and all that toll, tollage or custom within the said manor of Bowes, with all its rights, members, liberties and appurtenances thereunto belonging and appertaining, in the said county of York, and all that common furnace, with the appurtenances situate and being in Bowes aforesaid, and all that close of ground and pasture, together with the cottage thereupon built, and all other the appurtenances thereunto belonging, situate, lying and being below the castle in Bowes aforesaid, which said tollage, custom, common furnace, close of ground and cottage, with the appurtenances, and a mill formerly granted unto the said Christopher Hanby, are, in the indenture now in recital, expressed to be charged and for ever to continue charged with and liable to the payment of the yearly fee-farm rent of 20*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* And also all wastes, waste ground, commons, heaths, furzes, moors, marshes, ways, void ground, woods, underwoods, streams, banks, rivers, waters, watercourses, fishings, fowlings, hawkings, huntings, mines of coal and lead, opened and not opened, quarries, reversions, rents, services, heriots, fines, amerciements, courts leet, courts baron, and view of frankpledge, and all other courts, liberties, perquisites and profits of the said courts, and of all other the premises, goods and chattels of felons and fugitives, felons of themselves, and of persons outlawed, attainted, condemned, and of persons put in exigent, waifs, estrays, deodands, estovers, common of estovers, fairs, markets, and profits of fairs and markets, courts of pie poudre, duties, customs, pickage, emoluments, immunities, freedoms and hereditaments whatsoever within the townships, parishes, hamlets, precincts, territories of Bowes, Boldron, Sleightholme, Stoneykeld and the Spittle, or elsewhere within the said county of York, to the said manor or lordship of Bowes belonging or appertaining, or accepted, reputed, known, placed, letten or enjoyed as part, parcel, member, appendant or appurtenant of or to the said manor or lordship, or reputed manor or lordship aforesaid."

(1) The Attorney-General afterwards granted his fiat for a writ of error to the Exchequer Chamber.

The grant contained an exception of fee-farm rents, and anything previously conveyed or contracted to be conveyed by the corporation.

By deed, dated the 1st of October, 1658, Mr. Hanby conveyed the manor, with the wastes, commons and hereditaments mentioned in the deed of 1657 (except the tollage, the castle, some closes of land and rights of pasture connected therewith, and all mines of lead and coal within the wastes and commons of the manor), to trustees; and by declaration of trust, dated the 29th of November, 1682, it was declared that "the trustees should and would from time to time, and at all times from thenceforth for ever permit and suffer every of the persons mentioned in the schedule thereunto annexed, their heirs and assigns, being tenants of the several messuages, lands and tenements in the said schedule contained, and then in their several and respective tenures and occupations, to have and convert to their own uses respectively a ratable share and proportion of the rents, issues and profits of the said manor and premises, and of every part and parcel thereof so granted as aforesaid, according to the proportion of the several ancient yearly rents of the said messuages, lands and tenements, and of the monies by them respectively paid for the purchase of the premises, which said rents and monies were set down, expressed and declared in the schedule thereunto annexed." A schedule was added to the trust deed, in which was set forth a list of owners, their ancient rents, and the amounts subscribed by each towards the general purchase.

In 1841 the then trustees filed a bill in Chancery to have the cestuis que trust ascertained, and the trusts carried into effect under the direction of the Court. In this suit it was established that the persons beneficially interested were, in fact, all the then owners of ancient tenements in the manor, and a schedule was made comprising their names, and the respective yearly values of their tenements; the final decretal order of the Court, made the 7th of November, 1853, being, that the revenues of the trusts (after satisfying current costs and charges) should be divided by the trustees triennially amongst the parties entitled, and that new trustees should be appointed. By deed, dated 1854, the manor, moors, wastes, royalties and hereditaments were conveyed to the new trustees, upon the trusts and for the purposes mentioned in the deed of the 29th of November, 1682, and the decrees of the 7th of November, 1853.

The trustees, individually, are owners of ancient lands in Bowes, and one of them is a resident inhabitant of the township.

Amongst the hereditaments conveyed to the trustees with the manor and royalties is a certain moor in the township of Bowes, referred to in the parcels of the deeds of 1657 and October and November, 1682, containing at present about 11,000 acres, but of somewhat greater extent at the time of those deeds. In 1766 an act of parliament was passed for enclosing Bowes Moor and several open fields or pastures in Bowes. Under this act a portion of the moor was divided and inclosed. By the same act the Commissioners had power, on request of the majority of commoners, to except out of the inclosure any part of the moor which might be considered not worth the expense of cultivation, and the excepted parts were to remain as if the act had not been made; and the 11,000 acres and upwards of present moor were excepted out of the inclosure, not being considered then capable of profitable cultivation.

Up to and subsequently to 1766, when this division and inclosure took place, the right to depasture upon the moor was vested in and exercised by the owners of ancient lands and tenements only, being the same persons as were entitled to the manorial rights under the trust deed of 1682; but, between that year (1766) and 1856, the owners of some of the allotment lands set out under the Inclosure Act had acquired rights of common on the moor by user.

This has given rise to two classes of owners, namely, owners of old land, which is ancient land, and owners of new land, which is an allotment under the inclosure of 1766, and owners of which acquired rights of common by user, as before mentioned. The difference between these classes is, that the old land is entitled to manorial rights and the benefit of the trusts of 1682, while the new land is entitled to rights of common only, and not to participation in the manorial rights or profits of the said trusts.

In 1856 a provisional order was made, by the Inclosure Commissioners, under the authority of the General Inclosure Acts, for converting the moor into a stinted or regulated pasture. This order contained the following reservation:

“ And that the right and interest in all mines, minerals, stones, and other substrata under the lands to be inclosed, and also the right of all manner of game upon the said lands, be not in any way affected or interfered with by this inclosure; and all persons entitled to such mines, minerals, substrata and game have the same rights of entry and other rights as heretofore used and enjoyed.”

This order was afterwards confirmed by the 20 Vict. c. v. Since the passing of the last-mentioned act each freeholder has had allotted to him thereunder a proportionate number of stints or pasture-gaits, according to the value of his property, and 361 stints were awarded to the trustees as lords in trust of the manor, which stints they hold in trust for the same class of freeholders as are entitled to the manorial rights and profits under the trust deed, and the profits derived from these stints form an item in the trustees' annual account of receipts and expenditure, hereinafter referred to. The remaining stints were awarded exclusively to the owners of ancient lands and tenements, except in the case of the owners of allotment lands, who had gained rights of common by user as before stated.

An annual meeting of the owners of stints or cattle-gaits is held on the first Monday in February, when five persons are appointed by them field-reeves, under the General Inclosure Act, and these field reeves have full power and authority to manage and regulate the moor so far as relates to the herbage; and in order to defray the expenses, they raise money by a rate levied under the powers of the General Inclosure Act. The field-reeves, among other duties, have to protect the moor from overstocking by stint-owners, and from trespasses by strangers' cattle. Another duty of the field-reeves is to look after and take care of the cattle on the moor, and for this purpose they hire shepherds, and, by arrangement between the trustees and field-reeves, these shepherds assist the gamekeepers and watchers to preserve the game on the moor, a yearly sum being allowed for that purpose by the trustees towards the expense. The trustees appoint a gamekeeper, who is paid by them exclusively, and whose time is entirely devoted throughout the year to the preservation of the game on the moor. They also employ night and other watchers when necessary. In the grouse season the trustees issue tickets, now charged 20*l.* each, which are licences to shoot, and enable the holders to sport on these moors for twenty days from the 12th of August, and then (after an intermission of the month of September) for ten days in October. [A copy of one of these tickets formed part of the case.] The trustees also let the stone and flag quarries on the moors, and publish a yearly account of their receipts and expenditure. A copy of the last yearly account is hereunto annexed, and is to be taken as part of the facts stated and awarded. The trustees divide the balance in their hands triennially amongst the parties entitled, who are the owners of ancient lands and tenements within the manor, the trustees themselves also participating, as owners. The revenue derived from the sale of these tickets varies. The following is a statement of receipts from tickets during the last six years—

1859	£708
1860	504
1861	630
1862	No licences issued, in consequence of disease and scarcity of birds.
1863	787
1864	800

The quarries are included in the valuation list, and rated to the relief of the poor, and so are the stints or pasture-gaits set out to freeholders; but the 361 stints awarded to the trustees do not appear to be included in the valuation list, or to be rated. The respondents, however, admit their rateability and that of the quarry herbage and cottage-garden rents, and agree that they may be included in the valuation list, and that the list may be amended accordingly.

Many of the owners of ancient lands entitled to participate in the income derived from the trusts occupy their own lands and stints; others let their lands to tenants, either together with, or separately from, the stints. But no sum is added, either in the rate or valuation list, to the ratable hereditaments of any owner or occupier in respect of such portion of the profits of the trust as arises from the licences to sport.

It was agreed that the act, 20 Vict. c. v., the Inclosure Act of 1766 and the General Inclosure Acts should be referred to and used so far as they related to the case.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, whether the profits shewn by the annexed account to be received and distributable by the trustees under the trust (and not already included in the valuation list, or agreed so to be included as before stated,) were ratable to the relief of the poor; and, if so, whether the rate should be upon the trustees, or on all or any of the owners or others, in proportion to their respective interests or to the increased value of their ratable hereditaments in the township, in consequence of such profits, or how otherwise; and the assessment committee of the Teesdale Union were to amend the valuation list of the ratable hereditaments in the said township of Bowes, or cause a supplemental or substituted valuation list of the rateable hereditaments in the said township to be made, in conformity with the decision of the Court.

Edward James, for the respondents.—Neither the trustees nor their cestuis que trust are liable to be rated in respect of the proceeds of licences to shoot on the moor. There is no tenement to which the privilege of shooting can be or is attached. The inclosure, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, vested the right to the surface of the moor in the different stint-owners. The right to the shooting was retained by the trustees as lords of the manor. This right is an incorporeal hereditament, and forms no part of the profits of the soil. The right is enjoyed by the trustees upon the soil of other persons: it is in the nature of an easement. Neither can it be contended that the right of shooting is attached to the land of any of the allottees of stinted pastures. These lands cannot be said to be enhanced in value by the right of shooting, because their occupiers have an interest in the proceeds of this right.

T. Jones appeared on behalf of the trustees of the manor of Bowes; but the Court decided against his right to be heard.

Manisty (G. Bruce with him), for the appellants.—The trustees ought to have been rated in respect of the rights of shooting annexed to their ownership of part of the moor. The effect of the order confirmed by the inclosure act was to vest the soil of the moor in a number of persons as tenants in common. The right of shooting upon each portion of the soil followed the ownership of it. The lord himself had no right to the game as a franchise; he enjoyed the right simply as owner of the waste. Now, the words of the reservation apply, and apply only, to a right of game as a franchise. In Ewart v. Graham (7 H.L. Cas. 331; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 88) it was held, that where the right of hunting, shooting, &c. had been reserved to the lord by a private inclosure act and award, that the proviso did not apply to mere manorial rights, but that the exclusive right of shooting was reserved to him. But there was proved to be no right of freewarren in the lord.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The stint-holders surely do not have the right to work the minerals in common with the lord?]

The right to lead, coal, &c. never passed to the trustees. In Greathead v. Morley (3 Man. & G. 139; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) C.P. 246), the words by which minerals were reserved were nearly the same as in the present case. In Bruce v. Helliwell (5 Hurl. & N. 609; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 297) the right of fowling was reserved to the lord by an inclosure act, but it was held that this gave him no more than he had formerly enjoyed—a right in respect of the ownership of the soil. Moreover, it must be considered that on the plainest principles the proceeds of this right of shooting which belong to the present owners of the soil in undivided moieties, and so enhance the value of the land, ought to be rated. The Poor Law Assessment Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, has confirmed the principle that the enhanced value of premises should be rated—The Overseers of Sunderland v. Sunderland Union (18 Com. B. Rep. (N.S.) 531; s. c. 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 121).

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that this right of shooting is not a matter in respect of which the persons in whom the right has vested, the trustees of the manor, are ratable. By what has taken place under the inclosure act, the wastes of the manor, over which the lord had a right of shooting, have become vested in the commoners, and a certain portion of these wastes has been allotted to the lord in respect of his territorial rights. But all this was done with the express reservation that the right of game should not be affected. This reservation was, I consider, a parliamentary or statutory conveyance of the right of shooting to the lord of the manor. It has been contended that the lord enjoys the right of shooting in common with the rest of the stint-owners. But it cannot have been intended that every one of these stint-owners should have the right of sporting over the moor, because this would nullify the reservation; which provides "that the right of all manner of game upon the said lands shall not be in any way affected or interfered with by this inclosure." For if, instead of confining the right to the trustees, the legislature were to extend it to each of the stint-owners, they would lessen the value of the right, and thereby invalidate the provisions of the trust deed. Mr. Manisty contended that the reservation was inserted in order to protect any right of freewarren or franchise which might have been enjoyed by the lord. But I do not think this was the case; the reservation is one which is almost always put into inclosure acts, by which rights of common are converted into rights of ownership, and a portion of the soil given to the lord of the manor. It is very common to reserve the right of shooting to the lord, and this is all I think was intended by the words relating to the right of game in the order. It is perfectly true that if the right of shooting belonged to the lord of the manor, and he exercised that right himself, or let it out to tenants, from whom he received rent, this would enlarge the rent and thereby indirectly increase the rate. But it is admitted that a right which is incorporeal or in gross is not assessable to the poor-rate. It might have been expected that a right which, when severed, diminishes the value of the soil, should have been made ratable by the legislature; but it is not for us to legislate. This, therefore, is the only question—Is the right of shooting an incorporeal hereditament? I think that the reservation leaves the right of shooting where it was before, and that it remains vested in the lord as it would in an ordinary freeholder who had conveyed away his land, reserving the right of shooting. It is therefore a right in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament, and not the subject of a rate.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is necessary, in order to make the occupier of premises ratable to the poor-rate, that he should be rated in respect of a subject-matter which would by itself be ratable. The subject-matter may, however, be enhanced by matter in some way connected with the occupation of it. Now, the question is, whether this valuable right of shooting is so connected with the occupation of any ratable object that it would enhance the occupation and be taken into account in estimating its value. This raises the whole question, whether the right of shooting has been severed from the rest of the property and become a right in gross. If the facts were that the right of shooting was still attached to the land and an attempt was made to diminish the ratable value of the soil by letting out the shooting to others, this would give rise to some nice questions of law, of which I need only say, that they do not arise here; as I think that the inclosure act had the effect of severing the right of shooting from the rest of the property. By the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118. s. 116, it is enacted, that "the right of soil of and in all land which shall be converted into regulated pastures shall, subject to the right of the lord of the manor to all or any of the mines, minerals, stones and other substrata, where the same shall be reserved to him under this act, and to the other rights given or reserved by this act and the award in the matter of such inclosure, be vested in the persons who under the directions and determinations of such award shall be the owners of the stints or rights of pasture therein, in proportion to the shares or aliquot parts which such stints shall be thereby declared liable to of any rate under this act, as tenants in common." Therefore as soon as the soil of the moor is converted into regulated stints it is vested in the stint-owners, and they as tenants in common would, under ordinary circumstances, have the right of shooting. But the act says that the soil is to vest subject to the rights given or reserved by the inclosure award, and we must look at the award in the case to see whether it has the effect of conveying the right of shooting to all the stint-owners. Now, I do not think that there is anything in the reservation to shew that it has this effect. The words are, "that the right and interest in all mines, &c. under the lands to be inclosed, and also the right of all manner of game upon the said lands, be not in any way affected or interfered with by this inclosure." These words seem to me to express an intention that the right to the game and the right to the minerals should be in no respect affected by the inclosure, but that they should remain exactly as they were. It goes on further: "and that all persons entitled to such mines, &c. and game have the same rights as heretofore used and enjoyed." These few lines seem to shew that difficulties with regard to the existing rights of the land were contemplated. The reservation accordingly gives notice to the allottees that the right of shooting is preserved to those who formerly enjoyed it. Mr. Manisty has referred us to cases upon the construction of inclosure acts, where it was decided that a reservation to the lord of the right of sporting extended only to the right which he had previously enjoyed, and did not create a new one. None of these cases, however, lay down any particular rule; they all proceeded on the language of the special act or award. The words in the reservation were, I think, used in a popular sense, and meant that the right of shooting should belong to its former owner, but by a different title. As to the other point, I think that the fact that the stint-holder receives from the trust-fund part of the proceeds of the sporting licences, cannot be said to enhance the value of his occupation so as to make him liable to an increased rate.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. A right of shooting is not in itself the subject of a rate. It can only be brought into account when it improves and enhances the value of the land to which it belongs. The question arises, Is this right incident and appurtenant to the ownership of the soil? This must depend on the construction of the inclosure act. Before the inclosure the right of shooting was incident to the ownership of the soil by the lord; but if the order embodied in the act had the effect of severing that right from the soil, it created an incorporeal hereditament. What, then, is the true meaning of the words in the order? As to this, I cannot entertain the least doubt. There was a common over which a large number of persons had rights, in whom it was intended to vest the surface of the soil, preserving to the lord some of his manorial and territorial rights. I cannot doubt that this was the intention of the order, and have less doubt that the words of the order are capable of effectuating that intention. The words of the reservation, although they are not perhaps technically framed, indicate that the lord is to have the right of shooting, notwithstanding the surface of the soil has passed to others. That being so, the right of shooting is severed from the ownership of the land, and ought not to increase the amount of the rate.

Judgment for the respondents.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 20, 1866.

MORRIS, appellant, v. JEFFRIES, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 143; L. R. 1 Q.B. 261; 13 L. T. 629; 14 W. R. 310.

Adopted, Lawrence v. King, [1868] E. R. A.; 37 L. J. M.C. 78; 9 B. & S. 325; L. R. 3 Q.B. 345; 18 L. T. 356; 16 W. R. 966 (Q.B.).

Turnpike-Road Acts—"Horses tethered or wandering, straying or lying about a Turnpike-Road"—3 Geo. 4. c. 126, s. 123. and 4 Geo. 4. c. 95. s. 75.

HIGHWAYS.—By the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 123. any horse, &c. found "tethered or wandering, straying or lying about" any turnpike-road (except parts of it leading through uninclosed common or waste ground) may be seized and impounded. Horses belonging to the respondent, whose carter was standing four or five yards from them, were seized, for the purpose of impounding them, while grazing on the side of a turnpike-road. The Justices found that the respondent's horses appeared to be under the control of his carter, who had charge of them:—Held, that these horses were not liable to be impounded within the meaning of the 4 Geo. 4. c. 95. s. 75.

CASE stated by Justices, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

An information having been preferred by Charles Morris (the appellant) against William Jeffries, of Northleach, in Gloucester (the respondent), charging that the respondent did, on the 30th of July, 1865, at the tithing of Eastington, in the parish of Northleach, unlawfully release four horses, the property of the said William Jeffries, which said four horses were then on the way to the pound or place, to wit, the common pound of the tithing of Eastington, in the parish of Northleach, being the place then provided for that purpose by the trustees of a certain turnpike-road there situate, called the Stow and Cirencester turnpike-road, for the purpose of being impounded, before the said four horses had been discharged by the due course of law, the same having been before then lawfully seized by the appellant and so impounded, in consequence of the four horses having been found lying and straying on the turnpike-road there, not being such part of the road as did lead or pass through or over any common or waste or uninclosed ground, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.¹

The case came on for hearing before the Justices, at the Northleach petty sessions-house, at Hampnett, in Gloucester, when the following evidence was given:

By the appellant.—I am employed by the surveyor of the turnpike-road leading from Stow-on-the-Wold to Cirencester to impound any cattle that are grazing in the turnpike-roads. On the 30th of July, 1865, I saw four horses on the sides of the turnpike-road leading from Stow-on-the-Wold to Cirencester. They were grazing on the herbage there. There was a man in charge of them. I drove them along for the purpose of impounding them. I brought them down the road. I had asked whose horses they were. The man who had charge of them said they belonged to William Jeffries. I met Jeffries and his son. Jeffries and his son ordered the carter to take them home. I said to the carter who had them in charge, I was going to take them to the pound. The horses were taken away from me.

Cross-examined.—When I took the horses the man said he was attending to them by his master's orders. They were grazing on the sides of the road. When Jeffries ordered them to be driven on, I said, I have done with them. The policeman was present. It was about seven o'clock in the morning.

William Reed.—On Sunday morning, the 30th of July last, Morris called upon me at the station. There were four horses standing in a hollow by the side of the turnpike-road, as spoken to by the last witness, grazing. There was a man standing about four or five yards from the horses, minding them. Morris

(1) By 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 123, any person or persons who shall release or attempt to release any cow, horse, ass, swine or other live stock or cattle, which shall be seized for the purpose of being impounded under the authority of this act, . . . or shall rescue or release, or attempt to rescue or release any distress or levy which shall be made under the authority of this act until or before such cow, horse, ass, swine or other live stock or cattle seized or so impounded, or such distress or levy so made shall be discharged by a due course of law, may be committed by a Justice for a period not exceeding three months.

By 4 Geo. 4. c. 95. s. 75, if any horse, ass, sheep, swine, or other beast or cattle of any kind shall at any time be found tethered or wandering, straying or lying about any turnpike-road, or any parts thereof (except on such parts of any road as lead or pass through or over any common or waste or uninclosed ground), it shall and may be lawful for any surveyor of the road where the same shall be found, or any other person or persons whomsoever, to seize and impound every such horse, &c. : provided always, that nothing in this clause shall be deemed, taken, or construed to extend to take away any right of pasturage which may exist on the sides of any turnpike-roads.

went between the horses and the man and drove them down the road towards the prison. The man and I followed behind. We met Mr. Jeffries and his son, &c. —(The rest of the evidence is omitted, as it related merely to the alleged rescue.)

The Justices thought that as the respondent's horses were with a keeper and appeared to be under the control of the respondent's carter, who had charge of them, they were not straying, and were, therefore, not liable to be seized by the appellant under 4 Geo. 4. c. 75. s. 95. They therefore dismissed the case, although they were of opinion that the practice of turning out loose horses on the sides of a turnpike-road for the purpose of grazing, though attended by a keeper, was an obstruction to the user of the road by the public, and that the herbage of the waste on the sides of the metalled road could not be lawfully grazed by the respondent's horses.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, whether there was sufficient evidence given before the Magistrates to enable them in point of law to convict the respondent of releasing the horses, which had been seized for the purpose of impounding them; and, secondly, whether the respondent's horses, being with a keeper on the turnpike-road and grazing the herbage on the sides of it, were liable to be seized and impounded under 4 Geo. 4. c. 95. s. 75; and if so, whether the respondent was liable to be convicted under 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 128. upon the information for releasing the horses so seized.

T. S. Pritchard, for the appellant.—The respondent ought to have been convicted. The horses which had been turned loose by him were an obstruction to the public way, so that it did not matter whether or not they were attended by a keeper.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The Magistrates must be taken to have found that the horses were under the control of the keeper; that is, that they were near enough to him, though loose, for the purpose of feeding.]

All the Justices have found is, that the horses had a keeper with them. In the 4 Geo. 4. c. 95. s. 75. the words are, "If any horse, &c., shall be found tethered or wandering, straying or lying about"; and the preceding section repeals the 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 122, where the words are, "Any horse wandering, straying or lying about," omitting the word tethered. It is submitted that this shews that it was the intention of the legislature to compel horses and cattle to keep within certain limits, and not to be allowed to obstruct the highway.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The legislature do not appear to have said that cattle shall not be allowed to pasture on a turnpike-road.]

The Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 74, contains the words, "straying, &c. without a keeper"; but the amended act, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 25, repeals that section, and omits the words "without a keeper."

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the Justices were right. They have found that the horses were under the control of the carter, and this fact takes the case out of the act.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Whether horses under the control of a keeper are within the act is a question of law. Whether these horses were under control is a question of fact, which has been decided by the Justices in the affirmative. It seems to me that all the act meant was, that horses should not be sent out on the highway without being properly guarded.

Judgment for the respondent.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 20, 1866.

WHITCHURCH, appellant, v. THE BOARD OF WORKS FOR THE FULHAM DISTRICT, respondents.35 L. J. M.C. 145; L. R. 1 Q.B. 233; 13 L. T. 631; 14 W. R. 277;
12 Jur. N.S. 353.Adopted, R. v. Hutchins, [1881] E. R. A.; 50 L. J. M.C. 35; 6 Q.B. D. 300; 44 L. T. 364; 29 W. R. 724 (C. A.).Metropolis Local Management Act—Paving New Street—Apportionment of Expenses—Division of Street into Sections—18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. s. 105. and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. ss. 77, 110-112.

LONDON.—By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. s. 105. and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 77, the costs of paving a new street, under the compulsory powers of the former act, are payable by the owners of the land and houses abutting upon and forming the street, and are to be apportioned by the vestry or district board of works. By the interpretation clause of the latter act, the expression "new street" is to include a part of any such street. A district board of works, after passing a resolution that a street should be paved, apportioned the expenses of paving a portion of it among the owners of property constituting such portion:—Held, that the apportionment was void, as being unequal and not within the powers of the act.

On the 23rd of August, 1864, a complaint was preferred in the Hammersmith Police Court, by the board of works for the Fulham district (the respondents), against James Whitchurch (the appellant), for neglecting, as owner of houses or building land abutting on Latymer Road, Hammersmith, a new street about to be paved by the respondents, to pay the sum of 97l. 16s., his share of the estimated expenses of such paving. The Magistrate made an order for payment by the appellant of the amount claimed, but stated the following CASE for the opinion of the Court, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.—

At the hearing of the complaint it was proved, on the part of the respondents, and admitted, that, under the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), the Fulham district is composed of the parish of St. Peter and St. Paul, Hammersmith, and that the respondents have been and are duly constituted, under the Metropolis Local Management Acts, the board of works for the Fulham district.

At a special meeting of the respondents, held on the 25th of March, 1863, it was resolved, "That the roads in the parish of Hammersmith, known as St. George's Road, Clifton Street Road, and Latymer Road, be repaired under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102.¹ That the surveyor be and is hereby instructed to estimate

(1) By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. s. 105, "In case the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made, or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which such street is situate or made, be desirous of having the same paved as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriageway and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement (such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board)," &c.

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. s. 77, "Where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by the 105th section of the firstly-recited act, have paved or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners the costs of such repairs of the same, and apportion it on the owners of each of the properties through which the roads go; and that it is referred to the general purposes committee to carry out this resolution under the advice of the solicitor, upon the condition that such costs be obtained from the owners of each property before the respective works are begun. But the committee is hereby empowered to repair either of such roads so soon as the estimated cost thereof shall have been received from the owner or owners."

Pursuant to this resolution, the surveyor made an estimate of the cost of the repairs of the whole of St. George's Road, Clifton Street Road, and Latymer Road, and also an apportionment of the same on the property to be charged therewith, together with apportionments on the owners of the property. This estimate and apportionment were submitted to the general purposes committee, and they resolved, on the 13th of October, 1863, that the board be recommended to have notice served on the owners of Latymer Road forthwith. Latymer Road lies between a piece of land belonging to the Latymer charity at one end, and Wormholt Scrubs at the other, and for the purposes of this case may be considered as divided into four sections, hereinafter referred to as sections 1, 2, 3. and 4. respectively.

Section 1. consists of that part of the road which lies between Clifton Street and the south side of the railway; Section 2. consists of that part of the road which lies between the railway and a public-house called The Latymer Arms. And the remaining portion of Latymer Road, namely, Section 3, consists of that part of the road which lies between the charity land and the point of junction by Clifton Street; and Section 4. consists of that part of the road which lies between the public-house called the Latymer Arms and Wormholt Scrubs.

Shortly after the passing of the last resolution, the surveyor of the respondents, made an apportionment of the costs of repairing a portion of the roads, which portion was called Section 1, amongst the owners of the property constituting such portion. This apportionment varied in some cases only in detail, according to correction of owners' names, but did not increase the assessment. At a meeting of the respondents, held on the 23rd of March, 1864, the surveyor attended, with his apportionment of the cost of repairing such portion called Section 2, of the Latymer Road, when it was resolved, "That the said apportionment be adopted, and that the clerk be and is hereby instructed to serve notices on the owners to pay their portion of the cost of paving such road, pursuant to such apportionment."

Pursuant to this last resolution, the clerk of the respondents caused notices to be served accordingly.

The appellant is one of these owners, and the following is a copy of the notice which was served upon him.

"Metropolis Local Management Act. To Mr. James Whitchurch, Lancaster Road, Kensington, owner of a plot of building land, situate southward of the Britannia public-house, on the west side of the Latymer Road, Hammersmith, and numbered 73. on the plan sent in. Whereas the street or way known as Latymer Road, Hammersmith, in the county of Middlesex, is not paved to the satisfaction of the board of works for the Fulham district, in the county aforesaid, and it appearing to the said board that the said street should be so paved, I hereby give you notice that the said board hereby require you, as such owner as aforesaid, to pay, within twenty-eight days from the day of the of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do; and any such costs or expenses, including the cost of paving at the points of intersection of streets, and all other incidental costs and charges, shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board, and shall be recoverable either before the work shall be commenced, or during its progress, or after its completion; . . . and any such amount shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of the premises either by action at law or in a summary manner before a Justice of the Peace, at the option of the vestry or board."

By section 110, "The said recited acts (including the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855) and this act shall be construed together as one act."

By section 112, "The expression 'new street' shall apply to and include all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out, and a part of any such street."

service of this notice, to me at the office (called Broadway House) of the said board, situate in the Broadway, Hammersmith, within the said district, the sum of 97l. 16s., being the amount of the estimated cost of and incident to such paving, payable by you as such owner; and further take notice, that if the said sum be not paid as aforesaid, proceedings will be taken for recovery thereof.

“ Dated this 2nd day of April, 1864.

“ The said plan is herewith produced, and may be seen at the office any day between the hours of ten and four o'clock.

(Signed) “ W. Lovely,

“ Clerk to the said Board.”

The appellant neglected to pay the sum demanded of him by the notice, or any part of it.

It was contended before the Magistrate that the appellant was not bound to pay the amount apportioned upon him, and for which he had been summoned, inasmuch as the resolution of the board of the 25th of March, 1863, authorized the repairing of the three roads therein mentioned, or either of them, as entire roads, and not in sections, and, therefore, that the expenses of paving the whole of the Latymer Road should have been estimated by the respondents' surveyor in one sum, and apportioned on all the owners of lands abutting on the road, and such apportionment should have been adopted by the board; whereas the surveyor had apportioned the respective amounts of his estimate by different apportionments, and upon the owners of property comprised respectively in separate sections of the road for which respectively the estimate was made, which partial apportionments were adopted by the board.

It was contended, on the part of the respondents, that they had, by their resolution of the 25th of March, 1863, determined on repairing the roads, or either of them, therein mentioned, and the Metropolis Local Management Acts had not prescribed any mode in which the estimate of the expenses of repairing roads and the apportionment of such expenses are to be made, or any period within which such repairs are to be completed; that the respondents or committees for general purposes, to whom the respondents had referred the carrying out of the repairs, had a general discretion vested in them to carry out the repairs as they considered best, either in sections, or as entire roads, and to adopt the apportionment by their surveyor either as a whole or separated, for the work determined to be done; and that the proceedings were regular, and that payment against the appellant ought to be enforced.

The Magistrate was of opinion that the respondents were right, and gave his determination against the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether it was necessary for the legal carrying out of the resolution of the respondents of the 25th of March, 1863, to repair the Latymer Road, that one estimate only of the expenses of paving the whole of the road should have been made by the respondents' surveyor, and that there should have been but one apportionment of those expenses among all the owners of property abutting on the whole of the road, or whether the respondents under the resolution were warranted in causing separate apportionments in respect of the separate and distinct sections of the road to be made from time to time.

If the Court should be of opinion that the resolution was duly carried out by the separate apportionments before mentioned, then the order upon the appellant for the payment of 97l. 16s. is to be confirmed; but if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, the order is to be quashed.

Keane (L. Kelly with him), for the respondents.—The order was good. The whole question turns on the meaning of the word “ apportion,” for by section 77. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, the costs of repairs, such as those in the present case, “ shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board.” It is submitted that these words give to the district board a reasonable discretion in apportioning the expenses. There is no complaint of any positive inequality in this rate of apportionment. What is really complained of is, that in exercising the discretion vested in them the respondents have come to a wrong decision.

[BLACKBURN, J.—What you have done is to apportion the expenses of paving among separate sections of the street instead of the whole of it. The two modes will probably work out a different result; but, whether they do or not, you have not followed the mode prescribed by the statute.]

The appellant is unable to shew that he has been prejudiced by the apportionment.

Karslake (Haselfoot with him) was not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the order is clearly bad. The Metropolis Local Management Acts empower a vestry or district board to make an order for paving or repairing any new street; and by the interpretation clause, the expression "new street" is to include any part of such street. The board may, therefore, make an order for paving an entire street or part of it; but when they come to apportion the expenses they must charge them upon the whole value of the land and houses comprised in the street. They cannot order a street to be paved, and then divide it into sections with the view of determining how the property in each section shall meet the expenses of paving in that particular section. To put a different construction on the act would be most unjust. Suppose that there were a street varying in character and in value throughout its entire length, would it not be unfair to take one portion and charge it with the expenses of its repairs? I cannot think that the legislature intended to place so grievous a burden upon the owners of property of inferior value. The order of the Magistrate must therefore be quashed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. When the district board have to consider whether or not a street ought to be paved, it is also their duty to consider how much of it requires paving. In this case the vestry came to the conclusion that the whole of Latymer Road should be paved as one street. Then the acts of parliament say, that when a street has been paved by the district board, the expenses of paving are to be apportioned among the owners of houses forming the street. But this does not mean that the board are to make their apportionment capriciously. What is meant is, that, having made an estimate, this estimate is to be equally divided among the owners of the whole property. The present case is very like that of a poor-rate on a parish where the rate would be bad, and not according to law if an equal portion of it were levied upon each hamlet in the parish. It would probably be found that the result of making this apportionment upon one particular section is different from what it would be if made upon the whole street; but whether this is the case or not, it is enough to say that the statutable authority has not been followed, and therefore the order must be quashed, but without costs (Mellor, J. was absent).

Order of Magistrate quashed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 24, 1866.

THE QUEEN, on the prosecution OF THE GUARDIANS OF THE HAYFIELD UNION, appellants, v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE GLOSSOP UNION, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 148; L. R. 1 Q.B. 227; 13 L. T. 672; 14 W. R. 329.

Distinguished, R. v. Abingdon Union, [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. M.C. 153; L. R. 5 Q.B. 406; 22 L. T. 603; 18 W. R. 981 (Q.B.). See, Knaresborough Union

E. R. A. [1866]—VOL. 2

62

v. Pateley Bridge Union, 1871, 25 L. T. 590 (Q.B.); Guildford Union v. St. Olave's Union, 1872, 25 L. T. 808 (Q.B.). Explained, R. v. St. Ives Guardians, [1872] E. R. A.; 41 L. J. M.C. 94; L. R. 7 Q.B. 467; 26 L. T. 893; 20 W. R. 657 (Q.B.). Distinguished, Holborn Guardians v. Chertsey Guardians, 1884-85, 14 Q.B. D. 289 (Q.B. D. Div.): reversed, 15 Q.B. D. 76 (C. A.). Referred to, R. v. Stepney Guardians, [1885] E. R. A.; 54 L. J. M.C. 12; 52 L. T. 959 (C. A.). See, Cambridge Union v. Edmonton Union, [1900] E. R. A.; 69 L. J. Q.B. 584; [1900] 2 Q.B. 111; 82 L. T. 495; 48 W. R. 559 (Q.B. D. Div.).

Pauper Lunatic—Removability—Break in Residence—Domestic Service—Animus Revertendi.

POOR LAW.—A pauper who had resided, sometimes with her mother and sometimes with her brother, in the parish of G, went to live out of the parish as a domestic servant for one month, on the terms that the service was to be continued at the end of that time if both mistress and servant agreed. She took her clothes with her, and left no property in G. She always intended to return to her mother's house in the event, which happened, of her mistress dismissing her at the end of the month, and did then return and resided in G. till she was removed to a lunatic asylum:—Held, that under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. s. 1. and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. s. 1, the residence in G. was broken by the month's absence, since while the pauper was so absent she had no residence in G. to which she could return.

On an appeal to the Derbyshire Quarter Sessions, by the guardians of the Hayfield Union, against an order of Justices, of the 26th of November, 1864, adjudging the settlement of Elizabeth Gantcliffe, a pauper lunatic, confined in the Derbyshire County Lunatic Asylum, to be in the township of Hayfield, in the said union, and ordering the said guardians to pay to the guardians of the Glossop Union, from which last-mentioned union the pauper was conveyed to the asylum, the costs of the examination and of conveyance and the costs of maintenance, the Quarter Sessions quashed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court on the following

CASE.

The pauper is a single woman, thirty-two years of age, and for the purposes of this case is to be taken to be legally settled in the township of Hayfield, in the Hayfield union. Since her father died, eight years ago, she has occasionally been out as a domestic servant, residing when not in service sometimes with her mother and sometimes with her brother, both of whom have for some years lived in the township of Glossop, in the Glossop Union. In January, 1861, the pauper had resided within the township of Glossop for three years preceding and upwards, and was then residing there with her mother, and continued so to do until September, 1861, when she went to live out of the township of Glossop, as a domestic servant, with a Mrs. Arnold, of Tintwistle, a township in the county of Chester, and in the union of Ashton-under-Lyne. Her arrangement with Mrs. Arnold was, that she should serve her a month upon trial, and that at the end of that time, if both parties agreed, she should continue in the service upon the usual terms of quitting at the expiration of a month's notice. to be given by either of them to the other.

When she went to Tintwistle she took with her some clothes in a bundle, and had no other clothes or property. When she went into the service and during the whole time of her service she intended to return to her mother's house at Glossop in the event, which happened, of her receiving notice to leave the service within the month. When she had been there a fortnight her mistress told her she would not suit her, and must leave at the end of the month. This the pauper accordingly did, and returned to her mother at Glossop, with whom she continued to reside until the 25th of February, 1864, when she was removed to the Derbyshire County Lunatic Asylum under a Magistrate's order, dated the day previous. The pauper lunatic was previously to and at the time of the making of the order of removal to the asylum chargeable to the township of Glossop, and remained in the asylum at the charge of the Glossop Union until after the making of the order of the 26th of November, 1864, and until the hearing of the appeal.

The Court of Quarter Sessions held (subject to the opinion of this Court) that the above circumstances did not constitute a break in the pauper's residence in the township of Glossop.

The question for the Court is, whether at the time of her being conveyed to the said asylum the pauper would have been exempt from removal to the parish, or township of her settlement, by reason of any provision in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66. and the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55. If this Court shall be of opinion that she would have been so exempt, the order of Quarter Sessions quashing the order appealed against is to be affirmed. If the Court shall be of a contrary opinion the order of Quarter Sessions is to be quashed, and the order appealed against is to be affirmed.

Bristowe and F. Stephen, for the respondents, in support of the order of Sessions.—The pauper, though physically absent, was constructively resident in Glossop. A young unmarried woman has no residence but at her mother's, when not out at service.

[MELLOR, J.—But she resided also at her brother's.]

This residence was equivalent to a hired lodging. Her absence in Tintwistle was merely for a temporary purpose, and there was clearly an animus revertendi, though she intended to stay if both parties suited, yet the engagement was more temporary than an ordinary hiring, for it was at first only for a month, and both parties were at liberty to renew at the end of that. This case is within the principle of The Queen v. Brighthelmstone (4 El. & B. 236; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 41), The Queen v. Tacolnstone (12 Q.B. Rep. 157; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 44), The Queen v. the Justices of Gloucestershire (15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 48), and is distinguishable from The Queen v. Stapleton (3 El. & B. 766; s. c. 22 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 102) and The Queen v. Stourbridge (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 179).

Hayes, Serj., and Cave, contra, were not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—In these cases nice points sometimes arise as to whether a person who is physically away from his residence is still constructively resident there; but when he has gone elsewhere for a permanent purpose, there is a break in the residence. Whenever a home is kept up to which he may return, then the degree of intention to return to it becomes a material point to consider, but it is quite an abuse of language to say that where no residence is kept up to which the pauper can return, there is no break in the residence. It would be monstrous to say that a person was constructively resident if, though he intends to return at some future time, there is no place to which he can return to reside.

MELLOR, J. and LUSH, J. concurred.

Order of Sessions quashed.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

Jan. 26, 1866.

HUMPHREY, appellant, v. BETHEL, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 150; 1 H. & R. 221; L. R. 1 C.P. 215; 13 L. T. 797; 14 W. R. 457; 12 Jur. N.S. 212.

Turnpike—Exemption from Toll—Yeomanry Cavalry—Volunteers—26 & 27 Vict. c. 65. s. 45.

ARMY AND NAVY. HIGHWAYS.—The exemption of volunteers from toll contained in section 45. of the Volunteer Act, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65, does not extend to members of the yeomanry cavalry, and therefore such members are not exempt if they drive instead of ride to the place of meeting of their corps.

CASE stated, for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, by the Justices of the county of Somerset, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The appellant was the keeper of a turnpike-gate in the parish of West Monkton, in the county of Somerset.

The respondent was a non-commissioned officer in the West Somerset regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry, which had been duly called up for eight days' permanent duty at Taunton. The respondent, on his way from his residence to Taunton, arrived at the said turnpike-gate in order to pass through the same, driving a gig drawn by one horse. The respondent was dressed in the uniform of the said regiment, and was accompanied only by another member of the same regiment also in uniform; the gig contained no other articles than their respective arms and accoutrements, and the respondent was then going on his direct road to the place appointed for, and on the day for, exercise of the said yeomanry cavalry corps; and the appellant did then and there demand and take toll, viz., the sum of 4½d. from the respondent in respect of the said gig and horse or one of them.

It was contended, on the part of the appellant, that the provisions of the Volunteer Act, 1863, did not apply to the yeomanry cavalry corps; and that the respondent was not a volunteer officer or soldier within the meaning of the said statute, and therefore not entitled to exemption from toll under its provisions.

The Justices, however, being of opinion that the respondent was entitled to exemption under the 45th section of the said Volunteer Act, 1863, convicted the appellant of unlawfully demanding and taking the said toll.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the Court was, whether the respondent, as such non-commissioned officer of yeomanry cavalry as aforesaid, was a volunteer officer or soldier within the meaning of the Volunteer Act, 1863, and entitled, therefore, to claim the benefit of the exemption contained in the 45th section of the said act.

H. T. Cole, for the appellant.—It is submitted that a non-commissioned officer of the yeomanry cavalry is not within the exemption from toll contained in the 45th section of the Volunteer Act, 1863 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 65). That section, which frees from toll "any officer of the volunteer force, or any volunteer or any non-commissioned officer of the volunteer permanent staff," does not apply to the yeomanry cavalry corps. The act throughout keeps the two services—the yeomanry and the volunteer force—quite distinct. Thus, in section 5, the officers of the volunteer force are to rank with officers of Her Majesty's regular and militia forces as the youngest of their respective ranks, and to rank with officers of the yeomanry force according to the rank and date of their respective commissions; and in the schedule of repealed enactments several acts relating to the corps of yeomanry and volunteers are stated to be repealed, so far as they relate to volunteers only, leaving such acts unrepealed as to the yeomanry corps. It is admitted that if the respondent be considered a volunteer, within the meaning of the act of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65, he would be exempt, though driving a gig; but if he be not such volunteer, then, as a member of the yeomanry cavalry, he would be only exempt from toll, under the General Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32, when riding his horse.

Raymond, for the respondent.—The respondent was entitled to exemption from toll. The 45th section of the act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 65, applies to all volunteers, in the large sense of that word, that is to say, all those who give their services to the country for military purposes without pay, as distinguished from paid soldiers. That section makes no such distinction as has been contended for on the part of the appellant; but says generally that “any volunteer” when going to the place appointed for exercise is to be free from toll. It is not an uncommon thing to find a section in an act of parliament which goes beyond the purview of the statute. It was held in Stephenson v. Taylor (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 145) that the exemption from toll contained in the General Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32, extends to a carriage used by any member of a corps of volunteer infantry for his own conveyance to or from the place of exercise. The statute of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 65. was intended to remove all doubts on the subject; and for that purpose it gave the exemption in general terms, without any distinction between the different classes of volunteers, whether yeomanry or otherwise.

H. T. Cole, in reply.—If the legislature had intended to have given the yeomanry cavalry the exemption now claimed, it would have done so, by either extending the exemption in the General Turnpike Act to members of such corps when going to the place of exercise in gigs or other vehicles, or by inserting the word “yeomanry” in the 45th section. As it is, the word “volunteer” in that section must be confined to the force generally known as the volunteer force, as distinguished from the yeomanry, and for which alone the legislature was providing when it passed the Volunteer Act in question.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction in this case must be reversed. The question is, whether a non-commissioned officer of yeomanry cavalry in uniform driving to the place of meeting of his corps is exempt from toll. I am of opinion that he is not exempt, because he was driving. The General Turnpike Act, after a number of exemptions of officers and soldiers in the regular service and militia, deals with persons belonging to any corps of yeomanry or volunteer cavalry, and as to such exempts any horse used and rode by such person in the uniform of his corps and having his arms, if going to or returning from a place appointed for inspection or review. The exemption is therefore for any horse used by him and rode by him. Nothing can be clearer than that the General Turnpike Act gives an exemption from toll to the yeomanry cavalry provided the horse in respect of which the exemption is claimed be ridden by the officer, and that the exemption under that act cannot be claimed by an officer driving the horse in a carriage. Then comes the Volunteer Act, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65, and in the 45th section of that act there is the most wide and absolute exemption from toll of horses and carriages employed in conveying any volunteer in uniform to any place of duty, and the respondent claimed the exemption given by that section as being a volunteer. In one sense a member of the yeomanry corps is a volunteer; but we have nothing to do with this, and have only to interpret the statute, and I am of opinion that all through the Volunteer Act the word “volunteer” is used in contradistinction to the yeomanry force. It seems to me, therefore, that the wide exemption for horses used for volunteers is not extended to yeomanry officers using their horses not by riding but by driving them. Consequently the toll-keeper was right in making the respondent pay toll.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add, that the 42 Geo. 3. c. 66. s. 9. contains an exemption from toll in favour of horses ridden by members of the yeomanry cavalry, but there is no exemption as to yeomanry infantry conveyed in carriages, so that the legislature expected that the infantry would walk and the cavalry corps ride. As regards the last act, the word "volunteer" must be there construed with reference only to what that act was dealing with.

KEATING, J. concurred.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I have no doubt that the statute 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65. did not intend to interfere with the regulations under which the yeomanry corps were previously exempt from toll. It seems to be admitted, on the part of the respondent, that the yeomanry corps are not included in any other part of this statute except the exempting clause; now although in some cases a clause in a statute may go beyond the general scope of the act, that is not so, I think, in this case.

Judgment for the appellant.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

Feb. 9, 1866.

STINSON, appellant, v. BROWNING, respondent.

85 L. J. M.C. 152; 1 H. & R. 263; L. R. 1 C.P. 321; 13 L. T. 799;
14 W. R. 395; 12 Jur. N.S. 262.

Not applied, Horner v. Cadman, [1886] E. R. A.; 55 L. J. M.C. 110; 54 L. T. 421; 34 W. R. 413 (Q.B.D. Div.). Followed, Hill v. Somerset, 1887, 51 J.P. 742 (Q.B.D. Div.).

Highway—Nuisance—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 72.—Making Fire on the side of a Highway.

HIGHWAYS.—Making a fire within fifty feet of the centre of a public carriage-way is not an offence within the 72nd section of the General Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, unless it be done to the injury of the highway, or to the injury, interruption or personal danger of persons travelling thereon.

CASE stated by Justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The appellant having appeared before two Justices for the county of Worcester to answer to an information, charging him with having unlawfully made a certain fire within fifty feet of the centre of a public carriageway or cartway, contrary to the form of the statute (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50), it was proved, on the part of the respondent, that on the 10th of November, 1865, and within fifty feet of the centre of a certain highway, in the parish of Alvechurch, in the county of Worcester, called Icknield Street, viz., about ten feet six inches from the centre of such highway, the said appellant did make a fire and afterwards throw an apronfull of wood thereon, the road at the point where the fire was made being only twenty-one feet wide. On cross-examination it was proved that the road was not much used by the public, and that the appellant when he made the fire opened a lid in the wall, and put the fire in the fire-hole and closed the lid, the fire-hole being attached to the appellant's premises. The business of a wheelwright, for which purpose the fire was used, had been carried on at the appellant's premises for twenty years or upwards.

It was contended by the appellant's attorney that the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 72, under which the proceedings were taken, had reference only to fires made by hawkers, higgles, gipsies, or other persons travelling on the road, and not to the case of a fire made on the side of the highway by any person for the purposes of his trade, as in the present case, in which it appeared from the evidence that the fire was made by the appellant for the purpose of carrying on the trade of a wheelwright, which he had followed at the same premises for many years.

The Justices adjudged that the appellant did on the day named in the information make a fire in a fire-hole attached to the outside of his premises for the purposes of his business of a wheelwright, within fifty feet of the centre of the said highway, called Icknield Street, and which fire was so exposed to the said highway as to be, in the opinion of the said Justices, a nuisance within the meaning of the said statute, and they convicted the appellant accordingly.

If the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that the making of the fire by the appellant was a nuisance within the statute, then the conviction was to be confirmed. But if the Court should be of a contrary opinion, then the information was to be quashed.

H. Matthews, for the appellant.—The question turns on the construction of the 72nd section of the Highway Act, the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. That section imposes a penalty, not exceeding 40s., for committing any of the various offences there specified. After describing those which relate to injuring the road, cutting down the banks, or defacing direction posts, &c., the section states the following offences: "or shall play at football or any other game on any part of the said highways to the annoyance of any passenger or passengers, or if any hawker, higgler, gipsy or other person travelling shall pitch any tent, booth, stall or stand, or encamp upon any part of any highway, or if any person shall make or assist in making any fire, or shall wantonly fire off any gun or pistol, or shall set fire to or wantonly let off or throw any squib, rocket, serpent, or other firework whatsoever within fifty feet of the centre of such carriageway or cartway, or bait or run for the purpose of baiting any bull upon or near any highway, or shall lay any timber, stone, hay, dung, manure, lime, soil, ashes, rubbish, or other matter or thing whatsoever upon such highway, to the injury of such highway, or to the injury, interruption or personal danger of any person travelling thereon." It is submitted that the act for doing which the appellant was convicted is not an offence within the meaning of the section, inasmuch as to constitute it such offence it must be done to the injury of the highway, or to the injury, interruption or danger of persons travelling thereon. These latter words of the section override that part which relates to the making fires, and therefore it is submitted that as it is not found by the Justices that the fire of the appellant caused any such injury to the highway or annoyance to the persons passing thereon, this conviction cannot be sustained. The Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4. c. 26. s. 121, expressly provides for the case of blacksmiths having windows fronting the road and not closing them in the evening so as to prevent the light shining on the road; but as section 72. of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. omits this, though it retains the offences mentioned in the act of George the Fourth, of making fires and throwing squibs, it would rather seem that the omission was an intentional one on the part of the legislature, and that it was intended to allow such fires to be made unless they injured the highway or annoyed passengers.

No one appeared for the respondent.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction ought to be reversed. I must, however, say, that the point which has been now made for the appellant was not brought before the Magistrates; the point which was there made was, that it was not a nuisance to make a fire on the side of a highway if used as this had been for twenty years for the purpose of carrying on a business; but that that part of the section relating to making a fire was to be read with what is there previously stated as to hawkers and gipsies. I am clearly of opinion that the Magistrates were right as to the point which was brought before them; but they were mistaken in assuming that because the offence of making a fire near a highway is not confined to a fire made by gipsies or other such persons, that therefore the appellant was guilty of the offence. The nuisance consists of making or assisting in making any fire within fifty feet of the centre of the carriageway; but I am satisfied that Mr. Matthews's construction is the true one, and that the nuisance is not such per se, but is a nuisance only if done to the injury of the highway or to the injury, interruption or personal danger of persons travelling thereon. There must be a fire made under such circumstances as to cause such injury or annoyance. It may be said that such reading of the section is to make it useless, and that it would equally be a nuisance not only to make a fire but to do any other thing, if it be done to the annoyance of persons passing on the highway; that may be true; but the answer is, we are dealing with a section which gives a summary mode of proceeding when certain circumstances occur, one of which is making a fire within fifty feet of the centre of a highway. I think this construction is the grammatical construction of the sentence; the section begins by dealing with direct injuries to the highway, such as cutting down the banks and destroying or defacing milestones, direction-posts or stones erected upon a highway, and it then proceeds, "or shall play at football or any other game on any part of the said highways, to the annoyance of any passenger." There evidently would be reason for not reading this part as to playing games with what has gone before. Then the section proceeds, "or if any hawker, higgler, gipsy or other person travelling shall pitch any tent," &c. "upon any part of any highway." That, I take it, is an absolute prohibition, because the next sentence which the qualifying words "to the injury or annoyance of any person travelling on the highway" override, introduces a new subject, for it says, "or if any person shall make," &c., and that is continued as one clause down to the qualifying words beginning "to the injury of such highway." Therefore, the Magistrates not having found according to such qualifying words that this fire was to the injury of the highway, or to the injury, interruption or danger of any person travelling thereon, their decision must be reversed, but without costs, as this point was not taken before them.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The section prohibits making a fire, wherever it may be, if within fifty feet of the centre of the carriageway; and therefore if there were no qualifying words applicable to it, the effect would be what the legislature could not reasonably be supposed to have meant. My Brother Willes has pointed out that the construction contended for by Mr. Matthews is both the natural and grammatical one, and therefore I have no difficulty in saying that this conviction must be reversed.

Conviction reversed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

April 29, 1865; Jan. 24, 1866,

THE QUEEN, on the prosecution of THE MELTON MOWBRAY DISTRICT HIGHWAY BOARD, v. THE INHABITANTS OF THE PARISH OF ASHBY FOLVILLE, in error.

35 L. J. M.C. 154; L. R. 1 Q.B. 213; 12 Jur. N.S. 520.

Highway—Liability of Parish to repair Roads in another Parish—Prescription.

HIGHWAYS.—To an indictment against the inhabitants of the parish of

A. for the non-repair of a highway within the parish, the inhabitants pleaded that the inhabitants of the parish of G. from time immemorial, and in consideration of levying and receiving certain rates in respect of certain lands in the parish of A. adjacent to the highway, had repaired and ought to repair the highway so often as there should be occasion. Replication, that the said agreement in the plea mentioned was duly determined by notice in that behalf:—Held, on demurrer to the replication, that the plea was bad, since the alleged consideration was insufficient to support the liability of the parish of G, because it could not be enforced, and because it could not from its nature be immemorial, and the repairs must have been done by the parish of G. by virtue of some arrangement between the two parishes, which might be, and had been, put an end to.

Semble—that in point of law, a parish cannot be liable by prescription to repair a highway situate in another parish.

Writ of error directing the Justices of the Peace of the county of Leicester to send up a certain record.

The record set out an indictment preferred by the Melton Mowbray district highway board, at the Leicestershire Quarter Sessions, against the inhabitants of the parish of Ashby Folville, for the non-repair of a certain part of a certain ancient highway leading from Gaddesby to Rotherby, the said part being within the parish of Ashby Folville.

Plea—as to a certain portion of the said part of the said highway, that the inhabitants of the parish of Gaddesby, from time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, and by reason and in consideration of levying and receiving from time to time certain rates and charges on and in respect of certain lands in the parish of Ashby adjacent to the said highway, have repaired and ought to repair the said portion of the said highway when and so often as there should be occasion, as the said inhabitants of Gaddesby hitherto were used and accustomed and still of right ought to do.

Replication—that the said agreement in the plea mentioned was put an end to and duly determined by notice in that behalf.

Demurrer to the replication and joinder.

The Court of Quarter Sessions gave judgment for the defendants.

In Easter Term, 1865, April 29,

Sills and Inglesant argued for the plaintiffs in error.—The plea is bad. In The King v. Ecclesfield (1 B. & Ald. 348), a plea by a parish that the inhabitants of a certain district within a township were immemorially liable to repair and had always repaired certain highways within the parish, was held good, but there the district on which the burden was thrown was within the parish which was indicted. In the present case, the burden is sought to be thrown on a parish totally distinct from the parish in which the highways are. The plea sets up what is in effect an agreement, and in 1 Ventris, 90, nota, it is said, “Every parish of common right ought to repair the highways, and no agreement with any person whatever can take off this charge which the law lays upon them.” See also The King v. Stoughton (2 Wms. Saund. 159, b, and notes). The King v. Liverpool (3 East, 86) is an authority that the parish which is bound to repair the highways cannot be discharged of their liability by any agreement with others. See also The King v. St. George’s, Hanover Square (3 Campb. 222). But even if such an agreement could discharge the parish, the consideration in the present plea is bad, for if Gaddesby refuses to repair, the surveyor has no means of compelling it. Gaddesby moreover has no means of compelling the payment of the rates. This plea is therefore within the principle of The King v. St. Giles’s, Cambridge (5 M. & S. 260), where the plea was held bad for want of a consideration. Lord Ellenborough there says, p. 265, “The principle of law I take to be clear, that the inhabitants of a parish are liable of common right to repair the highways lying within it, unless they can shew that this burden is cast upon some other persons, under an obligation equally durable with that which would have bound the parish, which obligation must arise in respect of some consideration of a nature as durable as the burden cast upon them." It is obvious that the consideration here is not as durable as the burden. In Dawson v. Willoughby (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 37) it was laid down, that "no such thing is known to the law as part of one parish being united to another parish for the repair of the highways," and that case is conclusive of the point in the present case.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—It was not intended to be so. We especially endeavoured to steer clear of it. The judgment goes on: "It may in some cases happen that a parish may be bound to repair the highways in a part of another parish, if a good and continuing consideration for such an obligation can be shewn."]

Here the consideration cannot continue for ever, because this agreement might be put an end to at any time. Moreover, such a custom as the plea alleges, to be good must be immemorial, but it cannot be immemorial, for the consideration is the levying of the rates, and the rates are levied by statute, passed long after the time of legal memory. The replication is a good answer to the plea, and the demurrer admits the truth of the fact that the agreement stated in the plea has been put an end to.

Merewether, for the defendants in error.—The plea is good. That an obligation may exist on one parish to repair the highways in another parish is expressly recognized in Dawson v. Willoughby (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 37). In The King v. St. Giles's, Cambridge (5 M. & S. 260) it was not contested that such an obligation would be good if supported by a good consideration. That such a consideration as the plea alleges may be valid The King v. Machynlleth (2 B. & C. 166) is an authority, and this is assumed in The King v. Ecclesfield (1 B. & Ald. 348) and in The King v. Eastrington (5 Ad. & E. 765). An indictment would lie against Gaddesby for non-repair of this highway. The plea is a prescriptive averment, and must necessarily state the consideration, and hence the confusion arising from wrongly calling it an agreement. The replication admits that Gaddesby has from time immemorial repaired and ought to repair the highway, and contains no traverse of the allegation as to the levying of rates, and the replication is therefore no answer to the plea. The replication ought to have traversed the prescription, as was done in The King v. Eastrington (5 Ad. & E. 765).

Sills, in reply.—The plea sets up a custom, not a prescription—The King v. Ecclesfield (1 B. & Ald. 348).

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Some of the cases cited have been decided on the ground of the want of an adequate consideration; but with regard to the major proposition, that the liability can exist in law upon one parish to repair the highways in another parish for a good consideration, that has never been expressly decided, and we think we ought not to decide it without taking time for further consideration.]

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—The judgment of the Court¹ was now read by—

COCKBURN, C.J.—This was a case arising on an indictment against the defendants, the parish of Ashby Folville, for non-repair of a highway. The defendants pleaded that, as to a portion of the highway in question, another parish, namely, the parish of Gaddesby, had from time immemorial "by reason and in consideration of levying and receiving from time to time certain rates and charges on and in respect of certain lands in the said parish of Ashby, adjacent to the said highway, repaired, and were bound to repair the said portion of the highway." To this plea there was a replication, that the agreement in the plea was put an end to and duly determined by notice in that behalf. To this replication there was a demurrer, and judgment having been given thereon for the defendants by the Court of Quarter Sessions, error was brought to this Court.

(1) Cockburn, C.J. and Shee, J.

The case was argued before my Brother Shee and myself, and after argument we took time to consider, in order to look into the cases, with a view of satisfying ourselves whether there was any sufficient authority for holding that a parish could be liable by prescription to repair a highway situate in another parish.

The only positive authority for the affirmative that we have been able to discover is to be found in the case of The King v. Ragley (12 Mod. 409), in the course of which the following passage occurs, apparently as having fallen from Holt, C.J.: "The parish of common right ought to repair their highway; but by prescription one parish may be bound to repair the way in another parish." The case is, however, so loosely reported that it is difficult to see to what point in the case this dictum can have had reference. No question arose as to the liability of a foreign parish to repair. The case was one in error from a judgment on an indictment at the Quarter Sessions for non-repair of a highway "between A. and B. in the parish of Ragley," the exceptions being that it did not appear in what parish the way was, as B. alone might be in the parish of Ragley; secondly, that the judgment was "extrahatur et levetur" instead of "levetur et extrahatur." On this latter exception the judgment was reversed. The dictum in question, therefore, if it ever fell from the Chief Justice, which, looking to the looseness of the report may be thought doubtful, was altogether unnecessary to the decision of the case. We do not think that this is an authority (nor have we succeeded in finding any other) which, as it seems to us, would justify us in holding that such a liability can exist. In The King v. Ecclesfield (1 B. & Ald. 348) it was held that where there are several townships in one parish, a particular township may by immemorial usage be liable to repair its own roads, as distinct from the parish at large. But this is obviously a very different thing from holding that a parish can be bound by prescription to repair roads not within its own ambit. In The King v. St. Giles's, Cambridge (5 M. & S. 260), it was not necessary to decide the point, as it was there held that, at all events, such a liability could not exist, except on good and sufficient consideration; and in that case no consideration appeared.

Now, it being the general law that each parish shall maintain its own highways, except where, by reason of tenure, some particular individual is bound to repair; and as it is certainly more consistent with general convenience that each parish shall maintain its own roads than that the repairs of the highways in one parish shall be done by the inhabitants of another; more especially as the machinery established by statute for insuring the repair of parish highways, and finding funds for that purpose, would not be applicable to repairs to be done by a foreign parish; we are strongly disposed to think that, in the absence of a direct decision on the point, we should not be warranted in holding that such a liability can possibly exist in point of law.

Upon further consideration, however, we think it unnecessary to decide the case on this ground. The case of The King v. St. Giles's, Cambridge (5 M. & S. 260) clearly establishes that a prescriptive liability could not arise except on sufficient consideration; and it appears to us that the consideration set forth in the defendants' plea is altogether insufficient to support the alleged liability of the parish of Gaddesby. The consideration is stated to be the levying and receiving by the latter parish of the rates and charges on and in respect of the lands in the parish of Ashby Folville adjacent to the said highway. But it is obvious that no such right can in law exist. The right to levy rates is the creature of statutory legislation. The rates can be levied and taken only by those to whom the statutory power is given. If the occupiers of this district were to refuse to pay the rates, it is plain that the parish of Gaddesby would have no power to compel payment. Neither would the parish of Ashby Folville be warranted in levying the rates with a view to handing them over to Gaddesby, inasmuch as the former parish would only be justified in making and levying highway rates in respect of such highways as it was bound to repair. We are of opinion, therefore, that the alleged consideration is illusory and bad, and that the liability of Gaddesby consequently fails.

Independently, however, of the objection arising on the insufficiency of the consideration, the nature of the consideration stated is of itself fatal to the case of the defendants. It is clear that if a parish can be liable to repair the roads in another parish, such liability must date beyond the time of legal memory. But the consideration must have been coeval with the liability, and must, therefore, also have existed from time immemorial. But here, the consideration being the right to levy rates and charges, inasmuch as the levying of highway rates arises from statutes passed long since the time of legal memory, it follows that the repair of this particular highway by the parish of Gaddesby must have been posterior to that time. And this, again, is fatal to the liability of Gaddesby, as relied on by the defendants.

The proper conclusion therefore is, we think, that the repair of this highway by the parish of Gaddesby resulted from some arrangement come to between these parishes from considerations of mutual convenience, and which, therefore, could at any time be put an end to by either; and it appears by the record that notice was given to put an end to it on the part of Gaddesby.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the plea is on the face of it bad, and that on the demurrer to the replication there should have been judgment for the Crown. The judgment of the Quarter Sessions must, therefore, be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Jan. 30, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. RAND AND OTHERS.

35 L. J. M.C. 157; L. R. 1 Q.B. 230.

Referred to, R. v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway, [1867] E. R. A.; 36 L. J. Q.B. 171; L. R. 2 Q.B. 336; 16 L. T. 173; 15 W. R. 676 (Q.B.); Hayman v. Governors of Rugby School, [1874] E. R. A.; 43 L. J. Ch. 834; 30 L. T. 217; 22 W. R. 587 (V.C.); R. v. Meyer, 1875, 1 Q.B. D. 173; 34 L. T. 247; 24 W. R. 392 (Q.B. D.). Adopted, R. v. Mayor of Deal, 1881, 45 L. T. 439; 30 W. R. 154 (Q.B. D.). See, R. v. Handsley, [1882] E. R. A.; 51 L. J. M.C. 137; 8 Q.B. D. 383; 30 W. R. 368 (Q.B.D. Div.). Referred to, R. v. Cumberland, JJ., 1888, 58 L. T. 491 (Q.B.D. Div.). Applied, R. v. Farrant, [1888] E. R. A.; 57 L. J. M.C. 17; 20 Q.B. D. 58; 57 L. T. 880; 36 W. R. 184 (Q.B.D. Div.); R. v. London County Council, 1894, 71 L. T. 638 (Q.B.D. Div.). Discussed, R. v. Sunderland, JJ., [1901] E. R. A.; 70 L. J. K.B. 946; [1901] 2 K.B. 357; 85 L. T. 183 (C. A.).

Justice of the Peace—Disqualifying Interest—Possibility of Bias.

MAGISTERIAL LAW.—Any direct pecuniary interest, however small, in the subject-matter of inquiry, disqualifies a Justice from acting judicially in the matter, but the mere possibility of bias in favour of one of the parties does not ipso facto avoid the Justice's decision.

The corporation of B. were the owners of waterworks, and were empowered by statute to take the water of certain streams without permission of the mill-owners on their obtaining a certificate of Justices that a certain reservoir was properly completed, of a given capacity, and filled with water. An application was made to Justices accordingly, which was opposed by the millowners; but, after due inquiry, the Justices granted the certificate. Two of the Justices were trustees of an hospital and friendly society respectively, each of which had lent money to the corporation on bonds charging the corporate fund. Neither of the Justices could by any possibility have any pecuniary interest in those bonds; but the security of their cestuis que trust would be improved by anything improving the borough fund, and the granting of the certificate would indirectly produce that effect, as increasing the value of the waterworks; there was no ground to doubt that the Justices had acted bona fide:—Held, that the Justices were not disqualified from acting in the granting of the certificate, and the Court refused a certiorari for the purpose of quashing it.

This was a rule calling on John Rand and four other Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the corporation of Bradford, to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up a certificate of the Justices, dated the 18th of April, 1865, certifying that a certain reservoir, authorized by the Bradford Waterworks Act, 1854, to be constructed near Doe Park, had been completed and filled with water, and was capable of containing 110,000,000 of gallons of water, for the purpose of quashing it, on the ground that the Justices or some of them were interested in the subject-matter.

The facts disclosed on the affidavits are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Mellish and Kemplay (June 15, 1865,) shewed cause.

[Cleasby, contra, intimated that he admitted that section 46. of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxix. cured all objection in point of interest in the Justices as ratepayers of the borough, but that he should rely on the one objection that two of the Justices were mortgagees of the borough fund, and that the security of the mortgagees would be improved by anything which tended to improve the corporation property, and that the granting the certificate would greatly increase the value of the waterworks.]

The Justices are only interested as bare trustees, and conceding that the certificate may have the effect suggested, such an interest will not ipso facto disqualify them as any direct pecuniary interest might—The Queen v. the Dean of Rochester (17 Q.B. Rep. 1; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Q.B. 467), Ex parte Pettitmangin, cited in The Queen v. Allan (4 Best & S. at p. 921; s. c. 33 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. at p. 99, n.).

Cleasby and Maule, in support of the rule.—Any interest or possibility of bias is sufficient to disqualify a Justice acting in a judicial inquiry—The Queen v. Hertfordshire Justices (6 Q.B. Rep. 753). It is impossible to say what influence their position as trustees may have had upon the Justices, without imputing to them any intention of acting otherwise than with strict impartiality.

Cur adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court¹ was now (Jan. 30) delivered by—

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, by the Bradford Waterworks Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxiv. s. 51), the waterworks company were empowered to take the water of certain streams; but it was enacted that they should not take those flowing into the Harden Beck without the assent of the mill-owners on that beck, until it had been certified by Justices that a reservoir called Doe Park

(1) Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, J. and Shee, J.

Reservoir had been completed and filled with water, the company being required to give ten days' notice to the mill-owners before applying for the certificate, to the intent that they might oppose the granting of it. By an act of the same session (17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxix. s. 12), the municipal corporation of Bradford were empowered to purchase the Bradford waterworks for the benefit of the borough, and they did so. Afterwards (in January, 1865) the municipal corporation duly gave notice of their intention to apply for the certificate of the Justices. It was opposed; but the Justices, after hearing evidence and making an elaborate inquiry, decided in favour of the corporation, and granted their certificate. A rule was obtained for a certiorari to bring up this certificate, to be quashed, on the ground that the Justices who granted it were interested. All the objections were disposed of during the argument except the following: On the affidavits on both sides it appeared that an hospital and a friendly society had invested part of their funds in bonds of the Bradford corporation, charging the borough fund,² and that those bonds were taken in the names of trustees, and that two of the Justices in question were—one of them amongst the trustees of the society, and the other amongst the trustees of the hospital. Neither of them had, nor by any possibility could have, any pecuniary beneficial interest in these bonds; but, no doubt, the security of their cestuis que trust would be improved by anything improving the borough fund, and anything improving the waterworks after they became the property of the corporation would produce that effect.

The question which we have to determine is, whether this disqualified the Justices from acting in what was certainly a judicial inquiry, and we think it does not. There is no doubt that any direct pecuniary interest, however small, in the subject of inquiry, does disqualify a person from acting as a Judge in the matter, and if by any possibility these gentlemen, though mere trustees, would have been liable to costs, or to other pecuniary loss or gain, in consequence of their being so, we should think the question different from what it is, for that might be held an interest. But the only way in which these facts could affect their impartiality would be that they might have a tendency to favour those for whom they were trustees, and that is an objection not in the nature of interest but of a challenge to the favour. Wherever there is a real likelihood that the Judge would from kindred or from any other cause have a bias in favour of one of the parties, it would be very wrong in him to act; and we are not to be understood to say that where there is a real bias of this sort this Court would not interfere; but in the present case there is no ground for doubting that the Justices acted perfectly bona fide; and the only question is, whether in strict law, under such circumstances, the certificate of such Justices is void, as it would be if they had a pecuniary interest; and we think that The Queen v. the Dean of Rochester (17 Q.B. Rep. 1; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 467) is an authority that circumstances from which a suspicion of favour may arise do not produce the same effect as a pecuniary interest. And as the decision in that case was on demurrer to a plea, and might have been taken into error, the authority is one on which we ought to act.

We think, therefore, that the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

(2) See the 17 & 18 Vict. c. cxxix. s. 8, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. clii. ss. 2, 4.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

Feb. 10, 1866.

ASH, appellant, v. LYNN, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 159; 7 B. & S. 255; L. R. 1 Q.B. 270; 14 L. T. 224; 14 W. R. 583;
12 Jur. N.S. 485.

Beer Licences—Sale of Beer at Public Regatta—35 Geo. 3. c. 113, ss. 1, 17.
—6 Geo. 4. c. 81. s. 11.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—The exemption in 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. s. 11. in favour of persons duly licensed to sell beer, &c., and carrying on their trade in booths, tents, or other places, within the limits of any lawful fair or public races, relates only to the excisable penalties imposed by the act, and does not protect any person so selling beer, &c., from his liabilities under 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. s. 1. for selling without a Magistrates' licence.

CASE stated by Justices of the borough of Devonport, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions before the Justices, the defendant (the now appellant) was convicted under the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. of having, on the 2nd of August, 1865, sold beer at a place called Richmond Walk, in the borough of Devonport, without being duly licensed; and was adjudged to pay the mitigated penalty of 10*l.*, with 12*s.* for costs.

At the hearing before the Justices the following were found to be the facts of the case: The defendant sold beer in a booth or tent at a place called Richmond Walk, in the borough of Devonport. He was a licensed victualler of the borough of Plymouth (a borough adjoining Devonport), having the usual Excise and Magistrates' licences to sell beer at his victualling-house, under the General Licensing Act, 9 Geo. 4. c. 61. He held no other licence. The sale of beer was on the occasion of a public regatta for boats in the harbour of Hamoaze, which is an estuary of the river Tamar, and took place in a booth or tent in the courtyard of a dwelling-house abutting on the harbour, in which harbour the public regatta was held. By the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. s. 1. a penalty of 20*l.* is imposed upon any person who shall "sell by retail, or permit ale, beer, or other excisable liquor to be sold by retail in his house, outhouse, yard, garden, orchard, or other places, without being duly licensed so to do." By section 17. nothing in the act shall extend to prohibit any person from selling ale or beer in booths or other places at the time and place of holding any lawful and accustomed fair.

By the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. s. 1. a duty is imposed on every person who shall be duly authorized by Justices to keep a common inn, alehouse, or victualling-house, and who "shall sell beer, cider or perry by retail to be drunk in his house or premises." By section 11. nothing in the act is to extend to prohibit any person or persons duly licensed to sell beer, cider or perry by retail to be drunk or consumed in his, her, or their house or premises, . . . to carry on his or her trade or business, for which he or she respectively shall be so licensed as aforesaid, in booths, tents or other places at the time and place, and within the limits of holding any lawful and accustomed fair, by virtue of any law or statute in that behalf, or any public races.

The appellant claimed to be exempt from the penalty referred to in the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113, on the ground that he came within the exemption of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81, the sale having taken place in a booth and at a place, as he contended, within the limits of public races, or where a public race was being held.

The Justices were of opinion that the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. was an Excise Act of which section 11. did not apply to the offence in question, such offence not being specified in the section; but being an offence under a separate and independent and subsisting statute, namely, 35 Geo. 3. c. 113, which was not an Excise Act, but a statute for police purposes, as appeared to be illustrated in the cases of The King v. Hanson (4 B. & Ald. 519), the King v. Drake (6 M. & S. 116), and Buckle v. Wrightson (34 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 43). Further, that should the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. apply to the offence laid under the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113, the appellant was still not within the exemption of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. s. 11. on two grounds: first, because "a regatta" was not a public race within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81, and, secondly, because the place of sale being on the land, although abutting on the water where the regatta was held, was not "within the limits of the place" where such regatta was held.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, whether s. 11. of 6 Geo. 4. c. 81, an act which, upon the authority of the cases referred to, the Justices thought might be termed an Excise Act, had any operation or force, except in relation to the offences referred to and contained in that statute. Secondly, whether the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113 (which the Justices, upon the authority before stated, considered an act for police purposes) was not independent of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. and still in force, and, therefore, whether the exemption from penalties under it was not confined, as stated in the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. s. 17, to fairs only. Thirdly, if 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. were inoperative and controlled by the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. s. 11, then whether a regatta could be legally deemed to be a "public race," within the meaning of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81; and if so, fourthly, whether the sale of beer having taken place at a booth in the courtyard of a dwelling-house abutting on the harbour of Hamoaze, where the boats raced, such sale could be said to have been made at a place within the limits of the so-called race.

T. J. Clark, for the respondent.—The conviction was right. The liability of the appellant must depend on the provisions of the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113, and the exemption which it confers (by section 17.) on sales at fairs does not apply to the present case. In The King v. Hanson (4 B. & Ald. 519) it was held that this statute imposes no duty and is not an Excise Act. Now the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81, the 11th section of which is relied upon by the appellants, is, as the preamble clearly shews, an act for regulating Excise licences. The case of The King v. Drake (6 M. & S. 116) shews that, in order to satisfy the words "duly licensed" in the 35 Geo. 3. c. 113, the licensee must be provided with two licences, first, a licence from the Magistrates to keep an alehouse or place of public resort, and, secondly, an Excise licence or authority for the sale of excisable articles. It is therefore submitted that the Excise licence will not excuse the appellant from obtaining a licence under the General Licensing Acts. In the next place, a regatta does not come under the term public races as employed in the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. The word "race" applies to something which takes place within a moderate space.

Lopes, for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong. The expression "duly licensed" in 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. and the later act, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33. means duly licensed according to the Excise Acts. The exemption as to races in section 11. of 6 Geo. 4. c. 81, although repealed by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 22. s. 12. is expressly re-enacted by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33. s. 21. The case of The King v. Hanson (4 B. & Ald. 519) has no application here, as it related merely to a question as to the right of appeal from a penal statute.

BLACKBURN, J.—Without deciding any other point, I am of opinion that the Magistrates were right, and that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The act 35 Geo. 3. c. 113. imposed a penalty on persons selling excisable liquors without being duly licensed; and it was decided by The King v. Hanson (4 B. & Ald. 519) that this act did not impose any duty, and is not an Excise law, and distinct from 48 Geo. 3. c. 143, the then existing act imposing a penalty on selling without an Excise licence. If, therefore, any person sells ale without a Magistrates' licence he is subject to a penalty. On the other hand, the 6 Geo. 4. c. 81. is an act passed solely for the purpose of placing duties upon the sale of excisable liquors. By section 10. of this act penalties are referred to which mean, as I take it, excisable penalties; and by section 11. nothing therein contained shall prohibit any person duly licensed for that purpose from carrying on his trade in booths or tents, or within the limits of any public fair. This means, that where anybody is provided with a Magistrates' licence the penalties just mentioned shall not prohibit him from carrying on his trade under certain conditions; and there is nothing in the section to enable him to dispense with such a licence, but only an exemption from additional penalties. Now, the appellant had a Magistrates' licence for Plymouth, but not for Devonport. The conviction must be affirmed.

MELLOR, J. concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

(Error from the Court of Queen's Bench.)

May, 4, 5, 7, 1866.

CHARLOTTE WINSOR, plaintiff in error, v. THE QUEEN,
*defendant in error.

35 L. J. M.C. 121; 7 B. & S. 490; L. R. 1 Q.B. 390; 14 L. T. 567; 14 W. R. 695; 10 Cox. C.C. 227; 12 Jur. N.S. 561: affirming, [1866] E. R. A. 2452; 6 B. & S. 143; L. R. 1 Q.B. 289; 14 L. T. 195; 14 W. R. 423; 10 Cox. C.C. 276; 12 Jur. N.S. 91 (Q.B.).

Referred to, Droege v. Stuart; The Karnak, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. Adm. 57; L. R. 2 P.C. 505; 21 L. T. 159; 17 W. R. 1028 (P.C.). Adopted, R. v. Murphy, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. P.C. 53; L. R. 2 P.C. 535; 21 L. T. 598; 17 W. R. 1047 (P.C.). Observations not applied, R. v. Bradlaugh, 1883, 15 Cox. C.C. 217 (Q.B. D.). Followed, R. v. Lewis, [1909] E. R. A.; 78 L. J. 77 B. 722; 100 L. T. 976 (C.C.A.).

Indictment for Murder—Discharge of Jury without Verdict—Judge's Discretionary Power—Discretion not reviewable—Discharge of Jury no Bar to subsequent Trial—Evidence—Admissibility of Prisoner jointly indicted—Court of Error—Refreshment to Jury after Retirement—Sunday Dies Juridicus.

CRIMINAL LAW.—A jury sworn and charged with a prisoner may be discharged without giving a verdict by the presiding Judge, if a "necessity," that is, a high degree of need, for such discharge is made evident to the mind of the Judge. He alone is to decide when the "necessity" for such discharge is made evident to his mind, and his decision is not subject to review by any legal tribunal. The statement upon the record by the Judge of the result of such a decision is sufficient to establish the lawfulness of the discharge. Such a discharge, even if it be an improper exercise of discretion on the part of the Judge, is not a legal bar to a subsequent trial of the prisoner for the same offence, either upon the same or upon a fresh indictment.

If two prisoners be jointly indicted, and one alone be given in charge to the jury, the other is an admissible witness (though neither acquitted nor convicted, and though a nolle prosequi is not entered) upon the trial of the prisoner with whom the jury are charged.

A record shewed that on the trial of W. and H., who were jointly indicted for murder, the jury, after five hours' deliberation, at five minutes before midnight on Saturday night, were discharged by the Judge without giving a verdict, and without the consent of the prisoner or of the prosecution, on the ground that he, the Judge, for certain reasons, which he stated, "decided that it was necessary to discharge the jury." W. was afterwards given in charge to another jury, and tried alone upon the same indictment, when a verdict of guilty was returned, and judgment of death recorded; H. being admitted as a witness against her without having been either acquitted or convicted upon the indictment, and a nolle prosequi not having been entered:—Held,—affirming the judgment of the Court below (35 L. J. M.C. 121),—on a writ of error, that there was no error on the record. Conway and Lynch v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149) overruled.

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., Byles, J., Pigott, B. and Montague Smith, J.

Held, also, that the question of the admissibility of H. did not arise upon the record; but that if it had arisen, and if the question of her admissibility could have been inquired into, she was admissible.

Semble, per Pollock, C.B. and Martin, B., that a Judge has the power, in his discretion, to give refreshments to a jury, either before or after they have retired to consider their verdict.

This case came before the Court on a writ of error directed to the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The record set forth a writ of error directing the Justices of oyer and terminer for the county of Devon, and Justices assigned to deliver the gaol of that county, to send up a certain record, and the return to that writ, and then stated that at the general session of oyer and terminer held at Exeter for the county of Devon on the 13th of March, 1865, before Crompton, J., and Channell, B., the grand jury presented that Charlotte Winsor and Mary Ann Harris, on the 14th of February, 1865, at the parish of St. Mary Church in Devon, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did kill and murder Thomas Edwin Gibson Harris, against the peace, &c., and afterwards, at the same general session of gaol delivery, on the 17th of March ensuing, Winsor and Harris severally pleaded not guilty to that indictment, and a jury were impanelled and sworn to speak the truth concerning the premises in the indictment specified. That after the trial had proceeded for some hours, at a late hour on Friday the Court adjourned till the next day; and that on that day, the 18th of March, the trial proceeded, and the case on the part of the Crown and of the prisoners respectively having been concluded, the Justices charged the jury, who, after the conclusion of the charge, having been then kept together for the space of thirty-two hours or thereabouts during the trial, retired from the bar to consult upon their verdict, and after the further space of five hours, that is to say, at five minutes before midnight in the night of Saturday the 18th of March, the jury returned to the bar and (in the words of the record),

"Being asked by the Court here whether they have agreed upon their verdict, they say that they have not agreed, and unanimously declare that, after full consideration, they are wholly unable to agree, and cannot agree, upon any verdict to be given by them on the premises aforesaid; and therefore, because it manifestly appears to the Court here that the said jurors, after five hours' deliberation and such consideration amongst themselves, have not agreed upon any verdict, and declare that they have not agreed and are unable to agree upon any verdict to be given upon the premises aforesaid, and because all other the business of the said session of gaol delivery is finished and completed, and because the Lord's Day is immediately at hand, and because the said Justices of our said Lady the Queen are required by her letters patent to proceed to and be in Her county of Cornwall on Monday now next ensuing, in the execution of the said letters patent, and because it manifestly appears to the Justices here that, for the reasons and causes aforesaid, it is necessary to discharge the said jury, and the said Justices do decide and adjudge that it is necessary to discharge the said jury, and they do on the ground of such necessity as aforesaid altogether discharge the said jury from giving any verdict upon the premises, and they are accordingly discharged from giving their verdict upon the premises aforesaid. And the said C. Winsor and M. A. Harris are by the Justices here forthwith committed to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Devon, in the common gaol of the county safely to be kept until they shall be thence delivered in due course of law; and thereupon the sheriff is commanded that he have the bodies of the said C. Winsor and M. A. Harris at the next general session of general gaol delivery to be holden for the county of Devon, to answer the premises in the said indictment above specified and charged on them."

The record then stated that at the said next gaol delivery for Devon, held at Exeter on the 26th of July, and duly adjourned till the 28th of July, before Willes, J., and Keating, J. (the commission being set out at length), "come as well the said C. Winsor and M. A. Harris, under the custody of the said sheriff, as the said clerk of assize; and the said clerk of assize, who prosecutes for the Queen, prays of the Court that the said C. Winsor may be tried upon the said indictment separate and apart from the said M. A. Harris, and that the said M. A. Harris may be examined and give evidence on behalf of the Queen upon the trial of the said C. Winsor for the felony and murder aforesaid. And the Court doth allow the said prayer of the said clerk of assize. Therefore let the jury thereupon here immediately come," &c.

The record then stated that Winsor's counsel then and there objected, that in consequence of the proceedings on the said indictment above set forth, Winsor could not be legally tried, and must be discharged from the indictment and inquisition; that the Justices overruled the objection and ordered Winsor's trial to proceed; that the jury were duly impanelled and sworn "to speak the truth concerning the premises in the said indictment specified"; that Winsor's trial was adjourned to the next day, the 29th of July, on which day it proceeded, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty against Winsor, who was thereupon sentenced to be hanged.

The record then set out the assignment of errors by Winsor on the 24th of November, 1865, the joinder in error, and that the Court of Queen's Bench, on the 24th of January, 1866, held that there was no error on the record, and affirmed the judgment of the Court below.

Error was, on the 24th of April, 1866, assigned by Winsor on thirty grounds, which were in substance: that on the first trial the jury were discharged without having agreed to a verdict; and this without the consent of Winsor or of the prosecutor; without any fatality or illness or misconduct having occurred in Winsor, in the jury, or the Justices; without the jury being in any way incapacitated from giving a verdict; without any sufficient legal cause: and that the jury ought to have been directed to return a verdict of not guilty, or judgment should have been pronounced for Winsor, or Winsor should have been discharged from further prosecution on the indictment: that Winsor was wrongly deprived of her right to a verdict or a termination of the first trial: that there was time to conclude the first trial before the Justices were required to be in Bodmin: that the trial might have been concluded though all the other business was finished, and the Lord's Day was immediately at hand: that the first trial was wrongly adjourned to the next gaol delivery: that there was a discontinuance: that the second trial and the verdict, judgment, and all the proceedings were illegal and void because of the above facts, and because the first trial was discontinued and the prosecutor and witnesses were discharged of their recognizances and not bound over to give evidence at the next or any other gaol delivery, and because the jury were not sworn "to well and truly try, and true deliverance make, and true verdict give according to the evidence;" and because Winsor's life was in peril on the first trial for the same murder as that for which she was tried on the second; and because Harris was admitted as approver and gave evidence on the second trial, she having been jointly indicted with Winsor, and given in charge to the jury on the first trial, and neither acquitted nor convicted, and a nolle prosequi not having been entered. Joinder in error.

Folkard (Collins with him) (May 4, 5) travelled through the same authorities as those cited in the Court below, and followed the same line of argument, which are set out fully at p. 123, 35 L. J. M.C. He also said—In the expression in Co. Litt. 227, b, "a jury sworn and charged in case of life or member cannot be discharged by the Court or any other, but they ought to give a verdict," "charged" means, "charged by the summing up of the Judge," and when this is done, the Judge has no power to discharge the jury—Kelham's Trans. of Britton, p. 41, chap. 4. sect. 15.

[Per Curiam.—"Charged" means, "given in charge to the jury."]

There can be no new trial in cases of felony—1 Chit. Cr. L. 630, 653. A verdict, to be good, must be that of all the twelve, and therefore, if one dissents, a verdict of not guilty ought to be recorded—Hale, Hist. C.L., 6th edit., by Runnington, p. 348. King Alfred hanged Cadwine, a Judge, because when three of the jury would not find Hackwy guilty, he changed those three for three others, who joined with the nine to condemn him—Pettingal's Inquiry into the Use of Juries, p. 166; Ælfredi Magni Vita, a Spelman, lib. 2. p. 83. Freberne, a Judge, was also hanged because he condemned Harpin to death when the jurors doubted—Pettingal, 167; Horne's Mirrour of Justices, p. 239.

[BYLES, J.—Not only those; he hanged forty-four Justices in one year for their false judgment.]

It is not necessary to have unanimity in order to take a verdict of not guilty—Hobart, p. 262. The verdict in Rudd's case (1 Leach, C.C. 133) is quoted as the model of a verdict, "according to the evidence before us, not guilty"; see also 2 Reeve's Hist., p. 270, Kelham's Britton, p. 44, citing Fletu, p. 53, f. 41.¹ The verdict in Winsor's first trial might have been taken in another county—Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3. c. 12. s. 2; 2 Vin. Abr. pp. 123, 124, citing 2 Inst. 26; 3 Vin. 192.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—It is only by statute that commissions can be opened on the day after the appointed day—3 Geo. 4. c. 10. This was passed in consequence of Mr. Baron Garrow arriving late at Gloucester, and opening the commission after midnight. The 13 & 14 Vict. c. 25. enables Queen's counsel and others to act as Judges of assize.]

It was contended below, by the Crown, that the Judge had no power to give the jury refreshment after retirement, but there are numerous authorities that it may be done—2 Hale, P.C. 306. The only restriction is, that they may not eat without the licence of the Court, or at the expense of one of the parties—Doct. and Stud. c. 52, Mounson v. West (Leon. 1st part, p. 133). Duncombe's Trials per Pais, 251, 3 Burn's Just. 971, edit. 1845, 1 Chit. Cr. L. 632, Jenkyns's Rep. 187.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—Whatever is necessary to restore a jurymen to health can be given,—food, physic or an operation; whatever medical assistance is necessary, of course, ought to be given,—brandy-and-water or anything else.]

In 3 Car. & K. 90, it is said, that in Morris v. Davies, Mr. Justice Gaselee gave a jury, after eight hours' retirement, sandwiches and wine.

[MARTIN, B.—I do not suppose the Solicitor General would dispute the power of the Judge to give refreshment. It is simply a matter of common sense.]

There is no reason or authority to prevent a Judge from sitting on Sunday and taking a verdict.

[MARTIN, B.—7 Comyns's Dig. tit. 'Temps.' (B.) 3, says, "The entry of

(1) We have given these authorities, as they were referred to in argument, but they seem to have no immediate bearing upon the case.

any judgment upon record on Sunday is void²”; and, “before stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 7. all ministerial acts upon a Sunday were lawful, though not judicial.” I remember very well Mr. Justice Littledale taking a verdict on Sunday at York. I forget whether it was by consent or not, but he was very decided on the point.]

Comyn adds, that judgment given on Sunday in an inferior Court is void, implying that in a superior it is good. The Exchequer used to sit on Sunday—2 Mad. Hist. Exch. (2nd edit.), 5. Parliament has constantly sat on Sunday, and did so on the 18th of February in this session, to pass the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act for Ireland, 29 Vict. c. 1. In Morris v. Davies (3 Car. & P. 429) Mr. Justice Gaselee heard counsel argue and discharged the jury on Sunday; and in Newton's case (3 Car. & K. 91) Mr. Baron Rolfe and Mr. Justice Erle received the evidence of a medical man and discharged the jury on Sunday.

[ERLE, C.J.—I am decidedly of opinion that the acts we did in that case, whether right or wrong, were judicial, not ministerial. MARTIN, B.—The record here does not say that the Judges thought they could not take a verdict on the Sunday.]

The exercise of a Judge's discretion can be reviewed—The King v. Fowler (4 B. & Ald. 273), Shea v. the Queen (12 Ir. Law Rep. 153), Powell v. Sonnet (3 Bing. 381; s. c. 1 Bligh. N.S. 545), and Tinkler v. Rowland (4 Ad. & E. 868; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) K.B. 269). But the Judge has no discretionary power to discharge the jury at all—Hardy's case (24 How. St. Tr. 199), The King v. Woolf (1 Chit. Rep. 401). If the jury are discharged, the prisoner cannot be tried again. At the Spring Assize of this year, on the Western Circuit, Mr. Justice Byles discharged a jury who could not agree, and also discharged the prisoner.

[BYLES, J.—I had great doubts whether the case ought to have gone to the jury at all, but I expressly said to the prisoner, “You are liable to be indicted again.”]

No one can be twice in peril for the same offence, and twice in “peril” means twice in peril of a verdict—Bird's case (2 Den. C.C. 124, 216). The admission of Harris's evidence is a ground of error.

[MARTIN, B.—After the decision of the Court below, the fifteen Judges met, and were unanimously of opinion that her evidence was legally admissible. ERLE, C.J.—We all think that the point you are now arguing is not raised on this record, for it is not there stated as a fact that Harris was examined as a witness. Our judgment on that point would therefore be extra-judicial and inoperative.]

Then I allege diminution of the record, and move for a certiorari to amend the record and state that fact, and I have affidavits that Harris was in fact examined as a witness for the Crown, without having been either acquitted or convicted, or a nolle prosequi entered. I move on the authority of 9 Vin. Abr. 553.

[ERLE, C.J.—(After consultation with the rest of the Bench)—Whatever point you argued in the Court below we will allow you to argue here, but the record will not be amended.]

Harris was an approver, and her evidence was inadmissible, and error lies for it—9 Vin. Abr. 474, 10 Ibid. 30. s. 24. Rudd's case (1 Leach, C.C. 133) 3 Inst. 129, defines an approver as one “not disabled to accuse.” Harris was disabled, because the indictment was not disposed of as regards her—1 Bac. Abr. tit. ‘Approver,’ p. 262, 4 Com. Dig. tit. ‘Justices,’ (v. 1.) p. 637, Kelham's Britton, pp. 39, 161, 2 Hale, P.C. 228, 229, 3 Russell on Crimes,

(2) Comyns quotes, as authority for this, 1 Sir W. Jones's Rep. 156, Bedoe v. Alpe, where it appears that the proposition is only a dictum. Error being assigned “en scaccario que un information en le Court de Exchequer fuit exhibit en Court 13 Octobris, et ceo fuit Sunday et nemy dies juridicus,” the decision of Hulton and Jones was, “Que fuit bon, car coment il ne fuit dies juridicus pur agarde aucun judicial process, ou pur faire entree de aucun judgment de recorde, tamen il fuit bon pur accepter de information sur special ley.”

4th edit. p. 626. In The Queen v. Lyons (9 Car. & P. 555) and The Queen v. Jackson (6 Cox. C.C. 525), and The Queen v. O'Donnell (7 Ibid. 337), in Ireland, and The King v. Rowland (Ry. & M. 401), the Judges all condemned the practice of calling such a witness without first taking an acquittal or conviction.

The Solicitor General (Sir R. P. Collier) (Hannen with him) appeared for the Crown.

[ERLE, C.J.—If we wish to hear the Solicitor General, we will do so on Monday. At present we expect at that time to give judgment.]

ERLE, C.J.— (May 7), now read the judgment of the Court.—In this case it has been contended on behalf of the prisoner, the plaintiff in error, that the conviction appearing on the record is erroneous, because it appears thereon that the prisoner had been given in charge to another jury at a former assize, who had come to no verdict, and had been discharged by order of the Judge, for reasons which were alleged to be insufficient in law. But we are of opinion that there is no error apparent on this record, and we have come to this conclusion notwithstanding the arguments and authorities adduced by the learned counsel for the prisoner, because we find that the power of a Judge to discharge a jury before verdict has been the subject of numerous adjudications, and that all the important arguments and authorities to which our attention has been now directed have been frequently collected and carefully discussed in those cases, and we consider that the strength of reasoning and the weight of authority lead us clearly to the conclusion above stated; and we refer to the cases of The King v. Kinlock (Foster, C.C. 25), and Conway and Lynch v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), and Newton's case (13 Q.B. Rep. 716; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 201), and The Queen v. Davison (2 Fost. & F. 250), and The Queen v. Charlesworth (1 Best & S. 460; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25), and Winsor v. the Queen (6 B. & S. 143; s. c. 35 L. J. M.C. 121) in the Court below, as containing all that can be said on either side. We think it unnecessary again to go through an examination of these authorities and arguments, upon which the judgment in the cases referred to were rested, all, with one exception, leading to the conclusion above stated. The exception is the decision in the case of Conway and Lynch (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), where the judgment of the majority was adverse to that conclusion. But Mr. Justice Crampton dissented from the rest of the Court, and gave a judgment³ remarkable for sound reasoning and deep research, by which the propositions of law, on which he relied, appear to us to be clearly established. We consider that the doubts which have caused this repeated litigation originate in the unlimited terms used by Sir Edward Coke in stating what he considered to be the rule of the common law relating to the discharge of juries before verdict, viz., "A jury sworn and charged in case of life or member cannot be discharged by the Court or any other, but they ought to give their verdict." This rule, if taken literally, seems to command the confinement of the jury till death if they do not agree, and to avoid any such consequence an exception was introduced in practice, which Blackstone (4 Bl. Com. 360) has described by the words, "except in cases of evident necessity."

But the exception so expressed has given rise to further doubts, because "necessity" is an equivocal word, meaning either irresistible compulsion or a high degree of need. Those who have been interested in objecting to a discharge of a jury before verdict, have disputed whether the discharge was necessary in the stricter sense of the word. The same dispute about the meaning of the word "necessity" in the exception to this rule is the source of the main questions raised upon this writ of error, and they are in substance answered when we decide on the meaning of that word in the exception to the rule, and apply that meaning to the facts appearing on this record.

(3) See the judgment reported in note to The Queen v. Charlesworth, 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 46.

We may assume it to be clear that the discharge of the jury before verdict may be lawful at some times and under some circumstances. Then, with reference to the facts on this record, we hold that the Judge at the first trial had by law power to discharge the jury before verdict, when a high degree of need for such discharge was made evident to his mind from the facts which he had ascertained. We cannot define the degree of need without some standard for comparison; we cannot approach nearer to precision than by describing the degree as a high degree, such as in the wider sense of the word might be denoted by necessity.

We hold, further, that the Judge alone had to decide when the "necessity," in this senses of the word, for the discharge of the jury was made evident to him, and his decision thereon is not made subject to review by any legal tribunal. It was his duty to exercise his discretion both in ascertaining the relevant facts and in determining their effect in making the necessity for the discharge evident to himself. The lawfulness of the discharge depended upon the result of this exercise of his discretion, and the statement of that result upon the record is, in our judgment, sufficient to establish that the order for the discharge in question was lawfully made, and that the subsequent proceedings to trial and conviction are not rendered erroneous thereby.

If the discharge of the jury was lawful all the grounds of error founded on the assumption that it was unlawful fail. The contention that the prisoner has a right after a trial has begun and he has been given in charge to the jury to demand that the trial should be continued till a verdict should be given, or, if that cannot be done, that he should be acquitted and discharged, cannot be maintained. There is no reason or authority for supporting such a contention; the failure of some of the jury to agree with the rest is distinct from a doubt entertained by the whole jury. If the notion could prevail that the failure of the jury to agree entitled the prisoner to an acquittal, it, of course, follows that any single jurymen by refusing to agree could insure an acquittal. Even if it was assumed, for the sake of argument, that the statement on the record led the Judges of the Court of error to the opinion that the order for the discharge in question was an improper exercise of discretion on the part of the Judge who tried the case, still we should hold that such a discharge was no legal bar to a second trial either on the same or on a fresh indictment. The only pleas known to the law founded upon a former trial are pleas of a former conviction, or a former acquittal, for the same offence; but if the former trial has been abortive without a verdict, there has been neither a conviction nor an acquittal, and the plea could not be proved. That which would be matter of plea to a fresh indictment would be ground of error upon a second trial on the same indictment. As far as relates to the former abortive trial, nothing which then took place could be ground of error on the second trial on the same indictment, unless it would have been a bar by way of plea to a new indictment for the same offence. All the authorities are concurrent to this effect, with the single exception of the case of Conway and Lynch v. the Queen (7 Ir. Law Rep. 149), and we have before given our opinion on that case. On these grounds we decide that there is no error apparent on this record, and the judgment of the Court below is affirmed.

The learned counsel contended, further, that there was error in admitting Mary Harris as a witness on the second trial, in which the prisoner Winsor was alone given in charge to the jury. To this it was answered that it did not appear on the record that Mary Harris was examined as a witness on the trial. The learned counsel then proposed to move for a certiorari, in order that a statement of this fact might be added to the record, but we refused to grant the application, being of opinion that Mary Harris was an admissible witness under the circumstances here stated; so that if the fact were added to the record, and if the admissibility of the witness could be inquired into in this Court of error, the alleged ground of error could not be sustained.

ERLE, C.J. then said—Our judgment is, that the judgment of the Court below be affirmed, and that the keeper of Newgate gaol do re-deliver the plaintiff in error, Charlotte Winsor, to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Devon, and keeper of Her Majesty's gaol for the said county.*

Judgment affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

April 28, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. PARSONS.*

35 L. J. M.C. 167; L. R. 1 C.C. 24; 14 L. T. 450; 14 W. R. 662;
10 Cox. C.C. 248; 12 Jur. N.S. 486.

Evidence—Certificate of Conviction—Signature—Deputy Clerk of the Peace for a Borough—“Officer having the Custody of the Records of the Court”—5 Geo. 4. c. 84. s. 24.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 113. s. 1.

CRIMINAL LAW. MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.—A certificate of a conviction, made at the Quarter Sessions for a borough, within the Municipal Corporations Act, purporting to be signed by a person described thereon as deputy clerk of the peace of the said borough, and having the custody of the records of the said Quarter Sessions, is admissible in evidence, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113. s. 1, as purporting to be made by an officer having the custody of the records of the Court where the conviction was made, within the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84. s. 24, although the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76.) gave no power to appoint a deputy clerk of the peace for a borough within that act.

Per Bramwell, B.—A person de facto filling an office, carrying with it the custody of the records of the court, may lawfully give such a certificate, although he may not hold such office de jure.

The prisoner was tried, before Pigott, B., at Worcester, and convicted for being at large at St. Helen's, in Worcester, without lawful excuse, before the expiration of the term of fifteen years, for which term he had been transported, at the Birmingham Quarter Sessions, on the 24th of October, 1854. The learned Judge respited judgment, and reserved the following

CASE.

The certificate of conviction was produced, signed by T. R. T. Hodgson, and with the following statement appended to the signature: “Deputy clerk of the peace for the said borough of Birmingham, and having the custody of the records of the said Quarter Sessions.” The witness who produced the certificate proved “that one Edmunds is the clerk of the peace, but that he does not usually act, and that Mr. Hodgson is the person who acts as clerk of the Court in court.” It was further proved by John Suckling, who is a member of the town council of Birmingham, that he was present at a meeting of the town council for the borough of Birmingham when Mr. Hodgson was elected deputy clerk of the peace of the borough; that he believed Mr. Edmunds sanctioned that election, and that Birmingham is a borough under the Municipal Corporations Act. (A copy of the certificate is appended hereto.) Mr. Griffiths, on behalf of the prisoner, objected to the certificate on two

(4) The sentence of death was afterwards commuted by Her Majesty to a sentence of penal servitude for life.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B., Byles, J., Pigott, B. and Lush, J.

grounds: first, that it was not signed by the proper officer (under 5 Geo. 4. c. 84. s. 24); and, secondly, that it ought to shew on the face of it that there were Justices of the Peace present at the Quarter Sessions where the conviction took place. If the Court should be of opinion that either of these objections are valid, then a verdict of acquittal is to be entered; if the Court think that neither objection is good the conviction is to stand.

(Copy conviction referred to.)

“ Borough of Birmingham, county of Warwick.

“ These are to certify that at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace of our Lady the Queen, holden at Birmingham, in and for the borough of Birmingham, on Friday the 20th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1854, John Parsons, late of the borough aforesaid, was in due form of law tried and convicted on a certain indictment against him, for that he, on the 11th day of December, A.D. 1853, the dwelling-house of Benjamin Woodhouse feloniously did break and enter, and two dresses, two shawls, one yard of silk, ten handkerchiefs, four waistcoats, one pair of trowsers, ten shirts, one scarf and one top coat, of the goods and chattels of the said Benjamin Woodhouse, then and there feloniously did steal, and was thereupon ordered by the Court to be transported for the term of fifteen years. Given under my hand, this 6th day of March, 1866.

“ T. R. T. Hodgson,

Deputy clerk of the peace for the said borough of Birmingham and having the custody of the records of the said Quarter Sessions.”

Harington, for the prisoner.—The certificate of this conviction is made evidence by the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84. s. 24, which enacts, “ that the clerk of the Court or other officer having the custody of the records of the Court, where such sentence or order of transportation or banishment shall have been passed or made, shall, at the request of any person on His Majesty’s behalf, make out and give a certificate in writing signed by him containing the effect and substance only (omitting the formal part of every indictment and conviction of such offender, and of the sentence or order for his or her transportation, &c.), . . . which certificate shall be sufficient evidence of the conviction and sentence or order for transportation, &c. of such offender. And every such certificate, if made by the clerk or officer of any court in Great Britain, shall be received in evidence upon proof of the signature and official character of the person signing the same.” But the deputy clerk of the peace of the borough of Birmingham is not the clerk or officer of the Court of the Quarter Sessions for the borough. The clerk of the peace for the Quarter Sessions for the borough is appointed under the 103rd section of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 76), which enacts, among other things, that “ the council of every such borough shall appoint a fit person to be clerk of the peace during his good behaviour.” This statute gives no power to appoint a deputy, whilst it is only by express enactment that a deputy can be appointed by a judicial officer (Com. Dig. tit. ‘ Officer,’ 2). Thus the clerk of the peace in counties only appoints his deputy by virtue of the express enactment of 37 Hen. 8. c. 1. s. 3. Then, not being deputy clerk of the peace, there is no evidence that there is any other office of the Court which he can hold so as to give him the custody of the records of the Court.

[Underdown referred to the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113. s. 1, which enacts, “ That whenever, by any act now in force, or hereafter to be in force, any certificate, official or public document, . . . or any certified copy of any document, . . . or of any other proceeding, shall be receivable in evidence of any particular in any court of justice, or before any legal tribunal, . . . or in any judicial proceeding, the same shall respectively be admitted in evidence, provided they respectively purport to be sealed or impressed with a stamp, or sealed and signed, or signed alone, as required, or impressed with a stamp and signed as directed by the respective acts made or to be hereafter made, without any proof of the seal or stamp, where a seal or stamp is necessary, or of the signature, or of the official character of the person appearing to have signed the same, and without any proof thereof, in every case in which the original record could have been received in evidence."']

The person affixing his signature must, however, appear to bear a lawful official character; but there cannot lawfully be a deputy clerk of the peace for the borough, nor does there appear to be any office giving the custody of the records of the Court, other than the clerk of the peace.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—There is sufficient prima facie evidence that the person signing had the custody of the records. BYLES, J.—If the clerk of the peace be ill, or become lunatic, and unable to take the custody of the records for a time, what is to be done in the interim? BRAMWELL, B.—The records must be proved after the common law by production of the records themselves, &c.]

Secondly. There ought to have been evidence that there were Justices present at the Quarter Sessions when the conviction took place; it might have been, for aught that appears, a Court held by the Mayor, in the absence of the Recorder, under the 106th section of the Municipal Corporations Act.¹

[PIGOTT, B.—The words of that section give no power to the Mayor to hold any Court; he is, in the contingency there provided for, to "open the said Court, and to adjourn over the holding of the same." And in the proviso he is expressly prohibited from sitting as a Judge to try prisoners, &c.]

Underdown, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are of opinion, that if the person signing a certificate of conviction, under the 5 Geo. 4. c. 84. s. 24, has the custody of the records of the Court lawfully he is the proper person to give such certificate, and by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113. s. 1, if such purports to be signed by such a person, it is made evidence without more. There is nothing in the other point.

BRAMWELL, B.—I only wish to add, on the first point, that it is proved here that there is a de facto officer of the Court, who is called the deputy clerk of the peace for the borough. Therefore, without saying that any person who merely gets possession of the records of the Court could sign such a certificate as this, so as to give it validity, yet I think that here the person signing has a sufficient official character within the meaning of the later act cited. I think that when there is a de facto office, and, by virtue of that office, the person filling it has the custody of the records, he may give the certificate without holding the office also de jure.

Conviction affirmed.

(1) Sect. 106 : "In the absence of the recorder and deputy recorder the mayor shall be authorized and required, at the proper times appointed for the holding of such Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace in and for such borough, to open the said Court, and to adjourn over the holding of the same, and to respite all recognizances conditioned for appearing at the same, until such further day as such mayor then and there, and so from time to time, shall cause to be proclaimed: provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this act contained shall authorize or require any such mayor to sit as a Judge of the said Court for the trial of offenders, or to do any other act in the character of a Judge of such Court, save only in opening and adjourning the same, and respiting the said recognizances in manner aforesaid."

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

April 28, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. CARPENTER.*

35 L. J. M.C. 169; L. R. 1 C.C. 29; 14 L. T. 572; 14 W. R. 773;
10 Cox C.C. 246; 12 Jur. N.S. 380.

Referred to, R. v. Smallman, [1897] E. R. A.; 66 L. J. Q.B. 82; [1897]
1 Q.B. 4; 75 L. T. 394; 45 W. R. 249 (C.C.R.).

"Embezzlement"—Assistant Overseer—Clerk or Servant—Indictment.

CRIMINAL LAW. POOR LAW.—An assistant overseer of a parish, elected by the parishioners in vestry under the 59 Geo. 3. c. 12. s. 7, who fix his duties and salary, is to be deemed the servant of the inhabitants of the parish, and to receive money collected by him for the poor-rate levied upon the parish as such servant, and may be so described in an indictment for embezzling such money so received.

The prisoner, Robert Edward Carpenter, was indicted, before Montague Smith, J., at Gloucester, for embezzlement, and found guilty, his Lordship reserving the following

CASE.

The prisoner had been assistant overseer of the poor of the parish of Oddington. He was charged in one count of the indictment as servant of John Sedgely, Henry Collett, George Foden and Henry Lyne. These persons were the churchwardens and overseers of the said parish. In another count he was alleged to be the servant of the churchwardens and overseers of the said parish. In another count he was alleged to be the servant of the inhabitants of the said parish.

The prisoner was nominated and elected assistant overseer by the inhabitants in vestry, who determined that the duties to be executed and performed by him should be "all such duties as appertain to and are incident to the office of an overseer," and fixed the yearly salary of 3*l.* 10*s.* for the execution of the office.

On the 30th of March, 1865, an order of two Justices, reciting the election of the vestry, appointed the prisoner to the said office. The original order, which contains a schedule of instructions, will be in court, and may be referred to.¹ The prisoner, in point of fact, performed all the duties of overseer of the poor of the parish, and the churchwardens and overseers did not interfere with him. It was proved that the prisoner fraudulently appropriated to his own use monies which he had received for poor-rate, by virtue of his office as assistant overseer, under certain rates made for the relief of the poor of the said parish.

The question reserved was, whether the prisoner was clerk or servant to any of the persons mentioned in the indictment, and received and took into his possession the monies embezzled as such clerk or servant, within the meaning of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 67.

Harington, for the prosecution.—The assistant overseer is the servant of the inhabitants of the parish. He is appointed by the vestry, and the vestry represents the whole body of the inhabitants for that purpose—The Queen v. Watts (7 Ad. & E. 469; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 72),—and for that reason is not the servant of the churchwardens and overseers—Points, appellant, v. Attwood, respondent (6 Com. B. Rep. 38, 49; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.)

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B., Byles, J., Pigott, B. and Lush, J.

(1) See 59 Geo. 3. c. 12. s. 7; Chitty's Statutes, vol. 3. p. 1136, 3rd edit.; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103. s. 15; but no point arose upon the order.

C.P. 19). By the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103. s. 15, after reciting that in cases of embezzlement or larceny by assistant overseers appointed by the guardians of certain unions and parishes under the authority of the orders of the Poor Law Commissioners and of the Poor Law Board for some one or more of the parishes comprised within their union, or for their parish, as the case may be, it is enacted that, "in respect of any indictment or other criminal proceeding, every collector or assistant overseer appointed under the authority of any order of the Poor Law Commissioners or the Poor Law Board, shall be deemed and taken to be the servant of the inhabitants of the parish whose money or other property he shall be charged to have embezzled or stolen, and shall be so described; and it shall be sufficient to state such money or property to belong to the inhabitants of such parish, without the names of any such inhabitants being specified." The same rule may satisfactorily be adopted in the case of the prisoner, who was appointed under the 59 Geo. 3. c. 12. s. 7. All the requisites combine in this case to make him the servant of the inhabitants. He is appointed by the inhabitants in vestry assembled; his salary is fixed by the inhabitants; his duties are settled by them; and in them lies the power of his removal. He may give relief, and his office is independent of the churchwardens and overseers.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We think that the case is sufficiently within the statute.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

April 28, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. PAYNE.

35 L. J. M.C. 170; L. R. 1 C.C. 27; 14 L. T. 416; 14 W. R. 661;
10 Cox. C.C. 231; 12 Jur. N.S. 476.

Prisons Act, 1865—"Article or Thing"—Crowbar.

CRIMINAL LAW.—A crowbar is an "article or thing" within the meaning of the 37th section of the Prisons Act, 1865, and therefore any person who, with intent to facilitate the escape of any prisoner, conveys such an instrument into any prison is guilty of felony under that section.

The prisoner, Elizabeth Payne, was tried and convicted at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county of Surrey, on an indictment which charged her with conveying into the common gaol at Newington, in and for the said county, a crowbar, with intent to facilitate the escape of a prisoner therein being; but the Chairman reserved the following

CASE.

The indictment was framed under section 37. of the Prisons Act, 1865, which is as follows: "Every person who aids any prisoner in escaping, or attempting to escape, from any prison, or who, with intent to facilitate the escape of any prisoner, conveys or causes to be conveyed into any prison any mask, dress or other disguise, or any letter, or any other article or thing, shall be guilty of felony, and on conviction be sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour for a term not exceeding two years."

The counsel for the prisoner objected that a crowbar did not come within such section, and the Court reserved such point for the decision of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

J. Thompson, for the prisoner.—The words “other article or thing” must be confined to articles and things ejusdem generis with the previously enumerated articles and things—Kitchin v. Shaw.¹

[BYLES, J.—But the articles enumerated are of different natures. Your argument would point to articles or things ejusdem generis with that comprehensive class consisting of mask, dress, disguise or letter. How do you denominate that class?]

A class of the fraudulent kind. The rule that where particular words follow general ones they are to be construed as applicable to things ejusdem generis is laid down in Sandiman v. Breach (7 B. & C. 96; s. c. 5 Law J. Rep. K.B. 298). The repealed act, 4 Geo. 4. c. 64. s. 43. contained the further prohibitory words “instrument or arms.” Their omission in the present act withdraws the prohibition.

Straight, for the prosecution, was not heard.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The words “any other article or thing” mean any other article or thing of any other kind, sort or description whatever. All the prior statutes on the subject since the 16 Geo. 2. c. 31. s. 2. included such an instrument as a crowbar.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

April 28, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. REARDON AND BLOOR.*

35 L. J. M.C. 171; 10 Cox. C.C. 241; L. R. 1 C.C. 31; 14 L. T. 449;
14 W. R. 663; 12 Jur. N.S. 476.

Receiving Stolen Property knowing it to have been Stolen—Indictment—Joint Receipt—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 94.

CRIMINAL LAW.—Two or more persons may be indicted jointly for receiving stolen property knowing it to have been stolen, though each successively received the whole of the same at different times; and it makes no difference whether the receipt was direct from the felon or from an intermediate person.

The prisoners, Emma Reardon and Joseph Bloor, were jointly indicted before Lush, J., at Manchester, for receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen, when the learned Judge reserved the following

CASE.

There was no evidence of a joint receipt, but Reardon, who kept a house of her own, was in the practice of receiving stolen property from the thief or his accomplice, and of selling it to Bloor, who also had a place of business of his own.

The jury found each guilty, and the learned Judge sentenced Bloor; but an objection having been taken that upon the indictment a conviction of both could not stand, he respited the sentence against Reardon and reserved the question whether the conviction against her was sustainable upon the above indictment.

(1) 6 Ad. & E. 729; 734, per Lord Denman; s. c. 7 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 14.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, B., Byles, J., Pigott, B. and Lush, J.

Cottingham, for the prisoner.—The question turns upon the construction to be put upon the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 94, which enacts, "If upon the trial of any two or more persons indicted for jointly receiving any property it shall be proved that one or more of such persons separately received any part or parts of such property, it shall be lawful for the jury to convict upon such indictment such of the said persons as shall be proved to have received any part or parts of such property." It is submitted that this section contemplates a different case from the present. It is intended to apply to the receipt by two or more persons from the thief of the stolen property, the one taking a part and the other or others taking another part, and not to two receipts, as here, of the whole independent of each other—the one being at one time from the thief, and the other at another time by the second receiver from the first receiver. The words are "separately received any part or parts of such property"; but to have comprehended the present case, they should have been "received the same or any part or parts thereof."

[POLLOCK, C.B.—But the whole is equal to all its parts, and if each could be jointly convicted of receiving all the parts separately, so may each be convicted of receiving the whole.]

This section must be construed with reference to the 93rd section, which enacts that, "Whenever any property whatsoever shall have been stolen, taken, extorted, obtained, embezzled or otherwise disposed of in such a manner as to amount to a felony either at common law or by virtue of this act, any number of receivers at different times of such property or of any part or parts thereof may be charged with substantive felonies in the same indictment, and may be tried together, notwithstanding that the principal felon shall not be included in the same indictment, or shall not be in custody or amenable to justice." Under this section, therefore, upon an indictment charging them in separate counts with separate felonies, the prisoners might have been tried together and convicted, but not upon a joint indictment. The words "different times" apply to this case, but they are omitted in the 94th section. This latter section is a re-enactment of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100. s. 14, and the question whether that section applied to a case where two distinct acts of receiving the whole of the stolen goods was shewn was raised but not decided in The Queen v. Dring (1 Dears. & B. 329). Before the statutory enactments (the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 100. and the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), the prisoners could not have been convicted, unless a joint receipt were proved—Messingham's case (1 Moo. 257); but the prosecutor would have been put to his election, and one might have been convicted, but not both—Matthews's case (1 Den. C.C. 596) and Gray's case (2 Ibid. 86; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.s.) M.C. 105).

Sowler, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The object of the statutes appears to have been to get rid of certain technical objections to indictments which had apparently prevailed aforesaid. The 94th section says that one or more persons separately receiving stolen property may be indicted together, though there be no joint receipt, provided some have received one part and others other part. A man who meets with stolen property in the highway that has been dropped by the felon and found disposing of it at a smaller price than its proper value shortly after, may be found guilty either of stealing or of receiving it knowing it to have been stolen, according to the circumstances. And the statute then provides that all the persons concerned in the receiving may be indicted together. For this purpose there is no distinction as to time of receipt, nor is there any between receiving from the original felon and other intermediate persons. The 93rd section may be used to throw light upon the meaning of the 94th section as to the immateriality of difference of time. The 94th section uses the words "part or parts," so as to give some colour to the objection taken, yet looking logically at the matter, the whole is the same thing as all the parts. Take the case put by me on the argument, of the theft of a silver waiter and a tea-pot, where the one is received at one time and the other at another. There can be no distinction between that case and the receipt of both waiter and tea-pot together at different times.

Conviction affirmed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

May 7, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. FLETCHER.*

35 L. J. M.C. 172; 10 Cox. C.C. 248; L. R. 1 C.C. 39; 14 L. T. 573;
14 W. R. 774; 12 Jur. N.S. 505.

Rape—Idiot Girl—Consent—Want of Evidence of Connexion “against her Will.”

CRIMINAL LAW.—The mere fact of connexion with an idiot girl capable of recognizing and describing the prisoner, but incapable, so far as her idiotcy rendered her so, of expressing dissent or consent, and therefore without her consent, is not sufficient evidence of a rape to be left to a jury.

Quære—The Queen v. Fletcher (Bell, C.C. 63; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 85) overruled.

Charles Fletcher was tried, before Mr. Justice Keating, at the last Warwick Assizes, for a rape upon Fanny Elizabeth Churchill and convicted, when the learned Judge reserved the following

CASE.

The prosecutrix was an idiot girl, with one side and a foot paralyzed; she was seen going with the prisoner towards the inn where he was ostler, and afterwards coming from thence, with her hair down and the hair-net in her hand, but, as her mother said, “not different from her ordinary manner”; she had three cakes in her hand and was eating one of them. There was no evidence of the circumstances under which the connexion had taken place, but the prisoner admitted the fact, alleging consent, and that he had had connexion with her before, also with her consent. In answer to his question, whether she knew him, she said, “Yes, the man at Richards’.” Although only sixteen years old the medical man stated she was a fully developed woman, and that strong animal instincts might exist notwithstanding her imbecile condition. Appearances on examination were not inconsistent with connexion having previously taken place, and he rather inclined to that opinion, but they were also consistent with the connexion in question being a first connexion. I left the case to the jury, in terms reported to have been used by Mr. Justice Willes in the case of The Queen v. Fletcher (Bell, C.C. 63; s. c. 28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 85), viz., that if they were satisfied that the girl was incapable of expressing consent or dissent, and that the prisoner had connexion with her without her consent, they should find him guilty; but that a consent produced by mere animal instinct would be sufficient to prevent the act from constituting a rape.

The jury found the prisoner guilty.

I desire the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal as to whether I ought to have left the case to the jury at all, there being no evidence against the prisoner except the fact of connexion and the imbecile state of the girl.

No counsel appeared on either side, and the case was not argued.

* Coram, Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., Pigott, B. and Montague Smith, J.

POLLOCK, C.B. (May 7) delivered the judgment of the Court.—In this case the prisoner was tried, before my Brother Keating, for a rape upon an idiot girl, and the question reserved for us was, whether the case ought to have gone to the jury, there being no evidence except the fact of connexion and the imbecile state of the girl. Of the mere fact of connexion there was the clearest proof, for it was admitted by the prisoner. The Crown, however, offered no evidence that the connexion was had against her will. The indictment charged the prisoner with having committed the offence against her will and without her consent; and we are all of opinion that some evidence of that as a fact ought to be given before a conviction can be obtained, and there is not in this case that sort of testimony on which a Judge would be justified in leaving it to a jury to find a verdict. We are unanimously of opinion that there is here no evidence to establish either that it was against her will or without her consent. I wish to add for myself, and this is only my own remark, that I think the acts of parliament which made the offence of mere connexion a criminal offence in this case of young children under a certain age, have a tendency to throw light upon the case before us. Here the contention on the part of the Crown would have been that an idiot is incapable of consent; but it may be said in answer, that the same cause which required an act of parliament to make a simple fact of connexion a criminal offence in the case of children, would require an act of parliament in the case also of idiots. We think therefore that the conviction should be quashed.

Conviction quashed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 8, 1866.

THE WEARDALE DISTRICT HIGHWAY BOARD, appellants, v. THE TRUSTEES OF THE ALSTON TURNPIKE TRUST, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 173; L. R. 1 Q.B. 396; 14 L. T. 546; 14 W. R. 968;
12 Jur. N.S. 563.

Turnpike—Deficiency of Trust Fund—Highway Rates—4 & 5 Vict. c. 59. s. 1.

HIGHWAYS.—By a local act regulating certain turnpike-roads the monies coming to the hands of the trustees were to be expended in defraying the expenses of management, not exceeding in any one year 300*l.*, and next in maintaining and repairing the roads, but so that the amount expended for these purposes should not exceed 1,600*l.* in any one year, and then in paying off the debt owing by the trustees.

The revenue of the trustees exceeded 1,900*l.*, and therefore there was a surplus over and above the amount authorized to be expended in the management, maintenance and repairs. 1,900*l.* was sufficient to defray all such expenses. The trustees, wishing to pay off their debt, obtained an order under 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59. s. 1. for payment of a portion of the highway rates towards the expense of repairing the turnpike-roads:—Held, distinguishing The Queen v. White (4 Q.B. Rep. 101; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 31), that as the revenue exceeded 1,900*l.*, there was no power to make such order.

This was an appeal against an order of Justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The CASE stated substantially as follows:

At a Petty Sessions holden for the Petty Sessional Division of Darlington Ward, in the county of Durham, an information came on for hearing, upon the complaint of the respondent, who was the clerk to the trustees of a certain turnpike trust called "The Alston Roads Trust," in which it was alleged that the funds of the said turnpike trust were insufficient for the repairs of the turnpike-roads, and in which an order was applied for to appropriate such portion of the highway-rate as the Justices should think necessary for and towards the repairs of that part of the said turnpike-roads which lay in the township of Forest.

The Justices made an order upon the appellants, the Weardale District Highway Board, for the payment of the sum of 10*l*.

Upon the hearing of the said information it was proved, on the part of the respondent, and admitted and found as facts, that by "The Alston Roads Act, 1853," after repealing a former local act, it is enacted, section 22, that as arrears of interest due on the principal sum, or debts owing on the said turnpike trust should be and the same were thereby wholly extinguished, and that no interest should thenceforth be paid or payable upon the said principal sums or any of them; and by section 24, that all monies which should come to the hands of the trustees by virtue of the said act should be applied as follows, that is to say,

1. In paying and discharging the expenses of obtaining and passing the said act or incident thereto.

2. In defraying the expenses of erecting, altering and repairing toll-gates and toll-houses, and of the management of the said roads, and the salaries of officers and other incidental expenses, but not exceeding in any one year the sum of 300*l*., exclusive of payments to toll-collectors, and of the costs of prosecuting or defending any claims or suits.

3. In maintaining and repairing the roads and bridges and putting the said act in execution with reference thereto, but so that the amount expended for these purposes shall not exceed 1,600*l*. in any one year.

That the expenses of obtaining and passing the said act had also been paid and discharged. That the annual revenue from tolls and incidental receipts of the said Alston Roads Trust for the current year will amount to 2,208*l*. That the salaries of the officers employed by the said trustees, and the other expenses of and incident to the management of the said trust roads will amount for the current year to 272*l*. That the expenses of maintaining and repairing the said trust roads and bridges and putting the act into execution in reference thereto during the present year are estimated by the surveyor to amount to 1,596*l*., of which sum it is estimated 57*l*. will be expended within the township of Forest, the estimate being provided upon the actual expenditure within each parish during the past year. The 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, an act to authorize for one year the application of a portion of the highway-rates to turnpike-roads, continued by subsequent acts to the present time, after reciting the General Highway Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, whereby divers statutes passed in the reign of His late Majesty King George the Third, relating to the performance of statute duty, were repealed, and statute duty was thereby altogether abolished, and that the revenues of some turnpike-roads are so unequal to the charge and maintenance of such roads after paying the interest and principal of the sums due upon mortgage of the tolls thereof, when deprived of the aid heretofore derived from the statute duty, that it is necessary that some additional provision should be made for such roads for a limited period, section 1. enacts, that Justices, upon information exhibited before them by the clerk or treasurer of any turnpike trust that the funds of the said trust are insufficient for the repairs of the turnpike-roads within any parish, &c., may examine the state of the revenues and debts of such turnpike trusts, and inquire into the state and condition of the repairs of the roads within the same, &c., and if after such examination it shall appear to the said Justices necessary or expedient for the purpose of any turnpike-road so to do, then they may adjudge and order what portion (if any) of the highway-rates, &c. shall be paid by the parish surveyor, &c. to the said trustees, such money to be wholly laid out in the actual repairs of such part of such turnpike-road as lies within the parish from which it was received. By the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 94. s. 1. the highway board is substituted for the parish surveyor.

It was contended, on behalf of the appellants, that the act 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59. only applies to cases where "the funds of the turnpike trust are insufficient for the repairs of the turnpike-roads in any parish," and that as the trustees of the said Alston roads are directed by the said Alston Roads Act to expend not exceeding 1,600*l.* in maintaining and repairing the said trust roads and bridges, and the estimated expenditure for those purposes for the current year only amounts to 1,596*l.*, the funds are not insufficient for the repairs of the said roads; that the said respondents are not entitled to an order for parish composition, unless their estimated expenditure for repairs, &c. exceeds 1,600*l.*, the amount directed by their local act to be so expended; that section 26. of the said Alston Roads Act only contemplates a sum of 200*l.* as applicable at any one time for payment of debts, whereas for the present year there is a surplus of 340*l.* applicable for that purpose; that if, as they contend, the said respondents are justified in stopping short at 1,200*l.* in repairs of their roads, they would be equally justified in stopping short at 800*l.*, or even a less sum than that, and asking for parish composition to double or triple the sum applied for at present; and the appellants contended that the respondents cannot stop short at 1,600*l.* in repairs of their roads, and that, therefore, the order now applied for could not be made.

The respondent contended that in judging of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the funds for this purpose, the whole state and circumstances of the trust must be taken into consideration by the Justices, and that if there is a debt due upon the trust (as in the present case), the Justices are to consider that it is a duty incumbent upon the trustees of the turnpike trust to have a due regard to the discharge of such debt concurrently with keeping the trust roads in repair.

The judgment of the Justices was in favour of the respondent, and they made an order on the appellants for payment to the said trustees of 10*l.*, being part of the rate or assessment levied or to be levied for the repair of the highways in and for the said township of Forest.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the judgment was in point of law correct, and whether the trustees of the said roads could call upon the said highway board, under the circumstances of this case, to pay to them a portion of the highway rate levied in the said township of Forest. If the Court should be of opinion that the said order was legally and properly made, then the said order was to stand; but if the Court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information was to be dismissed.

C. Russell, for the respondents (May 2).—The question before the Court is not, whether the Justices have acted wisely in making the order complained of; but whether they had jurisdiction to make it. It is submitted that they had. By the 1st section of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, they may make the order, if they think it necessary or "expedient for the purposes" of the road. Now here the trustees wished to get rid of some part of their debt, and the Justices have thought it expedient that they should have the means of doing so.

[BLACKBURN, J.—But unless the trust funds are insufficient for the repairs, the Justices have no power to inquire about it. The trustees have got 1,900*l.*, which they may expend in the repairs, and which is sufficient for that purpose.]

But the question is, whether they may not pay off the debt with some of the money, if they think it is expedient to do so. The question seems to be decided by The Queen v. White (4 Q.B. Rep. 101; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 31), where the local act was almost exactly the same as the one now before the Court. It was decided that the order might be made.—He also referred to The Queen v. the Trustees of the South Shields Turnpike Roads (3 El. & B. 599; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 134), The Queen v. Hutchinson (4 El. & B. 200; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25), and to Mawby v. Hopkinson (10 Law Times, N.S. 27).

Besley, for the appellants.—The Queen v. the Trustees of the South

Shields Turnpike Roads (3 El. & B. 599; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 134) shews that the order of payments provided for by the local act is to be strictly followed.

[BLACKBURN, J.—But can you distinguish The Queen v. White (4 Q.B. Rep. 101; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 31)?]

It may be difficult to do so, but it was before the Court both in The Queen v. the Trustees of the South Shields Turnpike Roads (3 El. & B. 599; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 134) and The Queen v. Hutchinson (4 El. & B. 200; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 25); and in The Local Board of Health of Chatham v. the Rochester Commissioners (35 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 81), where Blackburn, J. said, "Turnpike-roads are all public highways, and as such, if the turnpike trustees are able to keep them in repair, they are bound to do so, and if they are not, the parish is to contribute, and the consequence of causing a sinking fund to be taken out of the tolls before the payment of the expenses of repairing the roads would be to accelerate the time when the parish will become liable."

[BLACKBURN, J.—And so I thought when this argument began; but The Queen v. White (4 Q.B. Rep. 101; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 31) seems to decide that the trustees are to have a discretion as to how the funds are to be expended. We must consider that case.]

He also referred to Brown v. Evans (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 101).

Cur. adv. vult.

BLACKBURN, J. delivered the judgment of the Court.—In this case, which was argued before my Brother Shee and myself, the question was, whether the Justices were right, under the circumstances stated in the case, in making an order, under the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59, on the appellants, to pay the trustees of the Alston Roads a portion of the highway rates. By the local act regulating the Alston Roads (the 16 & 17 Vict. c. cxii.), section 24, it is enacted, that all the monies coming to the hands of the trustees by virtue of the act shall be applied, first, in paying the expenses of obtaining the act (which have been discharged), secondly, in defraying the expenses of management, not exceeding in any one year 300*l.*; thirdly, in maintaining and repairing the roads, &c., but so that the amount expended for these purposes shall not exceed 1,600*l.* in any one year, and then in paying off a large debt owing by the trustees; so that it is clear that the legislature intended that, to the extent of 1,900*l.*, the management and repairs should be a charge on the trust funds prior to the debt. The facts are, that the revenue of the trustees exceeds 1,900*l.*, and the expenses of management and maintaining the roads fall short of that sum, so that there is a surplus, though a small one, applicable to the reduction of the debt; but the trustees think it proper to apply a larger sum to reducing the debt, and they have obtained an order from the Justices to require the appellants, amongst other parishes, to defray part of the expenses of the maintenance of the road, on the ground that the funds of the turnpike trust, which are sufficient to repair the road if the trustees obey the act of parliament and apply their funds primarily to those purposes (to the extent of 1,900*l.*), will not be sufficient if they disobey that act, as they propose to do, and apply the funds to reduce the debt. The Queen v. White (4 Q.B. Rep. 101; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 31) was very properly relied upon by the counsel for the respondents. If the present case was not distinguishable from that case, we should probably have required the case to be re-argued before the Court when more full, before dissenting from a decision in point. But we think that the case is very different from the present. The terms of the local act were hardly so express as those of the present act; and it might be thought that the subsequent general act repealed or at least overrode the prior local act. But in the present case the legislature have by an enactment subsequent to the general act, and therefore not repealed by it, in express terms provided in what order the funds of the trust shall be applied and we think it impossible to hold that the Justices or the trustees can have any power to alter that arrangement. For this reason we give judgment for the appellants.

Judgment for the appellants.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

April 25, 1886.

JOSEPH LEONARD HADLEY, JONAH HADLEY AND JAMES EBDEN, appellants, v. JOHN BROWNJOHN PERKS AND THOMAS HOLWAY
PERKS, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 177; L. R. 1 Q.B. 444; 14 L. T. 325; 14 W. R. 730;
12 Jur. N.S. 662.

The Metropolitan Police Acts, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. s. 66. and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. ss. 24-26.—Having or Conveying Property suspected to be Stolen—Arrest by Constable—Magistrates—Summary Jurisdiction.

LONDON POLICE.—The summary powers conferred by section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. upon the Metropolitan Magistrates, of dealing with a "person brought before any of the said Magistrates charged with having in his possession or conveying in any manner any thing which may be reasonably suspected of being stolen, or unlawfully obtained," do not apply to a case where the only possession of the property is a possession inside a warehouse, but are confined to the class of offences contemplated by section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. To bring a case within section 24, the "having in his possession" must be ejusdem generis with "conveying."

The power given to a constable by section 66. to "stop, search and detain any person who may be reasonably suspected of having or conveying in any manner anything stolen or unlawfully obtained," is confined to cases where a person has or conveys the property in the street or other open place; and section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. is supplementary to section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, and gives the Magistrate power to convict summarily persons who, under section 66, are liable to be arrested by a constable in the open.

Semble, per Blackburn, J., that section 24. gives the Magistrate the same power with regard to persons arrested under section 66. for offering for sale or pawn property suspected to have been stolen.

A person is sufficiently "brought" before a Magistrate within the meaning of section 24. if he appear in answer to a summons; and it is not necessary that he should have been actually arrested and brought in custody.

CASE stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. by the Lord Mayor of London.

The following are the material parts of the case: The respondents, who are millers at Shad Thames, preferred three several informations against the appellants jointly, charging that each of the appellants on three several days unlawfully had in their possession in Upper Thames Street, contrary to the statute, &c., certain sacks, the property of the respondents, which goods were then and there and were still reasonably suspected of having been stolen and unlawfully obtained. The informations were laid under the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. s. 24, the powers of which are given by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 84. s. 6. to two City Justices, and by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. s. 34. to one such Justice.

Upon the informations being laid, the Lord Mayor issued summonses to the appellants to appear at the Mansion House, and they accordingly appeared. The respondents called several witnesses, one of whom, a constable of the Metropolitan Police Force, and appointed for special duty as officer of the "Sack-Protection Society," proved that he found the sacks in question on the days named at the Steam Flour Mills, in Upper Thames Street, belonging to the appellants J. L. and J. Hadley, of whom the appellant Ebdon is the foreman, and that the sacks were marked with the names of the respondents and belonged to them. The appellants' counsel contended that the Lord Mayor had no jurisdiction, for the reason set out in the argument below, and also because the appellants had not been "brought" before the Lord Mayor in custody by a constable, as required by section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, and referred to 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. s. 69, for the meaning of the word "brought." The Lord Mayor, after hearing the respondents' counsel, contra, decided that he had jurisdiction, and the appellants then called many witnesses to prove that the sacks were brought in to their mills unknown to the appellants; that bakers, their customers, constantly sent back other sacks in return for the appellants' sacks; and that the orders given to the appellants' men were not to send out sacks belonging to other millers.

The Lord Mayor thought that the appellants were properly "brought" before him; secondly, that section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. created a new offence, and was specially intended to provide a summary remedy for protecting property in cases where an indictment could not be sustained or was inexpedient; and that therefore it was not necessary to prove larceny or fraud, but that reasonable suspicion was sufficient, which was to be gathered from all the circumstances of the case; thirdly, that the appellants had brought themselves within section 24, inasmuch as they had possession of the sacks in question, which were reasonably suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained; fourthly, that the appellants did not give the Lord Mayor a satisfactory account as required by section 24. of how they came by the sacks in question. The Lord Mayor therefore convicted the appellants of the offences, and adjudged J. L. and J. Hadley to pay 15*l.* each, being 5*l.* each for each offence, and Ebdon to pay 15*s.*, being 5*s.* for each offence.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court is, whether the Lord Mayor was right in point of law in convicting the appellants.¹

Hardinge Giffard (Poland with him), for the respondents, argued at length upon the details of the evidence to shew that the account given by the appellants of their possession of the sacks was not such as to give reasonable satisfaction to the Lord Mayor, under section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. The argument is omitted, because, from the view taken by the Court, this part of the case is immaterial.

Parry, Serj. (Waddy with him), for the appellant.—The Lord Mayor had no jurisdiction over this case. I quite admit that the appellants, if liable to be brought at all, were properly "brought" before him by summons, within section 24. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, and that it was not necessary that they should be brought in custody; but my point is, that that section only applies to cases within section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47.,² which section

(1) The evidence for the respondents and the appellants was set out at great length in two appendices, and the Court said, during the argument, that an appendix, as well as the case, ought to be divided into numbered paragraphs, otherwise the costs would not be allowed.

(2) Section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. enacts that "any person found committing any offence punishable either upon indictment or as a misdemeanor upon summary conviction, by virtue of this act, may be taken into custody without a warrant by any constable, or may be apprehended by the owner of the property on or with respect to which the offence shall be committed, or by his servant or any person authorized by him, and may be detained until he can be delivered into the custody of a constable to be dealt with according to law; and every such constable may also stop, search and detain any vessel, boat, cart, or carriage in or upon which there shall be reason to suspect that anything stolen or unlawfully obtained may be would not apply to the present case. Section 66. is directed against offences which may be described as locomotive, erratic or vagrant. This is clear from the words "found committing," "stop, search and detain." By section 55. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. that act is to be construed together with the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47; therefore section 66. of the latter act is to be taken with section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, which only applies to persons arrested for the erratic offences comprised under section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. If this were not so, section 24. would create a new offence, and give a Magistrate most arbitrary powers in cases where no indictable offence has been committed. Section 25. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. shews what course should be adopted where there is reason to suspect that stolen goods are concealed in a house.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The words of that section seem to require, before a search-warrant could be granted, proof on oath that goods had been stolen, and reasonable suspicion that they were concealed in the house.]

Section 24. does not include cases comprised under section 25.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The fact that section 25. follows instead of precedes section 24. is not conclusive of that proposition, but is an argument in its favour.]

Section 26. also confirms my contention; and unless section 24. applies to cases under section 66. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, there is no section which does.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It seems strange that section 24. renders persons taken red-handed liable only to two months' imprisonment, but section 26. renders persons not taken red-handed liable to three months' imprisonment. It may be because proof on oath that the goods are stolen is required by section 26, but only reasonable suspicion by section 24. If so, it is very awkwardly expressed.]

Poland, in reply (who was directed to answer the contention that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction).—Section 24. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. creates a new offence, and is not confined to cases under section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. There is a distinction between "having in his possession" and "conveying," and "having" is not limited to cases ejusdem generis with "conveying." It can hardly be contended that a person shewing in the street a diamond suspected to be stolen is liable under section 24, but not a person shewing it inside the threshold of a shop. If the appellants are right, there is no provision for the case of a person putting a diamond down upon the counter, because he cannot be arrested under section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, and there cannot be a search-warrant under section 25. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. Section 24. is designed for the case where no owner can be found, and where there may not be sufficient evidence to justify a remand. If section 25. is construed to require proof on oath that the goods are stolen, section 66, which uses the same words, would also require the proof on oath; and this shews that section 24. is not merely supplementary to section 66.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The reason for giving the power under section 66. is, that it is essential to make an instant arrest; and the constable has no time to do more than suspect; he has no time to make an oath. LUSH, J.—If found, and also any person who may be reasonably suspected of having or conveying in any manner anything stolen or unlawfully obtained; and any person to whom any property shall be offered to be sold, pawned, or delivered, if he shall have reasonable cause to suspect that any such offence has been committed with respect to such property, or that the same or any part thereof has been stolen or otherwise unlawfully obtained, is hereby authorized, and if in his power is required, to apprehend and detain, and as soon as may be to deliver such offender into the custody of a constable, together with such property, to be dealt with according to law."

Section 24. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. enacts, "That every person who shall be brought before any of the said Magistrates charged with having in his possession or conveying in any manner anything which may be reasonably suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained, and who shall not give an account to the satisfaction of such Magistrates how he came by the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 5l. or, in the discretion of the Magistrate, may be imprisoned in any gaol or house of correction within the Metropolitan Police district, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two calendar months."

your argument is right, you may, under section 24, convict a man merely for having in his warehouse property which is only suspected to be stolen, while you cannot, under section 25, even search the house except on oath that the goods are stolen.]

But if the construction which the Court proposes to put on section 25, namely, that proof on oath of the stealing is thereby required, be correct, then similar proof is equally required by section 66; but it is admitted that such proof is impossible under section 66. Therefore, I say it is not required under section 25, and section 24. includes cases under section 25. The powers contended for are very salutary, and the Court will not be astute to defeat the obvious intention of the statute.

BLACKBURN, J.—We are all agreed that the convictions should be quashed on the ground on which my Brother Parry puts it, viz., that the 24th section of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, under which only the appellants could be convicted, does not apply to the present case. The 24th section by itself is this: that “every person who shall be brought before any of the said Magistrates” (and the Lord Mayor has the power of two Justices) “charged with having in his possession, or conveying in any manner, anything which may be reasonably suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained, and who shall not give an account to the satisfaction of such Magistrate how he came by the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour,” and liable to a penalty, or in the discretion of the Magistrate, to imprisonment. Now, this is a very extensive, very arbitrary, and summary power. The words “having in his possession” taken by themselves would include the idea “at any time, in any place, in any manner”; but they must be taken with and construed with the words “or conveying in any manner.”

At common law it is no offence, nor is it any offence by statute, except by virtue of section 66. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, to have in one's possession goods suspected to have been stolen. The offence at common law is to have, with a guilty knowledge, things actually stolen. What cases, then, does this 24th section of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. embrace? The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47. was passed in the same session with, and so is contemporary with the later act. It is act to regulate the Constables of the Metropolis, and by section 55. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, the two acts are to be construed together as one act. Now section 66. of the earlier act provides that any person “found committing” offences punishable by virtue of that act, may be taken into custody; and then it enacts that every constable “may also stop, search and detain any vessel, boat, cart, or carriage, in or upon which there shall be reason to suspect that anything stolen or unlawfully obtained may be found, and also any person who may be reasonably suspected of having or conveying, in any manner, anything stolen or unlawfully obtained.” Such a power of arrest does not exist at common law. At common law a private person may arrest without warrant where a felony has actually been committed, and he has reasonable cause for suspecting that the person arrested has committed it. A constable may go further, and may arrest without warrant when he has reasonable cause for suspecting that a felony has been committed by the person arrested, though no felony has in fact been committed. But neither a constable nor any one else can, by common law, arrest a person on reasonable suspicion of having anything “unlawfully obtained”; but this a constable may do by force of section 66. Now, the expressions in that section, “Stop, search, or detain any vessel,” &c., and “conveying,” both point to the case of goods in transit, and there is, obviously, very good reason for giving a constable power to arrest summarily persons suspected of conveying goods stolen or unlawfully obtained, because such persons will take care to get quickly out of the way; but it may not be expedient to give such a power of arrest when the goods are found inside a house. The section also gives a further power to a person to whom property is offered for sale or pawn to arrest the persons offering it if he has reasonable cause to suspect that it has been stolen or otherwise unlawfully obtained; and since a thief tendering stolen goods to a pawnbroker will probably disappear as quickly as possible, there is the same reason for giving the power of arrest in that case. But the power is confined to the cases of persons having or conveying the goods, or tendering them for sale or pawn.

This, then, throws light on section 24. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71; and I think that the power given by section 66. to arrest summarily persons suspected of having or conveying stolen goods is confined to persons moving or being in the street; that the offence aimed at is, in fact, as it has been called in argument, a locomotive, erratic offence, and that section 24. of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. is aimed at the same class of offences. I am inclined to think it also extends to the case of persons offering suspected goods for sale or pawn, who may be arrested by virtue of the latter part of section 66; but what we now decide is that it applies to persons charged with having or conveying goods along the street.

I may here observe that in the later act the words are varied in section 26. from the words in section 24, in that section 24. speaks of "anything which may be reasonably suspected of being stolen," but section 26. speaks of "anything stolen." The general rule, which we learned in a conveyancer's chambers, was never to change the words unless you intend to change the meaning. I wish that those persons who are intrusted with the duty of drawing acts of parliament would follow this rule. They seem to think that they ought to vary the graces and expressions of their style so as not to become monotonous.

Looking at the words of section 24. I think that the expression "having in his possession" being coupled with "or conveying," must be limited to cases of "having" ejusdem generis with "conveying." Next comes the 25th section, and if the intention had been to make section 24. apply to cases under section 25, the proper arrangement would have been to put section 24. after section 25. I do not mean to say that this is conclusive on the point, but it is a reason in favour of holding that section 24. does not apply to cases under section 25. Now section 25. empowers a Magistrate to grant a warrant to search any house in which there is reasonable ground for suspecting that anything stolen or unlawfully obtained is concealed. But this warrant can only be granted on oath, and the information must be not merely that the goods are suspected to have been stolen, but it must be sworn that they have been actually stolen. There is an arbitrary power at the end of the section to take into custody every person found in the house who shall appear to have been privy to the deposit of the goods, knowing or having reasonable cause to suspect that they have been stolen. The whole of this section is confined to cases where there is an information on oath. But the mischief meant to be remedied by section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, is where property is being carried along the street, and there is every reason to suppose that it has been stolen from a warehouse, for instance, or a ship. There would not be time in such a case to lay an information on oath; but in order to seize goods in a house under a search-warrant, you must go further and make oath.

Then comes section 26, and that enacts, not if the person does "not give an account to the satisfaction" of the Magistrate how he came by the goods (as in section 24), but "if it shall appear to such Magistrate that any person shall have had possession of such thing, and had reasonable cause to believe the same to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained," then the person may be imprisoned for three months; that is, one month longer than the person offending under section 24. Section 26. seems, by the change of words of which I have spoken above, to be confined to cases where the goods are actually stolen; but this point is not before us, and we need not decide it.

For these reasons, I think that the summary power conferred by section 24. is intended to apply only to persons "having or conveying" property so as to be liable to be arrested under section 66, and probably also to persons liable to be arrested under section 66. for offering goods for sale or pawn. The Lord Mayor, therefore, exceeded his jurisdiction. There can be no doubt whatever that, provided the facts would have justified a summary arrest, it would have been no defence to say that the defendant had been brought before the Magistrate by a summons in lieu of having been arrested, and that the words of section 24. did not apply to persons "brought" by virtue of a summons. They clearly do so apply.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think section 24. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. is supplementary to section 66. of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, and that it only applies to cases of having or conveying in the street.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I also think that section 24. is merely supplementary to section 66, and that for two reasons. First, because some such provision as that contained in section 24. is necessary in order to carry out the provisions of section 66. In section 66. a power is given to a constable to stop persons merely on suspicion. It is useless to do that unless there is some provision made for bringing such persons before a Magistrate. Section 66. would therefore be inoperative without section 24, and section 24. does exactly adapt itself to the state of things contemplated by section 66. The second reason is derived from the structure of section 24. It does not say, as if it were creating a new offence, "any person having in his possession or conveying" property, but any "person who shall be brought before any of the said Magistrates charged with having," &c. That, I think, shews that it refers back to some other provision which enables him to be brought before the Magistrates, and that provision is contained in section 66.

Judgment for the appellants, without costs.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

April 27, 1866.

STANHOPE, appellant, v. THORSBY, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 182; 1 H. & R. 459; L. R. 1 C.P. 423; 14 L. T. 382;
14 W. R. 651; 12 Jur. N.S. 374.

See, R. v. Kettle, [1905] E. R. A.; 74 L. J. K.B. 254; [1905] 1 K.B. 212; 92 L. T. 59; 53 W. R. 364 (K.B.D. Div.).

Time for entering into Recognizance under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. ss. 2, 3.—Cattle Plague—Licence for removal of Cattle—Evidence.

MAGISTERIAL LAW.—On an appeal from the decision of Justices, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. ss. 2, 3, the appellant enters into the required recognizance within sufficient time, if he does so before the case is stated and delivered, although after the expiration of the three days allowed for applying for the case.

ANIMALS.—By an order, made by the local authority appointed by order of the Privy Council, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107. s. 4, the removal of cattle was prohibited, except fat cattle removed for slaughter with the licence of a Justice, in which such Justice shall state, inter alia, that he has been satisfied by the evidence of an inspector, or otherwise, that no case of cattle plague has occurred within one mile from the premises from which such removal is to take place:—Held, that where such licence has been granted without fraud on the part of the person applying for it, the Sessions cannot inquire into the evidence on which the Justice acted who granted it, and though granted without any evidence, it protects the person who removes his cattle under it.

CASE for the opinion of the Court, stated by the Justices in Petty Sessions, at Horncastle, in the parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln.

An information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant for removing two cows and sixteen bullocks along a public highway without the licence of a Justice of the Peace, contrary to an order of the 16th of January, 1866, made by the Justices for the parts of Lindsey in Quarter Sessions assembled, being the local authority appointed by an Order of the Privy Council, dated the 16th of December, 1865, under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107. s. 4, and the material parts of such order of Sessions necessary for this case are as follows:

"The Justices present declare that, with a view to prevent the spreading of the said disorder (the cattle plague) it is expedient, and they do accordingly declare and give notice as follows, that is to say, first, that between the 19th day of January instant and the 1st day of March next, no cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox, calf, sheep, lamb, goat or swine, shall be brought or sent to any public fair, market or place within the said parts of Lindsey for the purpose of exhibition or sale. Thirdly, that it shall not be lawful between the dates aforesaid to remove any cow, heifer, bull, bullock, ox or calf from place to place within the said parts of Lindsey over, along or across any highway or public road (not being a railroad), except fat cattle for the purpose of slaughter, which fat cattle may be removed for that purpose with the licence of a Justice of the Peace of the said parts, and shall before removal be marked by part of the hair being conspicuously clipped off in the form of a cross from one of the hind quarters; and in the said licence the Justice shall state the name and residence of the seller, that he has been satisfied by the evidence of an inspector or otherwise of the healthiness of the animal, that the animal has been in the seller's possession thirty days at least immediately previously to such removal, and that no case of cattle plague has occurred within one mile from the premises from which such removal is to take place during six weeks immediately preceding such removal, and that the licence shall be in force forty-eight hours from its date and issue, and no longer; and also except any other cattle which may be removed from one part of a farm to any other part of the same farm contiguous thereto and in the occupation of the same person with a licence of a Justice of the Peace of the said parts. Lastly, notice is hereby given that every person offending against the orders and regulations hereinbefore contained will be liable to forfeit for such offence a sum not exceeding 20l."

From the evidence adduced at the hearing of the information it appeared that the appellant, being in possession of a quantity of fat cattle, sent, on the 28th day of January, 1866, to Moses Elmhirst, Esq., a Justice of the Peace for the parts of Lindsey, a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"Revesby Abbey, Sunday, January, 28, /66.

"Dear Elmhirst,—Mr. Bell has become rather frightened at the plague being at Mareham-le-Fen (two miles from my farm) and my feeding beasts being pretty fat, he wishes to send them at once to Tattershall to Great Northern station, to be sent to London to-day, and sold and killed there to-morrow morning. There are ten short-horn steers, two cows and seven Scotch steers. Mr. Bell sends a note to the Horncastle inspector to give a warrant of their health, without which it must be understood that your order is not to be used. I also want a certificate for the removal of my animals across the road with the inspector's permission. Yours, sincerely,

"J. Banks Stanhope.

"Moses Elmhirst, Esq."

With this letter was inclosed a memorandum from Mr. Bell (Mr. Stanhope's steward), from which the following, being the part relating to the animals in question is an extract :

" Mem. for Moses Elmhirst, Esquire."

" List of beasts belonging to James Banks Stanhope, Esquire, intended to be forwarded by railway from Tattershall Station to Manchester.

" Ten short-horned bullocks

" (5 White and 5 roan).

" Two short-horned cows

" (1 white and 1 roan).

" Six Scotch bullocks

" (4 dun and 2 red).

" Geo. Bell."

" Revesby, 28th January, 1866.

" I certify that the above stated beasts are all healthy so far as I know, but they will only be forwarded by the order of an inspector, which is applied for.—G. B."

Mr. Elmhirst on this application granted a licence, in the form settled by the Quarter Sessions at which the above-mentioned order was made and supplied under the direction of a Court to the Justices for the parts of Lindsey, of which licence the following is a copy :

" Lincolnshire. Lindsey.

" Licence to remove cattle.

" I hereby permit the removal of

" 2 cows short-horned, 1 roan, 1 white,

" Sixteen bullocks, { 10 short-horned,
5 roan, 5 white,
6 Scotch,
4 dun, 2 red,

the property of James Banks Stanhope, Esquire, M.P., of Revesby, to London or Manchester, to be removed from Revesby to London or Manchester, via Tattershall Station, being for immediate slaughter, it appearing to me that the disease has not appeared within one mile of the premises from which the cattle are to be removed within six weeks from this date, the same are not infected by the disorder generally designated 'the Cattle Plague,' and have been thirty days at least in the possession of the applicant for this licence.

" This licence shall remain in force until 2.15 o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday next, the 30th day of January, 1866.

" Given under my hand this 28th day of January, 1866.

" Mos. Elmhirst,

" a Justice of the Peace acting in and

" for the parts of Lindsey."

Notes on the back of the licence.

" None of the animals named within may be removed between an hour after sunset and an hour before sunrise. The holder of this licence must produce and shew it to any person requiring him so to do. Within two days after the expiration of the time for which this licence is granted it must be sent (if by post prepaid) to the Justice of the Peace who granted it. Animals before removal to be marked by part of the hair being conspicuously clipped off in the form of a cross from one of the hind quarters. Penalty, 20l."

A certificate of the inspector that the appellant's cattle were healthy having been obtained, the cattle named in the information were, on the 29th of January, 1866, removed under this licence along the highway from Revesby to Tattershall Railway Station, en route for Manchester, and there sold.

It was contended, on the part of the appellant, that the cattle were proved to be fat cattle removed under the authority of a licence duly granted in compliance with the terms of the order, and that the information ought therefore to be dismissed. On the part of the respondent it was contended that the licence granted by Mr. Elmhirst was invalid and did not authorize the removal. Mr. Elmhirst was called as a witness by the respondent, and such parts of his evidence as bear upon the point in question are here given. He said, "I am a Justice for the parts of Lindsey, and act at the Horncastle Petty Sessions. On the 28th of January I received the letter produced (being the above-mentioned letter from Mr. Stanhope). I have the licence in my possession which I granted upon that letter. I produce it. The letter was brought by Mr. Stanhope's servant. I saw him, and sent back the order with the letter by him. I gave the letter back and sent a letter to Mr. Stanhope, stating that I had had very little time to make the order, and had sent his letter; in case any mistake should have been made in the numbers he would see it had not originated with me. I received a communication from Mr. Bell inclosed in Mr. Stanhope's letter. I also sent that letter back. I have no doubt this is the letter (the memorandum from Mr. Bell above set forth). I had no other evidence when I granted the certificate than the letter from Mr. Stanhope and the letter from Mr. Bell. I had no other evidence that there was no cattle plague within one mile of Mr. Stanhope's premises than the statement in his letter about Mareham-le-Fen. I was aware that there was cattle plague at Mareham, but I was not aware that it was nearer. I had no evidence that it was nearer. . . . I read the letter as if it contained a statement that there was no cattle plague within a mile."

The case stated the evidence of another witness called on behalf of the respondent, who proved that on Saturday, the 27th of January last, he had the cattle plague at his farm, which was within a mile from the appellant's; but that neither he nor the appellant had then any suspicion it was the cattle plague, but only that the cattle were not well. The Justices found that there was no fraud on the part of the appellant in obtaining the licence, but they ruled that in point of law it was the duty of a person applying for a licence to shew affirmatively to the Justice to whom the application was made that there was no cattle plague within one mile of the farm from which the removal was to take place; that the appellant ought to have shewn this, which his letter of the 28th of January did not do. And therefore the licence granted by Mr. Elmhirst was a void licence, and did not authorize the removal. And they convicted the appellant in a penalty of 20*l.* and costs.

The point for the decision of the Court was, whether the ruling of the Justices as to the invalidity of the licence on the ground stated above was correct.

On the case being called on,

Manisty (Stephens with him), for the respondent, took a preliminary objection to the hearing of the case, on the ground that the recognizances had not been entered into within the time limited by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. ss. 2. and 3. The conviction was on the 3rd of March last; the appellant applied for a case on the 6th of March, and the case was stated and delivered to him on the 24th of March. The appellant entered into the required recognizance on the 10th of March. The question is, what construction the Court will put on the 2nd and 3rd sections of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The 2nd section says that either party, if dissatisfied with the determination of the Justices, may apply in writing, within three days after the same, to the Justices, to state and sign a case; and the 3rd section enacts, that "the appellant at the time of making such application, and before a case shall be stated and delivered to him by the Justices, shall in every instance enter into a recognizance," &c., "and the appellant shall at the same time, and before he shall be entitled to have the case delivered to him, pay to the clerk to the said Justices his fees for and in respect of the case and recognizances, and any other fees to which such clerk shall be entitled." It is submitted that the recognizances must be entered into within the time limited for applying for a case—namely, three days after the decision; but that if the case is stated and delivered before the expiration of such three days, then the recognizance must be entered into before the delivery of such case. There has, it is believed, been only one decision on the construction of the section—Chapman v. Robinson (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 30), where the Court of Queen's Bench held that the appellant may enter into the required recognizance at any time during the three days allowed for applying for a case, and that he need not enter into it simultaneously with making the application.

[BYLES, J. referred to Morgan v. Edwards (5 Hurl. & N. 458; s. c. 29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 108).]

That case decides that the provision in section 2. of the act, that the appellant must within three days after receiving the case transmit it to the Court, is a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the Court to hear, and cannot be waived.

Bovill (Hannen and Stanhope with him), for the appellant.—It is manifest from sections 2. and 3. of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that the appellant must enter into the recognizance before the case is delivered to him, and that really is the only limitation of the time within which the recognizance is to be entered. Chapman v. Robinson (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 30) decides that it is not necessary to enter into the recognizance at the time of applying for the case. If not at that time, there is no other limit in the 3rd section, except "before a case shall be stated and delivered." Moreover, that section says that "at the same time, and before he shall be entitled to have the case delivered to him," the appellant is to pay the fees to the Justice's clerk. These fees must depend on the case being granted, and on the length of the case, and they are to be paid at the same time the recognizance is entered into. Manifestly, it cannot always be all done within three days. By section 4. the Justices may refuse a case if they think the application frivolous. Then by section 5, where they so refuse, there is power to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to the Justices to state a case, and where the Justices are then ordered to state a case, they are to do so, "upon the appellant entering into such recognizance as is hereinbefore provided." So the whole scope of the act is that the recognizance is to be entered into before the case is delivered out, and that it is not a condition precedent that it should be entered within three days after the decision.

[BYLES, J.—If the word "and" in the 3rd section were read "or" there would be no difficulty; it would then be "at the time of making such application, or before a case shall be stated." KEATING, J.—At all events there is the authority of Chapman v. Robinson (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 30) that "shall in every instance enter into a recognizance" does not apply to "the time of making such application." MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—The schedule of the fees to be taken by clerks to Justices helps you. The appellant is to pay these at the time of making the application, and as these depend on the number of folios, they are uncertain, and cannot be known until the case is stated. ERLE, C.J.—The section points to a space of time within which the recognizance is to be entered into, and the two termini of such space are at the time of making the application, and before the case is granted.]

Manisty in reply.—In Chapman v. Robinson (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 30) Lord Campbell said, "We think the recognizance was in time; it was entered into within the time limited for making the application for the case." The practice has always been to give the recognizance within the three days, and it is submitted that that is in accordance with the true meaning of the statute. The construction contended for on behalf of the appellant will give great facilities to paupers, who, by claiming a case, may put the Justices' clerks to the cost of preparing it without giving any security for their payment.

[ERLE, C.J.—We still think the statute is what we are to be guided by, and that the appellant has here entered into the recognizance within the period which the statute allows.]

Bovill, in support of the appeal.—The cattle of the appellant were removed under a licence. The Justices convicted on the ground of such licence being void because the Justice granted it without having, as they say, proper evidence before him. The licence is good on the face of it, and granted by a Justice having jurisdiction to grant it, and that is all that is required.

[BYLES, J.—Is it necessary that the Justice should have witnesses before him when he grants his licence?]

No. There is no power to examine witnesses. He must satisfy himself in the best way he can and if he be satisfied, which he may be from his own knowledge, that the cattle plague has not existed within a mile, he grants his licence. There is no suggestion of any fraud; indeed that is negatived by the finding in the case. Then how can the appellant be properly convicted when he acted under the authority of a licence, licensing him to remove his cattle?

Manisty, for the respondent.—The Justice who granted the licence has stated that he had no evidence before him when he gave the licence; that he had nothing but the appellant's letter, which was founded on a mistake. Then the Justices in Sessions have before them, as a fact, that no evidence was given at all; not that the Magistrate had evidence with which he might or might not have been satisfied, but that he had no evidence at all. It is a condition precedent that the Magistrate be satisfied by the evidence of the inspector, or otherwise, that no case of cattle plague has occurred within one mile of the premises. The Magistrate having in fact acted only on the letter of the appellant without any evidence before him, the Justices in Sessions think the licence so given is void, and it is upon that the opinion of the Court is asked.

[BYLES, J.—You interpret the word "evidence" to mean legal evidence?]

It need not be on oath. The mere incidental statement that the plague is at a place two miles off is no statement that it is not within a mile. There was here a total absence of knowledge in the mind of the Magistrate that it was not within a mile.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction is wrong. The power to convict is given if cattle are removed without the licence of a Magistrate. Here the cattle were removed with the licence of a Magistrate, and therefore the conviction for removing without a licence is in point of law a wrong conviction. The appellant applied for a licence, and it is found by the convicting Justices that there was nothing like an intentional deception or violation of the law on his part; but the Justices considered that they had a right to inquire into the quantity of evidence on which the Magistrate acted who granted the licence. I think they had no power to do so, and the conviction must be quashed. At the same time I must say that I think the Justices, in convicting, appear to me to have acted under a painful sense of duty, and with a determination resolutely to do their duty in a time of danger, and when the necessity for prompt action was of the highest importance to the public.

BYLES, J., KEATING, J. and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

Conviction quashed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

May 5, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. WHITEHEAD.*

35 L. J. M.C. 186; 10 Cox. C.C. 234; L. R. 1 C.C. 33; 14 L. T. 489;
14 W. R. 677.

Evidence—Competency of Witness—Judge may withdraw from the Jury the Evidence of an Incompetent Witness at any Stage of the Trial.

CRIMINAL LAW. EVIDENCE.—It is the duty of the Judge presiding at a trial to decide as to the competency of a witness; and if he has admitted a witness to give evidence, but, upon proof of subsequent facts affecting the capacity of the witness and upon observation of his subsequent demeanour, the Judge changes his opinion as to his competency, the Judge may stop the examination of the witness, strike his evidence out of his notes, and direct the jury to consider the case exclusively with reference to the evidence of the other witnesses.

The prisoner was indicted for an assault with intent to commit a rape.

The following CASE was reserved by the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for Lancaster, holden at Salford.

Hollinrake Whitehead was tried before me and others, my fellow Justices, in and for the said county, at Salford aforesaid, upon the 27th day of October, 1865, upon an indictment charging him with an assault upon one Harriet Pugh, at Todmorden, in the county aforesaid, with the intent the said Harriet Pugh then and there to ravish and carnally know. There were two other counts in the indictment, one of them charging an indecent assault and the other a common assault. The said Harriet Pugh is about seventeen years old, and has always been deaf and dumb. At the trial, it was proposed by the counsel for the prosecution to examine her through the medium of her father. It was stated that he and her sister could hold communication with her by means of arbitrary signs and motions, but that she had not been instructed in the "deaf and dumb alphabet," or in any institution or by any person skilled in communicating with persons labouring under the deprivation with which she is afflicted. The father was sworn truly to interpret in the case, and was requested by the counsel for the prosecution to explain to her the oath about to be administered to her. He then stated that he believed she was unaware of the nature and obligation of an oath, and that, although she had attended Sunday school for some years, he was not prepared to say that she believed in a future state or a condition of future rewards and punishments. Upon this it was objected by the counsel for the defendant that she could not be sworn, and the learned counsel for the prosecution proposed to give evidence independent of the prosecutrix in proof of the offence charged. It was objected that such evidence, in the absence of the direct testimony of the prosecutrix herself, could not be received on such a charge. I did not at the time decide upon this objection, but I caused a person named Beahan, an expert in regard to the education of and communication with deaf and dumb persons, to be summoned to the court for the assistance of myself and the jury in the case. The expert attended forthwith, and before being sworn to interpret, I requested him to endeavour to communicate with the prosecutrix, and particularly to ascertain the extent of her intelligence as to the nature and obligation of an oath. He did so, and intimated his belief that he was able to understand her signs and gestures, and to make himself understood by her, and that she comprehended him when he conversed by signs with her as to heaven and hell. He was then sworn to interpret, and she through him was sworn in the ordinary form. The examination through him then proceeded some way, and among other replies so obtained from the prosecutrix was one that she had consented to what the defendant did to her; she answered "Yes" to almost every question put to her. She was asked, "Did she know the counsel who was examining her?" To this she answered "Yes." The expert at this point informed the Court that he was satisfied he had been mistaken; that the prosecutrix was not able to understand him; and that the means of communication were, from want of training and otherwise, so defective that he felt it would be unsafe in the extreme to proceed with the examination through him or otherwise. Before coming to this conclusion, he again tested her in various ways, and the Court and jury were of opinion that any further examination of the girl under the circumstances would be most unsatisfactory. The counsel for the prosecution then applied that the jury should be discharged from returning a verdict, and that the trial should be adjourned to a further session, in order that in the interval the girl might be sent to a deaf and dumb school and properly instructed. Feeling myself bound by the authority of The King v. Wade (1 Moo. C.C. 86), I refused the application. The counsel for the prosecution then proposed to enter into the evidence of other witnesses in support of the charge, when the objection before mentioned was revived. After argument, I overruled the objection and admitted the evidence, which was in substance as follows:

* Coram Pollock, C.B., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., Pigott, B. and Montague Smith.

About 8.30 p.m., on the night in question, two girls, one the sister of the prosecutrix, and a young man who had been walking on a foot-road to a place called Car Laithe, in the outskirts of Todmorden, were returning homewards in the direction of Todmorden, when they heard a noise which caused them to stand and listen; it was repeated. The sister recognized it as the cry of the prosecutrix, and at her request the others accompanied her, all three running in the direction whence the noise proceeded. It was repeated several times as they approached. After running about 100 yards they found the prosecutrix on the ground across the foot-road, with her clothes thrown upwards over her knees and the defendant on his knees in the act of rising from her. The male witness seized him by the collar and pulled him off the prosecutrix; his trousers also were down. He was seized by the male witness, who (having recognized him and spoken to him by his nickname, "Darling") ultimately released him, and left him on the spot seeking his cap. Meanwhile the prosecutrix rose up; her bonnet was crushed; her dress soiled with sand; her hair dishevelled. She was in tears and put her hand several times to her chest. The footpath on which she was found is on the edge of a valley, and a witness resident on the opposite bank of the valley heard screams from the direction of this road about the time spoken to by the other witnesses. The road for a considerable length is skirted on each side by a wood, after emerging from which, as it approaches the place where the prosecutrix was found with the defendant as aforesaid, it is separated from the fields for a certain length by a hurdle fence on one side of the road only, after which there ceases to be any fence, and access to the fields and the wood is very easy from the road. It was on the part of the road above the hurdle fence that the prosecutrix was found. The foot-road in question is a public foot-road, and is distant nearly half a mile from the residence of the prosecutrix, and is known by the name of the "Lovers' Walk," and the evidence did not shew for what purpose the prosecutrix had gone thither, but it was proved that she had previously gone the same walk with her sister. All the witnesses (except the resident of the other side of the valley) had known the defendant for many years. He worked at the same mill as they did. He had never visited at the house of the prosecutrix or paid his addresses to her, nor, as far as the evidence went, had there been any association between him and her. On cross-examination of the prosecutrix's sister, she admitted that a man had been charged with an assault with intent, &c., upon her sister, the prosecutrix, four to five years ago, but that the case was dismissed by the Magistrates. At the close of the case for the prosecution, the counsel for the defendant called my attention to the fact that the prosecutrix had been duly sworn, and then withdrawn, as above stated, and then submitted there was no case to go to the jury in the absence of her testimony, denying that what was spoken to by the witnesses was done with her consent. I overruled the objection and held that the evidence given was such as was sufficient to go to the jury in support of the charge; but at counsel's request I reserved the point for the opinion of the Court. The defendant called witnesses to prove an alibi; but the jury found him guilty of an assault with intent to ravish. I allowed him to be discharged upon adequate bail to appear for judgment at the next Sessions.

I therefore respectfully desire the opinion of this Court upon the following points, 1. Was it competent for and obligatory for me to discharge the jury under the circumstances, in order that an opportunity might be afforded for the instruction of the prosecutrix? 2. Was it competent for me to leave the case to the jury upon the evidence above appearing, disregarding the doubtful evidence of the prosecutrix herself, and confining their attention entirely to the testimony of the other witnesses?

The case was partly heard on the 28th of April, when it was sent back to the Chairman, in order that the second question might be stated more clearly. In reply, the Chairman stated that the question to which he requested an answer was, "Whether my totally withdrawing the evidence of the prosecutrix from the jury after she was once sworn invalidates the verdict?"

Torr (May 5), for the prisoner.—The simple question is, whether the Judge, having decided that the prosecutrix was competent, could withdraw her evidence from the jury. I say he could not. The prisoner was entitled to the benefit of her evidence. In The Queen v. Hill (2 Den. C.C. 254; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 222) the evidence of a lunatic was admitted, and it was held that he was a competent witness. Lord Campbell, C.J., said, p. 262, "The jury are to decide on the credibility of his evidence." In Jacobs v. Layborn (11 Mee. & W. 685) it was held, that the evidence of a witness whose incompetency was not discovered till he had given part of his evidence, was improperly received; but the distinction between that case and the present is that there it came out as a new fact; here the state of the witness's mind was known from the first, and it is not fair that the prosecuting counsel should call a witness whose competency he knows to be doubtful, and reject her testimony as soon as it makes against the prosecution.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The difficulty I have is, that the witness, having been admitted, and her demeanour being visible to the jury, her manner and the direction of her eyes towards the prisoner, perhaps, might have thrown light on the case. If she had shewn that there was any understanding between her and the prisoner, so as to shew she was not an unwilling performer in the subject-matter of the charge, I think the jury ought to have been told, "If from what has passed during the imperfect examination of the witness you can derive any light, you may do so."]

Hopwood, for the prosecution.—The question is, not whether the prosecutrix was sufficiently competent to give evidence, but whether a Judge has power to change his opinion as to a fact.

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The Judge is the only judge of every fact necessary to determine the question of the admissibility of a witness.]

Certainly, and it follows as a matter of course that he may reject evidence when he finds out that it is not, what he at first thought it, admissible. The question of the competency of the prosecutrix was entirely for the Judge, who was the only judge of the fact necessary to determine it, namely, the amount of intelligence of the witness.

[MARTIN, B.—I once received the evidence of a man, who on examination appeared to be perfectly sane, and no one could have discovered any delusion. The moment he was asked, on cross-examination, what he had been doing the night before, he shewed that he was quite mad. He said he had been flying in the air, that he had seen the devil, and many other absurd things. With great doubt, I left his evidence to the jury.]

The Queen v. Hill (2 Den. C.C. 254; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 222) raised quite a different question—namely, the competency of a particular witness. Jacobs v. Layborn (11 Mee. & W. 685) is a decision directly in my favour, if any were needed. Mr. Baron Rolfe there says, p. 688, "If you once admit the principle that the objection may be taken at any other time than on the voir dire, I do not see how you can object to its being taken at any time," and Lord Abinger's judgment disposes of the question. The point was also so decided in The Queen v. Garner (2 Car. & K. 920) by five Judges. See also Lord Eldon's remarks in Vaughan v. Dorral (2 Swanst. 400) and Needham v. Smith (2 Vern. 464).

[He was then stopped on that point, Pollock, C.B. saying also, as to the first question, it is one we ought not to answer. The question, in fact, is, What course ought the Judge to take on another occasion, if a similar point arises? not Were the proceedings correct on this occasion?]

Torr, in reply.—In Yardley v. Arnold (10 Mee. & W. 145; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 413), Mr. Baron Parke expressed himself strongly against raising objections to the competency of a witness after he has once been sworn. If a Judge decides first one way and then another, which is to be taken to be right?

[POLLOCK, C.B.—The last decision is of course the binding one.]
There is no safety in allowing such a practice.

POLLOCK, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the first question is not one for us to answer, since it is in a hypothetical form; it is not a practical question asking whether what was done here was correct, but seeks to know what course should be taken in future should a similar question arise. The question for us to decide is, was it competent for the Judge to leave the case to the jury on the evidence of the other witnesses alone, striking out the evidence of the prosecutrix? We are all of opinion that the answer should be in the affirmative, and that it was competent for the Judge to withdraw the evidence of the prosecutrix from the jury. For that I have the authority of my learned Brethren to say that we are unanimous; but I desire to say—and I am alone responsible for this—that I was at first struck with the consideration that it was possible that the conduct of the prosecutrix in the witness-box might have led the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. I am now convinced, though I at first put that forward on the strength of what I understood to be Mr. Torr's argument, that I was not correct in that. Taking the answer of the Chairman of Quarter Sessions to what we requested him to answer, his decision on the facts is clear, and we ought to be satisfied with the result. It appears that a witness of doubtful admissibility was produced. The interpreter at first thought that she understood him, and that he had the means of putting himself in communication with her mind. He was soon disabused of that error, for error it certainly was. Her answers were vague, and not germane to the matter in hand: her examination was in fact a perfect farce; no truth could be got at. Thereupon the Judge did what he was perfectly competent to do. He said, "I received the testimony of this witness at first as competent, thinking her to be so. I now reject her as incompetent." I desired to put the point in favour of the prisoner as strongly as possible; but I think the Chairman was quite right in striking out the evidence of the prosecutrix, resting the case merely on the testimony of the other witnesses. That course would not prevent the jury, if they had observed anything in the conduct of the prosecutrix favourable to the defence of the prisoner, from taking that into their consideration. The position of the Chairman seems to be this: "Was I right," he says, "in directing the attention of the jury exclusively to what was evidence, and withdrawing from them what was not?" The whole Court think he was quite right, and that the conviction must be supported. I desired that no point in the case should go uninvestigated or undiscussed, but there is no ground for coming to any other conclusion.

MARTIN, B., BRAMWELL, B., PIGOTT, B., and MONTAGUE SMITH, J. concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

BAIL COURT.

May 7, 1866.

WATTS v. THE JUSTICES OF KENT.
PEARCH v. THE JUSTICES OF KENT.*35 L. J. M.C. 190; sub nom Reg. v. Lambard, L. R. 1 Q.B. 388; 14 W. R. 680.Overruled, Callaghan v. Dollwen, [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. M.C. 110; L. R. 4 C.P. 288, 21 L. T. 827; 17 W. R. 733 (C.P.).Friendly Society—Rules—Reference of Disputes to Justices—Case stated—21 & 22 Vict. c. 101. s. 5.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. s. 2.

FRIENDLY SOCIETY.—Where by the rules of a friendly society disputes between the society and a member are to be referred to Justices pursuant to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101. s. 5, such Justices may be compelled to state and sign a case for the opinion of the superior Court, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

Where the secretary of such a society is summoned as such secretary before Justices to answer a complaint against the society, and an order is thereupon made against the society, the society is substantially the appellant for the purpose of procuring a case to be stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; and therefore when, after the application for the case, the secretary has resigned his post and given the Justice notice of withdrawal of the application, the society may nevertheless continue the proceedings, and obtain a rule ordering the case to be stated, in case of a refusal by the Justices.

It appeared that the Sunbridge Benefit Society was established in 1837, and the rules of the said society were duly certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies on the 1st of February, 1862, under the Friendly Societies Act. By the 2nd rule of the society, "No person belonging to any other benefit society shall be admitted a member of this; and should any member of this society enter any other benefit society he shall be immediately expelled from and forfeit all claims on this."

By the 24th rule, "Should any member be charged with a breach of these rules for which the penalty is exclusion, and he be not present, he shall be summoned to attend the committee to hear and to answer such charges, and any accused member neglecting or refusing to attend after being summoned by the secretary (without assigning a satisfactory cause for his absence) shall be adjudged guilty and dealt with accordingly." By the 32nd rule, "In case of a dispute between this society and any member or person claiming on account of a member or under the rules, reference shall be made to Justices, pursuant to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101. s. 5." In the year 1864, at the suggestion of one William Wadmore, who was then president of the society, a special meeting of the society was held to consider a proposal to amalgamate with another benefit society, namely, a branch lodge, No. 5256, Tonbridge District of the Manchester Unity of Odd Fellows, and at such meeting a resolution was carried in favour of the proposed amalgamation. On the 6th of October, 1864, a second meeting was held, when the votes in favour of and against the amalgamation were equal, and Wadmore not having previously voted gave his vote as chairman in favour of the amalgamation, and on the same evening William Wadmore, Robert Palmer, James Jones, and many other members of the society joined the Branch Lodge of the Odd Fellows. The legality of this meeting was questioned by other members of the Sunbridge Benefit Society who were opposed to the amalgamation, and its trustees refused to sell out or transfer its funds. The society continued to exist, and treated Wadmore, Palmer, Jones, and others as persons who had voluntarily withdrawn from it, and declined to receive further subscriptions from them. In December, 1864, the Branch Lodge of Odd Fellows was broken up, and their effects, &c. handed over to the Tonbridge District of the Society of Odd Fellows. Disputes arose between the above-named persons and the Sunbridge Benefit Society as to the right of the former to be still considered as members of the latter, and in the end they were recognized again as members of the Sunbridge Benefit Society, and their subscriptions received. But in March, 1865, Wadmore and Palmer were served with a notice, under the 24th rule, to attend the committee to answer a charge, under the 2nd rule, of having become members of the (Tonbridge District) Sunbridge Branch of Odd Fellows.

* Coram, Shee, J.

On the day appointed (March 15) they attended; but as the committee decided that they would hear the cases separately, and would only admit one at a time to the room, they went away, and the committee investigated the charge in their absence, and expelled them from the society. Jones received a similar summons for the 27th of March, and attended before the committee, and made a statement in answer to the charge, but was, nevertheless, expelled.

In April, 1865, Wadmore, Palmer and Jones laid complaints before the Justices sitting in petty sessions at Sevenoaks, to the effect that a dispute had arisen between them and the Sunbridge Benefit Society respecting their right to continue members, and that they had been illegally expelled from the society; and Watts, the then secretary of the society, was summoned, as such secretary, to answer the complaints. The complaints were heard, and the Justices, thinking that the subsequent recognition of them by the society and receipt of their subscriptions waived the previous wrongful acts, determined that Wadmore and Palmer had not been legally expelled from the society, and ordered that Wadmore should be reinstated as a member, or the society should pay him the sum of 50*l.*; and that Palmer should be reinstated, or the society should pay him the sum of 25*l.*

Application was then made by Watts to the Justices to state a case for the opinion of the Court, and recognizances were entered into for that purpose, and other summonses were adjourned to await the decision of this Court.

Watts shortly afterwards resigned his office of secretary, and Peach was appointed secretary in his stead.

In December, 1865, Jones summoned Peach before the Justices at the same petty sessions to recover the sum of 18*s.* for the allowance during sickness payable to him as a member of the Sunbridge Benefit Society, under the rules of the said society. The hearing of that summons was adjourned from time to time, and was ultimately heard before the said Justices, on the 23rd of February, 1866, when it appeared by the minute-book of the society that Jones was expelled, under the 2nd and 24th rules, on the 27th of March, 1865, and no subscriptions had been since received from him; and it was then contended by the society that the Justices had no jurisdiction in the matter, as the complainant was not a member of the society; but the Justices heard and adjudicated on the said complaint, and ordered the society to pay Jones 18*s.* for sick allowance, and 10*s.* for costs. Peach then duly demanded a case, and tendered recognizances; but the Justices refused, and a distress was afterwards levied upon the goods of Peach for the said sums.

The Justices stated at the time of adjudication on Jones's case that they had received a notice from Watts, the late secretary, to say that he did not wish to proceed further with the cases of Wadmore and Palmer; and that, therefore, they should decline to state any case for the opinion of this Court.

A rule had been obtained, by Besley, calling upon the said Justices to shew cause why they should not state and sign a case, pursuant to the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, setting forth the facts and grounds of their judgment or determination upon the hearing of certain complaints preferred by the said W. Wadmore and R. Palmer against J. Watts, as the secretary representing the Sunbridge Benefit Society, that they had been unjustly and illegally expelled from the said society contrary to the rules thereof.

F. M. White now shewed cause.—The application is made under the 20 & 21

Vict. c. 43. s. 5, which gives this Court power to compel Justices to state a case who have refused to do so after being applied to under the 2nd section of that act. Section 2. enacts, "that after the hearing and determination by a Justice or Justices of the Peace of any information or complaint which he or they have power to determine in a summary way, either party to the proceeding may, if dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, apply in writing . . . to the said Justice or Justices to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination, for the opinion thereon of one of the superior Courts of law, to be named by the party applying."

By section 3. the appellant must enter into a recognizance before such Justice or Justices, or any other Justice exercising the same jurisdiction, conditioned to prosecute without delay such appeal, and to submit to the judgment of the superior Court. This statute only contemplates a proceeding where Justices are acting in the execution of their office as Justices; but it is submitted that in the present case they are appointed by virtue of the rules and statute merely to be arbitrators, and that the proceeding before them is merely an arbitration, and not a magisterial proceeding, in the proper meaning of the term.

The 32nd rule, above set out, provides that disputes between members shall be referred to Justices, pursuant to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 101. s. 5. That section enacts, "that where the rules of any society established under the said act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), or any of the acts thereby repealed, shall direct disputes to be referred to Justices, then any Justice of the Peace acting in the county or borough in which the place of business of such society shall be situated, upon complaint made by any member, his executors, administrators, nominees or assigns, or by any person claiming under the rules of the society, of any matter in dispute between him or them and the society, to summon the person against whom such complaint is made, to appear at a time and place to be named in such summons, and any two Justices present at the time and place mentioned in such summons shall proceed to hear and determine the said complaint, which complaint shall be heard and determined in England, in manner directed by the act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and in Ireland in manner directed by the act, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93; and such Justices may make such order thereupon, either for the payment of money or otherwise, together with costs, not exceeding 10s., as they shall think fit; and where the order shall be for the doing of some act other than the payment of money, the said Justices may order the payment of a sum of money in default of the doing of such act; and any monies which shall be paid by any officer of the society, so levied on his property under any order or warrant, the Justices shall be repaid with all damages accruing to him by the society."

Harington, in support of the rule, was not heard on the above point.

SHEE, J.—The rule must be made absolute. The case is clearly within the statute.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

April 28, 1866.

UNWIN AND ANOTHER, appellants, v. CLARKE, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 193; L. R. 1 Q.B. 417; 14 L. T. 356; 14 W. R. 688;
12 Jur. N.S. 429.

Followed, Smart v. Pessol, 1874, 30 L. T. 692 (Q.B.).

Master and Servant—4 Geo. 4. c. 34. s. 3.—Second Imprisonment of Workman for Renewed Breach of the same Contract of Service—Rescission of Contract.

MASTER AND SERVANT.—Under 4 Geo. c. 34. s. 3. (which enables Magis- trates to punish with imprisonment certain classes of workmen who are guilty of breaches of their contracts of service, or to abate the whole or part of their wages, or to discharge them from their employment) a workman may be convicted a second time for persisting, on his return from imprisonment, in absenting himself from the service of his employer, as the contract is not rescinded by the mere fact of imprisonment. And although the offender bona fide believes that a conviction will dissolve his contract, and opinions of Judges can be cited in support of such a belief, this is no lawful excuse, but only matter for the discretion of the Magistrates in imposing punishment.

CASE stated by Justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 15th of November, 1865, the respondent, who is a cutler at Sheffield, appeared before one of the Justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire, acting for the borough of Sheffield, in answer to a summons issued at the instance of the appellants (who are cutlery manufacturers at Sheffield), under 4 Geo. 4. c. 34, charging him with the following offence: "That he did at the borough aforesaid, on the 1st day of June, 1865, by memorandum in writing, contract to serve John Unwin, Philip Unwin, and Philip Askham, of Sheffield, in the said borough, cutlery manufacturers, and co-partners in trade, carrying on business under the style or firm of Unwin and Rodgers, as a journeyman in the business and employment of a spring-knife cutler, for a term of two years from the 1st day of June, 1865, at wages at certain prices named in the said memorandum, and having entered into his service according to his contract, had been, in the execution of the contract, and otherwise respecting the same, guilty of a misdemeanor, for that he did, on the 7th of November, 1865, before the term of his contract was completed, and on the 11th of November still did, unlawfully absent himself from his service without leave or lawful excuse, and without his master's consent, and neglected to fulfil the conditions of the contract, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided."

At the hearing, the appellants proved that the respondent had by a written agreement, dated the 1st of June, 1865, between himself and the appellants, hired himself to, and agreed with them to work for them solely for the term of two years from the date of the agreement, at a schedule of prices named therein, and that he would not hire himself during the term of two years, nor actually agree to serve nor be employed for any other person or persons except the appellants in any trade whatsoever, nor be employed on his own account nor for his own profit. And in consideration of such work being done, the appellants agreed to find the respondent full employment for the term of two years, and to pay him wages for the same at the prices named in the schedule. The respondent entered into his employment at the date of the agreement, and continued to work for the appellants until November last, when he absented himself and refused to perform his agreement.

At the hearing, the respondent, in answer to the charge, said that he had applied to the appellants to make an advance in his wages in the same manner that the large majority of cutlery-manufacturers in Sheffield had recently done to their hired workmen, which the appellants had refused to do; and in consequence he had felt himself justified in refusing to work for them at the low rate of wages. He declared that he would not return to his work, but would go to prison and break his agreement.

The Justice pointed out to the respondent that the agreement was fixed and certain as to the prices, and could not be altered except by mutual consent; and as the masters declined to raise the prices, he would have to be committed to prison unless he promised to return to his work and perform his agreement. The respondent still refused, and said he would not return to his work at the prices named, and would sooner go to prison, and so break his agreement, if the Magistrates should so adjudge him. He was thereupon committed to prison for twenty-one days, to be kept to hard labour, and his wages to be abated during that period, which sentence was carried out.

On the 15th of December, 1865, the respondent appeared before two Justices for the borough of Sheffield, in answer to a second summons, issued on the 11th of December, 1865, at the instance of the appellants, under the same statute. This summons stated his contract with the appellants in the same terms as the previous one, and charged that, having entered into the service according to his contract, he had been, in the execution of the contract and otherwise respecting the same, guilty of a misdemeanor, "for that he did on the 7th of December, 1866, before the term of his contract was completed, and on the 11th of December still did unlawfully absent himself from his service without leave or lawful excuse, and without his master's consent, and neglected to fulfil the conditions of the contract, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided."

At this second hearing the agreement was again produced, and it was also proved that since the respondent's liberation from prison he had not returned to his work, but had gone to his masters' premises and demanded his working tools (his own private property in the possession of his masters), when he was told by one of his masters that he must return to his work and carry out the terms of his agreement. He replied that he should not, as he considered his agreement broken and at an end by his going to prison.

In defence, before the Justices, it was contended by the respondent's attorney, that although the agreement might still be in existence, it could not be enforced by them, and that they had no power to commit the respondent to prison a second time for the same offence. In support of this argument the cases of Ex parte Baker (2 Hurl. & N. 219; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 155) and Youle v. Mappin (6 Hurl. & N. 753; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 234) were cited.

The Justices were of opinion that the respondent bona fide believed that he could not be compelled to return to his employment after having been sent to prison, and that he did not intend to return after his discharge therefrom. They were also of opinion that the agreement still existed, and was in full force and operation, and that the fact of the respondent going to prison and afterwards refusing to return to his work did not operate to destroy the contract. As, however, from the cases above cited, they considered it doubtful whether they had the power to commit the respondent to prison a second time, they dismissed the information, and at the request of the appellants stated this case.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether, under the circumstances above stated, the Justices had power to commit the respondent to prison a second time, as they would have done if they had thought that they had power so to do.

Price (Waddy with him), for the respondents.—The Justices had power to commit the appellant a second time under 4 Geo. 4 c. 34.¹ Ex parte Baker

(1) By 4 Geo. 4. c. 34. s. 3. "If any servant in husbandry or any artificer, calico-printer, handicraftsman, miner, collier, keelman, pitman, glassman, potter, labourer, or other person shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever, to serve him, her or them for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner, and shall not enter into or commence his or her service according to his or her contract (such contract being in writing and signed by the contracting parties), or having entered into such service shall absent himself or herself from his or her service before the term of his or her contract, whether such contract shall be in writing or not in writing, shall be completed, or neglect to fulfil the same, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor in the execution thereof, or otherwise respecting the same, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any Justice of the Peace of the county or place where such servant in husbandry, &c., labourer or other person shall have so contracted, or be employed, or be found, and such Justice is hereby authorized and empowered, upon complaint thereof, made upon oath to him by the person or persons, or any of them, with whom such servant in husbandry, &c., labourer or other person shall have so contracted, or by his, her or their steward, manager or agent, which oath such Justice is hereby empowered to administer, to issue his warrant for the apprehending every such servant in husbandry, &c., or other person, and to examine into the nature of the complaint, and if it shall appear to such Justice that any such servant, &c., or other person shall not have fulfilled such contract, or hath been guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for such Justice to commit every such person to the House of Correction, there to remain and be held to hard labour for a reasonable time not exceeding three months, and to abate a proportionable part of his or her wages for and during such period as he or she

(7 El. & B. 696; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 193) is in point. There a workman was convicted a second time though he had never re-entered the service of his master after quitting it; Lord Campbell saying, "As to the first point, I think a fresh offence was committed when the prisoner, after being liberated from imprisonment, did not return to the service because the contract continued and he absented himself, that is a distinct offence from the offence of which he had been before convicted." And Mr. Justice Coleridge, "It was the duty of the prisoner to return to the service, and if he does not he is liable to be again convicted as much as if he had gone back to his master's premises and walked out." The prisoner in Ex parte Baker (7 El. & B. 696; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 193) applied to the Court of Exchequer for a habeas corpus (2 Hurl. & N. 219; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 155), and there Chief Baron Pollock and Mr. Baron Martin expressed an opinion different from that of the Court of Queen's Bench.

[BLACKBURN, J.—But that was on a by-point. The question in the Queen's Bench was more like the present one.]

The statute was passed for the purpose of compelling workmen to perform their contracts. The section gives to the Magistrates an express power of discharging the prisoner from his employment. This is a strong reason for inferring that the legislature did not intend that the imprisonment which it imposed should put an end to the contract of service. It can make no difference to the master if the workman absents himself, by going away for his own pleasure or by going to prison. As for the objection that the respondent bona fide believed that he was at liberty to absent himself, Youle v. Mappin (6 Hurl. & N. 753; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 234), where the Court thought that a workman who had bona fide acted on the advice of his solicitor was not liable to be convicted, will be relied on. But it is submitted that the effect of the agreement is a question of law, and the bona fides of the belief in any particular construction is immaterial.

Quain, for the appellants.—The section in question is a one-sided piece of legislation of the most penal character, and ought to be construed with great strictness.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Surely we have only to ascertain the meaning of the legislature from the words used.]

The section makes no provision for compelling the master to receive the workman back in his employment. The contract is treated as rescinded and gone.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I am not aware of any case to shew that two actions may not be brought for different breaches of the same contract.]

The Magistrates must be presumed to have punished the respondent for the absence which he threatened as well as for that of which he had been guilty. In Youle v. Mappin (6 Hurl. & N. 753; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 234) Martin, B. repeated his impression that a workman must be punished once for all under this statute; saying that otherwise the man might be kept in prison during the whole term of his service, and a species of slavery would be created. There cannot be more than one breach of the workman's agreement to enter upon his service, and yet the same arguments as those which have been used in the present case might be urged to prove that the contract to enter the service was not rescinded by breach.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The mischief is much greater when the servant has once entered upon his service.]

When is the Statute of Limitations to begin to run with respect to a breach of the contract?

[BLACKBURN, J.—I should say there would be no bar till the end of the service.]

shall be so confined in the House of Correction, or in lieu thereof to punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages, or to discharge such servant in husbandry, &c., or other person from his or her contract, service or employment, which discharge shall be given under the hand and seal of such Justice gratis."

The opinion of Martin, B. in Youle v. Mappin (6 Hurl. & N. 753; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 234) is directly to the contrary.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In the report of that case in the Law Journal Reports, the observations of my Brother Martin are not of so decided a character.]

With regard to the question of bona fides, Rider v. Wood (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1) is in point.

[MELLOR, J.—Do you say that if a workman acted under the advice of one of his companions, who was reputed to be an authority on the subject, that this would entitle him to the benefit of a bona fide belief?

Here Judges have differed, and still differ, as to the construction of the section.

Price, in reply.

[BLACKBURN, J.—In this case our judgment is in favour of the appellants. The question is one turning upon the construction and effect of a statute, the terms of which have been so thoroughly brought to our notice that there is no reason why we should bestow further time upon it. We have arrived at the same conclusion, but not quite for the same reasons. My own judgment and that of my Brother Mellor are, apart from the authorities, in favour of the appellants; my Brother Shee will explain how far he concurs with us. It is our duty to find out the meaning of the act 6 Geo. 4. c. 34. This act was, no doubt, passed for the protection and assistance of masters against their workmen. It has been said that it was a one-sided piece of legislation, but we have only to do with its meaning. If it be a one-sided piece of legislation, the best thing we can do is to enforce the observation of it, in order that its defects may be made notorious. Section 3. provides that if any servant in husbandry, &c.—[His Lordship read the section.]—Now, the first question with regard to these words is, has the respondent “absented himself” within the meaning of the section? The respondent, after entering into service, refused to stay because his employer would not raise his wages. He is brought before the Justices, and imprisoned for twenty-one days. At the end of that time he came back, asked for his tools, and refused to continue in his employment because he thought that his imprisonment excused him from going on with his work. We have to say whether this second refusal was an “absenting himself” within the meaning of the statute. It seems to me that it was. The contract, which was a contract to serve for two years, had not been performed; and the respondent refuses to work, and stays away when it is still in force. It has been contended on his behalf that the contract having been once broken was rescinded, and that his obligation to serve was at an end, so that he could not be imprisoned a second time. But in all the cases that I can remember, a breach of a contract, accompanied by a declaration of an intention not to complete it, was held to give an option to the person injured, if he pleased, to rescind, but to give no rights to the wrong-doer. There can be no doubt that if the present case had existed in an action at law against the respondent, it would have been no plea for him to have said, that though his contract did not expire till June, he had absented himself during the previous month of May; for his contract, despite his absence, would still continue. Then it was said that the authority of the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Martin was in favour of the proposition that under this section, where a man has once been imprisoned for absenting himself from his employment, the master must be taken to have elected his remedy, and that the workman cannot be imprisoned again for the same offence. But there are no words in the statute by which such a view can be supported, and the presumption is against it; since the section gives power to the Magistrates to discharge the workman from his service. Mr. Quain hardly contended that there had been a rescission of the contract; and I do not see why a workman should be punished for an offence which he has only threatened to commit, or why he should be allowed to get rid of an engagement for two years by a slight imprisonment. In Ex parte Baker (7 El. & B. 696; s. c. 26 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 193) the Judges all thought that there had been a fresh offence, for which there might be a second imprisonment. The case was carried to the Exchequer, where my Brother Martin expressed himself strongly against the view of the Queen's Bench. I think, however, that the majority of the Judges who have had to consider this subject have expressed themselves in favour of the construction which we now adopt; and that being so, I have no hesitation in saying that the respondent has absented himself without lawful excuse within the meaning of the statute.

As to the second point, it was held in In re Turner (9 Q.B. Rep. 80; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 140) that though the words "without lawful excuse" were not in the statute, the conviction was wrong, as there might have been a lawful excuse; as if the man had had his leg broken, or were otherwise disabled. In Rider v. Wood (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1) it appeared that the workman had a right to terminate his service on giving notice, and that he gave what he thought to be a good notice; and it was held, that as he had stayed away under a mistake in fact, he could not be convicted. But there was hardly such a mistake here. There was no doubt about the facts; and the respondent can only be assumed to have thought, relying on the opinions of the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Martin in the Exchequer, that he might lawfully absent himself. But this was only a mistake as to the law, which no man can set up in his defence. The Justices might think that this was a good ground for imposing only a nominal punishment; or they might reasonably conclude, looking at all the circumstances, that the respondent had contumaciously absented himself. I think, therefore, that there ought to have been a conviction; and the case must be sent down to the Justices for a re-hearing, and to convict or not, as they think proper.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The view which we have adopted is contrary to that of my Brother Martin, but I think that his doctrine is not applicable to this case. The principle that a man ought not to be punished twice for the same offence is enforced in penal statutes where there can be but one offence which is made liable to punishment by the legislature. But I cannot think where a workman has been imprisoned under this section that he ought not to be again punished after coming out of prison because he has been guilty of a previous offence. My opinion is much fortified when I consider the power of discharging the workman from his service which is contained in the section, and which would be a very unnecessary provision if imprisonment put an end to the contract. With regard to the question of bona fides, I agree with my Brother Blackburn in thinking that it could only be considered by the Magistrates in mitigation of punishment. It would be a most mischievous decision if we held that an erroneous impression as to the law of the country could prevent a conviction under this statute.

SHEE, J.—I should certainly not have arrived at the same conclusion as my learned Brethren if the question had not been recently before the Courts, and the weight of authority had not been in favour of their opinion; as it seems to me that the respondent was not properly convicted. The words of the section are as follows.—[His Lordship read then.] Now it appears to me perfectly clear from these words that for the offence of not entering upon his duties, a workman can only be punished once, by imprisonment for three months; and having undergone that term of imprisonment he could not again be punished for not returning to his duties. And I cannot think that any difference was contemplated in a case where a man has entered upon his service and absents himself from it. A workman, in my opinion, has ceased to be in his master's service within the words of the statute when he has once absented himself, and where he is proved to have expressed his intention not to return, I think that he ought to be punished once for all. I entirely agree with what was said by the Lord Chief Baron and my Brother Martin in Youle v. Mappin (6 Hurl. & N. 753; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 234).

With regard to the other point, I think that a mens rea must be proved; and here I agree with the opinion of my Brother Martin in Rider v. Wood (29 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 1), and cannot see the distinction suggested by my Brother Blackburn. To prove that the respondent has absented himself within the statute must not two things be shewn, viz. that he has stayed away without lawful excuse, and with the knowledge that he had no such excuse? In The Queen v. Langford (Car. & M. 602) it was held that where persons riotously assembled for the purpose of demolishing a house, really believing that it was the property of one of them, and in the assertion of a supposed right, the act was not a felonious one within 7 & 8 Geo. 4. c. 30. s. 8. Here the respondent really believed that his contract was rescinded, and that he was justified in refusing to return. My opinion is, therefore, independently of the authorities, that he ought not to have been convicted.

Judgment for the appellants.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 7, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. SIR GEORGE GREY, BART.

35 L. J. M.C. 198; 7 B. & S. 434; L. R. 1 Q.B. 469; 14 L. T. 477; 14 W. R. 671; 12 Jur. N.S. 685.

Salmon-Fishery District, Limits of—Secretary of State—28 & 29 Vict. c. 121. ss. 4. and 5.

FISH AND FISHERIES.—When the Justices in Quarter Sessions for a county apply under the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121. s. 4. to a Secretary of State to form into a fishery district or districts all or any of the salmon rivers lying wholly or partly within their county, it is for such Secretary of State to fix by his certificate the limits of the district which he shall form in accordance with such request, and those limits need not be the same as those which had been intended by the Sessions.

This was a rule calling upon the Home Secretary to shew cause why a certiorari should not issue to bring up a certificate under his hand, forming the River Tees Fishery District, in order that it might be quashed.

It appeared from the affidavits that, under the provision contained in the 4th section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, the Justices of the North Riding of Yorkshire, at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, 1865, made an application to the defendant, the Secretary for the Home Department, to form into a salmon fishery district so much of the river Tees as was below a specified point, together with its tributaries in the county of Durham and the North Riding. In the application certain limits were set out as those which the Justices suggested should be the limits of the district. The defendant exercised the power given to him by the same section, and made his certificate as provided by the 5th section; but it appeared therefrom that he had included in the district formed by him the whole of the river Tees and its estuary in the two counties, and a certain portion of the sea coast, and the streams flowing into the sea between two specified points. The limits defined by the certificate were more extensive than those set out in the application by the Justices, and included parts which they had not intended should form part of the district.

The Solicitor General (Sir R. P. Collier) and Hannen shewed cause against the rule.—The question turns entirely upon the 3rd, 4th and 5th sections of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121. The 3rd section enacts, that the word "river" shall include such portion of any stream or lake, with its tributaries and such portion of any estuary, sea or sea-coast, as may from time to time be declared in manner hereinafter provided to belong to such "river"; and that "salmon river" shall mean any river as above defined, frequented by salmon or the young of salmon. By the 4th section it is enacted, that "The Justices of a county at any Court of Quarter Sessions held after the passing of this act (due notice having been previously given according to the practice of the said sessions), may, by writing under the hand of their chairman, apply to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State to form into a fishery district or districts all or any of the salmon rivers lying wholly or partly within their county, and the said Secretary of State may form such district or districts accordingly, and may include in any district so formed any river or rivers, or parts thereof, although not situated in the county on behalf of which the application is made." And the 5th section enacts that, "The limits of a river shall be defined for the purposes of this act, and a fishery district shall be formed, by a certificate under the hand of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, describing the limits of the river or district by a reference to a map or otherwise, as to the said secretary may appear expedient, but no such certificate shall be granted unless one month's previous notice of the intention of the said secretary to grant the same, and of the intended limits of the river or district, has been given by advertisement in such newspaper or newspapers published or circulating within the intended limits, and in such daily morning newspaper or newspapers published in London, as may be directed by the said Secretary of State, and when a certificate has been granted, a copy shall be advertised in such newspaper or newspapers." There is nothing to shew that the Secretary of State is to be bound by the determination of the Sessions as to the limits, or that the Sessions before making their application to him are to mark out the boundaries of the district, while it seems clear that he is the person who, under section 4, is to "form" such district, and, under section 5, to make the certificate defining the limits. The application by the Justices may be in the most general terms, without setting out any limits whatever, but the metes and bounds are, by section 5, to be described by "a reference to a map or otherwise," and this is to be done by the Secretary of State. This is the first time a map is mentioned in the act. No doubt he could not mark out limits beyond the boundaries of the counties, but with that limitation he is to exercise a reasonable discretion as to what the limits should be. Then it is also clear that all persons who wish to object have an opportunity of doing so, for by section 5. no certificate can be granted until a month's notice has been given by advertisement. There would be no use in publishing such advertisement if the limits were fixed beforehand by the Sessions; and, again, power is given to him to include parts of rivers which are not situated in the county on behalf of which the application is made. The Justices of a county have no such power as that.—[They referred to *Ex parte Smith*¹ and to Chapman v. Bowlby (8 Mee & W. 249; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 299), although they admitted that there was no case bearing much upon the question.]

Mellish and Simpson, in support of the rule.—If the view presented on behalf of the Secretary of State be correct, there would be no necessity for going to the Sessions at all. The proper course is, that notice is to be given to the Sessions, so that the matter may be argued before them and decided by them, and then that they should apply to the secretary, who is to form the district "accordingly"; i. e. in accordance with the determination of the Sessions to apply for the formation of the district. That is the only meaning which can reasonably be given to the word "accordingly." The Sessions having fully inquired into the case, determine what the limits are to be; but those limits are to be defined, i. e. made clear by reference to a plan or otherwise by the Secretary of State. The word "defined" does not mean the same as "settled," which would probably be the word used if the contention on the other side were right. The result of discharging the rule will be, that all the persons whose property is included within the limits fixed by the Secretary of State will be liable to be taxed for the preservation of salmon in the Tees, though they may have nothing to do with that river, and although the Sessions did not intend that their lands should be included in the district.

(1) 1 Best & S. 412; s. c. nom. In re the District of Todmorden, 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 305.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that this rule must be discharged. The question turns entirely upon the language of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121. It is true that the intention of the legislature is not so expressed as to be self-evident, but it seems to me to be clear enough. The first clause of the 3rd section shews what the word "river" shall include; it is to be first taken to mean what it would mean according to its ordinary popular sense, and further, it is to include such portion of any estuary, sea or sea-coast as may from time to time be declared, in manner hereinafter provided, to belong to such river. These portions would not be included in the ordinary popular sense of the word. Then, in the same section, the words "'salmon river' shall mean any river as above defined frequented by salmon or young of salmon." The 4th section gives power to the Justices in Quarter Sessions to apply to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State to form into a fishery district or districts all or any of the salmon rivers lying wholly or partly within their county—(His Lordship read the section);—and then section 5. shews how the district is to be formed and the limits defined, namely, by a certificate under the hand of the Secretary of State. The initiative is therefore given to the Sessions where the river or rivers are wholly or partly within the county, and to them is intrusted the province of seeing whether or not it is expedient that a fishery district or districts should be formed. If they think so, they may apply to a Secretary of State, and then, as seems quite proper, the legislature has intrusted such secretary with power to define what shall be the boundaries, and to form the district including such river or rivers or parts thereof, and it must be supposed that he would act reasonably, and define such limits as would be reasonable and right. This power is shewn by section 4, and I agree with the argument of Mr. Hannen, that the Secretary of State is to form the district, and he is to include such parts as he may think fit. The Justices at the West Riding Quarter Sessions would have no jurisdiction to decide that part of another county should be included, but the Secretary of State may do so, power being given him to that effect by the latter part of section 4. By the 5th section, no certificate is to be granted unless one month's previous notice be given by advertisement, of the intention to grant the same, and of the "intended" limits. The meaning is plain; the Secretary of State is to define the limits, and say what part of the coast, &c. may be included, but the period of a month is given before the certificate is granted, so that any person may come in and object, if he thinks fit; but that opportunity having been given, confidence is placed in the Secretary of State that he will not do anything unreasonable. I am therefore of opinion that in this case the Home Secretary had jurisdiction to make his certificate as he has made it, and that the rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The scheme of the act seems to be that the Justices are to determine the expediency of making an application to the Secretary of State for the purpose of having a district formed, and then, as seems very reasonable, that the defining the limits and formation of the district should be intrusted to another authority, inasmuch as part of another county may be added. There might be great difficulty in bringing about the joint action of the several Courts of Quarter Sessions, and the legislature contemplated giving power to the Secretary of State to form the district, but that a month's notice of the intention should be given in order to prevent prejudice to other persons. Why is it that such a notice should not be prescribed to be given by the Sessions if it was their province to define the limits of the district? But there is no provision to that effect. The object of the notice is to give an opportunity to any person who has an objection to any particular portion being included in the district, to appeal to the Secretary of State, and request him not to include it so as to affect his interests. If it were otherwise, one would expect some machinery to be given by the act such as we find for including highways within a district, but no such machinery is given, and as the Secretary of State has power to include parts of another county, there is good reason for holding that the Home Secretary in the present case had power to make the certificate and define the limits.

LUSH, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The scheme is, that the provision is not to apply to any salmon river, unless the Justices first determine that it is advisable; and then it lies on the Secretary of State to form the district and define its limits. I rely on the 4th section and the others which have been referred to by my Brothers. All persons interested have a right to come and object if they please. Under section 4. the Justices have a right to apply that any given river may be formed into a district, but they have no power to define the limits; while by sections 3. and 4. the Secretary of State may declare that any portion of the estuary, sea, or sea-coast, or parts of other counties, may be included. Therefore, the Justices have to determine whether a particular river or rivers ought to be brought within the provisions of the act, but it lies upon the Secretary of State to form the district and define the limits.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

April 26, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. THE JUSTICES OF KENT.

35 L. J. M.C. 201; 7 B. & S. 394; L. R. 1 Q.B. 385; 14 L. T. 331;
14 W. R. 635.

Appeal to Sessions—Order removing Lunatic Pauper—Union within several Jurisdictions—16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 108.

POOR LAW.—By stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 108. an appeal is given to any union or parish against an order adjudicating the settlement of a lunatic, confined in an asylum, to the Quarter Sessions for the county within which the union or parish obtaining the order is situate, or if the union or parish extend into several jurisdictions, then to the Quarter Sessions of the county or borough in which the asylum it situate. Where such an order was obtained by a union which was made up of parishes, some of which were within a city, which, though in the county, had separate Quarter Sessions, and some in the county without the city,—Held, that the appeal against the order was to the Quarter Sessions for the county, and not to the Sessions of the borough within which the asylum was situate.

Rule calling upon the Justices of Kent to shew cause why they should not enter continuances and hear an appeal. The appeal was against an order of Justices, obtained by the guardians of the Medway Union, adjudging the settlement of a lunatic pauper, confined in the Barming Heath Asylum, to be in the parish of Aldershot, and directing the overseers of that parish to pay the customary maintenance expenses. Part of the Medway Union is in the city of Rochester, which, though in Kent, has a Recorder and a separate Court of Quarter Sessions; and part of the union is in Kent, and within the jurisdiction of the Kent Quarter Sessions. The asylum in which the lunatic was confined is within the boundary of the borough of Maidstone, which has its own Court of Quarter Sessions. When the appeal came on for hearing it was objected by the respondents that the Court had no jurisdiction, as the Medway Union extended into the separate jurisdictions of the county of Kent and the city of Rochester, and that the appeal ought therefore, according to the situation of the asylum, to have been entered at the Maidstone Sessions. The Justices thereupon dismissed the appeal, and the present rule was obtained.

Poland shewed cause.—The Sessions had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 108, “If the guardians of any union or parish, or the overseers of any parish, feel aggrieved by any such order as aforesaid adjudging the settlement of any lunatic, they or he may appeal against the same to the next general Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county in behalf of which such order has been obtained, or in which the union or parish obtaining such order is situate; or in case such parish or union extends into several jurisdictions, then to the next general Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county or borough in which the asylum, registered hospital or licensed house in which such lunatic is or has been confined is situate, and such Sessions, upon hearing the said appeal, shall have full power finally to determine the matter.” Here, the Medway Union is within the jurisdiction of a county and of a borough, and the same principle must govern the case as if the union had been within the jurisdiction of several counties.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose that the union were composed of two boroughs, would there then be no appeal to the county Sessions, although, if the union were composed of either borough alone, the appeal would lie?]

It is true that in The Queen v. the Justices of Warwickshire (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 249) it was held that an appeal against an order of removal obtained by a parish situate wholly within a borough having separate Quarter Sessions, was to the county and not to the borough Sessions. But Mr. Justice Crompton, during the argument, said, “The last branch of the section (108.) means, when the parish is not wholly within one jurisdiction, but is partly in the borough and partly in the county, then the situation of the asylum shall determine the tribunal for appeal.” These words are exactly appropriate to the present case.—[He was then heard upon a second objection, upon which no judgment was given.]

Barrow, in support of the rule, was not called upon to argue.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I think that the rule must be made absolute, and that the Sessions have not put the right construction upon 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97. s. 108. That section enacts, “that if the guardians of any union or parish, or the overseers of any parish, feel aggrieved by any such order as aforesaid, adjudging the settlement of any lunatic, they or he may appeal against the same to the next general Sessions for the county on behalf of which such order has been obtained, or in which the union or parish obtaining such order is situate.” With reference to this part of the section, the Court of Queen’s Bench decided, in The Queen v. the Justices of Warwickshire (28 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 249), that where a parish is entirely situate within a borough having separate Quarter Sessions, the appeal is to the county and not to the borough Sessions. The section proceeds, “Or in case such parish or union extends into several jurisdictions, then to the Sessions for the county or borough in which the asylum is situate.” The legislature seems to have thought that difficulties might arise where the parish or union was in several counties, and they made the solution of these difficulties depend on a fact about which it would seem that there could be no dispute, that is, on the situation of the asylum. It is, however, quite possible for a building to be in several jurisdictions, according to the construction contended for, and I therefore think that the words "several jurisdictions" must be construed as if it were several such jurisdictions, that is, counties. With regard to the dictum attributed to Mr. Justice Crompton, I cannot but think that his Lordship would not, on consideration, have adhered to it. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the appeal was to the Quarter Sessions for the county of Kent.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with my Brother Blackburn in thinking that the words "several jurisdictions" must be construed several such jurisdictions.

Rule absolute.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 2, 1866.

SMITH (appellant) v. REDDING (respondent).

35 L. J. M.C. 202; 6 B. & S. 617; L. R. 1 Q.B. 489; 14 L. T. 358;
12 Jur. N.S. 618.

Referred to, R. v. Local Board of Grasmere, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. Q.B. 181.

Beer-House—Hours of Closing—Population—Parish or Place—3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. s. 15.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.—A beer-house situated in a hamlet maintaining its own poor, but included in a parish the population of which according to the last census exceeds 2,500, may, under the 15th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, be kept open until eleven o'clock at night, although the population of the hamlet itself does not exceed 2,500.

CASE stated by way of appeal against a decision of Justices, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions holden at Shenstone, in the county of Stafford, on the 14th of February, 1866, an information came on for hearing, in which the appellant was charged by the respondent with having kept open a beer-house for the sale of beer, in the hamlet of Wall, after the hour of ten o'clock at night, to wit, at thirty minutes past ten o'clock at night of the same day, he being a person duly licensed to sell beer by retail, and the said house not being "within the bills of mortality, nor within any city, cinque port, town corporate, parish or place, the population of which according to the last parliamentary census exceeded 2,500 persons."

Upon the hearing of the information, it was proved on the part of the respondent, and admitted on the part of the appellant, and found as a fact, that, on the day the alleged offence was committed, the appellant was a beer-house keeper in the hamlet of Wall, in the parish of St. Michael, Lichfield, in the county of Stafford, and was duly licensed to sell beer, ale and porter by retail, to be drunk and consumed in his house and premises there; that Wall is a hamlet or place maintaining its own poor, and has its own overseers and guardians, but is within the Lichfield Poor-law Union; that on the day in question, at half-past ten, p.m., the respondent, a police constable, visited the appellant's house and found it open for the sale of beer, there being four men drinking in it; that the population of Wall according to the last parliamentary census was 94, but the population of the said parish of St. Michael, Lichfield, within which it is situate as aforesaid, exceeds 2,500 persons. The hamlet of Wall, like several other places maintaining their own poor within the said parish of St. Michael, Lichfield, has now a separate church and minister, and is duly constituted the district chapelry of St. John Wall; that the licence of the appellant is thus worded: "We, the undersigned, being the collector and supervisor of Excise for the collection of Lichfield and district of Lichfield, hereby authorize and empower Edward Smith, now being a householder and dwelling in a house in Wall, in the parish of St. Michael, Lichfield, within the limits of the said collection and district, to sell beer, &c. by retail, in order that it may be consumed in the said dwelling-house of the said Edward Smith," &c.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that Wall was within and formed part of a parish, the population of which exceeded 2,500 persons. The Justices being of opinion that the evidence given before them brought the case within the operation of the 15th section of the act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, and that Wall was a place of itself within the meaning of that act, gave their determination against the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the Court was, whether the hamlet of Wall was part of the parish of St. Michael within the meaning of section 15. of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, so as to confer upon the appellant the privilege of keeping his house open until eleven o'clock at night. If the Court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made and the appellant was liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction was to stand; but if the Court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information was to be dismissed.

H. Matthews, in support of the conviction.—The question turns upon the construction to be put upon the words "parish or place." It is submitted that the conviction is right. Wall is a "place," and the population did not exceed 2,500 at the last census. It is a question of fact decided by the Justices. "Place" means an aggregation of houses—see The Queen v. Charlesworth (20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 181), where a place called Holmfirth was considered to be a place. It was an aggregation of houses and inhabitants, out with no local rights peculiar to itself; and Lord Chief Justice Erle in giving judgment, said, "The limitation of time for keeping the house open is fixed with reference to the wants of a dense population, and the enactment is an endeavour to give a description of the places in which the requisite degree of density may be expected to be found, rather than a precise definition."

Anstie, for the appellant.—All the enactments in the section confer a privilege, and there is no reason for holding that the number of persons in the hamlet, and not the number in the parish, is to be the test. The house is in a parish having a sufficient population to confer the right of keeping the house open till eleven o'clock. The Queen v. Charlesworth (20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 181) is overruled by Scott v. Washington (13 W. Rep. 939), in which Cockburn, C.J., said, "The rule is, that where a special term is used, followed by general words, the latter must be taken as cjusdem generis with the former." The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. incorporates 11 Geo. 4. & 1 Will. 4. c. 64, by the 32nd section of which the words "parish or place" shall be deemed to include any township, hamlet, tithing, vill, extra-parochial place, or any place maintaining its own poor."

H. Matthews replied.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The Justices were wrong in convicting the appellant; they thought that because Wall was a parochial hamlet, it was a "parish or place" within the meaning of the 15th section. But in construing that section it is necessary, first, to look at the 1st section, and then we find that in granting licences to retail beer and cider, regard is to be had to the number of inhabitants in the district, and the house must be rated at the amount provided for in the section. Under section 15. a house may be situated in a small parish and yet be within a cinque port or town corporate; and as under such circumstances it would have the privilege of being kept open until the later hour of eleven o'clock, I see no reason for thinking that when it is situate in a small place within a parish the population of which exceeds 2,500, such privilege of being kept open till eleven o'clock should not also apply. It is not necessary to decide whether The Queen v. Charlesworth (20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 181) was rightly decided; whether it was so or not, Scott v. Washington (13 W. Rep. 939) is not inconsistent with it. Here, though Wall may be a "place," and although it has not the number of inhabitants specified in the 15th section, yet it is within a parish having the requisite number, and the occupier of the house is therefore exempt from liability to conviction.

LUSH, J.—The object of this part of the act is to regulate the time of closing houses licensed for the sale of beer and cider by retail, according to the supposed wants of the district as indicated by the population; and the meaning of the word "place," having regard to that object, is, that it may be made up of fragments of parishes, which may contain the specified number of inhabitants, so as to make up a populous district requiring houses which should be kept open after ten o'clock. Scott v. Washington (13 W. Rep. 939) is consistent with our decision. In that case Bradley Green was a place within the parish of Biddulph, the population of which exceeded 2,500, though the population of Bradley Green itself was less than that number, and the Court held that the conviction was wrong. In order to support the present conviction it must be shewn that the house was not within a parish or place the population of which exceeded 2,500, but in reality it was within such a parish, and therefore the conviction was wrong.

Conviction quashed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

June 9, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. BARNES.*

35 L. J. M.C. 204; 10 Cox. C.C. 255; L. R. 1 C.C. 45; 14 L. T. 601; 14 W. R. 805; 12 Jur. N.S. 549.

Larceny—Property in Money—Effect of amendment.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner worked at a mill in the same room with three fellow-workmen, and was sent by them on pay-night for the wages of the four from the cashier of the works. The cashier gave the money for the four in a lump to the prisoner, who then went away and never gave any of it to his fellow-workmen. He was indicted for the larceny, and the indictment laid the property in the money in the workmen. At the trial, the indictment was amended by alleging the property to be in the proprietors of the works, instead of the workmen:—Held, that the property was rightly laid as at first, in the men, and not in the masters; and that, as the conviction had taken place on the amended indictment, which was wrong, the conviction must be quashed.

The Recorder of Bolton stated the following

CASE.

Robert Barnes was tried before me at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the borough of Bolton, holden on the 12th of April, 1866, on an indictment which charged him with stealing a sum of 13l. 6s., the monies of Reuben Smith and others.

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., Byles, J., Channell, B. and Shee, J.

The evidence was as follows:

Reuben Smith.—On the 16th of December last the prisoner was a fellow-workman with me at Ormrod & Hardcastle's. The prisoner, myself and two others worked in the same room. It had been our custom for one of us to go every fortnight to get the wages of the four from the cashier, and pay over the amount due to each; we did this by turns. On the 16th of December last it was my turn to go for the wages. The wages due to me on that day came to about 5*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* I cannot speak to the pence. The prisoner asked me if he might fetch the wages this time; I said "Yes, but you must fetch them again when it comes to your turn." He said he would. At twelve o'clock the prisoner went to get the wages; he never came back, and never gave me my wages. (Cross-examined).—We used to get the four men's wages in a lump, and pay them over in separate shares.

Thomas Unsworth.—I worked in the same room with the prisoner and Reuben Smith on the 16th of December last. My share of wages on that day was about 3*l.* 18*s.* On that day prisoner went for my wages; he never paid them to me.

Peter Critchley.—I worked in the same room with the prisoner on the 16th of December last. On that day 4*l.* 8*s.* 11*d.* was due to me for wages. Prisoner went to get the wages; he has not paid me my share.

John Makin.—I am cashier for Ormrod & Co.; on the 16th of December last the prisoner came to me for his wages, and those of the other witnesses. The account of wages due to each was made out in my office, under my superintendence, but I cannot say exactly how much was due to each on the day in question. When the prisoner came to me I believe I said "Whose wages are you come for?" He answered "No. 6. Sovereign." No. 6. is the number of the room in which the prisoner and the others worked, and "Sovereign" is the name of the mill. I had the money in one sum wrapped up in a paper. Our custom was to wrap up the wages for each room in a separate paper, inside which was written the names of the parties to whom they were to be paid, and the sum due to each, and this was done on the present occasion. On the 16th of December I handed the money to the prisoner wrapped up in a paper in the usual way. The sum which I handed to the prisoner was 18*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, and it was made up of 5*s.* 1*d.* in copper, 10*l.* in silver and 8*l.* in gold.

On this evidence it was objected, by counsel for the defence, that the indictment could not be sustained, because the money alleged to have been stolen was not the property of the prosecutor, but that of his employers, Messrs. Ormrod & Co., and I was of this opinion. Counsel for the prosecution thereupon applied to have the indictment amended by alleging that the money in question was the property of Messrs. Ormrod & Co., and I ordered the indictment to be amended accordingly, by inserting therein the words "Peter Ormrod and another," instead of the words "Reuben Smith and others." Counsel for the prisoner did not address the jury or call witnesses; but he contended that the above evidence was not, in point of law, sufficient to warrant a conviction on the indictment as amended, either at common law or under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 3. I then summed up the evidence, and the jury found the prisoner guilty; but on the application of counsel for the prisoner I admitted him to bail, to come up for judgment when called upon; and I reserved the above question for the opinion of this Court.

Sleigh, for the Crown.—The prisoner was the servant or agent of the Messrs. Ormrod, and was intrusted with the money by them to pay over to the men, and was not the agent specially of his fellow-men; and in that view, under the circumstances of this case, he was guilty of the larceny of their money—Russell on Crimes, by Greaves, 4th edit. 394, Lavender's case (2 East, P.C. c. 16. s. 15. p. 566), The Queen v. Metcalf (R. & M. C.C.R. 433), The Queen v. Goodbody (8 Car. & P. 665).

[BRAMWELL, B.—In all those cases the persons who ought to have received the money would still have their claim upon the persons who gave it.]

It is submitted that the Messrs. Ormrod here would not be discharged by giving the money to the prisoner.

[MARTIN, B.—If a man owes me money, and I send my servant to get it, and the servant gets it, is it not thereupon paid to me? If Unsworth had sued Messrs. Ormrod for his wages, and they had pleaded payment, what answer would there have been to that plea? The money ceased, upon the facts, to be the property of the Messrs. Ormrod, and became the money of the men who sent the prisoner.]

It was so charged in the first place in the indictment, and subsequently altered by amendment.

[CHANNELL, B.—It has been held, that the case must be decided upon the indictment in its amended form.¹]

There was a bailment by the Messrs. Ormrod of the specific monies.

ERLE, C.J.—We think this conviction should be quashed. The prisoner was charged with stealing the monies of the Messrs. Ormrod. It was their custom to pay their men on a certain day in the week, and their cashier had the money for that purpose. The prisoner was sent as the agent of other workmen working in the same room with him, and he demanded the money as their agent, and got it. It seems to me that Ormrod's agent paid off all those workmen, and, as soon as the money was given into the prisoner's hands for his fellow-workmen, the agent had discharged their wages.

Conviction quashed.

[CROWN CASE RESERVED.]

June 9, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. BOWERS.*

35 L. J. M.C. 206; 10 Cox. C.C. 250; L. R. 1 C.C. 41; 14 L. T. 671; 14 W. R. 803; 12 Jur. N.S. 550.

See R. v. Turner, 1870, 22 L. T. 278 (Q.B.). Applied, R. v. Negus, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. M.C. 62; L. R. 2 C.C. 34; 28 L. T. 646; 21 W. R. 687 (C.C.R.). Referred to, R. v. Hall, 1875, 31 L. T. 883 (C.C.R.). Followed, R. v. Harris, 1893, 69 L. T. 25 (C.C.R.).

Embezzlement—Clerk or Servant—Commission Agent.

CRIMINAL LAW.—The prisoner, with the permission of his employers, traded in the retail coal trade on his own account, and was employed, under an agreement in writing, by them as their agent for the sale of coals on commission. He was also to collect monies in connexion with his orders, but not to be held responsible for bad debts; the commission was not to be due till the money had been received by his employers; he was not to keep such monies in his possession for more than a week after receiving the same; and in case of dissatisfaction on either side, a month's notice in writing to terminate the agreement was to be given:—Held, by the Court, that upon the construction of the above agreement, he was not a clerk or servant, or employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. s. 68, and could not therefore be convicted of embezzlement.

(1) See The Queen v. Pritchard, Leigh & Cave, 36; s. c. 30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 169, and The Queen v. Frost, 1 Dears. 476; s. c. 24 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 116.

* Coram, Erle, C.J., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., Byles, J., Channell, B. and Shee, J.

The following CASE was stated by the Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions :

Samuel Bowers was tried before me, at the Sessions of the Peace for Middlesex, on the 10th day of January, 1866, upon an indictment which charged him with having feloniously embezzled several sums of money, the property of John Clark, by whom it was alleged that he was employed as clerk and servant. The prisoner was employed by the prosecutor under an agreement, dated the 9th of May, 1864, of which the following is a copy :

“ Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this 9th day of May, 1864, between Samuel Bowers, of 71, Upper Street, Pimlico, of the one part, and Robert Skirrow, John Clark and John Quick, coal owners and merchants, of 157, Great Portland Street, Saint Marylebone, both in the county of Middlesex, of the other part, witnesseth as follows: that the said Samuel Bowers hereby agrees to become, and the said Skirrow, Clark & Quick agree to engage, the said Samuel Bowers as their agent or traveller for the sale of coals, one guinea per week to be paid to the said Samuel Bowers as salary, and 1s. per ton to be paid as commission upon all coals sold by him, when the prices realized are in accordance with the current prices delivered; any dealers he may be the means of securing as customers to the wharf 6d. per ton to be paid for such services; 2s. 6d. per ton to be paid for cartage and delivery of coals. The said Samuel Bowers likewise agrees to collect all monies in connexion with his orders, but the said Skirrow, Clark & Quick will not hold him responsible for any bad debts that may be contracted, but expect him to be as cautious as practicable in securing good and solvent customers; the before-mentioned commission not to become due until the money has been received by the said Skirrow, Clark & Quick. The said Samuel Bowers also agrees not to keep or retain in his possession monies collected on behalf of the said Skirrow, Clark & Quick more than one week from the date of receiving the same. The said Skirrow, Clark & Quick agree to take the board and blinds now fitted up at the residence of the said Samuel Bowers at the cost price to him, on condition that they have free use without charge of that part of his residence now used as an office. It is mutually agreed that should dissatisfaction arise on either side a month's notice in writing must be given. As witness our hands, the day and year before mentioned.

“ Witness, { Skirrow, Clark & Quick.
“ William Clark. { Samuel Bowers.”

In June, 1865, the prisoner was desirous of selling coals by retail on his own account, and the prosecutor consented to supply him with coals for that purpose, but then made an alteration in the mode of remunerating him, which is specified in a letter of which the following is a copy :

“ Chief Office, 157, Great Portland Street, W.

“ London, June 3rd, 1865.

“ Mr. Samuel Bowers,

“ Dear Sir,—As you are now going into the retail coal trade on your own account, we think it best to have a proper understanding, and in future we pay you a commission only; your salary will be stopped from this date. We find a very large amount standing against you, and we particularly request you to do all you possibly can to get it in; the writer will wait upon you on Wednesday at the usual time, and hope you will have a large amount of money ready.—Yours truly,

“ Skirrow, Clark & Quick.”

The prisoner consented to the proposed alteration, and continued to obtain orders from various persons for coals, which were supplied by the prosecutor, the invoices being made out in the name of the prosecutor's firm, and in the three instances charged in this indictment such invoices were produced by the customers, who proved payment of the several amounts in such invoices to the prisoner, whose receipt was attached to each invoice. The prisoner did not account to the prosecutor for either amount. The manner of accounting was for the prosecutor to call on the prisoner weekly, who then paid him a sum of money on account of what he had received, and once a month the prisoner attended at the prosecutor's office, when the names of the customers who had been supplied with coals were called over and the prisoner stated whether they had paid, handing over in respect of the amounts he reported as having been paid the surplus beyond his weekly payments on account. He did not report that either of the sums in this indictment had been paid, but on the contrary represented them as still due after he had received the money. The coals supplied for the purpose of his retail trade were charged to him as to other customers, but this account was kept quite distinct from the account of the monies received by the prisoner on the prosecutor's account.

The sums alleged to have been embezzled were not received by the prisoner until after the second agreement had been made, and at the prisoner's place of business a board was exhibited describing him as agent to the prosecutor, and it was contended that he was not a clerk or servant to the prosecutor within the meaning of the statute. I declined to stop the case, and the jury found the prisoner guilty, judgment being respited until the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal is pronounced upon the above objection, and defendant is on bail.

The question for the opinion of this honourable Court is, whether the prisoner, under the circumstances herein stated, was a clerk or servant to the prosecutor, so as to be liable to be convicted of the crime of embezzlement.

Collins, for the prisoner.—The prisoner, under the circumstances of this case, is an agent and not a servant or clerk. His employers had no right to dispose of his time or to command his services under the second agreement. He was to act as their agent when and where he chose, and his employers paid him a commission for such work as he was disposed to do for them. He had no salary. In The Queen v. May (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 81; s. c. Leigh & C. 13) the prisoner was employed to get orders on commission, and it was his duty to account for any monies that he might receive, but he was held to be an agent only, and not a clerk or servant. The Queen v. Walker (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 207; s. c. D. & B. 600) is on all-fours with this case, and the prisoner there was held to be an agent, and not a clerk or servant.

[MARTIN, B.—Have The Queen v. Carr (Russ. & Ry. 198) and The Queen v. Hoggins (Russ. & Ry. 145) been overruled?]

In The Queen v. Tite (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 142; s. c. Leigh & C. 29) the prisoner was a commercial traveller and paid by commission, and was at liberty to take orders for other persons, and was held to have been rightly convicted of embezzlement: but that case is distinguishable from this in that the prisoner was found in that case to be a traveller, which was held to imply that he was under the prosecutor's orders to go here and there.

Metcalf, for the prosecution.—The prisoner was a servant and not an agent.

[ERLE, C.J.—We are inclined to think that if there had been no alteration in the engagement as it at first stood he would have been a servant.]

Then, under the second agreement he was under a contract to collect all monies in connexion with his orders. His time therefore was to a certain extent at the disposal of the prosecutor, and he was therefore his servant pro tanto. Having got the orders, he was compellable to collect the monies.

[SHEE, J.—The second agreement says, "As you are now going into the retail coal trade on your own account." That seems inconsistent with his being a servant.]

The jury here must be taken to have found that the prisoner was a servant, and the question was for them.

[MARTIN, B.—The point seems to me to turn upon whether, upon the true construction of this agreement, the prosecutor could send the prisoner where he liked.]

Mr. Justice Williams, in delivering his judgment in The Queen v. Tite (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 142; s. c. Leigh & C. 29), refers to The Queen v. Batty (2 Moo. C.C. 257) saying that it decided that the defendant is not less the servant of the prosecutor because he is paid by commission and not wages.

[ERLE, C.J.—But Mr. Justice Williams in that case recognizes the principle that the relationship of master and servant must exist, and that he must be more under the orders of his employer than to go about and get orders when he likes, to be within the statute.]

In The Queen v. Walker (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 207; s. c. D. & B. 600) the prisoner was treated by the prosecutor as his debtor.

The Queen v. Carr (Russ. & Ry. 198) is on all fours with this case.

Collins replied.

ERLE, C.J.—We think that this conviction ought to be quashed. The cases have established that a clerk or servant must be under the orders of his master, or employed to receive the monies of his employer to be within the statute; but if a man be intrusted to get orders and to receive money, getting the orders when and where he chooses, and getting the money when and where he chooses, he is not a clerk or servant within the statute. The question in this case depends upon the construction to be put upon the two documents, and such construction is the province of the Judge. The first document shews, I think, the existence of the relationship of master and servant. The second document, however, changes the relationship, stops the salary, and says that in future the prisoner is to have a commission. After that day he was not under the daily orders or control of his employers, and therefore, not a clerk or servant within the meaning of the statute.

Conviction quashed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 31, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. STONE.

35 L. J. M.C. 208; L. R. 1 Q.B. 529; 14 L. T. 552; 14 W. R. 791.

See Great Northern & City Railway v. Tillett, [1902] E. R. A.; 71 L. J. K.B. 525; [1902] 1 K.B. 874; 86 L. T. 723; 50 W. R. 652 (K.B.D. Div.).

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, section 121.—Compensation—Lands taken—Tenant for a Year or from Year to Year.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—A tenant for a year or from year to year, is not entitled to have the amount of compensation, in respect of his interest, determined under section 121. of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, where the company have merely given a notice to treat under the 18th section, but have not required him to give up possession.

Rule calling upon the defendant, an Alderman and Justice of the City of London and the Metropolitan Railway Company, to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding the defendant to hear and determine the question of compensation to be paid by the company to John Gibbs, for the value of his unexpired term or interest in certain lands and hereditaments, required to be taken by the said company under the powers of their act, and for any just allowance which ought to be made by an incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury which he might sustain.

It appeared from the affidavits that John Gibbs was a lessee in possession of a shop and premises, and on the 10th of January, in the present year, the company served him with a notice to treat under the 168th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The term under which he held would expire on the 24th of June. About the 16th of February he sent to the company the particulars of his claim as requested by the notice to treat, amounting to 573*l*. As the company took no steps, he summoned them before the defendant. It was objected that the defendant had no jurisdiction, as John Gibbs had not been required to give up possession, and the defendant held the objection good, and refused to hear the matter.

The rule above mentioned was then obtained.

Keane shewed cause against the rule.—The material sections of the statute are the 18th and the 121st.¹ All that the company have done was to give a notice to treat under section 18, and they have not required the claimant to give up possession of the premises. It follows that he is not entitled to claim compensation under the 121st section, and the defendant was right in holding that he had no jurisdiction to hear the case. The Queen v. the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company (4 El. & B. 88) is strong to shew that the 121st section does not apply unless the land is taken. He also referred to The Queen v. the Sheriff of Middlesex (31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 261), but it was admitted that no case could be found directly bearing upon the point.

H. Lloyd, in support of the rule.—The company have no right to withdraw from their notice to treat, and that notice must be treated as equivalent to their requiring possession to be given up. The claimant has been injured in three respects by the conduct of the company: first, he is prevented from getting an extension of his term; secondly, the company may get possession of his premises by giving a bond and depositing money by way of security, under the 85th section; thirdly, that being the case, he may be put to expense in securing new premises. The company say that they can go before the Magistrate at any time, but that the claimant cannot do so unless they require possession.

[LUSH, C.J.—The company do not require possession, they have only given notice that they will treat for the purchase of his interest.]

The notice to treat has as much effect in this case as in any other case, and the claimant ought to be able to force the company to go on. The 18th section is general, and applies equally to all cases.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—The notice to treat does not entitle the company to take possession until they have had the amount of compensation assessed, or have given the required security. When the immediate possession has

(1) Section 18. "When the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase or take any of the lands which by this or the special act or any act incorporated therewith, they are authorized to purchase or take, they shall give notice thereof to all the parties interested in such lands, . . . and by such notice shall demand from such parties the particulars of their estate and interest in such lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof; and every such notice shall state the particulars of the lands so required, and that the promoters of the undertaking are willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to the compensation to be made to all parties for the damage that may be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works."

The 121st section is as follows: "If any such lands shall be in the possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as tenant for a year or from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein, he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands, and for any just allowance which ought to be made to him by an incoming tenant, and for any loss or injury he may sustain, or if a part only of such lands be required, compensation for the damage done to him in his tenancy by severing the lands held by him, or otherwise injuriously affecting the same; and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by two Justices, in case the parties differ about the same; and upon payment or tender of the amount of such compensation all such persons shall respectively deliver up to the promoters of the undertaking, or to the person appointed by them to take possession thereof, any such lands in their possession required for the purposes of the special act."

been demanded, and he is asked to give up possession, he has his remedy by going before a Magistrate, but that is not the case here.]

The notice to treat is in effect a demand for possession.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The real answer to the rule that has been granted is, that something is required which has not been performed. The question is, whether the claimant is entitled to the benefit of the 121st section, and to have the amount of compensation determined in the way provided for by that section. The company have given the notice to treat which is required by the 18th section, but they have not done anything more. Mr. Lloyd says that the notice to treat is equivalent to requiring possession to be given up under section 121. It is necessary that he should go that length, for that section only comes into operation where possession is required of the lands of a person who has not any greater interest than as a tenant for a year or from year to year. It is therefore necessary to see whether the notice to treat does entitle them to require the possession to be given up. Clearly it does not, for according to the provisions of the statute, the power to enter is either when the amount of the compensation has been settled, or when they have given the security provided for by the 85th section. Here they have not done anything more than give a notice to treat, and nothing beyond that has happened to entitle them to require possession. Nor is the claimant bound to give up possession. Section 121. fails to apply to this case altogether.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question is, whether this notice to treat can be considered to be a requiring possession under section 121.—[His Lordship read the section.]—Now if the claimant has not been required to give up possession, he does not come within that section. There has been nothing more than a notice to treat, and that is very far from being required to give up possession before the expiration of his term. I say nothing as to whether the claimant has any other remedy.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The being required to give up possession before the expiration of his term, is a condition precedent to the right to compensation under the 121st section, and I cannot construe the notice to treat as amounting to such a demand.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 26, 1866.

THE QUEEN, on the prosecution of CARTER, v. FARRER AND GARLAND, JUSTICES, &c. FOR THE COUNTY OF DORSET.

35 L. J. M.C. 210; 10 Cox. C.C. 261; L. R. 1 Q.B. 558; 14 L. T. 515;
14 W. R. 777.

See R. Odell, 1870, 21 L. T. 556 (Q.B.); R. v. Cheshire Justices, 1884, 50 L. T. 483 (Q.B.D. Div.); Loughborough Highway Board v. Curzon [1886] E. R. A.; 55 L. J. M.C. 122; 17 Q.B. D. 344; 55 L. T. 50; 34 W. R. 621 (C. A.).

See also Highway Act 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77.

Highway Acts—25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. ss. 17, 18, 19.—Liability to Repair admitted Highway—Bona Fide Denial of Road being a Highway—Power of Justices to direct Indictment—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. ss. 94, 95.

HIGHWAYS.—Under section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61,—which enacts that when on the hearing of a summons under section 18, respecting the repair of any highway, "the liability to repair is denied" by the waywarden on behalf of his parish, the Justices shall direct a bill of indictment to be preferred, at the next assizes or Quarter Sessions, against the inhabitants of the parish for the non-repair,—the power to direct an indictment to be preferred does not arise when the liability to repair is denied on the ground alone that the road is not a highway, and the liability is admitted if the road be in fact a highway, and the denial of the road being a highway is made bona fide. In order to give the Justices a power, the liability must be denied on some ground other than that the road is not a highway, such as that some one else is bound to repair.

The expression in section 19, "when the liability to repair is denied," is to bear the same construction as the expression, "if the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied," in section 95. of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50.

Semble—that sections 94. and 95. of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, and sections 17, 18. and 19. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. apply only to admitted highways.

To a mandamus directing Justices to hear evidence upon and determine summonses issued under section 18. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. or to shew cause why they should not, under section 19, direct a bill of indictment to be preferred against a parish for the non-repair of a highway, the Justices returned, that on the hearing of the summonses the parish admitted that the road was out of repair, and that they were liable to repair if the road was a highway, but denied that the road was a highway, such denial being made bona fide:—Held, on demurrer to the return, that the return was a good answer to the mandamus, since the power of the Justices to direct an indictment to be preferred only arises where the liability to repair is denied; and here the liability was not denied within the meaning of the section.

A writ of mandamus, dated the 18th of June, 1864, directed to O. W. Farrer and G. V. Garland, two of the Justices for the county of Dorset, after reciting that at the petty sessions for the highways holden at Wareham, in the said county, for the petty sessional division of Wareham, on the 26th of April, 1864, two summonses, one addressed to the highway board of "the Wareham highway district," and the other to the waywarden of the parish of Bere Regis, issued in pursuance of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 18, came on to be heard, and that the two said Justices before whom such sessions were holden were then required on behalf of the prosecutor to receive evidence upon and hear and determine the matter of the summonses, or to direct a bill of indictment to be preferred and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpoenaed at the next assizes or at the next Quarter Sessions for the county, in pursuance of the summonses and the said statute, but that the Justices wholly refused to hear and determine the summonses, and dismissed the same without hearing and determining the merits thereof, and had not at any time since heard and determined the same, commanded the Justices, at the next petty sessions for the highways to be holden for the said division, to receive evidence upon and to hear and determine the matter of the summonses, or to shew cause to the Court of Queen's Bench why the Justices should not, in pursuance of section 19. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. and of the summonses, direct a bill of indictment to be preferred against the inhabitants of the parish of Bere Regis, in respect of a certain highway mentioned in the summonses being out of repair, and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpoenaed at the next assizes or at the next Quarter Sessions for the said county within which the highway was situate.

The return of the Justices stated that, at the said sessions, on the 26th of April, 1864, on the hearing of the summonses, the prosecutor appeared by his attorney, and the highway board and the waywarden of the parish of Bere Regis appeared by their attorney; and it was stated on behalf of the prosecutor and admitted by the board and the waywarden, that the summonses related to a certain part of a road called the Hyde Road, within the parish of Bere Regis, and that the same was then out of repair, and that the parish of Bere Regis was by a provisionanl order confirmed by a final order of the Quarter Sessions of the said county, included in the said district of the highway board of Wareham; that it was further alleged by the prosecutor, but denied by the waywarden on behalf of the parish, that the road was a common Queen's highway; that the liability to repair the road, if the same had then been a highway, was not denied by the waywarden on behalf of the parish, and on behalf of the prosecutor it was then admitted that the above denial by the waywarden was then made bona fide on behalf of the parish; that the only question then before the Justices on the hearing of the said information was, whether the road was a common highway as aforesaid or not; that thereupon evidence was tendered on behalf of the prosecutor to prove that the road was a common highway; that the Justices on the said hearing, in pursuance of sections 18. and 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, did hear and determine the matter of the summonses regarding the state of the road, and the liability of the party charged with the repair of the same; but finding that the summonses did not relate to an admitted highway, nor were in respect of any denial of a liability to repair an admitted highway, nor that the liability to repair the road as an admitted highway was then denied by the waywarden on behalf of the parish, they did not direct a bill of indictment to be preferred, and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpœnaed under section 19, nor did they receive or hear the said evidence on behalf of the prosecutor in support of the road being such highway as aforesaid, as they were not as such Justices directed or empowered by section 19. to hear any evidence upon or determine the question of a road being a highway, or to direct a bill of indictment to be preferred under the above circumstances, and where the fact of a road being a highway is the only matter denied, but the liability to repair an admitted highway is not denied on behalf of the parish.

Demurrer to the return and joinder therein.

J. D. Coleridge (Henry James with him), for the prosecutor, in support of the demurrer.—The Justices were wrong in refusing to direct a bill of indictment to be preferred before they had satisfied themselves that the road was not a highway. It is admitted that if they came to the conclusion that it was not a highway they could not make any order; but it is not enough that the denial of that fact is made bona fide by the parish. The Justices must inquire into the facts, and determine the matter for themselves. If they decided that it was a highway they ought to make the order; but their decision would not, of course, be conclusive against the parish upon the trial of the indictment; and some of the decisions in the old cases, as to the finding of the Magistrates being conclusive, seem irreconcilable with common sense, such as those of Mr. Justice Richardson, in Brittain v. Kinnaid (1 B. & B. 442). Under sections 94. and 95. of the old act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, they would have been bound to take this course; and my contention is, that sections 18. and 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61.¹ were intended to extend the

(1) The provisions of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. are as follows :

Section 18. "Where complaint is made to any Justice of the Peace that any highway within the jurisdiction of the highway board is out of repair, the Justice shall issue two summonses, the one addressed to the highway board and the other to the waywarden of the parish liable to the repair of such highway, requiring such board and waywarden to appear before the Justices at some petty sessions, in the summons mentioned, to be held in the division where such highway is situate; and at such petty sessions, unless the board undertake to repair the road to the satisfaction of the Justices, or unless the waywarden deny the liability of the parish to repair, the Justices shall direct the board to appear at some subsequent petty sessions to be then named, and shall either appoint some competent person to view the highway, and report to them on its state at such other petty sessions, or fix a day, previous to such petty sessions, at which two or more of such Justices will themselves attend to view the highway.—At such last-mentioned petty sessions, if the Justices are satisfied, either by the report of the person so appointed, or by such view as aforesaid, that the highway complained of is not in a state of complete repair, it shall be their duty to make an order on the board limiting a time for the repair of the highway complained of; and if such highway is not put in complete and effectual repair by the time limited in the order, the Justices in petty sessions shall appoint powers of the Justices. The Queen v. Arnould (8 El. & B. 550; s. c. 27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 92) shews that the Justices, under section 95, have no discretion to refuse to order an indictment, however clear the non-liability may be. In Ex parte Bartlett (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 65), Mr. Justice Hill points out the ingredients necessary to give the Justices jurisdiction, viz., the fact of a highway and the fact of non-repair. The second fact the Justices are to inquire into by the mode pointed out by the statute, and the inference is, that they are also to inquire into the question of highway or no highway by the reception of evidence in the ordinary way.

[MELLOR, J.—In The Queen v. Askerton,² a doubt was expressed whether, under the sections of the old act, the Justices had power to order an indictment in any case except that of an admitted highway. BLACKBURN, J.—I said there, that in order to oust the jurisdiction of the Magistrates, there must be a bona fide denial of the fact of a highway. In the present case there was that.]

They ought to go further than a bona fide denial, and to determine quoad jurisdictionem that it is not a highway before refusing to act. The Queen v. Heanor (6 Q.B. Rep. 745; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 38) is in favour of my argument. It was there held that the provision in the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. s. 95, directing the costs of the indictment to fall on the parish, did not apply where the road was not really a highway.³ It would, no doubt, have been a hardship to cast them on the parish in such a case, and the inference attempted to be drawn was, that the Magistrates had no power to direct an indictment, except where the road was admitted to be a highway. That hardship cannot arise under section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, which gives power to the Court to saddle either party with the costs; and since this section does away with the hardship, the inference is, that it also intended to do away with the construction that the powers of the Justices only arose in the case of an admitted highway. In drawing sections 18. and 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. it would have been easy to have inserted the word "admitted" before "highway," if that were the intended construction, and the point must have been present to the minds of the framers.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The object of the alteration in section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. appears to be that a prosecutor may no longer be encouraged by getting his costs in any event to prosecute groundless cases. The main object of the statute was, by sections 17. and 18, to give the means of a speedy repair for undisputed highways. Section 19. is collateral. If your contention is right, the Justices might be occupied several days in some person to put the highway into repair, and shall by order direct that the expenses of making such repairs, together with a reasonable remuneration to the person appointed for superintending such repairs, and amounting to a sum specified in the order, together with the costs of the proceedings, shall be paid by the board; and any order made for the payment of such costs and expenses may be removed into the Court of Queen's Bench, in the same manner as if it were an order of General or Quarter Sessions, and be enforced accordingly."

Section 19. "When, on the hearing of any such summons respecting the repair of any highway, the liability to repair is denied by the waywarden on behalf of his parish, or by any party charged therewith, the Justices shall direct a bill of indictment to be preferred, and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpoenaed, at the next assizes to be holden in and for the said county, or at the next General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the county, riding, division or place wherein such highway is situate, against the inhabitants of the parish, or the party charged therewith, for suffering and permitting the said highway to be out of repair; and the costs of such prosecution shall be paid by such party to the proceedings as the Court before whom the case is tried shall direct, and if directed to be paid by the parish shall be deemed to be expenses incurred by such parish in keeping its highways in repair, and shall be paid accordingly."

(2) 5 New Rep. 305; s. c. 13 W. Rep. 339; reported as The Queen v. Johnson, 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 85.

(3) In The Queen v. Buckland, 34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 178, Cockburn, C.J. and Shee, J. held that the Court has no power to order costs, where, on the trial of an indictment directed by Justices, under section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, the jury find that the road is not a highway.

determining for themselves the question of highway or no highway, and if they ordered an indictment the matter would have to be tried all over again at the sessions or assizes.]

In ninety-nine out of a hundred trials on a road indictment the dispute is highway or no highway, not the liability ratione tenuræ. In Williams v. Adams (2 B. & S. 312; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 109) it was held, that under section 73. of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, directing the removal of nuisances on highways, the Justices must determine for themselves whether the road was a highway or not.

[MELLOR, J.—Mr. Justice Crompton points out the reason why, in that particular case, the Justices were to determine that question, namely, that it lay at the foundation of their jurisdiction. If the road was not a highway, no offence was committed.]

This is not within the rule that where a question of title is raised the Magistrates' jurisdiction is ousted. The denial of the road being a highway might be raised at any time frivolously.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—If the denial were not made bona fide, I do not think the jurisdiction would be ousted.]

Brown v. Evans (34 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 101) and The Queen v. Cridland (27 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 28) are not in point.

Maule, for the defendants.—Sections 17, 18. and 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. only apply to admitted highways. By section 42, that act is to be construed as one with the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, so far as is consistent with the later act. If the intention had been as contended on the other side, the words would have been inserted in section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, "or if it be denied that the road is a highway."

[BLACKBURN, J.—In section 95. of 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. the words are, "If the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied." In section 19. of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. the words are "when the liability to repair is denied." You contend that there is no change intended by the later act. If so, this is another instance of the careless habits of the framers of our statutes in changing their language without intending to change their meaning.]

The Queen v. Heanor (6 Q.B. Rep. 745; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 38) and *The Queen v. Askerton*² are strongly in my favour. Mr. Justice Hill, in Ex parte Bartlett (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 65), said that sections 94. and 95. of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. only applied to admitted highways.

[SHEE, J.—The proviso at the end of section 94, that the Justices shall not make the order where the obligation of repairing the highway comes in question, is limited to the word "order," and does not appear to include "conviction." BLACKBURN, J.—Perhaps the legislature thought "order" and "conviction" were the same thing. It is very clumsily worded.]

The change in section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. is not from the cause contended on the other side, but because, where a prosecutor chooses to put in force the machinery of the later act against a parish in respect of a road which is a highway out of repair, but which some one other than the parish is liable to repair, it is unfair that the parish should in all cases be saddled with the costs. So far from the change in the later act as to costs shewing an intention on the part of the legislature that the later act should apply to cases of disputed highway, as was contended on the other side, it is an a fortiori argument in our favour, for it shews that the legislature desired to give less encouragement to prosecutors to get an order made for an indictment in doubtful cases. In the present case the prosecutor is not deprived of the ordinary remedy, but may proceed by indictment in the usual way.

Coleridge, in reply.—It is admitted that where the road is not actually a highway the Justices have no jurisdiction to order an indictment under section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, but The Queen v. Heanor (6 Q.B.

Rep. 745; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 38) shews that the Justices must inquire into the fact.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Under that section the only event in which the Magistrates' jurisdiction arises is "when the liability to repair is denied." Here the liability was expressly admitted if the road was a highway. Therefore, even if you were right in your contention that the Justices must inquire into the question of highway or no highway, still they could not order an indictment.]

Then, it is contended that in section 19. of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, the words "when the liability to repair is denied," include the case where the liability to repair is denied on the ground that the road is not a highway.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that the return is a sufficient answer to the mandamus, and the demurrer, therefore, must be overruled. I own I think the legislature did not intend these sections to apply to the case of a disputed highway. I cannot think that the legislature, when it gave Justices a summary jurisdiction to compel the repair of highways, intended to substitute that summary jurisdiction for a jury to determine the question as to whether there was a highway or not. I cannot but think that this summary jurisdiction was meant to be confined to cases where there was no dispute as to the road being a highway, and where the only question was, whether the highway needed repair. Now, to determine the question here, it is most important to look at the object of the mandamus, which is to order the Magistrates to direct a bill of indictment to be preferred against the parish for the non-repair of the road; and it is necessary to look at the words of the act to see under what circumstances the Justices are called on to make the order. It seems that they must not only be dealing with a highway out of repair, but in order to give them jurisdiction to make the order to prefer an indictment against the parish called on to do the repairs, the parish must deny "the duty or obligation of such repairs," in the words of the old act, and "the liability to repair," in the words of the later act. Assume, then, that the road is a highway, either because it is admitted to be so by the parish, or because, as Mr. Coleridge contends should be the case, it has been found to be so by the Magistrates who have heard evidence on the subject, what construction are we to put on the words "if the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied," in the old act, or the words in the later act, "when the liability to repair is denied"? I think the construction must be, that it presupposes the existence of a highway, and therefore that it is meant to meet the case where the obligation or liability to repair is denied on the only ground on which a parish can in such a case avoid its liability, namely, that some one else is bound to repair, as that a corporation is bound to repair ratione tenuræ. Now, here there is no dispute that the parish is bound to repair, if the road be a highway; and the only dispute is as to its being a highway. I think Mr. Maule gave a very lucid explanation of the reasons why the legislature, under the earlier act, made the parish liable for the costs of an indictment. The prosecutor, on behalf of the public, is entitled to insist on the road being repaired if it be a highway out of repair, and he is right in coming upon the parish for the repairs. If the parish seeks to get rid of the liability by fixing some one else with it, then it should be disputed at the expense of the parish. I can quite understand that when the act gave the Magistrates a summary jurisdiction to enforce the repair of a highway out of repair, the legislature should go on to say, "If this be a highway and out of repair, and the parish proceeded against be prima facie liable to repair, and that liability be disputed on the ground that some one else is liable, and the parish be indicted, then the costs of that indictment shall fall on the parish which seeks to get rid of the liability." I think The Queen v. Heanor (6 Q.B. Rep. 745; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 38), so far from making in favour of Mr. Coleridge, as he contended, is against him. If he is right, the Magistrates would have had jurisdiction to make the order for the indictment; but the Court held that the costs could not be fixed on the parish, because the verdict of the jury was, that the road was not a highway. The argument from that, therefore, is, that the Magistrates had no jurisdiction. Besides that, in Ex parte Bartlett (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 65), Mr. Justice Hill gave an opinion on this very question; and I own I am only too happy to be able to fortify my own opinion by anything that fell from that most eminent and learned Judge. He there said, "Sections 94. and 95. only apply to cases of admitted highway. In order to give the Justices jurisdiction to make the order, the road must be a highway, and it must be out of repair; the latter fact is to be ascertained by the Justices in person or by sending a surveyor, and if the highway be found out of repair, and the liability to repair is denied, the Justices are then to order an indictment to be preferred. But if these two facts do not co-exist, the Justices have no jurisdiction to direct an indictment." If that be the right explanation of the meaning of the legislature, and I think it is, then it is as applicable to one act as much as to the other. Then, if that be so, the facts shewn on the face of this return are sufficient to entitle the Justices to our judgment; since those facts shew that there was no dispute on the part of the parish of their liability to repair if the road was a highway.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the return to the mandamus is good. The question really turns on the construction of three sections, namely, the 17th, 18th, and 19th, of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61; and the construction of those depends greatly on the construction of the 94th and 95th sections of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, which are not repealed by the later act; but it is there (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 42) enacted that the two acts are to be construed together as one act. I agree with my Lord as to the construction of those sections, and I am chiefly influenced by looking at the general object which the legislature had in view, which was this: where there are highways in a parish the public have a right to have them kept in repair, and, as a general rule, the public are interested in that; but the remedy at common law, by indicting the parish, is slow, and the object of the legislature in the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. was, that when there was a highway out of repair, there should be a quick remedy for repairing it, provided by sections 94. and 95. Now, as a general rule, Magistrates have no summary jurisdiction where a question of title is bona fide raised, unless there is something to shew that they were intended to have the summary jurisdiction in the particular case. In Williams v. Adams (2 B. & S. 312; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 109) it was held, that the Justices were to determine whether the road was a highway or not; but it was pointed out by Mr. Justice Crompton that that question involved the very foundation of their summary jurisdiction under the particular section, and that that did not conflict with the general rule, that where a question of title was bona fide in dispute Justices have no summary jurisdiction. We should expect, then, that the legislature would not intrust Justices with the duty of determining whether the road was a highway or not, or whether the liability to repair rests on the parish or on some one else. If either of these questions is raised, the Justices are not to determine it. I think that the effect of section 94. of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. is, that if there is a bona fide denial either that the road is a highway or that the parish is liable, then the Justices are to hold their hands, and not convict the surveyor or make the order for the immediate repairs. At the end of section 94. there is a proviso "that the said Justices shall not have the power to make such order as aforesaid (whether the word 'order' is there meant to be equivalent to or to include 'conviction' or not we need not now inquire; the grammatical meaning would be 'the order' only, the common sense meaning would be 'the order or conviction'; but, however that may be, the order is not to be made) in any case where the duty or obligation of repairing the said highway comes in question." In one sense of the words, no doubt, "the duty or obligation of repairing" is denied where there is a dispute as to the road being a highway; and it is true that, if the road is denied to be a highway, then it is also denied that the parish is liable to repair. But that is a strained sense in which to interpret the words, and I think the meaning must be that the denial of the liability is to be distinct from the denial of the road being a highway. The proviso is introduced in order to bring in section 95. That section enacts that "if on the hearing of any such summons respecting the repair of any highway, the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied," the Justices shall order a bill of indictment to be preferred. Looking, then, at the object of the legislature, I think the indictment is to be ordered then, and then only—namely, when the duty or obligation is denied on the ground that some one else is liable. I quite agree with my Lord that, though the point in the case referred to⁴ was not exactly the same, the dictum of Mr. Justice Hill is a very weighty authority, for he was so exact and careful in the language he used; and the point in that case comes very near the present case. Then comes the question, is the intention of the new act, the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, different from that of the former act? It is true that the words are altered—"liability" being used instead of "duty or obligation"—but I cannot see that that makes any difference in the construction.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, after considering carefully the sections bearing on the matter, the meaning of the legislature was, that where there was a disputed highway there the parties should be left to their ordinary remedy by indictment. It is not as if that remedy was taken away by these statutes. With regard to The Queen v. Heanor (6 Q.B. Rep. 745; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 38), I agree with my Lord that it makes against Mr. Coleridge's contention, instead of in favour of it. Now, in the new act,⁵ the words are changed; but if it was intended, as Mr. Coleridge says, to change the construction, such words as these, "or where the fact of the road being a highway is denied, the Justices shall order an indictment to be preferred," might easily have been inserted. For these reasons, I quite agree with my Lord and my Brother Blackburn that the return is a good answer to the mandamus.

SHEE, J. concurred.

Judgment for the defendants.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

June 6, 1866.

THE QUEEN v. PHILLIPS AND ANOTHER.

35 L. J. M.C. 217; L. R. 1 Q.B. 648; 14 W. R. 791; 12 Jur. N.S. 920.

Principle applied, R. v. Surrey Justices, 1872, 26 L. T. 22 (Q.B.).

Highway—Diverting and Stopping up—Substitution of New Highway—Justices' Certificate—Nearer or more Commodious—5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50. ss. 85, 91.

HIGHWAYS.—By a certificate of two Justices, obtained for the purpose of diverting and stopping up a highway, &c., and made under the 85th section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, it was stated that the proposed new highway "will be more commodious to the public, by reason," &c., and that the old highway called, &c., "will if and so soon as such diversion or substitution be effected, become and be wholly unnecessary and useless, by reason," &c. The certificate also shewed that the way to be substituted for the old one was not an entirely new way, but would consist of two existing ways which were to be widened and enlarged so as to make them more commodious and convenient:—Held, overruling The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157), that the certificate was not bad by reason of its not stating that the new highway would be nearer as well as more commodious.

(4) Ex parte Bartlett (4).

(5) 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61. s. 19.

Held, also, that it was not bad by reason of its not stating that the new highway is more commodious, and that it was sufficient to state that it would be, &c.

Held, also, overruling Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394), that it was not necessary that the highway to be substituted should be entirely new.

This was a rule calling upon the defendants to shew cause why an order of Sessions, allowing an appeal of Edward Goodale and others against a certificate under the hands of William Gilpin and Octavius Ommaney, Esq., two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the county of Surrey, dated the 28th of August, 1865, and purporting to be made under the 85th section of the Highway Act, 1835, for the purpose of diverting and stopping up certain highways, called Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley, situate in the parish of Mortlake in the said county, should not be quashed for the insufficiency thereof.

The Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Surrey, holden at Kingston-upon-Thames, upon the 17th of October, 1865, upon hearing the appeal, stated a case, which was substantially as follows.—

This was an appeal unto this Court, by and on behalf of Edward Goodale and others, against a certain certificate under the hands of William Gilpin and Octavius Ommaney, Esqs., two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, acting in and for the said county, of their having viewed certain highways in the parish of Mortlake, in the said county, for the purpose of diverting, stopping up and opening such highways as are mentioned and described in the said certificate, in pursuance of an act passed in the fifth and sixth years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled 'An act to consolidate and amend the laws relating to highways in that part of Great Britain called England,' which said certificate is in the words following, that is to say: 'Surrey, to wit. Whereas Charles John Phillips and James Wigan, both of the parish of St. Mary, Mortlake, in the county of Surrey, brewers, being desirous of diverting and stopping up a certain highway called Thames Street, situate in the said parish of St. Mary, Mortlake, leading from the towing-path of the river Thames, opposite to the wharf of the said parish, through their property, to and joining the public road or highway from Richmond to Mortlake, at the back of the King's Arms public-house, in the High Street, Mortlake, aforesaid, and also of diverting and stopping up a certain branch highway or alley called Brewhouse Alley, situate in the parish and county aforesaid, and leading from Thames Street aforesaid to the High Street, Mortlake, and in lieu thereof, and in substitution for the same, first, of opening a new highway, to commence at the said towing-path opposite the said parish wharf, and to lead into the High Street, Mortlake, aforesaid, by throwing into and adding to a certain highway or passage there, known as Bull's Alley, so much of their land on the east side thereof and next adjoining thereto, as would make such last-mentioned way or passage 30 feet wide, or thereabouts; and, secondly, of widening the public highway called the High Street aforesaid, from the east corner of a wooden building called or known as the Tithe Barn to the King's Arms corner of the said High Street, by throwing into and adding to such street a piece of land on the north side of and next adjoining to that part of the said High Street of sufficient width to make all that part of such street of the width of from 28 feet 9 inches to 40 feet and upwards, did, on or about the 22nd day of February, in the year of our Lord 1865, in pursuance of the Highways Acts, duly give notice, in writing, to the Kingston District Highway Board of and in the county aforesaid, of such their said desire. And the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan did then require the said board to give notice to the churchwardens of the said parish to assemble the inhabitants of the said parish in vestry, and to submit to them the aforesaid desire of them the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan. And whereas, in pursuance of the said notice or requisition, the said Kingston District Highway Board, did, by a notice signed by Thomas Terry, their chairman, on behalf of the board duly authorized in that behalf, on or about the 23rd day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1865, give notice to the churchwardens of the said parish to assemble the inhabitants of the said parish in vestry, and to submit to them the aforesaid wish of the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan. And the said churchwardens did, in manner required by the statutes in that behalf, give notice of and convene a vestry meeting of the said inhabitants, to be holden on the 16th day of March, in the year last aforesaid, at which the aforesaid wish of the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan should be submitted to the said inhabitants then and there assembled. And whereas a meeting of the said inhabitants in vestry assembled was, in pursuance of such last-mentioned notice, duly held at the vestryroom in the parish of Mortlake aforesaid, on the day and year last aforesaid, at which meeting Richard Fountain Stratton, one of the churchwardens of the said parish, presided as chairman, and at such meeting the aforesaid wish of the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan was submitted to the said inhabitants then and there assembled, and a majority of such inhabitants then and there agreed to the said proposal, and deemed it expedient that the said highways should be so diverted and stopped up as proposed by the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan; but a poll was then and there demanded by certain of such inhabitants, and the said meeting was thereupon adjourned to the 6th day of April then next for the purpose of taking such poll, and afterwards, on the day and year last aforesaid, such adjourned vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish was duly held at the last-mentioned place for the purpose of taking the said poll; and at such last-mentioned meeting the said Richard Fountain Stratton again presided as chairman, and the said poll was then and there taken accordingly, and the majority of the votes of the inhabitants of the said parish, then and there present, were then and there given in favour of the said proposal; and the said inhabitants then and there agreed to the said proposal, and deemed it expedient that the said highways should be so diverted and stopped up as proposed as aforesaid, and thereupon the said Richard Fountain Stratton (as chairman at such respective meetings as aforesaid) did, by an order in writing, dated the 25th day of April, in the year last aforesaid, direct and request the said Kingston District Highway Board and their district surveyor to apply to two of Her Majesty's Justices to view the said ways, and proceed according to the provisions of the Highway Act, 1835. And whereas, in pursuance of the said last-mentioned order, the said Kingston District Highway Board did (by John Niblett, their district surveyor), on the 25th of July, in the year last aforesaid, duly apply to and request us, the undersigned William Gilpin and Octavius Ommamey, then and still being two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said county of Surrey, and acting in and for the division of Richmond, within the said county (within which division the said highways so proposed to be diverted and stopped up are situate), to view the said highways so proposed to be diverted and stopped up, and also the said proposed new highways, and proceed according to the provisions of the Highway Act, 1835. And we, the said Justices, did accordingly, on the 27th day of July, in the year last aforesaid, together and at the same time, view the said highways so proposed to be diverted and stopped up (that is to say), first, the said highway called Thames Street, which last-mentioned highway leads from the towing-path of the River Thames, opposite to the wharf of the said parish of Mortlake, to the public road or highway from Richmond to Mortlake, and joins such last-mentioned road at the back of the King's Arms public-house, in the High Street, Mortlake, aforesaid; and also, secondly, the said branch highway or alley called Brewhouse Alley, which last-mentioned highway or alley leads from Thames Street aforesaid to the High Street, Mortlake, aforesaid. And we the said Justices did also, on the day and year last aforesaid, at the like application and request, together and at the same time, view the said proposed new highways (that is to say), first, the said piece of land next adjoining to and on the east side of Bull's Alley, Mortlake, aforesaid, which runs from north to south from the said towing-path to the said High Street, and is in length from north to south 99 feet or thereabouts, and in width at the north end thereof 12 feet 9 inches or thereabouts, and becomes wider from north to south, and is at the south end thereof 21 feet 9 inches in width or thereabouts; and, secondly, the said piece of land next adjoining to and on the north side of the High Street, Mortlake, aforesaid, and which extends from the east corner of the wooden building called or known as the Tithe Barn to the King's Arms corner of the said High Street, and is in length from east to west 255 feet or thereabouts, and in width at the west end thereof 21 feet or thereabouts, and tapers to a point towards the east end thereof, but is of sufficient width throughout to increase the width of all that part of the said High Street, and to make the same of the width throughout of from 28 feet 9 inches (on the east) to 40 feet and upwards (on the west); and it appearing to us the said Justices on such view, for the reasons hereinafter stated, that the said old highways, called Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley, may be diverted and turned as aforesaid, so as to make the same severally and respectively more commodious to the public (that is to say) by the substitution for the same of the High Street and Bull's Alley respectively aforesaid, when the same shall have been so widened as respectively aforesaid by the addition thereto of such new highways or pieces of land as respectively aforesaid, and that the said new highways will be more commodious to the public than the said old highways called Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley, and that the said old highways called Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley will, if such diversion or substitution be effected, become and be unnecessary and useless; and the said Charles John Phillips and James Wigan, the owners of the land through which such new highways are proposed to be made as aforesaid, having, by writing under their respective hands, consented to the same being so made, we the said Justices did, on the 27th of July, in the year last aforesaid, direct the said highway board of the said district surveyor to affix a notice, in the form or to the effect of Schedule No. 19. to the Highway Act, 1835, annexed, in legible characters, at the place and by the side of each end of each of the said highways from whence the same are respectively proposed to be diverted or stoppd up, and also to insert the same notice in some one newspaper published and generally circulated in the said county of Surrey, for four successive weeks next after we the said Justices had viewed the said highways as aforesaid, to affix a like notice at the door of the church of St. Mary, Mortlake, in which the said highways so respectively desired to be diverted or stopped up lie, on four successive Sundays next after the making such view. And whereas it hath this day been proved to the satisfaction of us the said Justices that such several notices have been so affixed and published as aforesaid, and a plan hath been delivered to us at the same time, particularly describing the said old and proposed new highways by metes, bounds and admeasurements thereof, which plan hath been verified before us by Frederick Atwood, a competent surveyor, and is hereunto annexed:—Now, therefore, we the said William Gilpin and Octavius Ommaney, so being and acting as such Justices as aforesaid, do hereby, in pursuance of the statute in that case made and provided, certify that we did, on the said 27th day of July, 1865, together and at the same time, view the said highways called Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley, so respectively desired to be diverted and stopped up, and did upon such view find and we do hereby certify, that for the reasons hereinafter stated, the said highways called Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley, and which are respectively delineated on the said plan, may be diverted and turned in manner aforesaid, so as to make the same severally and respectively more commodious to the public (that is to say), by the substitution for the same of the High Street and Bull's Alley respectively aforesaid, when the same shall have been so widened as aforesaid by the addition thereto of such new highways or pieces of land as aforesaid; and we do further certify that we did, on the day and year last aforesaid, together and at the same time, view the said proposed new highways, and which as to the one, or part thereof, situate on the north side of the High Street contains in length 255 feet, and is of the width hereinbefore mentioned, and is delineated on the said plan between the letters G. and H, and therein coloured red, and which as to the one, or part thereof, lying on the east side of Bull's Alley contains in length 99 feet or thereabouts, and is of the width hereinbefore mentioned, and is delineated on the said plan between the letters E. and F, and also therein coloured red; and we did upon such view find and do hereby certify, that the said proposed new highway will be more commodious to the public than the said old highways or either of them, by reason that the said old highway, called Thames Street, is in the widest part thereof only 31 feet 9 inches in width or thereabouts, and becomes gradually narrower as the same approaches the said wharf or towing-path, being at the last-mentioned end thereof only 15 feet 3 inches in width or thereabouts (including footpath, way or space for the same), and by reason that the said alley, called Brewhouse Alley, is only of the width of from 4 feet to 4 feet 4 inches or thereabouts, and is wholly impassable by carts, whereas by the said addition to the said High Street the inconvenient north-west corner of such street will be rounded off and the approach and entrance thereto rendered much easier and safer, and the said High Street will be considerably widened at and towards the west end thereof, so as to be made to be of the width of 40 feet and upwards at the west end, and to be from thence to the point at the east end of the Tithe Barn marked G. on the said plan, of a width of 28 feet 9 inches or upwards throughout, (the same being at present in part of the width of 22 feet only); and in no part to the west of Bull's Alley will such High Street be of less width than 25 feet 5 inches; and also by reason that the said alley called Bull's Alley, which is now in part of the width of 8 feet 3 inches only or thereabouts will be made to be from double to treble such width throughout, whereby the traffic to and from the said wharf, and the convenience of the persons using or resorting to the same, will be greatly benefited; and whereby also the said High Street will be made greatly more commodious to the public generally as well as to persons having occasion to go to or from the said wharf; and we do further certify that the said old highway called Thames Street and the said old branch highway called Brewhouse Alley will, if and so soon as such diversion or substitution be effected, become and be wholly unnecessary and useless by reason of the said new highways being more commodious as aforesaid, and by reason that all persons who would otherwise have occasion to use the said old highways, will be able to use the said new and widened highways in the High Street and Bull's Alley aforesaid, in lieu and stead thereof, with at least equal, if not greater, facility and convenience. And we do further certify that the stopping up of Thames Street will remove a source of considerable danger to persons going by the Lower Richmond Road from Richmond to Barnes and London, or in that direction, on foggy or dark nights, inasmuch as Thames Street on such occasions appears to be, or is liable to be mistaken for a part and continuation of the main high road, and persons making such mistake and passing up the same accordingly are in danger of being precipitated into the river. And, lastly, we do certify that the several highways so respectively proposed to be stopped up or diverted as aforesaid, were and are so connected together that they cannot be separately stopped up or diverted without interfering one with the other, and may be lawfully included in and stopped up or diverted as aforesaid by and by virtue of one order or certificate. Given under our hands, at Mortlake, in the county of Surrey, this 28th day of August, 1865.—William Gilpin, Octavius Ommaney." And by which said certificate for diverting, stopping up and opening such highways as therein mentioned, the said appellants apprehend themselves aggrieved. Now, after hearing counsel on both sides, and the premises being fully considered, it is ordered by this Court that the said appeal be and the same is hereby allowed, subject nevertheless to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. And it is further ordered by this Court, subject likewise to the said Court of Queen's Bench being of opinion that the said appeal has been properly allowed by this Court, that Messrs. Charles John Phillips and James Wigan, the respondents, do forthwith pay to the said appellants the sum of 244*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, being the costs and expenses incurred by the said appellants in prosecuting the said appeal.

The Kingston District Highway Board, on receipt of the notice and ground of appeal, delivered a copy of the same to Messrs. Phillips and Wigan, on whose requisition the application to the Justices had been made, pursuant to the Highway Act.

The said appeal came on for trial on the 19th of October, 1865, and counsel appeared on behalf of the said highway board, and stated that such board considered the improvement would be very beneficial to the public, and that the new way would be very much better than the old one. Counsel also appeared on behalf of Messrs. Phillips and Wigan in support of the said certificate. The notice and grounds of appeal having been admitted, the certificate and the plan annexed to it were agreed to be taken as read.

It was then objected, on the part of the appellants, that the said certificate was defective and bad in law on the face of it on several grounds (that is to say): first, because (assuming the proposed alteration to be in fact a stopping up of the old highways) the certificate stated that the old highways Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley would become unnecessary when the proposed new ways should be made, and not that they were unnecessary at the then present time; secondly, because (assuming the proposed alteration to be in fact a diversion of the old highways or either of them) the certificate did not state that the proposed new highways would be nearer and more commodious to the public, but only that the same would be more commodious (and in support of this objection the case of The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 157) was cited and relied upon); and, thirdly, it was objected that the proposed alterations were not, in fact, a diversion or turning of a highway within the meaning of the statutes.

The Court having considered these objections, decided the first and third in favour of the respondents, but the second in favour of the appellants.

The respondents' counsel thereupon applied to the Court to grant a special case on the second point, which the Court consented to do, whereupon the counsel for the appellants applied for a case upon the first and third points also, to which the Court also consented.

It being thus the opinion of the Quarter Sessions that the certificate must be quashed, the Court considered it unnecessary for the present to empanel a jury for the purpose of determining the questions of fact, and the certificate was quashed, subject to this case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The question for the opinion of this Court is, whether the certificate is defective on the face of it and bad in law on any one or more of the three grounds of objection above mentioned.

If the Court shall be of opinion that the certificate is bad in law on one or more of such grounds, the judgment or order of the Court of Quarter Sessions is to be confirmed. If the Court shall be of opinion that the certificate is not bad in law on any of the said grounds, then the said judgment is to be reversed, and the matter is to go back to the Quarter Sessions for the purpose of having the questions of fact determined and of proceeding thereon according to law.

Ballantine, Serj. and Garth, in support of the order of Sessions, shewed cause against the rule.—It will be convenient to dispose at once of the second ground which was urged at the trial, and which is set out in the case. The Sessions were quite right in quashing the certificate upon that ground, because The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 157) was binding upon them; but it must now be admitted that that case can hardly be considered to be law, inasmuch as great doubt was thrown upon it in Wright v. the Overseers of Frant (4 Best & S. 119; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 214). The doubt suggested by two of the members of the Court seem to make it useless now to argue that the decision in The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 157) can be sustained. But the judgment of the Sessions may be supported upon other grounds. First, upon the third ground referred to in the case; the diversion of the highway is not such a diversion as was contemplated by the Highway Act. When a highway is to be diverted, a new one must be made, and it is not enough to make alterations in an old and existing highway, as has been done in the present case. Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) is an authority directly in point, although it arose under the 13 Geo. 3. c. 78. In that case Lord Ellenborough said, "The Magistrates have only jurisdiction conferred on them in a given case; they may divert an old road so as to make it nearer or more commodious to the public; that is, by making a new road. The whole section contemplates that a new highway is to be made in lieu of the old one, which is to be stopped up, and the Magistrates can only order the old highway to be stopped up on the condition that a new highway has been made and put in a proper state. But what diverting or turning of the old road has there been in this case? or what new highway has been given in lieu of the old one which is stopped up? The facts are simply these: the Magistrates have extinguished and stopped up one old road, and have enlarged another in different parts of it; but the termini a quo and ad quem, and the direction of it, remain the same as before. Increasing the width of an old highway is neither diverting another old highway nor making a new one; and the Justices cannot make facts by their determination, in order to give to themselves jurisdiction contrary to the truth of the case. There is the less reason, too, for saying that a new highway has been set out in lieu of the old one, because Egg Lane has not been widened through its whole course, but the additions are only made in patches; so that if the whole course of the highway there were stopped up, there would be no continuity of road in any other place in lieu of the other old highway, which has been stopped up. Therefore, however desirous we may be of consulting the convenience of individuals in this respect, in a case too where we may reasonably conclude from the adjudication of the Magistrates in sessions that the alteration is more commodious to the public, yet the words of the act are too strong to get over; and we cannot extend the jurisdiction of others any more than we can our own." And the other Judges agreed. Now the facts of the present case are rather stronger against the validity of the certificate than they were in Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394). An entirely new highway ought to be made before the old one is stopped up, for, otherwise, there would be no protection for the public.

[BLACKBURN, J.—I cannot see why the making an addition to an old road so as to make it more commodious should be the same as making an entirely new one, but Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) seems to be an authority that such is not the case.]

If it had been intended merely to widen the High Street and Bull's Alley, the proceedings should have been under the 82nd section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, and not under the 85th section, as the present proceedings are, being for the stopping up of the present highway. The 82nd section gives full power to widen and enlarge such highways as are not of sufficient breadth, making recompense for the land which is taken. Therefore, the judgment of Lord Ellenborough is in point.

[MELLOR, J.—I have great difficulty in distinguishing it from the present case.]

And it is submitted that the decision is clearly right, for all the provisions of section 85. apply to a "new highway so proposed to be made."

[SHEE, J.—But is not the whole of the 85th section prospective? The highway is not to be diverted or stopped up till after the appeal has been dismissed, or the time for appealing has passed without any appeal being made. The actual order for diverting or stopping up the highway is to be made by the Sessions, under section 91. The old highway is not to be stopped till the new one is made, so that the public seem to be fully protected.]

But where a highway is to be merely widened, as is to be done here, the proceedings under sections 85. and 91. are inapplicable, for those sections apply to new highways and the stopping up of old ones.

The next ground upon which it is submitted that the certificate is bad, is that which is set out first in the case, namely, that it merely shews that Thames Street and Brewhouse Alley will become unnecessary and useless if and so soon as the diversion or substitution has been effected, whereas it ought to have shewn that they were unnecessary and useless. Nothing can be more vague than the certificate in using such terms as "if and so soon," while the intention to be gathered from the words of the 85th section is that the certificate ought to shew that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public, and if more commodious, as is asserted in the present case, the reasons why it is so.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Must we not read the 85th and 91st sections together?]

It is not clear that section 91. affects section 85. at all; at any rate, it is cumulative, and affords an additional protection over and above section 85, and it is difficult to see how such a question could be left to the jury under section 89.

[BLACKBURN, J.—By the 85th section the notices are to be in the form given in schedule 19, and that form shews that the notice must refer to the plan; but if your contention is right, one would expect that the notice would refer to the new highway, as set out and marked by posts, &c. I can see no express words in section 85. that the new highway must be made and set out first.]

It is submitted that the proper construction to be put upon the words is, that when a highway is to be stopped up, the certificate must shew that at the time of the view it has become unnecessary.

Hawkins, J. Browne and L. Kelly, in support of the rule.—The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157) was wrongly decided, and cannot now be considered as an authority. The certificate is good, although it does not state that the new highway would be nearer and more commodious.

[BLACKBURN, J.—We are with you on that point.]

Then the next point is, can this be said to be a diversion of the highway? It cannot be necessary that there should be an entirely new highway. It is not the highway itself which is to be diverted; it would be impossible to do that; all that is meant is, that the traffic should be diverted from one course into another course.

[BLACKBURN, J.—It means diverting the right of way.]

Bull's Alley had been used only as a footway, but is now to be made into a highway for carriages. The decision in Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) has never been expressly overruled; but it has never been acknowledged as a binding authority. Besides, there may be a distinction between that case and the present in this respect. The alteration in that case of the old highway was only in patches, while here the alteration is continuous; so that it is really the same as making a new highway. Is it to be said that it is not a new highway, merely because part of it is old? It is a mistake to say that these proceedings ought to have been under the 82nd section, because it is a case of widening an old highway; that section only applies where the old highway is to be kept in full play. Further, Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) was questioned in De Ponthieu v. Pennefeather (5 Taunt. 634). In that case one of the points made was, that there was no new way made in lieu of the old way, because the new way did not directly lead from the same terminus a quo to the same terminus ad quem; and Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) was cited in support of the objection. In delivering the judgment of the Court Chief Justice Gibbs said, "The last objection is, that no sufficient new way has been set out in lieu of the old way. It is urged for the defendant that if the Magistrates take away the old road, to which the defendant has a confessed right, they must give him in lieu of it a complete title to a new road for the whole distance, on their order and on their order alone. We think the act is not to be so construed. We are of opinion that if the new road given by the order carries the subject into a public highway that carries him to the point to which the old road led, it is sufficient."

[BLACKBURN, J.—The two decisions might stand together; the point is not quite the same as in Welch v. Nash (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157), which seems to be directly in point; although I admit that I have great difficulty in following Lord Ellenborough's judgment.]

They also referred to Brittain v. Kinnaird (1 B. & B. 440) and the observation of Burrough, J. upon Welch v. Nash (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157).

Next, the legislature never intended that the new highway should be actually made before the certificate was granted.—(They were then stopped.)

BLACKBURN, J.—This case is rather a peculiar one, and unfortunate in this respect: in the first place, The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157) was quoted at the Sessions, and although considerable doubt had been thrown upon it, the decision had not at that time been overruled; and the Sessions, in deference to it, decided that the certificate was bad, and quashed it, subject to a case for the opinion of this Court. On that the question comes here whether or not we can overrule The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157).

Further than that, there were two other objections, which were overruled by the Sessions. One of them arose on the authority of Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394), which seems positive against the decision. We are called upon to support the certificate when there have been these decisions, one upon one point and the other upon the other, against the certificate; and looking at all the circumstances and the arguments, we have all come to the conclusion, perhaps too presumptuously, that both Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) and The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157) were wrong. If this were the ordinary case, where the matter was determined here, and could not be appealed against, we should think ourselves bound by two positive decisions. In the present case, if we decided that the certificate was bad, for either or both of these reasons, the decision would be final, and this road could never be diverted at all. If we follow the decisions, we follow them finally and without appeal; but if we decide against them, then, as shewn by Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394), the question may be raised either by action of trespass or by issuing a writ in any form the parties may agree to, so as to take the case to a Court of error, and appeal against the opinion of this Court. Under these circumstances, although not without some doubt, we think that we may follow our own view, and, notwithstanding the authority of those two cases, decide against them. We may decide upon what seems to us to be the right view of the law, although it has the effect of going against those decisions.

As to The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157), the Highway Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4. c. 50, provided a code for the manner in which highways were to be diverted, stopped up and turned. In the first place, the inhabitants in vestry are, under section 84, to be called together, and if they think that the proposed alteration is a good one, the surveyor is to be directed to apply to the Justices to view the same. Then, by section 85, it is provided that "when it shall appear upon such view of such two Justices of the Peace, made at the request of the said surveyor as aforesaid, that any public highway may be diverted or turned, either entirely or subject as aforesaid," which means subject to the reservation of the footway or bridleway, "so as to make the same nearer or more commodious to the public, and the owner of the lands or grounds through which such new highway is proposed to be made shall consent thereto by writing under his hand, or if it shall appear upon such view that any public highway is unnecessary," the said Justices are to proceed to grant a certificate. From this it would appear that the legislature were contemplating that there may be two cases: one where the highway is wholly unnecessary, and simply because it is wholly unnecessary it may be stopped up—and what the Justices are to ascertain is, whether it is wholly unnecessary; the other is, where the highway is to be diverted or turned. The words refer to each matter plainly enough. Where there is to be a substitution, something in lieu of the old highway, where the owner of the land says, "I will dedicate this part of the land for a new highway, in lieu of and in substitution for the old highway," then the right of way which was over that part of the land will be stopped up, and the land given up. There must be the assent of the vestry; but the legislature has said, in addition, that this shall not be done unless the two Justices who view it certify that the new highway is nearer or more commodious. I should think, looking at these words taken by themselves, that one view would be that if the inhabitants were content to take a road which was nearer, and which, though not necessarily more commodious, would generally be so, and the Justices certify upon the view that such road would be nearer, the diversion may be made. And that the other view would be, that if the inhabitants are willing to take the new highway, on the ground that, although not nearer than the old one, it would be more commodious, because it goes round a hill, or something of that sort, if the Justices certify that it will be more commodious, it may be done. Through the rest of the 85th section the words are, "nearer or more commodious"; but, nevertheless, the Court of Queen's Bench thought, in The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157), that the word "or" was to be read as and, and that the highway was not to be stopped up unless the proposed new highway was nearer as well as more commodious. That would strike one as a straining of the words; and if it stood only upon the 85th section, it would be very difficult to agree with it. The 89th section, which is the appeal clause, proceeds thus: That in case of an appeal the Justices are to summon a jury, and to inquire whether the new highway is nearer or more commodious, or whether the public highway "so intended to be stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, is unnecessary, or whether the said party appealing would be injured or aggrieved," and the jury may return "a verdict that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public, or that the public highway so intended to be stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, is unnecessary, or that the party appealing would not be injured or aggrieved;" and in such case the Sessions may dismiss the appeal. The reasoning in the case of The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157), from the disjunctive being used, is that if the jury find any one of the three alternatives, the appeal would be allowed, but if the reverse, the appeal would be dismissed; the machinery of an appeal would not work the matter out. But I think that, looking at the appeal clause and the others which come before it, the words in the appeal clause are according to the allegations in the certificate of the Justices, and that the jury are to find one or the other. If the Justices certify that the proposed new highway is nearer, the jury are to find whether it is nearer; but if the Justices do not find that it is nearer, but that it is more commodious, then the jury are to find whether it is more commodious or not. If the Justices do not find both, they are to find one or the other. We ought to take the meaning to be that "or" should mean "or," and that the finding should be in the alternative secundum allegata et probata, in the certificate of the Justices. I should not so readily have come to this conclusion if it had not been for the case of Wright v. the Overseers of Frant (4 Best & S. 119; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 214). When my Lord and myself sat alone, we thought that we should then have to decide whether we should follow The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157) or not. My Lord was very decided indeed, and said without hesitation that he was ready at any time to overrule it. I certainly thought at the time that the decision was not right, but I do not think that I expressed myself so strongly. However, we did not think it right that two of us should overrule that decision, and therefore the case was adjourned to be re-argued on another day. On that day my Brother Mellor was present, but it turned out that it was not necessary that we should decide that The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157) was wrong, although we thought that it was so. Now it does become necessary to decide upon the very point, and we think that decision wrong, and inasmuch as to follow that case would be to follow what we think is wrong, and without there being any appeal, whereas, if we go against it, we still leave it in the power of the parties, if they are so advised, to question our decision in a Court of error, we have come to the conclusion, feeling at the same time what a strong thing it is to do so, to decide against it.

Then, as to Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394). We feel it all the more a strong thing to deal with this case, because we have already in this same matter dealt with The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 157), but the same reason applies, that if we overrule it, an appeal will lie. As I have already pointed out, the proceeding for stopping up is by going to the vestry, and then if they and the Justices think that the road should be stopped up, and the jury upon an appeal find that it is unnecessary, it may be done. As to the other part of the case, when a road is to be diverted or turned, taking the words by themselves, I think they mean that when people have offered to substitute something in lieu of an old highway, and the owner of land has said that he is willing to dedicate a piece of land elsewhere, so that the public should have a right of way over it, although the road itself cannot be altered, the right of way can be so, and if the vestry think and the Justices certify, and the jury, in case of an appeal, find that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious, it may be done. Now, in the present case, there was a narrow old road, called Bull's Alley, along which persons might go, and what is offered as a substitute for the old highway is that they should add a breadth of 21 feet on one side, so as to make this narrow alley a good broad carriageway 30 feet wide. They say, we will substitute for the old road in Thames Street a new road, consisting partly of a right of way over this new ground, where we have knocked down the houses, and partly of Bull's Alley, where there is an existing right of way. It seems to me that this is to all intents and purposes a diversion and substitution, and offering the new and substituted right of way for the old one. I cannot see in technical reasoning or popular sense any difference between the offering of a right of way to the public over a portion of the land covered by the old narrow way, or offering to give a right of way over a similar portion of land which happens not to be used. I should have thought it very clear, if it was not that Lord Ellenborough's judgment in Welch v. Nash (8 East 394) stands in the way.—[His Lordship read from the passage set out above.]—I quite agree that the widening of an old way is not the diverting of another, but I cannot agree that to throw a portion of land into a highway, so as to give the public a right of way over the part thrown in, is not making a new highway, if it is made for the purpose of being in lieu of and in substitution of another highway, so as to justify the inhabitants of the parish in assenting to the stopping of it up. I cannot but think, with great deference to the high opinion which I entertain for Lord Ellenborough, that such a case would be within the meaning and spirit of the enactment. In De Ponthieu v. Pennefeather (5 Taunt. 634) the argument went to distinguish and not to overrule Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394), and the two cases do not clash as far as the decision goes; but it is impossible to read the judgment of Chief Justice Gibbs without seeing that it differs from the reasoning in Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394). Part of the reasoning is overthrown, and part not much questioned.

Then there is one other point, somewhat bearing upon Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394), namely, that in both the old and the new act there is a power given to Justices to order the widening of inconvenient highways, and to make compensation for the land taken, provided that they do not take houses, paddocks, &c. or inclosed ground. The question is, whether or no, where, as here the party cannot be compelled to assist in a great public benefit by the widening of Bull's Alley, but is willing to do so on condition that Thames Street, which runs through his land, should be stopped up, the legislature has said that shall not be done. If he is willing to give up what will make the way more commodious though he is not bound to do so, I do not see why he may not.

There is one more point, upon which there seems to be very little doubt. Where there is to be a diversion and a substitution to be made in this way, the whole scheme of the act is that the Justices who are to view are to view the land intended for the proposed new highway, and if they find that such new highway will be satisfactory and good, they are to direct the surveyor to put up the notice set out in the Schedule No. 19, wherein the public are told that the Justices have viewed the place of the old and of the proposed new highway, a plan of which would be lodged with the clerk of the peace for a certain number of days before the Court of Quarter Sessions is asked to make an order. At the Quarter Sessions the consent of the owner is to be produced, not that the land has been actually given and the new highway made, but that it shall be. Then, in the 91st section, there is a proviso that if no such appeal be made, or if it shall be dismissed, the Sessions shall order that the old highway be stopped up and the new one made, and from that time the new one will continue; then there is another proviso, that no old highway shall be stopped until such new highway shall be completed, &c. There is, therefore, a careful provision in the act that the Sessions are to determine on the Justices viewing the proposed new highway, and being of opinion that it is the right thing to substitute for the other, the road is to be made. I take it to be clear that the new highway is not to be carried into effect beforehand, and that it was not contemplated by the statute that the alteration should be made before the matter came before the Sessions. I think that the houses ought not to have been knocked down or the alleys widened before going to the Sessions. Therefore I think that the order of Sessions as it stands to quash the certificate should be reversed and the certificate affirmed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion upon all the points. I am bound to say that I entirely agree with my Brother Blackburn as to the reluctance with which one ventures to say that either of the decisions which are now brought directly in question, as it appears to me, are decisions by which we cannot abide. With reference to The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 157), I was obliged to go away during the first part of the argument. My Lord and my Brother Blackburn had expressed a very decided opinion that the case had been wrongly decided; but it was thought not to be right, in a Court constituted by two Judges only, to express a judicial opinion contrary to it. The argument was resumed again when I was present, and we all, I think, agreed that the reasoning upon which that case proceeded was erroneous; but it was not then necessary to express that opinion as the decision of the Court. Now, the case having been shaken by the opinion expressed by my Lord and Brother Blackburn, we come to a review of it, and I now, of course, feel the less reluctance in saying that the reasoning upon which it was founded appears to me a misconception of the statute, and it seems rather to have been brought about by a suggestion made in the course of the argument by Lord Denman, who said, "Non constat that the two Justices would have made the order if they had not been satisfied of both." With all respect for Lord Denman, I cannot help thinking that the Justices ought not to have certified as to either without being satisfied of each. I observe afterwards, in the judgment, Lord Denman said, "Believing, therefore, that we are more likely to effectuate what was probably the meaning, by holding that all the requisites should concur before an order is made, and the latter words being as favourable to that construction as the earlier are to the opposite, we think (in answer to the first question) that one alternative having been negatived, the order should not have been made." I think that is erroneous, and that the order is to be made if the proposed new highway is either nearer or more commodious, and not necessarily that both these alternatives should concur. We must give the same construction to the words as to the finding of the jury as to the earlier part of the section, and I think that the case was erroneously decided. This opinion is fortified by the consideration which it received upon the former occasion.

When we come to the consideration of Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394), I agree with my Brother Blackburn, that there are kindred reasons affecting both that case and The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 157), and which induce me to come to the conclusion at which I have arrived. The Judges who expressed the suggestion that the proceeding ought to have been upon the widening clause do not appear to me to have paid sufficient attention as to what was intended by that clause. I entirely agree in the view just now expressed, that, with respect to the widening clause, the proceeding is to be independent of the wish of any particular party, and is to be at the suggestion of two Justices for the public convenience, and the recompense for the ground is to be paid out of the public fund, if it can be agreed upon, and if not, then after the intervention of a jury impanelled for the purpose of assessing the damages. But this case proceeds upon the intervention of the party who proposes to shew that what he has asked the Justices to do is a reasonable thing to be done, and will be not only beneficial to himself but to the public. What is he to do? He is first to get the vestry to consent, and then the parties interested, and then there is to be a view of the Justices. I cannot help thinking that the decision in Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) proceeded on placing too little stress upon the words, "When it shall appear, upon such view of such two Justices of the Peace, made at the request of the said surveyor as aforesaid, that any public highway may be diverted and turned, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, so as to make the same nearer or more commodious to the public." Therefore the diversion contemplates either that the road will be made nearer or more commodious, and if either of these appears to the Justices who are to view it, they are to make the certificate, so that it appears to me that one of the alternatives alone is sufficient to sustain the order. Where the Justices have had this view, and have had the necessary proof, and have seen the metes and bounds, and so on, they are to proceed to certify under their hands that they have viewed the said highway, and that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public. Now, I think that the mistake into which, as I venture to suggest, Lord Ellenborough fell, was in reading "new highway" as if it meant an actually different highway, different in position, situation, and so on. I do not think that is the real meaning, but that when you couple it with the preceding part of the section, it means the highway; if it be proposed to be diverted by making it nearer or more commodious, it is then a new highway, as contemplated by the section. And under circumstances like the present, where the diversion consists in removing houses and substituting one part of the way for another, treating it as a diversion of the existing way by taking down part of the buildings, adding to the width of the way, so as to make what was before really and practically a useless and unusable way a road that is useful and usable, I think that is a diversion which does take place by making it more commodious to the public. By the course we are taking, we are really putting it into the power of the other side, if they are dissatisfied with our judgment, of going to the Court of error, where The Queen v. Shiles (1 Q.B. Rep. 919; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) M.C. 157) or Welch v. Nash (8 East, 394) can be reviewed, and without the same reluctance which we naturally feel in reversing them, and which we could not have done had it not been necessary for the decision of this case.

With reference to the other point, I entirely agree with the reasons assigned by my Brother Blackburn. This is not a proceeding to stop up a road as useless, but for diverting a road. If it had been to stop up a highway as useless, the certificate must necessarily have shewn that the highway was now useless. But that is not the proceeding at all; it is only incidental, and does not, as it appears to me, at all affect the consideration of this question. Instead, therefore, of certifying that the way is useless, the certificate certifies that when these proceedings are taken, and all these alterations are made, it will become useless. I think that it would be an extraordinary construction, and would lead to an absurdity, if we were to hold that a party, before he knows the opinion of the Justices, is to go to the expense of pulling down the houses and widening the other road, and that he may not obtain that opinion, by calling the attention of the Justices to the circumstances as they now exist, and pointing out by the plan to their satisfaction what are the alterations which he proposes to make. I think it would be a monstrous thing to hold that this was all to be done, the building pulled down, and all the expenses incurred before the Justices are to certify. Upon these grounds, I am of opinion that we must come to the conclusion that the certificate must remain in force, and the order of Sessions be set aside.

SHEE, J.—I entirely agree with what has been said by my Brothers Blackburn and Mellor, and I do not think that I can add usefully anything to what they have said.

Order of Sessions reversed, and certificate affirmed.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

May 30, 1866.

THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, appellants, v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF HAUGHLEY, respondents.

35 L. J. M.C. 229; L. R. 1 Q.B. 666; 14 L. T. 548; 14 W. R. 779;
12 Jur. N.S. 596.

Adopted, Great Western Railway v. Pontypridd Union (otherwise R. v. Llantrissant), [1869] E. R. A.; 38 L. J. M.C. 93; L. R. 4 Q.B. 354; 20 L. T. 364; 17 W. R. 671 (Q.B.). See, R. v. South Staffordshire Waterworks, [1886] E. R. A.; 55 L. J. M.C. 88; 16 Q.B.D. 359; 54 L. T. 782; 34 W. R. 242 (C. A.). Referred to, Great Central Railway v. Banbury Assessment Committee, [1909] E. R. A.; 78 L. J. K.B. 225; [1909] A.C. 78; 100 L. T. 89 (H.L.).

Poor-Rate—Railway—"Contributive Value"—Deduction in respect of a Fund for the Renewal of Rolling Stock.

RATES AND RATING.—The rateable value of a portion of a railway, consisting of the net annual profits from the traffic upon the portion rated, cannot be increased by any part of the profits earned by the same traffic upon other portions of the line. Therefore the expenses of traffic over one portion of a line cannot be estimated according to a mileage proportion, formed by taking into account the increased profit and relative decrease in the cost of conveying the same traffic, with a large accession to it, upon other parts of the line.

In rating a railway, an arbitrator took as the amount to be deducted in respect of the depreciation of rolling stock the proportionate part of a fund for renewing the stock when it would naturally be worn out:—Held, that this mode of calculation was warranted by the terms of the Parochial Assessment Act, as the tenant of a railway might reasonably think that his tenancy would last over the time when it could legally be terminated.

Upon appeal to the Quarter Sessions of Suffolk, against a poor-rate for the parish of Haughley, in Suffolk, the appeal was by consent referred to Mr. Cleasby to find the facts and state a case, and at the request of either party to raise points of law for the opinion of the Court.

The following CASE was accordingly stated.

The appellants are the Great Eastern Railway Company; their line runs through the parish of Haughley, in the county of Suffolk, with two branches, one leading to Bury, and the other leading to Norwich. There is a station in the parish of Haughley, and there are together 1 mile 6 chains of railway in the parish. On the 4th of December, 1863, a rate for the relief of the poor was duly made in the parish of Haughley, in which the appellants were assessed at a rateable value of 900*l.* for their railway and station, without distinguishing them. No objection is made that the rate does not distinguish the land from the station, or on any other technical ground. The rate was duly appealed against. The gross yearly earnings on the railway in the parish of Haughley are 2,660*l.* The principal traffic is that passing over the railway in Haughley from Bury in the direction towards London and back, and from Norwich in the same direction and back; and there is also considerable traffic passing over the railway from Bury to Norwich and back, the mere local traffic, namely, that originating or ending at Haughley, is very small.

The following are the expenses and deductions which I find to be fairly applicable to that part of the railway and works which are in the parish of Haughley: maintenance of way and works, 251*l.*; locomotive expenses, 468*l.*; carriage and waggon expenses, 115*l.*; miscellaneous expenses, 478*l.*; income duty, 39*l.*; tithe rentcharge, 5*l.*; rental of stations, 106*l.*; rates and taxes, 4*s.* in the pound upon assessments.

The above expenses amount to 1,462*l.*, with the addition of the amount of rates and taxes, which depend upon what is determined to be the rateable value of the railway.

I also find the following deductions from the gross receipts to be properly made in ascertaining the rateable value: fund for renewal of way, 236*l.*; fund for depreciation of rolling stock, 76*l.*; risks and casualties, 20*l.*; interest and tenants' profits, 15*s.* per cent. on capital employed in rolling stock and stores, 400*l.* These sums added together amount to 732*l.*; and supposing that the line in Haughley is properly rateable only in respect of the earnings of Haughley, the figures in this and the preceding paragraph give the rateable value of the line in Haughley about 388*l.*: in that case the blank left for rates and taxes would be filled up 77*l.* And I find the rateable value of the station at Haughley to be 110*l.*; so that, upon the above figures, the whole rateable value of railway and stations in Haughley would be 498*l.* The above figures shew the value of the occupation of the railway derived from the actual earnings in the parish of Haughley, and that portion of the expenses and deductions fairly applicable to the portion of the line in the parish of Haughley. The expenses and deductions depend, to some extent, upon the amount of traffic or earnings; as, for instance, the item for miscellaneous expenses, which is arrived at by dividing the whole amount of miscellaneous expenses in proportion to the earnings upon each part of the line. They also depend, to some extent, upon the distance run by the engines, and would be the same whether there was one carriage attached or several, and whether the carriages were empty or full.

And I have been desired to state, for the opinion of the Court, the following question as to the occupation in Haughley being increased in value by a participation in some portion of the profits earned on other parts of the line.

The respondents contend that there is an additional portion of the profits beyond those actually earned in Haughley properly attributable to the occupation in Haughley, and therefore to be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value; they contend that, in respect to that portion of the traffic which passes not only over the line in Haughley, but also other portions of the line, there should be a participation in all the profits earned, and therefore that, inasmuch as the same traffic is carried at a much greater profit over other portions of the line where the traffic is greater than over Haughley, each part of the line may be regarded as contributing to earn those additional profits. And the amount of contribution which the respondents insist upon is found by the mileage in Haughley, as they contend that, in respect of the same traffic passing over any portions of the line, each mile over which it passes must be considered as participating equally in the profits earned by that traffic, or, in other words, as earning a proportionate part of them. If they are right in so contending, as hereinbefore mentioned, for the participation according to mileage of all profits in respect of the same traffic,—and the fact that the whole line is worked as one concern is sufficient to establish that proposition,—then I find as a fact that, independently of the profits derived from the actual profits in Haughley, there is a further profit which, upon the aforesaid mileage principle, would, to the extent of 75*l.*, be applicable to Haughley. If the respondents are not right in so contending, then I find as a fact that there are no profits attributable to the occupation in Haughley beyond those derived from the actual earnings there.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, at what sum the Great Eastern Railway Company ought to be rated in Haughley? I reserve the question of costs until the decision of the question by the Court of Queen's Bench.

The case having been referred back to the arbitrator to raise any questions of law that either party might think fit, he further certified and reported as follows:

I have already raised upon the case the only question of law that I was, according to my understanding of what took place, called upon to raise. I was requested to raise, as a matter of law, the question of what was called "contributive value," that is to say, of some additional value beyond the immediate value of the occupation in Haughley. This was treated by both parties as a separate question; and the respondents, who had to establish the propriety of this addition, placed their case entirely upon the ground stated in the case, viz., that in respect of the traffic which passed over Haughley, as well as other parts of the line, each mile of the railway over which that traffic passed must be regarded as contributing equally to the earnings of the profits derived from that traffic; in other words, that if the same traffic is carried at a much greater profit over one part of the line than over another, still each part of the line must be considered as equally earning the profit. Being struck with the generality of this proposition, and the apparent difficulty of sustaining it, I took care to have it distinctly understood that this part of the claim made by the respondents was founded entirely upon the correctness of that proposition, and that, if that proposition were not sustained, that part of the respondents' claim failed. If that proposition be correct, there can be no other question of law, the figures arrived at being merely a result of the calculation of the profits. In obedience to the rule of court, and at the request of the parties, I make an addition to the case as follows:

I have been requested by the appellants to state upon what principle certain figures in the expenses and deductions have been arrived at. The item for locomotive expenses, 468*l.*, has been arrived at by taking the locomotive expenses on the whole Great Eastern system, and then giving to Haughley the same proportion as the number of miles run by trains through Haughley bear to the number of train miles run over the whole system. The item for carriages and waggons, 115*l.*, was arrived at in a similar manner, the difference being that a number of carriages and waggons in each train must be taken into account. The item for miscellaneous expenses, 478*l.*, was agreed to on both sides, and was arrived at by taking the gross amount of miscellaneous expenses applicable to the whole system, and then taking that proportion which the gross receipts in Haughley bore to the gross receipts over the whole line. Both parties agreed that this was the proper mode of apportioning these expenses. The gross traffic in Haughley, 2,660*l.*, is arrived at by taking that part of the receipts which arises from traffic not entirely local on the mileage principle; for example, if the whole fare of a passenger is a certain sum, a proportionate part of this sum is attributed to Haughley according to the number of miles in Haughley.

I have also been requested by the appellants to raise as a question of law for the opinion of the Court the proper mode of making the allowance for the depreciation of rolling stock. I have in the items for locomotive expenses and carriage expenses made a full allowance for the annual repairs of the rolling stock, taken upon an average of several years; and as this stock would after a certain number of years be worn out, I have allowed the item 76*l.* as the proportionate part of a fund for the renewal of stock worn out. The appellants now contend that I ought, as a matter of law, to have allowed for the depreciation of stock by taking its value at the beginning of the year, and then ascertaining what a new tenant would give for it at the end of the year, and making the difference the amount to be distributed over the line for this deduction. I understood this question to be brought before me as a question of fact; and as the mode of arriving at the supposed value, both at the beginning and at the end of the year, is by estimate and valuation, and not satisfactory (the parish not having the means of testing it), I adopted the first-mentioned mode as more easily applied as well as more correct in principle. If the Court is of opinion that I ought, as a matter of law, to have adopted the mode contended for by the appellants, then, upon the evidence before me, this item of deduction should be increased by the sum of 56*l.*, and the rateable value diminished by a corresponding amount.

J. D. Coleridge (Keane and Bushby with him), for the appellants.—It will be convenient, first of all, to consider the proper mode of making the allowance for the depreciation of rolling stock. The appellants contend that this allowance ought to be ascertained by taking the difference between the value of the stock at the beginning of the year (when it is supposed to be let to a yearly tenant) and its value at the close of the year. The depreciation in the value of rolling stock during the first four or five years after its renewal is rapid, but for some ten or fifteen years afterwards it is very slight. It is therefore quite plain that, if the amount to be deducted in respect of annual depreciation is merely that sum which, if put by every year, would, with interest, defray the expense of renewing the stock at the end of a number of years, the deduction will be less than the difference between the value of the stock at the beginning and at the end of the first year. Now, the Parochial Assessment Act provides, that the rateable value of premises is to be the rent at which they might reasonably be expected to let year by year,—deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of repairs, insurance and other expenses. The act, no doubt, was never intended to apply to railways; but as it has not been amended, its words must be adopted according to their ordinary meaning.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—Are we obliged to assume that the statutory tenant from year to year intends to go out at the end of the year?]

The act speaks of a tenant from year to year, and such a tenant can be turned out at the end of eighteen months. If it be objected that the depreciation would be less during the second year, the answer is, that it would bear the same proportion to the reduced price which the incoming tenant would pay for the stock.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—But may we not consider, looking at the relation which would subsist between the proprietors and tenants of a railway, that they would contemplate that the tenancy, though legally a yearly one, would last many years?]

To construe the act in this manner would be to treat the word “tenant” as equivalent to lessee for a term of years.

With regard to the second point, respecting what is called “the principle of contributive value,” the claim urged by the respondents is utterly absurd. The Court of Queen’s Bench has long since decided, in The Queen v. the London and Brighton Railway Company (15 Q.B. Rep. 313; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 124), The Queen v. the Great Western Railway Company (15 Q.B. Rep. 519; s. c. 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 84) and The Newmarket Railway Company v. St. Andrews-the-Less (3 El. & B. 94; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 76), that the mileage principle is not to be adopted, and that the profits can only be taken into account in the parish where they are actually earned. That which is now contended for is really nothing but the mileage principle under another name. Besides, if that which is earned in a profitable parish is to be added to the earnings of an unprofitable one, the loss sustained by the passage of the line through an unprofitable parish ought to have been deducted from the rateable value of the line in the profitable parish, in order to achieve perfect fairness and equality.—They referred to Hodgson on Railways, 819, and The Queen v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company (30 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 68).

Field (Horace Lloyd and Guise with him), for the respondents.—The words of the Parochial Assessment Act, with reference to a letting from year to year, cannot exclude all consideration of the subject-matter of the tenancy. It may reasonably be expected that the tenant of a railway would imagine that he was not likely to be disturbed in his possession for some considerable time. The arbitrator was therefore quite right in apportioning the ordinary cost of renewing the stock, instead of supposing that its value ought to be taken at the beginning and end of the year. With regard to the other point, the arbitrator was wrong. He has not taken into account the value which, in addition to the strictly local earnings, is attached to the possession of the line to be rated. The whole line is worked as one concern, and a great portion of the traffic which passes over it is through-traffic. The parish which sends the passenger is the inducing cause of his being forwarded along the whole line, and has a right to have all the profits derived from him in other parishes brought into account. A train starting from Norwich to London, takes up a number of passengers beyond Haughley, who add to the profit of the journey from Haughley to London, though the locomotive expenses of that journey are not increased in the same proportion. It is, therefore, submitted that all the parishes over which passengers are conveyed are equally entitled, per mile per passenger, to any benefit or profit which may be derived from the traffic, and consequently to any increase of profit that in the course of the journey may result from taking up other persons and conveying them in the same carriages. In The South-Eastern Railway Company v. Dorking (3 El. & B. 491; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 84), Lord Campbell expressly says that the rateable value of a portion of railway is not necessarily determined by the pecuniary receipts for the use of it within the parish. The estimate ought, therefore, to have been a larger one, and the rate must be amended.

Coleridge, in reply.—Each parish is entitled to the benefit of accidental advantages. The mileage principle, wherever it is possible, ought to be disregarded.—He referred to and distinguished The South-Eastern Railway Company v. Dorking (3 El. & B. 491; s. c. 23 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 84).

COCKBURN, C.J.—Two questions have arisen in this case. First, whether, in assessing Haughley for rating purposes, the traffic beyond it ought to be taken into account in order that the expenditure within the parish may be reduced; for the more we reduce this expenditure the greater is the profit of the line rated, and the greater, of course, is its rateable value. After some attention to the case, it seems to me that the decision of the arbitrator, Mr. Cleasby, was right. There is a through-traffic from London to Norwich, and, beyond Haughley, on the road to London, there is a large accession to this traffic. Now, it is said by Mr. Field that the effect of this additional traffic is to reduce the expenditure with respect to each individual traveller, so that, supposing him to have started from Norwich, the expense of his carriage through the parish of Haughley must be lessened by taking into account the diminished expense of conveying him upon other parts of the line on the way to London. But I do not think that the expenses of the line to be rated ought to be calculated with reference to the cost of conveying passengers. The working expenses of the whole of the traffic between Norwich and London ought to be ascertained, and a proportionate part of these expenses must then be apportioned to the traffic in Haughley. The cost of carrying a passenger may vary upon different parts of the line, but the working expenses may still be after a uniform rate. This may be illustrated by the case of the old stage-coaches. The expense of running a stage-coach between Norwich and London was so much per mile, with hardly any variation. Sometimes there were five passengers, sometimes fifteen. If there were five passengers, the coach ran at a loss; if there were fifteen, its journey was a profitable one. So, also, with this railway: when it is being worked from Norwich to Haughley the profit is likely to be less than when it is being worked along those parts of the line beyond Haughley, where there is received a large addition to the passengers and traffic, so that the rest of the journey is lucrative and profitable. There is also this fallacy in Mr. Field's argument, for according to him, the working expenses of the line rated are to be got at by taking into account the profits of the additional traffic beyond Haughley, and not the mere working expenses of this traffic. These profits, whether by accident or not, are acquired without and beyond the parish of Haughley, and they cannot be rated as belonging to that parish. The first question must therefore, I think, be decided in favour of the appellants.

The other question is, whether, in making deductions in respect of the repairs and renovation of the railway stock, the arbitrator was right in dealing with the case upon the supposition that the hypothetical tenant would make his calculations as to the amount of rent under the assurance that the stock would be replaced at the end of what may be called its natural life, or whether these deductions are to be made by finding the difference in the value of the stock at the beginning and end of the year of tenancy. Mr. Coleridge strongly urged upon us that we should be departing from the words of the statute if we held that the arbitrator was right in his view that the deductions in respect of repairs ought to be spread over the whole period of the natural life of the stock. But it is one thing to start with the assumption that you are dealing with a tenancy from year to year, and another to say that the circumstances are such that the hypothetical tenant, in considering what rent he shall pay, is bound to assume that his tenancy will not last beyond a year. It is undoubtedly a tenancy from year to year, but it is a tenancy of such a character that the tenant may well think it worth his while to deal with the rolling stock as though he were sure that his tenancy will not be broken up at the end of the year; and if it were shewn that in a large number of yearly tenancies the tenant does deal with his stock in this manner, this fact ought to be considered in valuing the rent payable under a yearly tenancy of this railway. At all events, the question, whether the tenant would make his deductions upon one principle or the other, is a matter of fact which must be decided by an arbitrator or at sessions, as the case may be. Now, I think that there is nothing in the Parochial Assessment Act which requires us to say how the arbitrator ought to have decided upon a question of fact, and whether he has decided rightly or wrongly. He must find out the circumstances which are likely to exercise an influence upon the person to whom a railway is let from year to year, and how much rent he might fairly be expected to give. When he has come to a conclusion, it is not our province to disturb it, or even to pass an opinion upon the reasoning which has guided him. This question must, therefore, be decided in favour of the respondents.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. It is our task to say what is the rateable value of a portion of a line of railway passing through several parishes. This value must depend upon the actual earnings of the railway within the parish, deducting the expenses which properly belong to this part of the line. Now, Mr. Field has argued, with much ingenuity, that the earnings within the parish ought to include part of the profits of the traffic when it has passed beyond the parish. But, as it seems to me, there is this fallacy in his argument—he loses sight of the fact that the fares of the passengers, which go to make up these profits, are actually earned in parts beyond the parish. And with regard to his argument that the part of the line within the parish, by serving as a feeder to those parts in other parishes, makes the average expenses per passenger of those parts less than they otherwise would be, the same observation may be made. The accession of traffic, and the consequent diminution of expenses without the parish, are the result of an accident, the benefit of which belongs to those parishes where the accident takes place. The rent and the rateable value of the line in those parishes will be greater than that in others. It seems to me, therefore, that, with regard to the first question, Mr. Cleasby is right.

With reference to the second, it is, no doubt, one of the difficulties which arise upon the construction of this act of parliament; but I do not think that the arbitrator is bound to disregard any other circumstance than the value of the stock at the beginning and end of the year. I think that it is quite fair for him to look at the nature of what is supposed to be let, and the probable though uncertain duration of the tenancy,—in fact, at all matters which would be considered by a tenant in contracting to pay rent. For my own part, I think that much is to be said in favour of the conclusion at which the learned arbitrator has arrived, although it is not necessary for us to say more than that he was not compelled to come to another conclusion. The question is one of fact, and must be settled by the arbitrator or the Sessions. I think, therefore, that our judgment must be in favour of the company on the first point, and against them on the other.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The decision of the learned arbitrator is objected to by the respondent parish, because he has taken, as the basis of his calculation, the actual gross receipts of the railway in the parish of Haughley, although the mode in which the amount of receipts included in his calculations was ascertained is not objected to. The respondents attack the sufficiency of the estimate of profits; and, without finding fault with the mode in which each item was ascertained, say that an item was left out which ought to have been admitted. They say that the learned arbitrator has omitted from his estimate what is called "contributive value," that is, a value beyond that of the actual receipts of the railway in the parish of Haughley, arising from the circumstance that the company occupy it, together with other parts of the line, particularly that between Haughley and London; and that this contributive value ought to be added to the actual value found by the arbitrator in the manner described in the case. It appears to me that this cannot be done without adopting the mileage principle, instead of the parochial principle; although the parochial system has always been adopted in assessing railways to the poor-rate. It has been expressly decided in several cases, following The King v. Kingswinford (7 B. & C. 236), where the parochial system was applied to a canal, that railway is to be rated in respect of the profits earned within the parish. And in The Queen v. the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company (15 Q.B. Rep. 313; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 124) it was laid down that the amount of the traffic over the portion of the railway in each parish, taken in connexion with the proper deductions, must regulate the amount of the rate; and that if the portion of a line within a parish is more productive than other portions in other parishes, either because there is more traffic or because the yearly outgoings and expenses there are less, it ought to be assessed at a higher proportionate value. This being the case, I cannot think of any better mode than that adopted by the learned arbitrator, or one less likely to produce difficulty or lead to inconvenience and injustice.

We now come to what is urged on the part of the appellants, the railway company. They say that, putting aside all questions of contributive value, the arbitrator, in ascertaining the net annual value of the traffic in the parish, ought to have deducted the actual amount of depreciation in the rolling stock by wear and tear in the course of one year from the commencement of the tenancy. The principle adopted by the arbitrator was not to assume that the supposed tenancy would only continue for a year and a half, and he made his estimate upon the supposition that no tenant would contemplate so early an end of his tenancy, and that the fair mode of finding the annual cost of preserving the rolling stock necessary for the line to be rated, would be to see what amount per annum, during the natural life of the rolling stock, would be sufficient to keep it in the same effective state. Now, it cannot be denied that in what he did he was unable to comply literally with the directions of the Parochial Assessment Act, that the estimate must be according to the rent at which the hereditaments might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. But these words are hardly applicable to such a particular description of property as a railway, and must, I think, be taken according to some reasonable intendment. If we find that a tenant of a railway, although his legal interest would not be greater than that of a tenant from year to year, would make his calculations upon the understanding that he would not be dislodged before the lapse of a number of years, we cannot say that the estimate made by the learned arbitrator was an improper one. I think, therefore, that he came to a right conclusion on both points.

Judgment for appellants on the question of contributive value, and for respondents on the question of deductions

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

June 21, 1866.

BUDENBERG, appellant, v. ROBERTS, respondent.

35 L. J. M.C. 235; L. R. 1 C.P. 575; 15 L. T. 387; 14 W. R. 992.

Customs Amendment Act, 1859, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 37. ss. 6. and 8.—Importing Goods of one Denomination concealed in those of another—"Cause to be imported."

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.—It is an offence, under section 6. of the Customs Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 37, to cause to be imported goods of one denomination concealed in packages of goods of any other denomination, though the goods be such as are not subject to any duty on importation.

The 6th section imposes a penalty on any person who "shall cause to be imported goods of one denomination concealed in packages of goods of any other denomination," and the 8th section enacts, that the word "importer" in any act relating to the Customs is "to apply to and include any owner or other person for the time being possessed of or beneficially interested in any goods imported":—Held, that the words "cause to be imported" in the 6th section are not to be interpreted according to the meaning given to the word "importer" in the 8th section, which includes many persons who would not come within the 6th section.

Case stated by the stipendiary Magistrate for the borough of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions, holden at Liverpool aforesaid for the borough of Liverpool, on the 29th of March and on the 2nd of April, 1866, Arnold Budenberg, hereinafter called the appellant, was convicted on an information, preferred by John Roberts, an officer of Customs, and hereinafter called the respondent, under the direction of the Commissioners of Customs, charging that he, the said appellant, did, on the 21st of December, 1865, cause to be imported into the port of Liverpool, being a port of the United Kingdom, to wit, at Liverpool, in the borough of Liverpool aforesaid, certain goods of one denomination, to wit, eight kegs containing 7 cwt. of gunpowder, the said gunpowder being then and there concealed in certain packages of goods of another denomination, to wit, in eight casks containing about 18 cwt. of china clay, contrary to the 6th section of "The Customs Amendment Act, 1859," whereby the said appellant had forfeited the penalty of 100*l.*, for which the Commissioners of Customs had elected to sue, and the appellant was adjudged for his said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of 100*l.*, to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay the sum of 8*l.* 5*s.*, being the amount of costs awarded to Her Majesty in that behalf; and if the said several sums were not paid forthwith, the appellant was adjudged to be imprisoned in the gaol at Walton, in the said county, until the said several sums should be paid.

On the application of the appellant, the Magistrate stated and signed the following

CASE.

On or about the 15th of December, 1865, one A. Ehrenberg shipped at Antwerp, on board the Neva steamer, for Liverpool, eight casks, which he represented as containing china clay.

Ehrenberg consigned the casks so shipped to Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann, of Liverpool, the agents for the Neva, and took from the captain of the vessel a bill of lading in the ordinary form, undertaking to deliver the casks to Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann or their order; and by a letter, dated Antwerp, December 15, 1865, he wrote Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann with the bill of lading, and stated that the casks were for Messrs. Schäffer & Budenberg, whose directions they would have to follow. In each of five of the casks of clay so shipped by Ehrenberg was concealed a keg of gunpowder of 100 pounds in weight, and in each of the other two casks of clay was also concealed a keg of gunpowder of 50 pounds in weight.

On the 17th of December Dunkerley & Steinmann received from Messrs. Schäffer & Budenberg a letter, of which the following is a copy:

" Manchester, Dec. 16, 1865,
96, George Street.

" Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann, Liverpool.

" Gentlemen.—We have been informed that Mr. Ehrenberg shall forward to your address, and for our disposal, by the steamer Neva, leaving Antwerp for Liverpool on Monday, the 18th instant, eight barrels of china clay, namely,

" B. No. 1.	Gross weight,	196	kilog.
" 2.	"	208	"
" 3.	"	208	"
" 4.	"	220	"
" 5.	"	190	"
" 6.	"	200	"
" 7.	"	210	"
" 8.	"	200	"

" Please store the above, informing us of their safe arrival, and we shall instruct you how to forward the same to different places. We remain, &c.,

" Schäffer & Budenberg."

On Sunday, the 17th of December, 1865, Ehrenberg, who was then in London, saw Budenberg, and informed Budenberg of the shipment to Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann of the eight casks, and that the clay contained the kegs of gunpowder.

There was no evidence before me that prior to the 17th of December Budenberg had any knowledge of the shipment of the clay, or of the fact of its containing the kegs of gunpowder. The Neva arrived in Liverpool on or about the 21st of December, 1865, and forthwith discharged her cargo.

On the 19th of December, 1865, Budenberg went to Liverpool, and there saw Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann, to whom the casks of clay had been consigned. He then informed them of the fact that there was gunpowder contained in the clay, and requested them to take steps to get the casks passed through the custom-house.

After this interview, Messrs. Dunkerley & Steinmann took the usual steps to get the goods passed through the custom-house, and their clerk requested the examining officer to pass them without examination; but on his refusal to do so, and after directing a sub-officer to bore the casks, the clerk informed the Customs officer that there was gunpowder contained in the clay.

On receiving this information the custom-house authorities caused the clay and the powder contained in it to be seized, and it has ever since been retained by the custom-house authorities, and they ultimately caused the information above set forth to be laid against Budenberg, his partner Schäffer residing abroad.

In addition to the above facts, it appeared that neither china clay nor gunpowder is subject to any duty on importation.

I considered it was proved that goods of one denomination concealed in goods of another denomination had been imported; and, having regard to the meaning of the word "importer," as defined by the 8th section of "The Customs Amendment Act, 1859," I came to the conclusion that Budenberg was the importer thereof; and I also considered that the same definition must be applied to the term, "if any person shall cause to be imported," used in the 6th section of the said last-mentioned act.

The question for the opinion of the Court is, whether, under the circumstances, my decision was right in point of law.

Holker, for the appellant.—In the first place, it is submitted that, to bring the case within the 6th section of the Customs Amendment Act, 1859 (22 Vict. c. 37),¹ it is not enough that a person should import goods of one denomination concealed in packages of goods of another denomination; but it must be done to evade duty, and where neither class of goods is subject to any duty, there is no offence within that section; for the section goes on to say, or "shall cause to be imported any package of goods as of one denomination, but which shall afterwards be discovered . . . to contain other goods subject to a higher rate or amount of duty." The offence to which the section points is evidently the offence of importing goods liable to a higher duty concealed under goods subject to a lower duty. That, however, was not what occurred in the present case. Here the Customs were not defrauded, and the only persons who had a right to complain were the owners of the vessel that carried the goods. If the construction contended for by the other side be the true one, the importing sugar mixed with sand or cotton packed with stones to increase the weight would equally be offences under this section. Next, there was no evidence that the appellant was a person who caused to be imported within

(1) The following are sections 6. and 8. of the Customs Amendment Act, 1859 :

Section 6.—"If any person shall cause to be imported goods of one denomination concealed in packages of goods of any other denomination, or shall directly or indirectly cause to be imported or entered any package of goods as of one denomination, but which shall afterwards be discovered, either before or after delivery thereof, to contain other goods subject to a higher rate or amount of duty than those of the denomination by which such package was entered, such package and all goods contained therein shall be forfeited, and every person shall forfeit and pay for every such offence a penalty of 100*l.*, or treble the value of the goods contained in such package, at the option of the Commissioners of Customs."

Section 8.—"For the removal of doubts as to the meaning and application of the word 'importer,' as used in the Customs Acts, the word 'importer' in any act relating to the Customs is hereby declared to apply to and include any owner or other person for the time being possessed of or beneficially interested in any goods imported into the United Kingdom, from the time of the importation thereof until they shall, on payment of the duties thereon or otherwise, be duly delivered or discharged from the custody or control of the Customs."

the meaning of the 6th section. The Magistrate considered the 6th section was to be interpreted by the 8th section; and that, according to the meaning of "importer" in that last section, the appellant was an importer within the 6th section. That must be erroneous, for the legislature never could have intended that the person mentioned in the 6th section as the person who caused to be imported was to comprise every one who came within the meaning of "importer" in the 8th section. The 6th section intended to create an offence as regards only the person who might be presumed to have had knowledge of it, that is to say, the person who caused the goods to be so imported; but if it is to extend to all who are comprised in the 8th section, it would include many who might be entirely innocent of any fraud. Lastly, the appellant does not appear to have known anything of the concealment of gunpowder in the clay until after the shipment of the casks; and a person ought not to be convicted under the 6th section of the act, unless it was shewn he had knowledge of the concealment.

Lock (T. Jones with him), for the respondent.—It is not necessary that the goods should be subject to any duty; the words in section 6, "If any person shall cause to be imported goods of one denomination concealed in packages of goods of any other denomination," constitute a separate offence from that of concealing goods in packages of goods subject to a lower rate of duty, to which the rest of the 6th section relates.

[ERLE, C.J.—I think that section points to two offences: one importing goods of one denomination concealed in those of another denomination, and the other importing goods liable to the higher duty concealed in goods liable to the lower duty. You need not argue any further this first point.]

Then, as to the second point. There was evidence that the appellant caused these goods to be imported. The consignees of the casks were the mere agents for the steamer, and they were told by the consignor that the casks were for the appellant and his partner, whose directions they were to follow. The letters of the 15th and 16th of December clearly shew for whose account the casks were sent, namely, that of the appellant and his partner. Moreover, the appellant informed the consignees, after the casks had arrived, that there was gunpowder in the clay, and requested them to pass the casks through the custom-house, so that altogether there was evidence on which the Magistrate might have come to the conclusion, without reference to the 8th section, that the appellant was, to all intents and purposes, the importer; and the Magistrate was therefore well warranted in finding him to be the importer.

Holker, in reply.—The Magistrate was not satisfied from the evidence before him that the appellant had caused the gunpowder to be imported, for the Magistrate evidently only considered the appellant was the importer by reason of the large interpretation given to the word "importer" by the 8th section.

ERLE, C.J.—I think that the statement of the conclusion of law relating to this statute at the end of the case is a statement of a conclusion of law which has not my concurrence; because, if I understand the statement of the learned Magistrate rightly, he has in effect stated that the importer, according to the definition of the 8th section, is a person who has caused to be imported within the meaning of the 6th section. I think the word "importer" in section 8. includes many persons who would not come within the meaning of the 6th section. If any beneficial interest in goods imported be created in a third person, that third person would become an importer within the meaning of the 8th section, and yet he would be by no means a person within the meaning of the 6th section; otherwise if a person had imported goods, and there was a concealment, such as inclosing one within another, I might buy them ever so innocently whilst they were in the custom-house, and the words of this conviction would make me liable to a penalty of 100*l.* and the forfeiture of the goods, as the importer of the goods. But I am not within the meaning of the words of the man who caused the goods to be imported. I think the two sections have a different bearing. Then I think that a finding that the party "caused to be imported" is abundant to convict under that 6th section; and I propose to send the case back again to the Magistrate, not to re-state the facts,—he has examined all the facts and he has all the evidence before him,—but after stating what I have done about the difference between the man who causes to be imported and the person who is included in the definition of "importer" in the 8th section, I think it ought to be sent back to the Magistrate to see whether he draws the inference that Budenberg "caused to be imported." And I am of opinion that Budenberg caused to be imported, either if he sent an order to Mr. Ehrenberg, and in pursuance of the order Ehrenberg sent them, or if there had been a communication between Ehrenberg and Budenberg, and both of them had co-operated with mutual knowledge that gunpowder should be sent into England inclosed in casks of clay, or if there had been a communication between them "whenever a convenient season let some gunpowder be sent in a certain number of casks." If there was anything of an understanding between Ehrenberg and Budenberg, in pursuance of which Ehrenberg sent the gunpowder to Budenberg, there was abundant evidence from which the Magistrate might have drawn the conclusion that Budenberg caused to be imported. As it is, I do not know whether he means to negative such knowledge on the part of the appellant, or to find that the appellant caused to be imported. It appears to me that the whole transaction has upon the face of it many signs of the parties acting mutually with knowledge of illegality, and the sending of an article from a foreign correspondent to a correspondent in England, with a known violation of the Customs law, is very good evidence that those parties were acting with an understanding.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I understand that the Magistrate has asked us whether he was right in point of law in considering the words "caused to be imported," in the 6th section, are to be interpreted in the same way as the word "importer" is to be interpreted by force of section 8. in the same act. I think the words are not to be interpreted by that interpretation clause, and that the words "caused to be imported" in the 6th section are to be read in their fair and ordinary sense, and not in the constructive sense that is given to the word "importer" in the interpretation clause, section 8. Therefore, I agree with my Lord in thinking that in point of law the Magistrate was wrong in the construction of the act, and I concur in thinking that the case should be sent down to him to be re-stated, not that he should take fresh evidence, but in order that he should state as a fact whether with reference to the words "caused to be imported" in the 6th section, he was at the time of the conviction satisfied that the appellant had caused those goods to be imported.

Case remitted. .

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

June 21, 1866.

THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, appellants, v. REEVES, respondent.

85 L. J. M.C. 239; 1 H. & R. 845; L. R. 1 C.P. 580; 14 L. T. 662;
14 W. R. 967; 12 Jur. N.S. 786.

See Toomer v. Reeves, [1868] E. R. A.: 37 L. J. M.C. 49; L. R. 3 C. P. 62;
17 L. T. 149; 16 W. R. 83 (C.P.).

Turnpike Act—3 Geo. 4. c. 126. s. 32—Exemption from Toll—Stores for the Use of Troops—Carrier.

HIGHWAYS.—The exemption from toll in the Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4.

c. 126. s. 32, in favour of carts conveying stores for the use of Her Majesty's forces, applies, although the cart conveying such stores be the cart of a common carrier hired for that purpose by the contractor for such stores, and although the contract contains a power to the officer in command at the depot to which they are being conveyed, of rejecting them, if they should not be of a certain quality.

CASE stated by Justices, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, from which it appeared that an information was laid under the General Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4. c. 126, charging the respondent with having taken from the appellants at a toll-gate called the Farnborough gate, in the county of Hants, the sum of 6d. for toll in respect of a waggon containing hay drawn by two horses, which waggon and horses were then exempt from toll as being employed in conveying commissariat for the use of Her Majesty's forces within the meaning of the 32nd section of the said act.

At the hearing it was proved that the hay being conveyed in the said waggon had been delivered by certain persons trading under the name and firm of Messrs. Toomer Brothers (who were then contractors for the supply of forage and other commissariat supplies for the uses of Her Majesty's forces at Aldershot, in the said county) to the appellants, to be conveyed by them to the commissariat stores at Aldershot aforesaid. That the said hay was sent by the said Messrs. Toomer Brothers for the use of Her Majesty's forces at Aldershot, in pursuance of a certain contract for commissariat supplies made on the 17th of January, 1866, between them and Her Majesty's Deputy Commissary General to supply hay and other forage at Aldershot camp and command in such quantities, at such times, and at such barracks or camps as might be required within the command by the proper officers, as specified in certain conditions thereto annexed, subject, among other things, to the following conditions:

" 2. The contractor shall deliver the forage at his own expense, at such periods and in such quantities as may be required, into the stores or on the ground at Aldershot, or at Woolmer Forest, or wherever horses may be quartered or picketed within the command as may be directed by the officers appointed for that duty.

" 4. The officer commanding may, on application from officers commanding regiments or corps for their respective services, or whenever he may deem fit, appoint a brigade or additional board to inspect the supplies, and if the board shall be of opinion that they are not of the quality specified in the conditions, they shall be rejected, and the officer of the commissariat may, without further appeal, purchase such supplies as may be required to replace those rejected, as provided in clause No. 3.

" 16. A stock of oats, hay and straw, sufficient at least for fourteen days' consumption for the number of horses actually in the camp and command, shall be kept by the contractor. This stock shall be inspected and approved by the Deputy Commissary General, or other officer acting for him; and the issues to the troops shall be made from such supply in the order in which the same may have been inspected and approved. The Deputy Commissary General, or other officer acting for him, shall have full power and authority to reject any article offered which may appear to be of inferior quality; and in case of a proper supply of the respective articles not being immediately provided in lieu of those so rejected, or whensoever the stock of forage shall be less than the fourteen days' supply prescribed, the Deputy Commissary General, or other officer acting for him, shall have full power to purchase such quantities as may be thus rejected or deficient, as provided in clause 3."

The said hay was being conveyed according to the terms of the said contract for delivery, on behalf of the contractors, in terms of the provision in clause 2. of the contract; and in order to take the hay to the said commissariat stores, it was necessary for the said waggon and horses to pass through the said toll-gate.

On the waggon and horses arriving at the said toll-gate, the respondent demanded and took from the appellants the sum of 6*d.* as and for toll in respect of the said waggon and horses, and refused to allow the same to pass except on payment of such toll, although the appellants then claimed exemption from such toll, on the ground that, the said hay being for the use of Her Majesty's forces, the said waggon and horses were exempt from such toll. The respondent was a person duly authorized to demand and take such toll as was legally payable at the said toll-gate, and the amount demanded and taken would be the amount of toll legally payable for the said waggon and horses if any were payable.

It was contended, on behalf of the appellants, that no toll was payable, inasmuch as the waggon and horses were within the exemptions from toll mentioned in the 32nd section of the said act, and were a waggon or other carriage and horses drawing the same, conveying commissariat or other public stores for the use of Her Majesty's forces. The said Justices were, however, of opinion that the said waggon and horses were not within the said exemption. The question for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas was, whether such decision of the said Justices was right.

C. Wood, for the appellants.—It is submitted that the Magistrates were wrong, and that the waggon of the appellants came within the exemption of section 32. of 3 Geo. 4. c. 126. That section exempts from toll "any waggon, wain, cart, or other carriage whatsoever," &c., "employed in conveying any ordnance, or barrack, or commissariat, or other public stores, of or belonging to His Majesty, or for the use of His Majesty's forces." In the present case the hay was being sent for the use of the forces at Aldershot; but, because the contract under which the hay was sent contained a power to the officer in command to reject it, if not of a certain quality, it was contended before the Magistrates, on behalf of the respondent, that the hay was not necessarily part of Her Majesty's stores. Still, notwithstanding such power of rejection, the waggon was conveying stores for the use of Her Majesty's forces, and was, therefore, within the exemption. In the points of argument delivered for the respondent, it is stated that the exemption does not apply to carriers for hire, but is limited to the contractor removing from his store to the depot. If that were so, the Crown would, indirectly, have to pay the toll, as the price would be affected by it, and so the exemption would be lost.

No one appeared for the respondent.

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Magistrates was wrong. It is clear that stores sent for the use of Her Majesty's forces are by the act exempt from toll, and these stores were here in course of being conveyed by the contractor for the use of Her Majesty's forces. It is said, however, that if a contractor employs an agent or carrier to convey and deliver the stores for him, that then the exemption does not apply; but that is not so, for I am clearly of opinion that the contractor may hire any one he pleases to carry the stores for him, and that, according to the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se, the person so carrying the stores for the contractor is the same as the contractor himself conveying stores for the use of Her Majesty's forces, and within the exemption.

BYLES, J., and MONTAGUE SMITH, J., concurred.

Decision reversed.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

May 26, 28, 1866.

WILDES v. RUSSELL.

35 L. J. M.C. 241; L. R. 1 C.P. 722; 16 L. T. 478; 14 W. R. 796;
12 Jur. N.S. 645.

*Office of Clerk of the Peace—Misdemeanor—1 W. & M. c. 21. s. 6.—
Impeaching Adjudication of Sessions.*

MAGISTERIAL LAW.—A contumacious refusal by a clerk of the peace to record an order of the Court of Quarter Sessions is a misdemeanor in the execution of the office of such clerk within the meaning of section 6. of 1 W. & M. c. 21, and for which therefore the Justices may discharge him from such office.

Where a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions shewed that charges in writing, under the 1 W. & M. c. 21, had been exhibited before such Court against the clerk of the peace, alleging that he had wilfully and contumaciously refused to enter and record a certain order of that Court, ordering certain costs incurred by the Justices to be paid, and that having heard the same and what the clerk had to allege in defence, the said Court had adjudged the charges to be proved, and had adjudged such clerk to be guilty of the misdemeanor in his office with which he was so charged, and had on account thereof dismissed him from his said office:—Held, that such judgment, being good on the face of it, was conclusive, and could not be reviewed by a jury in an action by such clerk against a subsequently appointed clerk to try the right to the fees of the office.

Held, also, that such judgment could not be impeached in such action, on the ground that the Justices who had adjudged had a pecuniary interest in the order being recorded which the clerk had so refused to record, nor on the ground that the charges against the clerk had been exhibited at the instigation of the Justices who afterwards adjudged him guilty thereon.

This was an action for money had and received, brought by the late against the present clerk of the peace for the county of Kent, to try the question whether the plaintiff had been properly removed from the said office.

The plaintiff had held the office of clerk of the peace for the county of Kent for several years prior to his dismissal, which occurred on the 23rd of May, 1865, and having claimed a right to certain fees called transportation fees, which the Sessions disputed, he had in November, 1864, obtained a rule nisi from the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel the payment of the same. This rule was afterwards discharged on terms, the matter being compromised; but a Mr. Scudamore, an attorney, had been engaged by certain of the Justices, acting on behalf of the Sessions, to resist the mandamus, and a bill of costs, amounting to 169*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, had become due to Mr. Scudamore for services rendered by him as such attorney on the occasion of such mandamus and in effecting the compromise. This sum the finance committee of Justices recommended to be paid out of the county-rate, in a report they made at a Court of Quarter Sessions held on the 10th of January, 1865, and that Court, adopting such recommendation, thereupon ordered its payment.

It would be the duty of the clerk of the peace to enter such order on the proceedings of the Court and for the county treasurer afterwards to pay the bill so ordered to be paid. In practice, the treasurer, however, pays before the order is formally entered and recorded by the clerk of the peace, and he did so on this occasion.

Although full particulars of Mr. Scudamore's bill of costs had been given to the finance committee, only a short note of the bill had been presented to the Sessions by such committee, in which the amount was stated to be due to Mr. Scudamore for professional services rendered and money paid on account of the general business of the county. The plaintiff refused to record the order for the payment of this bill, and, in a letter which he wrote to Lord Romney, the chairman of the Court of Sessions, he stated that his reason for not entering the order was, that the bill had not been presented in the usual manner by the finance committee, but only a short note of it, and that he would therefore report to the Court on the subject. At the next meeting of the Court the plaintiff did so, when, amongst his reasons for not entering the order, he stated his objection to there not being a bill of costs with the items presented, and also that the costs were such as ought not to be borne by the county, but only by those Justices who had engaged Mr. Scudamore and who had so incurred them on their own individual responsibility. Being, however, called on by the chairman to state whether he still refused to enter the order, he replied he did, and the matter was referred to the finance committee to take such measures as they should think right on the subject. This committee took counsel's opinion, and acting thereon got the county treasurer to exhibit at the Court of Sessions charges in writing against the plaintiff, under the statute 1 W. & M. c. 21, in which, after setting out the order of the Court of Sessions, ordering 169l. 16s. 6d. to be paid to Frederick Scudamore by the treasurer, and stating that it was the duty of the plaintiff as clerk to enter and record such order on the proceedings of the Court, it was alleged that the plaintiff "wilfully, wrongfully, maliciously and contumaciously, and without reasonable or lawful excuse, refused to enter and record such order, and so had misdemeaned himself in the execution of his office."

These charges came before the Court of Quarter Sessions on the 23rd of May, 1865, when, after hearing evidence and counsel both for and against the plaintiff, the Court adjudged the charges to be proved, and dismissed the plaintiff from his said office of clerk. The formal judgment of such Court as drawn up set out the written charges which had been so exhibited, and after stating the hearing on the 23rd of May, 1865, and what was then insisted on by the plaintiff and his counsel in his defence, proceeded as follows: "The Justices in Court of Quarter Sessions, on the said 23rd of May, do adjudge and find that the said complaint and charges in writing, and all and every the allegations and averments, matters and things in the same contained, have been duly proved before them and are true, and that the said Henry Atkinson Wildes has been duly proved to be and is guilty of the several misdemeanours in the execution of his said office of clerk of the peace in the said complaint and charges in writing alleged, and the said Justices do now therefore openly in the said last-mentioned Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace holden in and for the said county, on account of the said misdemeanors, and of each of them, so proved as aforesaid, discharge the said Henry Anderson Wildes from his said office of clerk of the peace for the said county, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided."

At the trial, before Erle, C.J., on the facts above stated, the counsel for the plaintiff sought to impeach the judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions, on the ground that the Justices had acted both as prosecutors and Judges, and had moreover a pecuniary interest in the matter which disqualified them from trying the charges against the plaintiff, as, if Mr. Scudamore's bill was not paid out of the county-rate, it would have to be paid by those Justices who had engaged him, and that the plaintiff was justified in refusing to enter the order, and that his refusal to do so was, under the circumstances, not a misdemeanour within the meaning of the statute. The learned Judge, however, ruled that the judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions was conclusive, and could not be reviewed by a jury or impeached in the way proposed, and he accordingly non-suited the plaintiff.

A rule nisi was subsequently obtained by Montagu Chambers, for the plaintiff, to set aside such nonsuit and for a new trial, on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to sue for the fees pertaining to the office of clerk of the peace of the county of Kent, as the lawful holder of that office; that the plaintiff was not lawfully dismissed from the said office, nor the defendant lawfully appointed thereto; that the order or adjudication of the Court of Quarter Sessions purporting to dismiss the plaintiff from the said office was illegal and void; that the Court of Quarter Sessions by whom such order was made was improperly and illegally constituted, the Justices, or some of them, who were present or taking part in the proceeding being incompetent or disqualified through personal or pecuniary interest, or as accusers, prosecutors, parties, witnesses, or otherwise interested in the result; that all the proceedings, or some of them, for the purpose of removing the plaintiff from his said office, were unlawful and void; that the alleged misconduct of the plaintiff did not constitute a misdemeanour in the execution of his office within the 1 W. & M. c. 21. s. 6, and that the Justices had no jurisdiction to examine or adjudicate thereon; that no sufficient complaint or charge in writing was duly or lawfully exhibited against the plaintiff to the Justices in Sessions, or in compliance with the statute, and that the information or complaint upon which the Justices assumed to proceed was merely colourable; that the plaintiff did not misdeemean himself in the execution of his duty within the meaning of the statute, nor was he guilty, or proved to be guilty, of the charges or offences made or alleged against him; and that the order purporting to discharge the plaintiff from his office of clerk of the peace was not fairly or lawfully obtained.

Against this rule,

Bovill and C. Pollock now shewed cause.—This action is brought to try the question whether the plaintiff was rightly dismissed from the office of clerk of the peace. The 6th section of the statute 1 W. & M. c. 21, on which this question arises, enacts, "that if any clerk of the peace already nominated, or to be nominated, as aforesaid, shall misdeemean himself in the execution of the said office, and thereupon a complaint and charge in writing of such misdemeanour shall be exhibited against him to the Justices of the Peace in their General Quarter Sessions, it shall be lawful for the said Justices or the major part of them, from time to time, upon examination and due proof thereof, openly in their said General Quarter Sessions to suspend or discharge him from the said office." It is said by the other side that this section gives no power to dismiss unless the clerk be guilty of an indictable offence; but that is not the meaning of misdemeanour in this section, as shewn by the preceding section, the 5th, which makes the appointment "for so long only as such clerk of the peace shall well demean himself in his said office." Here the charge which was exhibited against Mr. Wildes shews a wilful neglect and an absolute refusal to obey the order of the Justices. That of itself, it is submitted, would amount to a forfeiture of his office. How could the Quarter Sessions have gone on after such refusal had they done otherwise than they did? But it was for such Court alone to determine the character of the act of their clerk; and they having so determined it, their judgment is conclusive—The Queen v. Bolton (1 Q.B. Rep. 66; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 49), In re Clarke (2 Q.B. Rep. 619; s. c. 11 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 75) and The King v. Grundon (Cowp. 315). And in Carus Wilson's case (7 Q.B. Rep. 984) the Court of Queen's Bench held that whether what had been done by Mr. Wilson was a contempt or not of the Royal Court of Jersey was a matter which that Court had to decide for itself. That a wilful and absolute refusal to act is a forfeiture of an office is well established by authority—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Office and Officers,' M, and Philips v. Bury (1 Ld. Raym. 5. 9), where Lord Chief Justice Holt laid down as law that "contumacy was a good cause of deprivation," and in The King v. Wells (4 Burr. 2004) Lord Mansfield, in giving judgment, said, "I think the law is well laid down by Serj. Hawkins in treating of offences by officers by neglect or breach of duty. He says, it is certain that an officer is liable to a forfeiture of his office, not only for doing a thing directly contrary to the design of it, but also for neglecting to attend his duty at all usual, proper and convenient times and places whereby any damage shall accrue to those by or for whom he was made an officer." If the facts were as they are stated in the judgment of the Quarter Sessions, the Justices would be entitled to discharge the plaintiff from the office he held, and the finding of that Court as to those facts cannot be controverted by a jury. That the evidence need not be set out in the order, as this Court will intend everything to be right which does not appear to be otherwise, is established by The King v. Lloyd (2 Strange, 996), and by Buller, J., in The King v. the Undertakers of the Aire and Calder Navigation Company (2 Term Rep. 666). On the part of the plaintiff, it was said that he had a right to take the opinion of the jury as to whether the plaintiff had acted properly or not in refusing to record the order for the payment of Mr. Scudamore's bill of costs on the ground that the order was not a valid one. This, it is submitted, he had no right to do, and that nothing the jury could say would affect the validity of the order. Next, it was said that some of the Justices would have been personally liable for the amount of these costs unless they were paid out of the county-rate; that therefore they had a pecuniary interest in the matter. Even if they were interested, that would not have affected the validity of the order; until it had been quashed, the decision of the Justices would have been good, and the conduct of the plaintiff in refusing to record it would have been equally wrong, and laid him open to the charge which was made against him. The case, however, of The King v. Essex (4 Term Rep. 591) shews that the costs of litigation which the Justices have bona fide incurred may be ordered to be paid out of the county rate, so that the order was a valid one, and the Justices had not, in fact, such a pecuniary interest as alleged. But the circumstances of their being so interested would not make the order void, but at most only voidable—Dimes v. the Proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal (3 H.L. Cas. 759) and Ranger v. the Great Western Railway Company (5 Ibid. 72). With regard to the objection that the charges were exhibited at the instigation of the Justices, and that they acted therefore both as prosecutors and Judges, it is only another branch of the same question, and the case of Ex parte Pettitman (33 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 99, note.) shews that would be no ground for objecting to a conviction. The Queen v. the Dean, &c., of Rochester (17 Q.B. Rep. 1; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 467) also shews that the interest was not such as to disqualify. The decision, moreover, in the present case altered the status of the party affected, and was therefore a decision in rem—The Duchess of Kingston's case (2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 674, 5th edit.)

Montagu Chambers and Gates, in support of the rule.—It is said, in the first place, that the judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions is conclusive in this action; next, that it is at most voidable and not void; and, thirdly, it has been said to be a judgment in rem, and, therefore, unimpeachable. Now, it is submitted that there is a marked distinction between a case in which a person seeks to justify what he has done under an order of Justices and a case between third persons, who can impeach the order on the ground that it has not been fairly obtained, or the Court making it was not properly constituted, or had not jurisdiction to make it—Day v. King (5 Ad. & E. 359), Christie v. Unwin (11 Ibid. 373; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 47), Briscoe v. Stephens (2 Bing. 213), Mico v. Morris (3 Lev. 234), Adney v. Vernon (Ibid. 243), Basten v. Carew (3 B. & C. 649) and Crepps v. Durden (1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 649, 5th edit.). No doubt, if the Quarter Sessions here was a properly constituted Court, its judgment could not now be impeached by extrinsic evidence; but it is submitted that the Court was not properly constituted. Some of the Justices composing it were individually liable for

Mr. Scudamore's costs, and there had been an ill will and irritable feeling in the matter between them and the plaintiff, and therefore a Court so constituted was not likely to be a fair Court; they had, moreover, directed the prosecution of these charges against the plaintiff, and they were acting, therefore, at the time of adjudicating on the case, both as prosecutors, Judges and witnesses. That is contrary to the principles of the law—Bac. Abr. tit. 'Courts,' (B), where it is said, "No person can be a Judge in his own cause, but the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas may bring an action in that Court, but then the entry must be special, viz., placita coram Johanne Blencow, milite," &c., and a reference is there given to Salk. 396, as stating that the Mayor of Hereford was laid by the heels for sitting in judgment in a cause where he himself was lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment, though he, by the charter, was sole Judge of the Court. To the same effect is Broom's Maxims, p. 118, 4th edit., where it is said to be "a rule always observed in practice, and of the application of which instances not unfrequently occur, that where a Judge is interested in the result of a cause he cannot, either personally or by deputy, sit in judgment upon it." For this is cited Brooks v. the Earl of Rivers (Hard. 503) and The Earl of Derby's case (12 Rep. 114). Mr. Broom also gives Dimes v. the Proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal (3 H.L. Cas. 759) as a leading case in illustration of this maxim, and he refers to The Queen v. the Aberdare Canal Company (14 Q.B. Rep. N.S. 854; s. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 251), as shewing that proceedings heard before Commissioners, under a statute which forbade persons to act in that capacity when interested, have been adjudged void. It has been held that the presence of one interested Magistrate will render the Court of Quarter Sessions improperly constituted and vitiate the proceedings—The Queen v. the Justices of Hertfordshire (6 Q.B. Rep. 753; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 73), The Queen v. the Justices of Suffolk (21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 169), The Queen v. the Cheltenham Commissioners (1 Q. B. Rep. 467; s. c. 10 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 99). The case of The King v. the Bishop of Chester (2 Strange, 797) is also in point. The judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn in The Queen v. Rand (35 L. J. M.C. 157; s. c. 1 Law Rep. Q.B. 30) is favourable to the present plaintiff, as that learned Judge admits "that any direct pecuniary interest, however small, in the subject of inquiry does disqualify a person from acting as Judge in the matter." If a Judge is disqualified from acting, it is an objection which goes to the jurisdiction, and it is not necessary that the conviction should be quashed. In Thompson v. Blackburn (1 Nev. & M. 266) a judgment of a county court was held to be not conclusive. Doe d. Davy v. Haddon (3 Dougl. 310) was the case of an ejectment against a schoolmaster, who had been removed by sentence of the trustees of the school for misbehaviour, and the Court of King's Bench allowed evidence to shew corruption in one of the Judges. The case of Price v. Dewhurst (8 Sim. 279) is also an authority in support of the plaintiff; Vice Chancellor Shadwell there held to be void the judgment of a foreign Court, consisting of persons interested in the property in dispute. With regard to the statement that the judgment here was a judgment in rem, it does not come within the definition of one.

[WILLES, J.—There is no authority for saying that a judgment in rem cannot be set aside if pronounced by a Court improperly constituted.]

Then, was the act of the plaintiff a misdemeanour within the meaning of the statute? It is submitted that it was not, though it is admitted that a wilful neglect of duty or intentional misconduct might work a forfeiture of office. That is not the character of the plaintiff's conduct in declining to record the order. Surely, if a clerk of the peace believes the order he is asked to record is an illegal one, he is entitled to direct the attention of the Justices to the matter before he enters it on the proceedings. Then, who is to determine the point whether the refusal by him was an improper refusal? It is submitted that the plaintiff has a right to have that matter inquired into and determined by a competent tribunal.

WILLES, J.—This was an action for money had and received, to try the question whether the plaintiff or the defendant was entitled to the office of clerk of the peace of the county of Kent; and at the trial the question was raised whether the removal of the plaintiff, who formerly held that office, was a valid removal. The plaintiff, being clerk of the peace, appears to have claimed a right to certain fees, which right was contested, and the Justices entertained an opinion adverse to such claim, whereupon the plaintiff applied for and obtained a writ of mandamus to the Justices, ordering that they should do what was necessary towards the plaintiffs' receipt of those fees. Certain of the Justices, acting upon the part of the whole body, as is usual where a mandamus is directed to a large and fluctuating body, made a return to such mandamus, and resisted the litigation thereby instituted, and for that purpose they employed as their attorney a Mr. Scudamore. It appears that the proceedings under the mandamus were settled by a compromise, and a bill of costs to Mr. Scudamore was incurred in the matter of such mandamus. I think it is unnecessary for the decision of this case to consider whether Mr. Scudamore could have recovered the amount of that bill of costs against the Justices personally who employed him, or whether the costs would be payable out of the county-rate. It is sufficient that such bill of costs was incurred, and that it came under the consideration of the finance committee, and that that committee considered that as such costs related to a proceeding in which the county was interested, and which determined a question affecting its funds, the costs ought to be paid out of the county-rate. The recommendation of the committee was acted on by the Sessions ordering that the bill of costs should be paid.

Now, assuming that to be a valid order, it became the duty of the plaintiff, as clerk of the peace, to enter it, and to make out a certificate or order to the treasurer, by means of which Mr. Scudamore might obtain the amount. The plaintiff, however, resisted the order of the Justices, and refused to enter it and make out the necessary documents for the receipt of the money from the treasurer, and the plaintiff gave several grounds for doing so in his report to the Justices. Amongst others, he said that the costs had been incurred by individuals, and ought not to come out of the county-rates, and also that no bill of costs had been produced with items, but only an abstract; and that the order, therefore, was not an order that should bind the county.

I do not find that at that time the plaintiff raised the point which has been made by Mr. Chambers, namely, that although the costs generally might have been allowed to be paid out of the county-rate, yet that a certain portion of them had been incurred, not in the defence of the mandamus, but in respect of the compromise that had afterwards been entered into, and that, at all events, such portion of the costs ought not to have been allowed. I do not mean to say that had the plaintiff done so this would have made any difference in my opinion, for reasons which I shall presently mention; but it was not one of the reasons stated by the plaintiff why he refused to enter the order.

The plaintiff made his explanation before the Justices, and the Justices adhered to their opinion that the order was valid, and the plaintiff adhered to his, and refused to register the order. That being so, his refusal was referred to the finance committee, and that committee appear to have come to the conclusion that a misdemeanour in his office had been committed by the plaintiff, and they appear to have recommended that a prosecution should be instituted and taken up by the treasurer, who should make a statement of the grounds of the offence for which it was proposed that the plaintiff should be removed. The treasurer thereupon drew up a statement, which was brought before the Sessions. The Sessions adjudged the plaintiff to be guilty of such misdemeanour, and that he should be removed. The Custos Rotulorum thereupon appointed the defendant. The plaintiff was dissatisfied with these proceedings, and brought this action. At the trial, these facts, and others which I can more conveniently refer to in the course of my judgment, having been opened by Mr. Chambers, the counsel for the plaintiff, Mr. Bovill, for the defendant, stated that, assuming all the facts to be proved as opened, he should insist that there was no cause of action; that the judgment of the Court of Sessions was conclusive, and could not be inquired into by a jury; and that, therefore, the plaintiff must be taken conclusively to have been removed, and incapable of maintaining this action. To this the Lord Chief Justice assented, and nonsuited the plaintiff. The present rule was obtained to set aside such nonsuit, on the various grounds mentioned in the argument. The Court has heard an argument on both sides, which has given the Court the greatest assistance, and it is very satisfactory to be sure that all the relevant topics and all the main authorities have been brought forward. If after having heard the case so thoroughly investigated, we had entertained any doubt in the matter, we should have taken time to consider; but we have come clearly to the conclusion about to be pronounced, and I see no reason why there should be any delay in giving judgment.

I am of opinion that the course taken by my Lord at the trial was the right one, and that this rule ought to be discharged. During the argument a variety of questions was presented to us for decision, and it would probably be better to go through these questions in their order. In the first instance I will refer to the statute 1 W. & M. c. 21. s. 6, which confers an authority on the Justices to dismiss any clerk of the peace who shall misdemean himself in the execution of the office.—[The learned Judge here read the section.]—The section points out the consequences of such dismissal: the first consequence is, that the office is void; the second is, that the Custos Rotulorum may appoint a new clerk; and the third is, that in case the Custos Rotulorum neglect or refuse to appoint a new clerk before the next General Quarter Sessions, the Justices in Sessions shall do so.

On that section the first question which arises is, whether the office of clerk of the peace had become void, that is, whether the plaintiff had been guilty of a misdemeanour in the office of clerk of the peace, and upon that I own I entertain no doubt. What is a misdemeanour in office is to be found in Com. Dig. tit. 'Offices,' K 3. The word "misdemeanour" in this section is not used in a criminal sense; but it means any improper conduct, such as gross negligence or non or bad user of office. Therefore, there can be no doubt that an absolute and contumacious refusal to enter an order of the Court of Quarter Sessions is a misdemeanour in the office of clerk of the peace. I quite agree with Mr. Chambers that an inadvertent omission, or mere delay, or even a strong remonstrance on the part of the clerk of the peace to the Justices against entering an order which appeared to him to be contrary to law, would not be a misdemeanour in his office; but any constant refusal would be otherwise. Suppose the Justices were to make an order which they thought right, and which the clerk of the peace, after remonstrance, had failed to satisfy them was wrong (as, for instance, if he refused to enter a criminal sentence because hard labour was attached to it which he thought illegal, and which the Justices, upon the construction of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 110. s. 13. should think they had a power to award), I apprehend that would be clearly a misdemeanour in his office. There would be an end of all discipline if such conduct were permitted. The proper course in such a case would be to leave it to the Court of Queen's Bench to determine whether the order was right or not, but not for the clerk of the peace to set himself up as an appeal in error over those which the law has in the administration of justice made his superiors. I certainly think, therefore, that the plaintiff, however properly he may have considered that he was acting in so refusing to proceed on the order of the Justices, was setting himself up as the master of his masters, and was committing a misdemeanour in his office.

Upon this part of the case, I may remark it is not to be assumed that, by passing it over, I see any objection to the order of the Justices. Apart from what was said by Mr. Chambers, as to a portion of the bill having been improperly incurred, which I lay aside because the plaintiff did not rely upon it at the time, I have yet to learn that the costs incurred in county business have to be paid by the Justices, individually, who actually act, and who represent the county in the litigation. Whatever economy it might be to the county to refuse to pay the costs, it might afterwards find great difficulty in getting people to take up its business; and the case of The King v. Essex (4 Term Rep. 591) shews that no such rule exists as the plaintiff appears to have relied on. At all events, it is enough to say that the Justices having determined the question, and the plaintiff, having refused to act on their decision, he laid himself open to proceedings. Then the 6th section refers to the mode in which proceedings are to be instituted, and it says a complaint and charge in writing shall be exhibited against him to the Justices. The section does not deal only with cases of contumacious disobedience. There might be a case in which a clerk of the peace might claim a fee to which he was not entitled, and the person from whom he claimed might institute proceedings by a charge in writing to the Justices. The charge in writing has two objects: first, to give formality to the proceedings, and, secondly, to give the accused notice of what he has to meet. In the case I have just supposed, the charge would come like the charge of a private prosecutor; but there may be cases in which the misdemeanor might affect the Court itself, as in instances of contumacy or contempt of Court. In such cases, I cannot doubt that such a misdemeanor would be equally within the 6th section. How, then, is such a misdemeanor to be prosecuted? Who is to exhibit it? Any person who has an interest in doing so. I should have thought, looking to the course of proceedings under similar statutes, that the Court itself might, of their own motion, call on the clerk to answer, and I refer as an illustration of this to the case In the matter of Bryant (4 Term Rep. 716. and 5 Term Rep. 509), where the Court of King's Bench, acting upon the statute 27 Geo. 2. c. 17, appeared, by a rule, to have exercised a jurisdiction analogous to that given to the Quarter Sessions in the present case. Here, however, the Sessions did not so proceed; but the finance committee and the Court of Sessions itself requested the treasurer to bring the matter before the Court. Then arises the most important question in the case, whether the Court was competent to decide on the matter, or whether they were Judges and also parties, and whether the proceedings, therefore, were void. The question was divided into three heads in the argument for the plaintiff. It was said, first, there was a pecuniary interest, on account of some of the Justices being liable for the costs; secondly, their interest as prosecutors in having induced the treasurer to bring the matter forward; and, thirdly, it was said that the judgment was improperly obtained.

As to the third, I am unable to distinguish it from the others. It is not stated that any fraud was committed, nor that any of the members of the Court used any artifice to defeat justice. It was hardly suggested, except that they sat on the Bench and adjudged, and that they had a pecuniary interest or strong bias, that any of the members of the Court were guilty of or acted from corruption. I must therefore dismiss the third head and deal only with the others.

Now, as to the pecuniary interest alleged. It is certain that the Justices had employed Mr. Scudamore in the proceedings on the mandamus. It is then said that they were interested in obtaining the order to pay the costs, otherwise they would be personally liable, and so they were interested in procuring the plaintiff to be discharged from his office because he had not filed that order. On that point I must refer to what I have already said, and, in addition, I must express an opinion that that is not such a pecuniary interest as to make the judgment of the Justices void. I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that the persons whose costs had already been paid had, upon the supposition that the case of The King v. Essex (4 Term Rep. 591) would be overruled, such a pecuniary interest in the matter as to make their judgment void. It may or may not have been wiser that they should not have been there; of that they were the best judges; but it was lawful for them to be there.

As to the other question, whether they were disqualified by being prosecutors, I cannot entertain any doubt. It might equally well be said that a Judge who directs that a particular bill shall be presented to the grand jury, because he thinks that the evidence, according to the depositions, will support the charge, ought to withdraw from the Bench, and send some other person to try the charge, simply because he said that a reasonable case existed for an inquiry. I cannot regard the Justices who suggested that the prosecution should be instituted, as being persons who could be properly called parties to the prosecution. Section 6. gives the appointment of a new clerk of the peace to the Justices on the failure of the Custos Rotulorum to appoint. So that there is no case in which in a proceeding under this act, it may not be said the whole body of the Justices may be interested in removing a clerk of the peace. The remote interests which have been suggested, namely, of the county not paying, and the Justices being, therefore, personally liable for costs, and the bias of those who have directed a prosecution ought not to be compared with the direct interest given by the appointment under this 6th section. If the Justices had been disqualified by interest, what would have been the result? Would the proceedings have been void, or would the Court of Queen's Bench have interfered? The case of Dimes v. the Proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal (3 H.L. Cas. 759) is, I think, convincing, that the judgment would not be void, so that it might, at any time thereafter, within six years from any receipt of fees, be questioned by the person discharged after, perhaps, the evidence had been lost, on which the judgment was founded, but voidable only on proper steps being taken to set it aside. That was the opinion of Lord Wensleydale in that case, as shewn by his pointing out what would be the proper course by which to take advantage of such an objection. He said that the proper course would be to bring a writ of error in fact, and to suggest as error that the Judge was interested. Assuming that the judgment stands, what is its effect? It is said that it has no effect except between the Justices and the plaintiff, and that it has no effect upon third parties. Is that the true result of the principles laid down? It is unnecessary to refer to more than the judgment of this Court in the case of Kemp v. Neville (10 Com. B. Rep. 523; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 158), in which Groenvelt's case (1 Ld. Raym. 454) was cited, where Chief Justice Holt,—after stating that the censors of the College of Physicians, who had punished the plaintiff for bad practice as a physician, had jurisdiction, first, over the person of the plaintiff, because he had practised in London; secondly, over the subject-matter, viz., the unskilful administration of physic; and, thirdly, over the fact for which he was punished, because it was committed within the jurisdiction, viz., in London,—goes on to say that where a man has jurisdiction over another man in all these particulars, it is apparent that whether the matter of fact be such as is alleged or not, it is not traversable, but the plaintiff is concluded. That was adopted by this Court in Kemp v. Neville (10 Com. B. Rep. 523; s. c. 31 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) C.P. 158), where the action was against the Vice Chancellor of Cambridge University for locking up a young woman for alleged improper morals. As to the cases which have been cited on behalf of the plaintiff in the present case, I shall refer only to two, because they illustrate all that has been contended for on the part of the plaintiff. First in the case of Price v. Dewhurst (8 Sim. 279), which at first sight appears to be an authority for entering into the question whether the Court was properly constituted; but when it comes to be considered, it does not do so. It was a case to enforce the distribution of the testator's property. He having died domiciled in England, the question was, was the English law to be enforced among the parties? It appeared that he had previously lived at the Danish island of St. Croix, where the property to be distributed was. By the Danish law there is what is called a Court of Dealing, that is, a Court by which it should be determined how assets upon a testate or intestate succession should be distributed, from which Court there is an appeal to the Supreme Court in Denmark. It seems that persons could, by certain proceedings under the Danish law, constitute themselves, although interested in the matter, a Court of Dealing. Certain persons interested under the testator's will in that case did constitute themselves into a Court of Dealing, and awarded that the law of domicile should be disregarded, and the property handed over to themselves. The Vice Chancellor, in dealing with that case, applies the principle to which Mr. Gates referred, but the parties there were more than interested, for the end and beginning of the proceedings were intended to be that the persons who acted as Judges should give the property to themselves. That is what was passing in the mind of the Vice Chancellor, because he says, "I am at liberty to do this, viz., to see whether a judgment obtained abroad has been fraudulently obtained or not, and I apprehend that if the Court finds that certain proceedings abroad have been fraudulent, then it is at liberty to deal with the parties it finds before it and the subject it has to administer, just in the same manner as if the foreign judgment had never taken place."

Now, the only other case relied on by the counsel for the plaintiff to which I shall refer is that of Doe d. Davy v. Haddon (3 Dougl. 310), and that case I think comes to nothing more than was suggested by the Court of Queen's Bench in The Queen v. the Governors of Darlington School (6 Q.B. Rep. 682; s. c. 14 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 67), where it was held that trustees had power to dismiss the schoolmaster at their discretion, but the Court suggested that corruption or indulging in malicious feelings against the master, or anything to prove that the judgment of the trustees was not a real judgment, might have been shewn. On the whole, therefore, having considered this case as its importance demanded, I am clearly of opinion that the course taken by my Lord at the trial was right, and that the rule ought to be discharged.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should have abstained from adding anything, after what has been said by my Brother Willes, if the case had not been of so great importance to the plaintiff. It cannot be disputed, I think, that the judgment was pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction, created for that purpose by the statute. Then are the proceedings good on the face of them? It is said that the charges do not amount to a misdemeanor. But the word "misdemeanor" in the 6th section is to be read in connexion with the 5th. The two expressions, "well demean himself," which is in the 5th section, and "misdemean himself," which is in the 6th section, are correlative expressions, and each interpret the other. "Misdemean himself," I conceive, means nothing more than this, behaving improperly in his office. If then the order be a good order, which the judgment states it to be, and if the plaintiff wilfully refuses to obey it, which this judgment states he did, the judgment is good on the face of it. Then the question is, may it be impeached by extrinsic evidence? Now, I will assume that it may be impeached for fraud practised on the Court, or for corruption in the Court, or for violation of natural justice, as where a man has had no notice of the proceedings. I will also assume that if it could be made out that the Justices were interested, then the judgment might be impeached. Had they then any interest? The only interest was in the order for the payment of the bill of costs. I agree with what my Brother Willes has said on that point. In making this order for the discharge of the plaintiff, the Justices could have had no interest except the power of appointing his successor in the event of the Custos Rotulorum failing to do so. The only remaining question is, could the persons who were judges also act as prosecutors? The conduct of the plaintiff was contumacious to the Court itself, and might therefore be prosecuted by the Court.

There is so close an analogy between a prosecution of this nature and proceedings in the nature of contempt, that I am unable to see any difference. With a case of contempt, the Judge suggests himself the offence, and it is inquired into before him. It would be no disqualification, I apprehend, in the case of a prosecution of an inferior officer of this Court, if the Court suggested the prosecution, and in the event of the success of the prosecution the Court, or some member of it, might have the appointment of the successor. At one time it did occur to me that perhaps some other person might have directed the proceedings; but, on full consideration, I do not think that that would have made any real difference.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It has been scarcely urged by the counsel for the plaintiff that the charges in writing did not disclose matter that amounted to a misdemeanor within the meaning of the statute. Misdemeanor there clearly means only misbehaviour in office, and if so, it can scarcely be contended that the charges alleging a contumacious refusal to record an order of the Court of Quarter Sessions was not a misbehaviour in office by the clerk of the peace within the meaning of the statute. Whether those charges were proved or not, I abstain from giving an opinion; for I think that question is not before us. Generally, all Courts of competent jurisdiction are judges of the facts, and their adjudications as to the facts are conclusive. That, again, was not disputed generally by the counsel for the plaintiff; but they said that the plaintiff might inquire into the validity of the order, because the Court of Quarter Sessions in this case was not properly constituted. The grounds suggested for this are, that the Justices had an interest, and that they were prosecutors. I am, however, at a loss to find what interest they had in the dismissal of the plaintiff from office. The order had been made, and whether drawn up or not, it appears to have been obeyed; so that the pecuniary interest which it is alleged they had, seems to me to be not borne out by the facts. Then it was said that they were both parties and judges. It strikes me that they were not parties unless they had some personal interest in the matter. They may have been prosecutors, but as such they were exercising a public duty as they were when they were acting as judges. The maxim that no man can be a Judge in his own cause, cannot refer to a state of things like the present when, from a relation created by the statute, there is thrown on these Justices the duty of deciding whether there has been a misdemeanor in the office of clerk of the peace. Supposing a clerk of the peace were to falsify the records of the Court, can it be said that the Court has not power to bring him before themselves, and to order that charges shall be made against him in respect of such offence? If so, surely the same principle must apply to other offences by the clerk of a less degree. The Justices in sessions are, I think, not only competent to decide, but they are exclusively the tribunal to determine the question. On these grounds, therefore, it seems to me that my Lord was right in holding upon the facts suggested that it was impossible to inquire into the validity of this order.

ERLE, C.J.—I am still of the same opinion that I had at the trial when I directed the nonsuit. The reasons have been so fully assigned by my learned Brothers, with which I entirely concur, that I have nothing to add.

Rule discharged.

[IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.]

June 13, 1866.

THE QUEEN, on the prosecution of CASSELLS, respondent, v. HALL, appellant.

35 L. J. M.C. 251; L. R. 1 Q.B. 632; 12 Jur. N.S. 892.

Easter Offerings—Meaning of Term "Communicant"—Construction of Terriers—Evidence—Ancient Terriers—Fresh Evidence on Appeal.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—An ancient terrier contained the following statement as a class of rights belonging to a parish church: "Easter offerings, every communicant, 2d.; every cow, 2d.; every plough, 2d.; every foal, 1s.; every hive of bees, 1d.; every house, 3½d.:—Held, first, that the terrier was admissible, and was evidence of a custom sufficient to exclude an alleged common law right to Easter offerings at the rate of 2d. per head for every member of a family of or above the age of sixteen, as this right had never been considered to include some of the items embraced in the statement; secondly, that the word "communicant" did not apply to the second and succeeding items in the statement, but that they were chargeable on all the parishioners, whether communicants or not; thirdly, that houses built since the terrier was made were chargeable; lastly, that there was nothing in the terrier to shew that the term "communicant" applied to persons other than those who actually communed.

Quære—whether Easter offerings are due as of common right.

On the hearing of an appeal to the Quarter Sessions from the decision of the Justices below, it is competent to the respondent to produce evidence in support of his case additional to that given before the Justices.

On appeal to the Quarter Sessions of the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Pontefract, on the 10th of April, 1865, against an order of two Justices, adjudging the appellant liable to pay to the respondent, as vicar of Batley, the sum of 7½d. for tithes, oblations and obventions arising within the parish of Batley, for the year 1864, and also the sum of 5s. for costs, the Sessions confirmed the order, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following.

CASE.

The order was made under the 7 & 8 Will. 3. c. 6. s. 2, and the following were the grounds of appeal: First, that there is no legal custom within the parish of Batley for the payment of Easter offerings. Secondly, that there was no legal evidence of any custom for the payment of Easter offerings in the parish of Batley produced at the hearing before the Justices, or of any authority for the respondent to receive any Easter dues or Easter offerings. Thirdly, that there was not any legal terrier or other authority for the respondent to receive Easter dues or offerings within the parish of Batley. Fourthly, that the terrier upon which the claim of the respondent was founded purported to have been made before the appellant's dwelling-house was erected, and no terrier had been made since the erection of his dwelling-house so as to make or establish any claim for Easter dues or Easter offerings in reference thereto. Fifthly, that the appellant was not a communicant of the Church of England. Sixthly, that the order made upon the appellant in other respects was illegal and void.

At the hearing of the appeal the parish clerk was called, and produced a terrier, dated 1825, entitled, "A terrier of the glebe lands and other rights belonging to the parish church of Batley, in the West Riding of the county of York, 1825," and which contained, amongst others, the following note: "13th. Easter offerings, every communicant, 2d.; every cow, 2d.; every plough, 2d.; every foal, 1s.; every hive of bees, 1d.; every house, 3½d." This document did not on the face of it purport to be made by the procurement or direction of the archbishop or of the bishop of the diocese, nor did it appear that the bishop had appointed the persons to make it who had signed it. It concluded with the signature of Matthew Sedgwick, the curate, three churchwardens and eight other persons. It was not signed by Mr. Foxley, the then vicar, nor did it appear whom the churchwardens represented, the vicar or the parish, nor did it appear that the eight other persons who had signed it were inhabitants of the parish at the date of the terrier, nor did it purport to have been taken on the view, nor state how it had been made, nor did it appear to be duly attested by the bishop's registrar.

The parish clerk also produced two other terriers, of the respective dates of 1781 and 1777, all of which terriers he brought from the parish chest. The counsel for the appellant objected to the admission of the terriers of 1781 and 1777, on the ground that the Court of Quarter Sessions was called upon to decide on the second ground of appeal, whether the order made by the Court below was good and well founded on the evidence then brought before it, and the terrier of 1825 was alone in evidence before the Justices who made the order. That the appeal was against that decision, and that in the absence of any authority under the statute giving the respondent the right to bring forward fresh evidence in support of the original complaint, the Quarter Sessions ought not to allow the respondent to adduce further and better evidence as though this were an original hearing of the complaint. The objection was overruled and the evidence admitted.

The parish clerk further proved that he had held his office for fifty years, and that he had written the terrier dated 1825 and signed it; that he had collected the tithes and Easter offerings throughout the parish both for the last vicar, who died twenty-five years ago, and the present one; that the Easter offerings so collected included a sum of 2*d.* for each communicant and 3½*d.* for every house. He further said that he collected from every parishioner who would pay. On cross-examination he further stated that the Rev. Thomas Foxley was vicar when the terrier of 1825 was made, and that Mr. Sedgwick was then curate; that Mr. Foxley was not at Batley at that time; that neither the bishop nor the chancellor of the diocese, nor any one representing either, was present at the meeting at which the terrier was resolved upon; that he did not take or send any copy of the terrier to the bishop's registry at York; that he did not see or hear from the chancellor of the diocese about the terrier, and that he did not know whether anybody had done so. That formerly the Quakers used to refuse to pay the Easter offerings; they always refused, and other persons had refused lately.

Mr. John Dickens, a clerk in the registry of the Archbishop of York, produced from the registry a number of terriers, dated respectively 1727, 1743, 1748, 1764, 1770, 1777, 1781, 1786, 1802 and 1825, all of which contained the same paragraph as that numbered 13 in the terrier of 1825, and in the same words, the terrier of 1825 from the bishop's registry being a duplicate of that first produced by Chadwick, and in his handwriting.

The counsel for the appellant formally objected to the reception of this evidence, on the ground before mentioned. The Justices admitted it, and reserved the point.

The counsel for the respondent then put in evidence the endowment of the vicarage of Batley, A.D. 1235, from the Archbishop's Roll in the Registry of York, from which it appeared that the vicarage was endowed with "omnes proventus altarii." On behalf of the appellant it was proved that he had been four years minister of the Baptist chapel at Batley; that his parents had never been members of the Established Church; that neither he nor his wife had ever been baptized or confirmed according to the rubric; that they had never been communicants in the Established Church; and that the house in which he lived, and in respect of which the amount of 3½*d.* was claimed, was not built at the date of the last alleged terrier.

On the part of the appellant it was contended, first, that this was not the hearing of an original complaint, but an appeal from the decision of Justices alleged to be wrong on the evidence before them. It might well have been that, on better evidence to warrant the decision of the Court below, there would have been no appeal; that if the fresh evidence were admitted, this was, in fact, a new trial, and not an appeal against the judgment in a former one; that the document produced before the Justices in petty sessions was not shewn to be a valid terrier; that it did not appear by what authority it was made, or that it was made by any, nor did it appear that it was signed by the churchwardens of the parish, nor by any parishioners signifying their assent on behalf of the parish to its correctness; that for anything that appeared, it was a mere private document written for the benefit of the clergyman, and by his procurement; that it did not appear to have been laid up in the bishop's registry, nor to be an exemplified or examined copy of any terrier placed there. It was, therefore, invalid as a terrier, and not admissible.

Secondly, that assuming the additional evidence to have been rightly admitted, and the copy of the terrier of 1825 to be valid, it could only affect such houses as were built at the time that it was made, and which were fully described in the body of the document, or in the schedule thereunto annexed, as the very object of making these terriers from time to time was to include the additions and alterations made in the lands and tenements which belonged to the vicarage, and that as the appellant's house was not then in existence the terrier did not in any way affect it, nor shew it to be a house belonging to the vicarage or liable to pay Easter dues to the vicar, nor shew whether the house was lying within or out of the parish. The same objection also applied to the antecedent terriers if they were held to be receivable in evidence.

Thirdly, that the appellant and his wife never having been communicants of the Church of England, the customary payment alleged to be due from every communicant could not be due from them as such, neither could it be due to the vicar as an offering for religious services rendered, as none had ever been rendered by him, to the appellant or his wife.

The counsel for the respondent contended that it was the practice of the Court to receive additional evidence on appeals, and that the additional evidence ought to be received; that Easter offerings were due of common right, independent of custom, and even if that were not so, still, the custom being established, it was unnecessary, in order to charge the appellant in respect of the house, that it should be inserted in the schedule of the terrier, any more than it was necessary to insert every fresh plough, or hive of bees, brought into the parish, and that parishioners were liable to Easter or other ecclesiastical dues, although they were not communicants.

If the Court should be of opinion that the respondent was correct in contending that the appellant was liable to Easter offerings, due as of common right, or that, looking at the second ground of appeal, fresh evidence, in addition to what was given before the Justices who made the order, was admissible on the hearing of the appeal, and, also, that neither of the appellant's second or third objections was well founded, the order of Sessions is to be confirmed. But if the Court should think either of the last-mentioned objections well founded, or that the Sessions were wrong in admitting fresh evidence on the hearing of the appeal, their order is to be quashed.

Manisty and Hannay (April 21), for the respondent.—With regard to the first point, it was decided, as long ago as 1795, in The King v. the Inhabitants of Bromley (6 Term. Rep. 330) that an appeal to Quarter Sessions from an order of Justices is like a new trial, in which the whole case is re-opened. With regard to the second objection, terriers containing statements corresponding to those in the terriers objected to were duly produced from the registry of the Archbishop of York.

[The COURT intimated that the first two objections need not be argued further.]

There is therefore evidence of a custom to pay the dues which are claimed. But, putting aside this evidence, there is abundant authority to shew that Easter offerings at the rate of 2d. a head for every person above the age of sixteen are due as of common right, though more may be claimed by custom. They were originally a composition for personal tithes. They cited Lawrence v. Jones (Bumb. 173; s. c. 2 Gwil. 662; 1 Eag. & Y. 801), Egerton v. Still (Bumb. 198), Carthew v. Edwards (2 Eag. & Y. 121; s. c. Amb. 72), Stirling v. King (3 Wood, 87), Bennett v. Tocker (Ibid. 460), Wright v. Elderton (1 Ibid. 518), Swaine v. Perne (Ibid. 341), Statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 13. ss. 7, 10, Gibson's Codex, 705, Bacon's Abr. tit. 'Tithes,' (M) Toller on Tithes, 48, Shelford on Tithes, 306, note (K), Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, vol. 3, tit.

'Tithes,' 713, Ayliffe's Parergon, 395. The appellant's house is chargeable, although it was not in existence at the time of making the terrier in 1825. The words of the terrier are general, and apply to each one of the parochial houses, whatever may have been the date of its erection.

Cleasby and Campbell Foster, for the appellant.—Easter offerings, as a substitute for personal tithes, are only due by special custom and not of right. These offerings, when they first originated, were voluntary. They cited Popplewell v. Canby (2 Ibid. 390), The King v. Reeves (W. Kelynge, 196; s. c. 2 Eag. & Y. 55), 2 Inst. 58, 659, Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, tit. 'Offerings,' 1, Gibson's Codex, 503, Watson's Clergyman's Law, 585, Stephen's Laws of the Clergy, tit. 'Oblations,' 27 Hen. 8. c. 20, 32 Hen. 8. c. 7, Eagle on Tithes, vol. 1, pp. 413, 414. The word "communicant" applies to the whole statement in the terrier, so as to restrict the claim to actual communicants; and the custom, if it exists, ought not to be unduly extended to houses which were not in existence at the time of the terrier.

Cur. adv. vult.

On the 13th of June, the judgment of the Court (Blackburn, J., Shee, J. and Lush, J.) was delivered by BLACKBURN, J.—Two questions raised in this case were disposed of in the course of the argument. We held, and to that opinion we adhere, first, that it was competent to the respondent to produce, on the hearing of the appeal, evidence in support of his claim, additional to that which was given before the Justices; and, secondly, that the terriers were admissible in proof of a customary right to the oblations therein mentioned.

The question principally argued before us was, whether a payment of 2*d.* per head for every member of a family of or above the age of sixteen was due of common right as an Easter offering; and several authorities in support of the affirmative of that proposition were cited. As the view we take of this case makes it unnecessary to decide this question, we desire only to say, in reference to it, that when the point arises for judicial decision, we hope it will be in such a form as will admit of an appeal to a Court of error. We are of opinion that in this case there is sufficient evidence of a custom, and such a one as excludes the common law claim, supposing it to exist, because it embraces items to which the common law right does not and never has been considered to extend. That evidence consists of terriers dated respectively 1727, 1743, 1748, 1764, 1770, 1777, 1781, 1786, 1802 and 1825, each of which contains the following statement, as a class of "rights belonging to the parish church at Batley, viz.: Easter offerings—Every communicant, 2*d.*; every cow, 2*d.*; every plough, 2*d.*; every foal, 1*s.*; every hive of bees, 1*d.*; every house, 3½*d.*." The appellant contends that the word "communicant" overrides the whole, and that, unless he is chargeable with the 2*d.* as a communicant he is not chargeable with either of the following items. But we are of opinion that this is not the proper reading of the article. We think that each item is an independent charge, and payable by every parishioner, whether he comes within the denomination of communicant or not. The appellant further contends that only such houses are chargeable as are ancient and were in existence when the terriers were made. Upon this point, also, we are against him, and hold that the custom attaches as soon as a house is built and is occupied. We are therefore of opinion that the assessment of 3½*d.* in respect of the house occupied by the appellant is valid, and ought to be supported. This brings us to the main question, namely, what is the proper meaning to be put on the term "communicant": does it mean every person whom the Church in ancient times regarded as under an obligation to commune, and who was therefore virtually a "communicant," or only those who actually communed? Agreeing, as we do, that the word is capable of the wider sense, we are of opinion that the evidence fails to shew that that is the sense in which it is used in the terriers, and that, in the absence of such evidence, we must attribute to the word "communicant" its proper and primary meaning, and hold that it is confined to those who actually communed.

We cannot, therefore, answer the questions put to us by the Sessions wholly in favour of either of the parties, and can, therefore, neither quash nor confirm the order, and the case must, if the parties request it, go back to the Sessions; but as neither party has wholly succeeded, and neither can get costs, they will probably consent to let the matter rest.

Case to be remitted to the Sessions.

[IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.]

May 25, 1866.

HARTLEY v. HINDMARSH.

35 L. J. M.C. 255; 1 H. & R. 607; L. R. 1 C.P. 553; 14 L. T. 795;
14 W. R. 862; 12 Jur. N.S. 502.

See R. v. Miles, [1890] E. R. A.; 59 L. J. M.C. 56; 24 Q.B. D. 423; 62 L. T. 572; 38 W. R. 334 (C.C.R.).

See also 7 Ed. 7. c. 17.

Assault, Action for—Previous Conviction—Bad Plea—Insufficient Proof.

CRIMINAL LAW. EVIDENCE.—To an action for an assault the defendant pleaded that he had been summoned by the plaintiff before a Magistrate, who convicted him in the costs of the complaint and hearing, which the defendant had paid. At the trial, the Magistrate's clerk produced his note-book, by which it appeared that the Magistrate had merely ordered the defendant to enter into his recognizances and pay the expense thereof; the clerk also said in such cases no conviction was ever drawn up:—Held, that the plea was bad, and did not disclose a defence under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. s. 45; that it was not proved; and that, even if there were a conviction, the proper proof was not adduced.

The first count of the declaration was for a common assault, and the third plea to that count alleged that the assault was committed within the jurisdiction of a Metropolitan Police Magistrate; that he, on the complaint of the plaintiff, summoned the defendant, who duly appeared; that such Magistrate having "heard the complaint and charge of the plaintiff, upon the merits adjudged and determined the said complaint and charge, and then ordered the defendant then to pay, and then convicted him, the defendant, in the costs as well as of the said complaint and charge as of the hearing thereof, but did not further order or convict the defendant," and that the said costs were the whole amount which he was adjudged to pay, and that before action he paid them.

In support of this plea, the defendant called the Magistrate's clerk, who produced his note of what had taken place before the Magistrate, from which it appeared that all the Magistrate had done was to order the defendant to enter into recognizances to keep the peace and to pay the costs thereof. The clerk also stated that in such cases it was not the practice to draw up a conviction.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff for 30l., with leave reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for himself on the third plea. A rule nisi was obtained, pursuant to such leave to enter a verdict for the defendant on the third plea, and also for a new trial on the ground that the plea as proved was a good bar to the action.

Parry, Serj. and Woollett shewed cause.—The plea is pleaded under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. s. 45, which provides that if a person on complaint (within the three preceding sections) of the person aggrieved obtain a certificate of dismissal, or, being convicted, pay the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or suffer the imprisonment awarded, he shall be released from all further proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause. In order to obtain this protection, the Magistrate must either dismiss or convict in a fine or imprisonment; the Magistrate has done neither in this case: he has simply, under his other powers, ordered the defendant to enter into recognizances and pay the costs thereof. Again, this is a plea which must be proved in omnibus, which has not been done.

Digby Seymour and Tapping, in support of the rule.—The policy of the statute is to prevent a person being harassed twice. Now here, clearly, there was a hearing and adjudication, and the notes produced were sufficient evidence thereof; for, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. s. 76, the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. are incorporated, and by section 14. of that act a mere note or memorandum may be drawn up, and it is no less a conviction when in that form, and equally efficacious—Ratt v. Parkinson (20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 208), Ex parte Johnson (3 Best & S. 947; s. c. 32 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) M.C. 193).

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The plea says that the Magistrate “ordered the defendant to pay, and then convicted him in the costs as well of the said complaint and charge as of the hearing thereof;” this was not proved, for the clerk proved that he was only ordered to pay 2s. for the expenses of the recognizances which he was required to enter into. There was no adjudication within the meaning of the statute, and the plea is bad as not being within the statute. The statute says, that if the person “having been convicted shall have paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or suffered the imprisonment awarded,” he shall be released from any future action. But here the plaintiff was not adjudged to pay any money within the meaning of the statute. If any person claims the protection of the statute there must either be a dismissal, which must be proved by a certificate, or a conviction, which must be proved in the ordinary common law way.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

BYLES, J.—I am also of the same opinion; for, first, the plea is bad and not within the statute; and, secondly, it was not proved. Again, even if there were a conviction, and it were properly pleaded, yet there was no proper proof; for, though it is true that the oral judgment is the conviction, and that even when drawn up it may, on appeal, be amended before being returned to the Sessions, still, before a conviction can be proved, the law requires that there should be one properly drawn up.

MONTAGUE SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant relies on a statutable release, which cannot be effectual unless the statute be complied with. The statute gives a release if there be a dismissal and certificate thereof, or if there be a conviction and the fine paid or imprisonment undergone. Now, here, there was no dismissal and certificate, nor was there a conviction; but the Magistrate exercised his common law power to bind the defendant over to keep the peace, and ordered him to pay the expense of that.

Rule discharged.

WESTBURY, L.C., June 7, 8, July 11, 1865.

TOTTENHAM v. EMMET.

14 W. R. 3; 12 L. T. 838.

Referred to, Aylesford v. Morris, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. Ch. 146; 27 L. T. 753 (V.C.): affirmed, [1873] E. R. A.; 42 L. J. Ch. 546; L. R. 8 Ch. 484; 28 L. T. 541; 21 W. R. 424 (L.C. & L. J.). Referred to, Beynon v. Cook, 1875, L. R. 10 Ch. 389; 32 L. T. 353; 23 W. R. 413 (L.JJ.); Rae v. Joyce, 1892, 29 L. R. Ir. 500 (C. A.).

Reversion — Dealings with reversioner — Inadequacy of consideration — Mortgage.

FRAUD AND MISREPRESENTATION.—The plaintiff was entitled to a base fee in certain real estates in Ireland, subject to the life interest of, and the exercise of a power of appointment by, his father, who was upwards of seventy years of age, and a lunatic. He applied to the defendant for a loan of 500l., and agreed to include in the security certain costs, to cover which he was not properly liable, and amounting, with the sum of 500l., to 1,064l. The defendant consented to advance the money on these terms. Accordingly, the plaintiff, who had an independent solicitor, mortgaged his reversion to the defendant to secure 2,000l. in case the plaintiff's father should die within three years after the date of the mortgage, and 4,000l. if he should outlive that period, with interest on the respective sums. The plaintiff's father died four years afterwards and the plaintiff filed a bill to set aside the mortgage.

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the mortgage must stand for a security only for the sum actually advanced, and the costs which the plaintiff was liable to pay with interest, and (the plaintiff having before the filing of the bill offered the defendant better terms than the Court held him entitled to), the defendant was ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

The same principles apply to mortgages, as to sales, by expectant heirs.

The principles of the Court, judging of dealings with expectant heirs, are not affected by the repeal of the usury laws.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported 13 W. R. 123). The facts were as follows:—

The plaintiff, Mr. Loftus Abraham Tottenham, at the date of the transactions in question, was entitled, under his father's marriage settlement and a disentailing deed, to a base fee in certain freehold estates in Ireland, subject to his father's life interest, and subject to the exercise of a power of appointment by deed or will by his father. In 1836 the father was found lunatic, and was declared to have been of unsound mind since 1830, and Dr. Southey, the physician appointed by the Court, certified him to be an incurable lunatic. He died in 1860, at the age of seventy-six, without having exercised his power of appointment. In 1852 the plaintiff accepted a bill for 500l., as he alleged, for the accommodation of a Mr. Coghlan. This bill was discounted by the defendant Rickards, and ultimately came into the hands of the defendant Emmet, who brought an action against the plaintiff upon it. This action failed through the want of a proper indorsement, and the costs of the plaintiff (the defendant at law), were taxed at 184l. 7s. 6d., and paid by the defendant Rickards, who appeared to be the person really interested in the result of the action. The plaintiff had filed a bill of discovery to obtain evidence in support of his defence to the action, but having succeeded on the point of pleading, he did not proceed with the suit. The costs of the defendant Emmet in the action were said to be 200l., and in the suit 100l., and the costs of the defendant Rickards in the suit were said to be 80l., but no bills of costs were ever produced in respect of these sums. In August, 1856, the plaintiff, being in great want of money, applied to the defendant Emmet for a loan of 500l.

upon a post obit security, and agreed to include the above sums for costs in the security. The plaintiff had an independent solicitor, Mr. Fesenmeyer, who acted for him throughout the negotiations. By an indenture dated the 16th of August, 1856, and made between the plaintiff of the one part, and the defendant Emmet of the other part, after reciting, amongst other things, the action, and that the costs of the defendant Emmet in such action amounted to the sum of 200*l.*; and reciting the suit in chancery, and that the costs of the defendant Emmet in the suit amounted to 100*l.*; and reciting that the plaintiff alleged that the said action was defended and the said suit instituted without his authority, and admitted that the defendant Emmet was unjustly put to the said costs in the said action and suit, and was desirous that the same should be repaid to the defendant Emmet; and reciting that the plaintiff, who had then applied to and requested the defendant Emmet to lend and advance him the sum of 500*l.*, and to pay on behalf of him, the plaintiff, unto the defendant Rickards, the sum of 264*l.* (being the amount of certain costs paid by the defendant Rickards in the said action and suit); and that in consideration thereof the plaintiff had proposed and agreed to secure unto the defendant Emmet, by the indenture now in statement, and by judgments both in England and Ireland against the plaintiff, at the suit of the defendant Emmet, the payment, within six calendar months after the decease of the plaintiff's father, but without interest during the life of the plaintiff's father, of the sum of 2,000*l.*, in case the plaintiff's father should not live beyond the period of three years from the day of the date of the indenture; and the payment within six calendar months after the death of the plaintiff's father of the sum of 3,000*l.*, with interest on the sum of 2,000*l.*, part of the said sum of 3,000*l.*, at the rate of 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent. per annum from the end of three years from the day of the date of the said indenture, and up to the day of the death of the plaintiff's father, and on the whole of the said sum of 3,000*l.* at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from the day of the death of the plaintiff's father, in case he should live beyond the period of three years from the day of the date of the said indenture, which said sum of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* (as the case might be) was to cover the said sums of 500*l.*, 264*l.*, 200*l.*, and 100*l.*, making together the sum of 1,064*l.*, the residue of the said sum of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* (as the case might be) being added to the said sum of 1,064*l.*, as in lieu of interest during the life, or such part as was thereinbefore-mentioned of the life of the plaintiff's father, and in compensation for deferred payment; and reciting the payment by the defendant Emmet to the defendant Rickards of the sum of 264*l.*, it was witnessed that in pursuance of the agreement, and in consideration of the premises, and of the sum of 500*l.* then paid by the defendant Emmet to the plaintiff, the plaintiff conveyed the Irish estates to the defendant Emmet, subject to a proviso for redemption in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The plaintiff also covenanted that he or his issue in tail would, when competent to do so, do all acts necessary to turn the base fee into an absolute fee simple.

At the date of the mortgage the plaintiff was thirty-seven years old; had been married five and a-half years; and had had issue five children, of whom two were then living. No valuations were made prior to the mortgage of the plaintiff's reversionary interest. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether the defendants were fully aware of the hopeless nature of the lunacy of the plaintiff's father. The reversion fell into possession in August, 1860, and shortly afterwards disputes arose with respect to the mortgage. In the course of the correspondence, the plaintiff offered considerably more than the Court ultimately held him liable to pay. On the 18th of March, 1863, the defendant Emmet filed a bill against the plaintiff, praying for the usual foreclosure decree. On the 26th of March, 1863, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant Emmet as follows:—

"Sir,—We are instructed by Mr. Tottenham to offer to pay you all the cash which you advanced to him on the execution of the security of the 15th of August, 1856, and all the costs paid by you to Mr. Rickards of the chancery suit, which Mr. Tottenham was liable to pay, and which are mentioned in the security above referred to, together with interest on such payments at the rate of 6l. per cent. per annum, as also the costs of conveyances and filing the present bill in chancery. It is Mr. Tottenham's intention, if this offer is not accepted, at once to file a cross-bill to set aside the security, and to use this letter as he may be advised."

In a subsequent letter, the plaintiff's solicitors added that the plaintiff "was ready to pay Mr. Emmet his costs of the chancery suit, which Mr. Tottenham might also be liable to pay."

This offer was refused, and the present suit was commenced to set aside the security. Mr. Rickards was made a defendant by amendment, on the ground that he claimed an interest in 264l., part of the money secured, and was a necessary party. It appeared that, at the date of the mortgage, the plaintiff was in receipt of 800l. a-year out of his father's estates, under an order in lunacy. Several actuaries gave evidence as to the insufficiency of the consideration, and no actuary asserted that the plaintiff received the full value. But some stress was laid on the nature of the contingency, by which the plaintiff's interest was liable to be defeated, and it was contended that such a contingency was not capable of valuation. It was also contended that the plaintiff was under a moral if not legal obligation to pay all the costs of the action, and to discharge the bill which he had accepted, that a fresh action might have been brought with success, and that, under all the circumstances of the case, the consideration was ample.

The Master of the Rolls, following his decision in Bromley v. Smith (7 W. R. 557; 26 Beav. 644), viz., that, in judging of dealings with expectant heirs, there was no difference between a sale and a mortgage, which was a sale pro tanto: held that the mortgage must stand as a security only for the sum of 500l. actually advanced, and such part of the costs as the plaintiff was really liable to pay. And, inasmuch as the defendant Emmet had refused the fair offer of the plaintiff, he ordered him to pay the costs of the suit. From this decision the defendant appealed.

Selwyn, Q.C., and E. K. Karlake, appeared for the appellant.—They contended that the rule as to dealings with expectant heirs was a branch of the law of usury, and that since the repeal of the usury laws the rule was, at least, greatly to be relaxed. It was immaterial whether a contract was made in one form or another while it remained essentially the same, and there was no doubt that a contract for repayment of the principal sum advanced, with compound interest at 20l. per cent. on the death of the plaintiff's father, would be a valid contract, and enforceable in this court. That the contract between the parties was much more beneficial to the plaintiff than such a contract would have been, and that, therefore, the plaintiff's bill should fail. In any case the defendant was entitled to a foreclosure decree for as much as was by the plaintiff's bill confessed to have been advanced, with interest, and was entitled to the costs.

They cited—Earl of Chesterfield v. Janssen (1 Wh. & Tu. L. C. 428); Edwards v. Burt (2 D. M. G. 55); Perfect v. Lane (30 Beav. 197).

Southgate, Q.C., and F. H. Colt, for the plaintiff, supported the decree of the Master of the Rolls. The rule as to post obit securities and contracts as to expectancies was a different rule from those as to usury, and, though the latter have been repealed, the former holds in full force; and this rule is not relaxed because the additional security of a charge on a reversionary interest in real estate is taken by the creditor: the onus is still thrown on the creditor to show full consideration given for the bond or other security.

They cited: Bromley v. Smith (ubi sup.); Talbot v. Staniforth (9 W. R. 827; 1 J. & H. 484); Tottenham v. Green (32 L. J. Ch. 201); St. Albyn v. Harding (27 Beav. 11).

Baggallay, Q.C., and J. W. Chitty, for the defendant Rickards.

E. K. Karlake, in reply, referred to Freeman v. Bishop (2 Atk. 39).

LORD WESTBURY, L.C., reserved judgment.

July 11.—The following judgment, signed by Lord Westbury and bearing this date, was forwarded to the parties and to the Registrar:—It is the established rule of courts of equity that persons dealing with expectant heirs (under which denomination remaindermen and reversioners are included) must prove that they have given their value for the interest acquired by them. This rule applies to mortgagees as well as purchasers wherever a mortgage is taken from an expectant heir for a sum of money, the amount or full value of which he has not received. The case before me is the same as if Mr. Emmet had bought from Mr. Loftus Abraham Tottenham a reversion of a sum of 2,000*l.*, to be, in a certain event, increased to 3,000*l.*, payable after the death of the father of Mr. Tottenham. I treat these sums as certainly secured, for I cannot attend to the suggestion that possibly by the death of the plaintiff, Tottenham, and his two children, in the lifetime of his father, the mortgage, being the conveyance of a base fee only in the freehold estates, might have perished altogether. At the time of the contract the father had been a lunatic for more than twenty-five years. He was upwards of seventy years of age, and afflicted with paralysis. The son was in his thirty-eighth year; he was married, and had five children born to him during the six years preceding the contract, of whom two were alive. The security, therefore, as to the freeholds, was not subject to any real danger; and as to the leasehold estates, the son was absolutely entitled to them, subject to the father's life interest. The subject of the contract of purchase by Mr. Emmet (for as such I regard it) was the principal sum of 2,000*l.* if the father of Mr. Tottenham died within three years of the date of the contract, and the sum of 3,000*l.* if he survived the period of three years, that is to say, if the father died within three years Mr. Emmet was to receive 2,000*l.*, but if he survived that time by a day only, Mr. Emmet would receive 3,000*l.* The sum that might become payable under this contract was to be repaid to Mr. Emmet within six months after the death of his father, with interest from the death at the rate of three and a quarter per cent. The consideration given for this reversionary sum is next to be considered. To render the nature of the alleged consideration intelligible, it is necessary to state that an action had been brought by or in the name of Mr. Emmet, but on behalf of the defendant Rickards against Mr. Tottenham on a bill of exchange. Mr. Tottenham obtained a verdict on a technical point. The costs incurred by the plaintiff in the action were estimated at 200*l.*, and the defendant, Rickards, had paid to Mr. Tottenham's attorney the sum of 184*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* as the costs of the defendant. In aid of his defence to that action Mr. Tottenham had filed a bill of discovery against Emmet and Rickards for the costs of which he was liable, and they were computed as to Emmet at 100*l.*, and as to Rickards at 80*l.* In the month of August, 1856, Mr. Tottenham applied for a loan of money to Mr. Rickards, by whom he was introduced to Mr. Emmet, and the latter agreed to advance him the sum of 500*l.*, on the terms that he should include in the security the above-mentioned several sums of 200*l.*, 184*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, 100*l.*, and 80*l.* Of these sums Mr. Tottenham was under no liability whatever to pay the sum of 200*l.*, or to repay the sum of 184*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* Mr. Emmet says that Mr. Tottenham voluntarily offered to include these two last-mentioned sums in the proposed mortgage security. If he did, it is a proof of his distress and pecuniary embarrassment. I cannot reckon either of these two sums as part of the consideration for the mortgage made to Mr. Emmet. With respect to the other two sums of 100*l.* and 80*l.*, they may be taken (although no bills of costs had been delivered) as the amount of the costs payable by Mr. Tottenham in respect of the bill of discovery. The result, therefore, is that the value given to Mr. Tottenham for the mortgage is the sum of 500*l.*, and the two sums of 100*l.* and 80*l.*, making in the whole 680*l.* This is the entire consideration given by Mr. Emmet for the principal sum of 2,000*l.*, payable after the death of the lunatic, if he should die within three years, or for the sum of 3,000*l.*, payable in like manner.

if the lunatic survived the period of three years. There is no evidence on the part of Mr. Emmet, to prove that this sum of 680*l.* was, at the date of the contract, the fair value of either of the two reversionary sums secured by the mortgage. But, on the other hand, there is evidence that even the entire sum of 1,064*l.* was much less than the value of either of the principal sums of 2,000*l.* or 3,000*l.* The terms were such as no one but an embarrassed man would have submitted to, and inasmuch as they were taken from an expectant heir, the transaction is such as, according to the rules of this court, must be deemed unconscionable. The principles of this Court, by which the validity of dealings with expectant heirs is tried (however unwise they may be when examined by the light of jurisprudence and social economy), are not at all affected by the Legislative abolition of the old laws against usury. The value of an expectancy or reversionary interest may be ascertained now as well as it could be when the law against usury was in existence. It was insisted before me that Mr. Emmet might have lent the 500*l.* to Mr. Tottenham at 40*l.* or 50*l.* per cent. interest, and that the loan would have been legal and valid. This may be conceded, but it must be added that if Mr. Emmet took for such a contract with an expectant heir any charge or security affecting his expectancy (in which word I include remainders and reversionary interests), the contract would still have to be tried by the settled rules and principles of this court, and if the terms of it were found to be such as the Court holds to be unconscionable, the transaction would be set aside. It is immaterial that Mr. Tottenham voluntarily proposed to Mr. Emmet to make himself liable for the 200*l.* and 184*l.* The offer was made under the pressure of pecuniary distress, and was a bribe to Mr. Emmet to induce him to lend him the sum of 500*l.* Administering the justice of this Court, I am bound to say that such offer ought not to have been accepted. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decree of his Honour, the Master of the Rolls, is in substance correct, and I am bound to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Wood, V.C., July 15, 1865.

WINDHAM v. COOPER.

14 W. R. 8.

Practice—Cross-bill—Dismissal for want of prosecution.

PRACTICE.—The pendency of a cross-bill by a different defendant is no answer to a motion to dismiss for want of prosecution by a defendant who is right in point of time.

This was a motion to dismiss for want of prosecution. The moving defendant was a bare trustee, and the principal defendants (his cestuiz que trustent) had filed a cross-bill to impeach the settlement on which the plaintiff's title depended, and were not in a position to move.

E. K. Karlake, for the motion, shewed that the defendant was right in point of time.

Rolt, Q.C., and Terrel, contra.—The principal defendant has become bankrupt and his assignees have filed a cross-bill to impeach the settlement. and if that suit proceeds and the settlement is set aside, this suit will be rendered nugatory.

This is a mere ornamental defendant, who has no real interest in getting rid of the suit.

Karslake, in reply.—A person who files a bill must proceed with his suit whether there is a cross-bill filed or not.

Wood, V.C.—Liberty to amend was given two months ago on the application of the plaintiff.

When the bill was originally filed an answer was put in by this defendant saying that the suit ought not to proceed to a hearing till a cross bill had been filed. If the matter had stayed there I would not have received a motion to dismiss, made without any previous notice requiring the plaintiff to proceed; but the plaintiff did not stay proceedings on the answer coming in, but, on the contrary, applied for leave to amend; this reduces the matter to the simple question whether, when a cross bill is filed by one defendant, every other defendant is obliged to wait till it sues that one to bring his cross bill to a hearing, or till the plaintiff chooses to force him on; I can see no reason for holding any such doctrine; the suit must be taken, for this purpose, as a separate suit against each defendant, and in the absence of any special circumstances connecting any two defendants together, each defendant is entitled to require the plaintiff to proceed against him with the same expedition as if he alone was a party to the suit.

I make the common order in this case.

Wood, V.C., June 26, 1865.

WOODS v. SOWERBY.

14 W. R. 9.

Practice—Account—Real estate—Creditors' suit.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Though an account of real estate can only be had at suit of a creditor in a bill on behalf of all creditors, still, if in a suit not so entitled, it becomes expedient to take such an account, the Court will, at the hearing, direct the bill to be taken as a bill on behalf of creditors. There is no objection to a bill for an account of the estates of two testators who are joint debtors.

This was a bill against the executors of two testators of the name of Hyde.

It appeared that these persons were jointly indebted to the plaintiff on simple contract, and the bill prayed for administration of both estates, and that the plaintiff's debt might be paid out of either or both.

The bill was not filed "on behalf of himself and all other creditors," &c., and the persons beneficially entitled to the real estate of the testators were not parties thereto. The usual administration decree was taken against the estates of both testators, and it appeared that the personal estate was insufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's debt.

The cause now came to be spoken to on minutes of this decree.

Rolt, Q.C., and Bury, for the plaintiff, asked for an account of the real estate, and that the same might be administered in the usual manner.

E. K. Karslake, for the defendant, objected that they could not have an account of the real estate of two testators in the same suit, unless it was a creditor's suit on behalf of all the creditors of each. The right of administering real estate is not given to a plaintiff, except in a bill on behalf of all creditors. Even a creditor cannot have a decree at all affecting real estate except in a suit on behalf of all creditors.

Rolt, Q.C., in reply.—The objection is too late. The decree has been already taken against both. We have a lien on the property of both, and want thereupon to get at both estates. When you have got trustees with power to sell and give receipts you do not want the cestes que trustent for the purpose of enforcing a lien against the property.

WOOD, V.C.—The right form will be to direct that the bill should be taken as on behalf of all the creditors of A. and R. Hyde, deceased, respectively. Then take an account of the two estates, and if they are insufficient, decree a sale of the real estate.

Then there will be the usual administration decree of the real and personal estate of two testators, and an account of what is due to the plaintiff under the decree, and then reserve further consideration.

There is no substantial difficulty in the case of the trustees, you do not want two sets of defendants; all persons must come in to have the account taken, each for his own estate.

LORDS JUSTICES, Nov. 4, 1865.

Re ADAM'S TRUSTS.

14 W. R. 18; 13 L. T. 347; 11 Jur. N.S. 961.

Will—Death—Life estate—“In the event of death,” and “at the death” construed as referring to death at any time.

WILL.—Bequest to A., “and in the event of her death” over, followed by codicil reciting the bequest to A., giving legacies, and proceeding—“at A.’s death I wish all remaining to be for the benefit” of B. and C.

Held, that upon the will and codicil, taken together, A. took a life interest, with remainder to B. and C.

This was an appeal from an order made on petition by the Master of the Rolls for payment out of court of a sum paid in under the Trustee Relief Act.

Robert Adam, by his will dated the 21st November, 1854, devised and bequeathed as follows:—“I give, devise, and bequeath all my effects, both real and personal, to my wife Phœbe Adam, and, in the event of her death, to the children of my deceased brother, James Adam, to be equally divided between them.”

The testator made a codicil to his will dated the 23rd November, 1854, which was in the following words:—“I hereby, as before stated, leave all I possess to my wife, Phœbe Adam, wishing her to continue the allowance of 30*l.* per annum to Mrs. James Adam; I also wish 20*l.* to be given to each of Henry Cox’s children at their wedding, and the sum of 20*l.* to each of Mrs. James Adam’s children on their wedding-day; also 50*l.* to be given to William Cox, my wife’s brother; at my wife’s death I wish all remaining to be for the benefit of Mrs. James Sarah Adam and her children.”

The testator died in 1858, and his wife in 1862. The executor of the testator, in 1864, paid into court part of the estate, and upon the petition of Phœbe Adam’s executors, the Master of the Rolls made an order for payment out of court of the fund to them. Against this order the present appeal was brought by Mrs. J. S. Adam and her children, who insisted that the gift to the testator’s widow was for life only, with remainder to themselves.

L. Bird and H. J. Bird for the appellants.

Whitehorne for the respondents, the executors of Phœbe Adam, cited Pushman v. Filliter (3 Ves. 7); Wilson v. Major (11 Ves. 205); Re Mortlock’s Trusts (5 W. R. 748; 3 K. & J. 456); Bowes v. Goslett (6 W. R. 8; 27 L. J. Ch. 249); Holmes v. Godson (4 W. R. 415; 8 D. M. G. 152); Re Yalden (1 D. M. G. 53); Barton v. Barton (3 K. & J. 512).

Cole, Q.C., for the trustee of the will, asked for his costs.

L. Bird in reply.

KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., said that the words used in the will in this case, in reference to the death of the testator's wife, were, properly speaking, flexible; they might either mean death in the testator's lifetime, or death whenever it might happen. The interpretation to be put upon these words must depend upon the context in which they were found, and the codicil must, for this purpose, be read with the will.

The words "as before stated" in the codicil seemed to leave the matter as it was left by the will, if it were not for the other parts of the codicil. In this particular case his Lordship thought that on the true construction of this will and codicil, the words, "at my wife's death I wish all remaining to be for the benefit of Mrs. James Sarah Adam and her children," indicated an intention to reduce the gift to the testator's wife to a tenancy for life; the words, "all remaining" were to be construed as meaning all which should remain, not after any expenditure by the testator's wife, but after payment of the legacies given by the codicil. His Lordship gave no opinion on the words of the will taken alone, but thought that, taking the codicil with the will, the testator's wife must be held to take as tenant for life, with remainder to Mrs. James Sarah Adam and her children.

TURNER, L.J., said that this was a difficult case, but that on the first disposition in the will, he entertained no doubt. It was clear that an absolute gift to A., followed by an absolute gift to B. on A.'s death, was, in the absence of any controlling context, a gift to B. in the event of A.'s death in the lifetime of the testator. But these words might bear a different import according to the context in which they were found. His Lordship thought that nothing could be found in the codicil to affect the construction of the will until the words, "At my wife's death, I wish, &c." These words must be carefully considered. To construe the words "at my wife's death" as referring to death in the testator's lifetime, would be to put a forced and unnatural construction upon them, they must mean "on my wife's death." Then, as to the words, "I wish," his Lordship thought that the authorities cited by Mr. Whitehorne, in his very lucid and concise argument, did not bear upon the present case; but it seemed clear, on looking at the rest of the codicil, and especially at the gift of the legacies, that those words were there used as words of bequest; the testator then had said—"On my wife's death I give and bequeath all remaining"—and these last words must mean, all that may remain after the previous dispositions, and not all which might be undisposed of by the testator's wife. His Lordship therefore concurred with his learned brother in thinking that an order should be made on the footing of a tenancy for life in the wife, with remainder to Mrs. James Sarah Adam and her children.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Nov. 3, 1865.

Re THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN CORK COMPANY (LIMITED).

Ex parte LEIFCHILD.

14 W. R. 22; L. R. 1 Eq. 231; L. T. 267; 11 Jur. N.S. 941.

See In re Baglan Hall Colliery Co., [1870] E. R. A.; 39 L. J. Ch. 591; L. R. 5 Ch. 346; 23 L. T. 60; 18 W. R. 499 (L. J.).

Joint-stock company — Winding-up — Contributory — Paid-up shares — Creditors—Power to purchase.

COMPANY.—Messrs. C., assignees of a patent, agreed with certain persons, proposing to form a limited company, to sell all their interest with the stock plant and machinery, Messrs. C. to have 840 shares in the company, of £5 each, to be treated as paid-up. An assignment was accordingly executed, stating the consideration to be ten shillings, and a memorandum and articles of association, framed, stating the objects of the company and the title to the 840 shares, describing them as paid up. Messrs. C. subsequently transferred 329 of the shares to L., as a trustee for them, and both on the printed certificates and in the book the shares were designated as "paid-up." The company being subsequently ordered to be wound up upon petition, and an official liquidator appointed, he sought to put L. on the list of contributories, on the ground that although the shares were treated as, and stated to be, paid up, no money or goods passed, which was a fraud on creditors.

Held,—That the statement in the articles of the objects of the company included a power to purchase. That the fact of L. being a trustee did not protect him if he was otherwise a contributory. That a nominal consideration in a deed was not inconsistent with a real valuable one actually existing, and that unless a fraud being charged against L. he was not liable as a contributory, and that the creditors could not raise a case of fraud but by bill. Costs of the official liquidator and L. out of the estate.

This was an adjourned summons on the question whether George Leifchild was liable to be placed upon the list of contributories in the winding up of this company. On the 5th of November, 1852, Robert B. Cousins obtained a patent for improved machinery for the cutting and dressing of cork, and that patent became ultimately vested in Messrs. J. L. & R. M. Claypole, who, in the Spring of 1860, agreed by parol with certain persons to sell to them their interest in the patent, together with the leasehold premises in Esher-street, London, with the stock, plant, and machinery. The object of the proposed purchasers was to form a joint-stock company (limited) for the purpose of working the patent, and this was accordingly done, and articles and a memorandum of association framed, dated the 1st May, 1860, which set forth that the object was to work the patent, but contained no specific power to purchase it, and there was a statement that J. L. Claypole was entitled to 840 paid-up preference shares. The letters patent being at the time vested in Messrs. Claypole, the stock-in-trade and debts of the concern were sold to the persons forming the company for £750 in cash, and by an indenture of even date with the articles of association, the patent and machinery were assigned to a trustee for the company for ten shillings consideration, and then there was the parol agreement for the delivery of 980 paid-up shares of £5 each to the Messrs. Claypole, as a consideration for the plant and machinery, and the certificates were delivered, but there was no entry in the books specially mentioning the consideration for the shares, but they were stated simply as paid-up. Previously to August, 1861, the Messrs. Claypole transferred 329 of these shares to Mr. Leifchild, and a resolution was passed at a meeting on the 17th of that month that all the paid-up preference shares should be turned into paid-up ordinary shares, and, amongst other shareholders, Mr. Leifchild's name was specially mentioned as the holder of 329 paid-up preference shares. On the 29th of November, 1862, Leifchild, by the direction of J. L. Claypole, transferred 180 shares of the 329 to R. M. Claypole, leaving 149 in his name. Subsequently the old certificates were given up and cancelled and new ones issued, including the 149 shares, then paid-up ordinary shares. The 3rd clause of the articles of association stated the object of the company to be "the purchasing and selling and cutting of cork by improved machinery." The company was registered in June following and several meetings held, at which various alterations were made in the articles, but the statement with regard to the 840 shares, in connection with J. L. Claypole, and the 3rd clause, remained untouched, and both in the printed certificates and the entries in the book the shares were stated as "paid up." The company was to have a nominal capital of £20,000 in 4,000 shares of £5 each, and was started and carried on business until July, 1864, when a petition was presented by John Butterworth, the representative of a shareholder, and it was ordered to be wound up, and an official liquidator appointed under the Companies' Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89). In the books an entry appeared of £12,600, as the total received for calls, whereas the only money which actually passed were sums of £1,500, £500, £500, and £500, and this appeared in evidence with reference to the books; the result of the meetings being, in fact, an arrangement by the shareholders among themselves. In the proceedings under the winding-up in chambers, a call being in prospect, a question was raised whether Mr. Leifchild was not liable in respect of his 149 shares, in consequence of their being not in reality paid up, though so represented, and this involved the same question as to the remainder of the 840 shares held by Messrs. Claypole, and the chief clerk considered that that question had better be disposed of in court, and adjourned the matter accordingly, and it now came on upon the usual summons to be argued.

Glasse, Q.C., and Fry, for the official manager, contended that Mr. Leifchild held himself out to the world—what in fact he was not—a paid-up shareholder. The effect of the sale was that no money or money's worth passed, and however good and binding that might be as between the shareholders, it was a fraud against the creditors. Leifchild was a member either in respect of paid-up or not paid-up shares, and if they were not paid-up, he must pay up (20 & 21 Vict. c. 78, s. 61). Payment must be by money passing from one party to another, or an equivalent in goods; here there was nothing of the kind, but even in that case all parties must agree, and here the creditors were not bound. On the deed nothing but 10s. consideration appeared: Peacock v. Monk (1 Ves Sen. 127); Ex parte Daniell (1 De G. & J. 372).

Jessel, Q.C., and W. W. Mackeson, for Mr. Leifchild, argued that he was a bare trustee, and there was no contract between him and the company. No new contract could be made; but if there was, Leifchild must be a party to it. Parol evidence was admissible to prove something dehors the deed. Let it be admitted that the directors and shareholders of a limited company could not, among themselves, agree that certain paid-up shares should be delivered to a particular shareholder without consideration, which would be a fraud under the Act; the question here was whether there was bond fide consideration, and on that question there was an affidavit un-contradicted of the bond fide value of the patent and machinery (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 64); Clifford v. Turrell (1 Y. & Coll. 138, 9 Jur. 633), in which Lord Lyndhurst disapproved of Peacock v. Monk; Maxwell v. Port Tennant, &c., Company (24 Beav. 495); Ex parte Currie (11 W. R. 46).

Glasse, Q.C., in reply, referred to Official Manager of the Athenæum, &c., Company v. Pooley (7 W. R. 168; 3 De G. & J. 284); Taylor on Evidence 898 (citing Peacock v. Monk); Gale v. Williamson (8 M. & W. 408).

KINDERSLEY, V.C. (stated the facts, and referred to the 3rd clause of the articles of association).—It is justly said that this clause does not specify the purchase of the patent, but if, in order to work it, it was necessary or expedient to purchase it, it appears to me to be within the objects specified by this clause, although, no doubt, a privilege for exclusive use only might have been reserved. The agreement to purchase on the terms proposed was not only made, but it formed a part of the articles of association, which were the foundation of the partnership, and specifying the footing upon which the joint-stock company (limited) was to be carried on. The transfer to Leifchild could not, I presume, be made without the concurrence of the directors, because they always reserve a veto. The fact that he was a mere trustee is no reason why he should not be liable, because the company were not bound to regard a trust, and therefore if he has made himself otherwise liable to be put on the list, the being a trustee will not exonerate him, but the question is, whether, if he had taken a voluntary transfer for his own benefit, he would be liable as a contributory. About the facts there is no doubt, but it is said the 840 shares cannot be considered as paid-up, because the consideration for them was the transfer of the patent by a deed only specifying ten shillings consideration, and the Court must shut its eyes to the arrangement on which, in fact, one of the clauses of the articles was founded, and Peacock v. Monk (supra) was cited as an authority that you were precluded from shewing that there was any other consideration than that stated in the deed. Clifford v. Turrell was also cited to shew that Lord Lyndhurst hesitated to accede to that, observing it was a mere dictum, but this, it appears to me, at all events, may justly be considered to be a rule, viz., that supposing Lord Hardwick's dicta right, that must be where the real consideration, such as natural love and affection or pecuniary consideration, would be said to be inconsistent with that expressed in the deed. Here there is only a nominal consideration, namely, ten shillings, and I think it is scarcely inconsistent with it to allege natural love and affection or money, or money's worth; and, therefore, assuming that Lord Hardwicke's dictum is law, it appears to me it would not apply to the case of a nominal consideration, which was originally introduced to raise an use, and for no other purpose, and is, in fact, no consideration at all. The question here is, not whether the deed is to be upheld or set aside, but whether or not the shares were given as a consideration for the patent, and, if so, it is immaterial whether this deed is invalid or not; and I have only to consider whether I am precluded from looking at the facts, there being no suggestion of fraud or trick by which the shareholders were deluded; indeed, as far as I can see, it was all perfectly fair. The question is whether, as against Leifchild or the Claypoles, I can say that the shares are not to be treated as paid up, and that they are not to have the benefit of the consideration given in lieu of the £5 per share for the shares. It appears to me that there is no reason why Mr. Leifchild should be put upon the list, unless, according to the terms of the Act, he is liable to contribute to the assets." What do those words mean? Why, that he is liable with other persons to pay a certain contribution to make good the liabilities; no one in this case having a right to say he is bound to assist in paying the debts. But it is said that does not extend to creditors. Now, under the original Act, the Court did not concern itself with creditors; but they are now taken into account; that is to say, by means of contribution the Court is to make up the means of paying them. But unless you can say that it is a fraudulent transaction, they can have no remedy anywhere; and if they had, how is that to be decided on a question whether a party is to be put on the list of contributories or not? They must do it by filing a bill. Leifchild was guilty of no fraud, but was merely in the position of a person taking shares represented by the articles of association to be paid up, and he takes them as the company represented them in their articles, namely, as paid-up shares. It appears to me that Mr. Leifchild ought not to be put upon the list. The official liquidator has only done his duty in coming here, and therefore he must have his costs out of the assets, and pay Mr. Leifchild's costs, adding them to his own.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 7, 8, 1865.

ACKROYD v. BRIGGS.

14 W. R. 25; 13 L. T. 521.

Practice—Parties—Tenants in common.

PRACTICE.—Where three out of forty-seven tenants in common filed a bill for an injunction to restrain the digging of stone on the common property, objection for want of parties not allowed.

The plaintiffs in this suit were three tenants in common, each being entitled to one undivided sixth part of a farm and land at Clayton, in Yorkshire.

The title was derived from one William Ackroyd, who devised the property in question to his six children as tenants in common. At the time when the bill was filed the shares of these six children had, by transmission of interest, become vested in forty-seven persons in all. Of these the plaintiffs were together entitled to a half of the property, and the other half was divided between the other forty-four tenants, some of whom were out of the jurisdiction, and whose shares, in some instances, amounted to no more than a 360th part of the property.

The plaintiffs filed a bill in their own names only, for an injunction to restrain the digging by the defendants of stone on the common property.

Malin, Q.C., and Wright, for the plaintiffs.

Cole, Q.C., and J. Pearson, for the defendants, took the objection that the tenants in common, other than the plaintiffs, ought to have been parties.

STUART, V.C., disallowed the objection for want of parties, and granted the injunction, directing that of the sum arranged to be paid for stone already dug, one-half should be paid to the plaintiffs at once, and the other half paid to them on their producing a release from the other tenants in common.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Nov. 8, 1865.

In re THE XERES WINE COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 43; 13 L. T. 269.

Practice—Joint-stock Company—Winding-up—Adjourned summons to restrain sale.

COMPANY.—The Court will not, upon an adjourned summons, give any direction to the official liquidator which will operate as an injunction to restrain a sale by a creditor holding securities of the company.

This company being in the course of being wound up under the Companies Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), this was an application by the official liquidator on an adjourned summons, to restrain the Alliance Bank from selling wines, of which the bank held the dock warrants as a deposit, to the value of £9,000. The sale had been advertised for that day (Nov. 8).

Druce, in support of the application, stated that a Mr. Duckworth represented the wine company in this country, and he entered into an agreement with a M. Leon, abroad, by which the wine company were bound to ship wines to this country to be sold by the company, M. Leon drawing bills up to £75 per cent. of the value of the consignments, but there was a stipulation that the wines were not to be sold at a sacrifice. Bills were drawn against the wine company, and the company deposited with the Alliance Bank dock warrants to enable them, through means of the bank, to provide for the bills which M. Leon had drawn, but there was the same condition at the time of the deposit that the wines were not to be sold at a sacrifice. About £1,000 worth of the wines had been sold, and the sale of these wines was not now called in question, but it was alleged that the banking company was aware of the circumstances.

Baily, Q.C.—No they were not.

Druce.—The company were factors for the shipper and the party with whom the dock warrants had been deposited had no right to sell, although it was the custom of merchants often to do so and to disregard the law. The parties holding the goods had come in and proved their debt, and the official liquidator was in a position to call upon them as creditors. The wines were subject to the provisions of the Winding-up Acts, and the official liquidator now asked for the direction of the Court. The sale was advertised as wines in bond, duty paid—the whole without reserve. The official liquidator having received notice that this sale would be attempted, sent to the consignor abroad, and received for answer that he would not consent to the wine being sold at a sacrifice. The bank had thrown together these wines and others of an inferior quality, but of the same brand, the only object of the bank being of course to realize enough to cover their security. The consignor, moreover, stated that he should hold the estate responsible for any loss, and what was now asked was that some direction should be given as to the sale of the wines, and that it should be subject to the approbation of the Court; and the official liquidator submitted to concur in any sale which did not contravene the orders of the consignor.

Baily, Q.C., and Karslake, who opposed the application, were not called upon.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I do not see how I can assume jurisdiction on this summons. If a bill were filed of course I could go into the case. You are asking in fact an injunction to restrain the sale without filing a bill; and I do not see how I can possibly do it. If you came to the judge in chambers for his direction, the consequence would be that you could do that without bringing the Alliance Bank before the Court. All I can do is to refuse the application with costs, without prejudice to any application to be made to the judge in chambers.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 9, 1885.

CAMPBELL v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

14 W. R. 45; 13 L. T. 356; 11 Jur. N.S. 922.

Practice—Examination of witnesses de bene esse.

EVIDENCE.—A commission may issue to examine witnesses de bene esse, although the defendants have not appeared.

This was a bill filed by Lieutenant Donald Campbell, the claimant to the earldom and estates of Breadalbane for the purpose of perpetuating the testimony of certain witnesses resident in Scotland, who were all of a great age and in a precarious state of health. The bill prayed that the persons named might be examined in perpetuam rei memoriam, relative to the pedigree of the plaintiff, and that their evidence might be recorded and perpetuated, and that a commission might be issued for their examination in Scotland.

The bill was filed on the 16th of September.

The Attorney-General had appeared, but neither of the other defendants (the rival claimants to the earldom), both of whom were out of the jurisdiction, had done so; Mr. Nicholson, solicitor, of Lime-street, had accepted service for one of the defendants on the 22nd September, but had refused to enter an appearance, and the other defendant could not be found. The theory of the plaintiff was that the defendants were purposely keeping away in order to protract the proceedings in hopes that witnesses material to the plaintiff's case might die in the meantime.

Downing Bruce, for the plaintiff, moved for leave to have a commission issued for the purpose of examining these witnesses. He cited Coveny v. Athill (1 Dick. 355); Frere v. Green (19 Ves. 319); Lancaster v. Lancaster (6 Sim. 439; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 69); Earl of Belfast v. Chichester (2 J. & W. 439).

Wickens, for the Attorney-General, objected on the ground that the application was irregular, that the other defendants had not appeared, and that replication had not been filed.

STUART, V.C., said that he could not make the order in the terms of the prayer of the bill, but he would make the usual order for examination de bene esse. As the witnesses were all over seventy years of age, the commission must issue at once.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 13, 14, 1865.

DOWLING v. DOWLING.

14 W. R. 47; L. R. 1 Eq. 442; 13 L. T. 553; 11 Jur. N.S. 1033: reversed [1866] E. R. A.; 14 W. R. 1003; L. R. 1 Ch. 612; 15 L. T. 152; 12 Jur. N.S. 720 (L. JJ.).

Construction of will—Gift to children by implication.

WILL.—A gift of the interest of a residue to the four sons of a testator, "and at the decease of either, without lawful issue, such share to revert to the remainder then living, or their child or children."

Held, to confer only life interests on the four sons, and that their respective children took vested interests in the capital.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Richard Dowling, deceased, formerly of Plumstead, in Kent.

The testator, by his will, dated the 18th of November, 1859, gave the whole of his real and residuary personal estate to trustees, upon trust for conversion and investment; and the will contained the following clause: "The interest therefrom to be divided half-yearly between my four sons above-named; and at the decease of either without lawful issue, such share to revert to the remainder then living, or their child or children."

The testator left five sons living at his death, and some questions were raised as to which of his sons were referred to in the above bequest.

The principal question in the suit was as to the construction of the gift to the sons. It was urged by the four sons that they were absolutely entitled in equal shares to the capital of the invested fund. And on behalf of the children of one of them (who had been served with notice of the decree), that the parents took life interests only, with a gift in remainder by implication to their children, while it was contended by the heir at law and next of kin of the testator that the gift was void of uncertainty, and that the testator died intestate as to his real and residuary personal estate.

Malins, Q.C., and Cracknall for plaintiff, S. H. Dowling, one of the four sons of the testator.—There was no gift by implication to the children of the testator's sons. This gift to them was merely substitutionary. It was clear that the gift of "the interest" was equivalent to an absolute gift of the capital. Then a gift like the present would, under the old law before the Wills Act, have given the testator's sons absolute interests, but the gift over would have been void for remoteness. Since the Wills Act the words "die without issue" would mean "without leaving issue," and the gift over would be good; but the testator's sons would retain absolute interests, subject to the contingent executory gift over.

Osborne, Q.C., and Speed, for parties in the same interest.

The following cases were cited to show that a gift of the interest carried the principal: Philipps v. Chamberlaine (4 Ves. 50); Haig v. Swiney (1 S. & S. 487); Humphrey v. Humphrey (1 S. N. S. 536); Page v. Leapingwell (18 Ves. 463); Wheel v. Ollive (32 Beav. 421); and on the question of implication: Salisbury v. Petty (3 Hare, 86); Forth v. Chapman (1 P. W. 663); Lee v. Busk (14 Beav. 459); Lee v. Busk (2 D. M. & G. 810); Ranelagh v. Ranelagh (12 Beav. 200); Sparks v. Restal (24 Beav. 218); Cooper v. Pitcher (4 Hare, 485); Andree v. Ward (1 Russ. 260); Webster v. Parr (26 Beav. 236); Neighbour v. Thurlow (28 Beav. 33).

Aikin, for the children of one of the testator's sons, who had been served with the decree, cited Ex parte Rogers (2 Mad. 449); Wetherell v. Wetherell (10 W. R. 818 4 Giff. 51).

Bacon, Q.C., Greene, Q.C., Waller, Wellington Cooper, and Schomberg, appeared for various parties interested.

STUART, V.C., said that the question raised in the case whether the testator's sons took absolutely, or whether the capital was given to their respective children after their death, was so perplexed by reason of the weight of authority on both sides that it was very difficult to deal with it. The case of Ex parte Rogers was a decision of very great authority. The decision in that case was not followed by Lord Longdale in the case of Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, and in the case of Lee v. Buck Lord Cranworth is reported to have said that he doubted it. These eminent judges appeared to have forgotten that that case was decided by Sir T. Plumer on the authority of Lord Thurlow's decision in the case of Harman v. Dickenson (1 B. C. C. 91). The Master of the Rolls, however, in the case of Ranelagh v. Ranelagh professed himself to be unable to answer the question proposed by Sir T. Plumer in Ex parte Rogers, why the children were named in the gift over. The reasoning in that case was that it was difficult to see why the testator should have made the gift over to take effect on the first and others dying without issue unless he intended some benefit to the issue. That reasoning applied still more forcibly in the present case, as the testator, by mentioning the children of his sons in the gift over, clearly showed that they were the objects of his bounty. The gift over was "to the remainder then living or their child or children. The observation of Sir T. Plumer, therefore, bore very strongly on this case. He (the Vice-Chancellor) found the Court of Appeal divided in opinion, and he was, therefore, compelled to decide the question by the reason of the case, and he must come to the conclusion that the children of the testator's sons took by implication, and that the testator's sons were only entitled to life interests in the residue.

Wood, V.C., Nov. 10, 13, 14, 15, 1865.

DAW v. ELEY.

14 W. R. 48; L. R. 1 Eq. 38; 13 L. T. 390.

See now Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. c. 29).

Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852—Statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83—Admission of evidence—Trial of a patent—Practice—Hearing of counsel.

PATENT.—On the trial of a patent case by the Court, without a jury, the defendants tendered evidence of a prior use not specified in their particulars of objections delivered to the plaintiff in pursuance of statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 41. They alleged that this evidence was unknown to them till after the case was in the paper.

Held, that the evidence could not be then received, but might be made the subject of a special motion.

When the Court is sitting as a jury, the practice as to hearing counsel is the same as at common law, but, on points of law occurring in the same case, counsel will be heard according to the ordinary practice of the Court.

This was a suit to restrain the alleged infringement by the defendants of the plaintiff's patent for the manufacture of central fire breach-loading cartridges. The defendants resisted the patent on the ground of want of novelty in the alleged invention, and they also denied infringement. In the particulars of objections which the defendants had, under the provisions of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 41, delivered to the plaintiff, they stated that the matters claimed as inventions in the specification were in common knowledge of men in trade for the manufacture or sale of cartridges previously to the date of the plaintiff's patent, and as instances the defendants named themselves, Mr. Robert Adams, and Mr. C. W. Lancaster, and also that the alleged invention was used prior to the date of the letters patent in the following manner, that is to say, that the defendants had manufactured at their premises, and sold, previous to the date of the patent, cartridges so made as to act in a precisely similar manner to those described in the plaintiff's specification. During the examination of one of the witnesses for the defence, it was proposed to ask him questions with a view of showing a prior knowledge of something equivalent to the plaintiff's alleged invention in Belgium, this not having been stated in the particulars of objections.

Rolt, Q.C., Hindmarch, Q.C., Boyle, and T. Aston for the plaintiff, objected. If evidence relating to other places than those mentioned in the particulars of objection were to be admitted, it would really be an evasion of the statute. The objections ought to state exactly what case the plaintiff has to meet, that he may either be prepared with evidence to meet it, or, being satisfied that the objection is a valid one, may be saved the cost of any further proceedings. They referred to Curtis v. Platt (8 L. T. N. S. 657).

Daniell, Q.C., Bushby, and A. G. Langley, for the defendants.—This evidence did not become known to the defendants till the 6th November, after the cause had come into the paper, and, therefore, the matters which it referred to could not have been included in the particulars. The same course ought to be taken as was taken in Renard v. Levinstein (13 W. R. 229), and, if necessary, the defendants should have leave to serve a notice of motion. The Court will not allow an accident to interfere with the justice of the case, but, in admitting, or not admitting, the evidence will only be guided by its materiality, and if there be inconvenience to the other party, the Court can impose such terms as it thinks fit to meet this. In Renard v. Levinstein it was said that the defendant might, with ordinary diligence, have discovered the evidence. This was not so here.

Wood, V.C.—A suit in chancery concludes the right, and, in this respect, differs from an action at law. Moreover, on appeal, the new evidence might be introduced.

Hindmarch, Q.C., in reply.—On an appeal time would be given to the plaintiff to meet the new evidence. At any rate the defendants were aware of the proposed evidence ten days ago, and they should at once have moved to have it admitted.

Wood, V.C.—The evidence cannot be admitted at present. The question is by no means a technical one, but a very vital and substantial one, and for this reason the Legislature took the course it did in requiring a specific statement of the place where the alleged prior use took place. (His Honour here read the words of statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 41.) This provision was intended for the benefit of both parties, that either they might be prepared to meet the case set up, or submit at once on finding the truth of what the particulars stated. As to the argument that truth might be excluded by this provision, it was possible that truth might be purchased too dearly for the suitor. If this witness could be heard to say what he saw in Belgium, another might be heard to say what he saw in Pekin, and the case would have to be postponed to bring witnesses from thence, and meanwhile the patent would be running out. This shows the wisdom of the enactment. The evidence must be shut out now, but with leave to the defendants to make such motion in relation thereto as they may be advised.

A further question was raised as to the proper course to be taken in hearing the addresses of counsel in a case of this nature, when the Court was trying questions of fact as a jury, as well as deciding questions of law in the ordinary way.

Wood, V.C., said, that as far as the questions of fact were concerned, he should follow the practice at common law. One of the plaintiff's counsel would open the plaintiff's case; then the plaintiff's witnesses would be called and examined; then one of the defendant's counsel would open his case, and the defendant's witnesses would be called and examined; after this one of the defendant's counsel would sum up the evidence, and one of the plaintiff's counsel would reply on the whole case. On any question of law he should hear counsel on both sides, according to the ordinary practice of this Court.

Accordingly, after the evidence was closed, and the summing up and reply had been heard, counsel were heard in the ordinary way on the questions of law.

[IN THE COMMON PLEAS.]

Nov. 3, 1865.

HADLEY v. TAYLOR AND OTHERS.

14 W. R. 59; L. R. 1 C.P. 53; 13 L. T. 368; 11 Jur. N.S. 979.

Negligence—Unfenced hole near a highway—Public nuisance—Liability of occupier.

NEGLIGENCE.—The defendant temporarily stored his goods in the ground floor of an unfinished warehouse still in the builders' hands, and paid the landlord for so doing. Between the warehouse and a highway, and fourteen inches from the latter was an unfenced hole, which had been made by the landlord. The plaintiff slipped on the highway, and fell into this hole.

Held, that the hole, though not actually adjoining the highway, was a public nuisance, and that the defendant was sufficiently in occupation of the premises to render him liable to the plaintiff for the injuries caused by his fall into the hole.

Declaration for that the defendants were the occupiers and possessed of a certain warehouse and hoisthole, vault, or cellar, immediately adjoining a public highway, and wrongfully suffered the said hoisthole, vault, or cellar, to be open to the said highway, without any light, railing, fence, or protection, and so as to be dangerous to persons lawfully passing along the said highway during the hours of darkness; and the plaintiff while lawfully passing along the said highway during the hours of darkness, fell into the said hoisthole, vault, or cellar, whereby, &c.

Plea—Not guilty, and issue thereon.

The action was tried before Byles, J., at Worcester, when the plaintiff obtained a verdict for 250*l*. The material facts of the case were as follows:—

The defendants were merchants in Manchester, and in February last, while their own warehouse was being pulled down, they made arrangements with a Mr. Jeffreys to allow them to put their goods into a warehouse which was being built for him. In pursuance of this agreement they entered, and deposited their goods in the ground floor of the new warehouse, and made a payment on account of rent. At the back of this warehouse ran a street, with a footpath on each side of it, and between the footpath nearest to the warehouse and the warehouse itself there was a small space of ground, in which had been dug a hoisthole, to be used for the business of the warehouse. This hole was about six feet in length and depth, and three and a-half feet in width, and was fourteen inches from the footpath; it was not in any way fenced from the street, but it was intended to be enclosed by an iron railing. At the time of the accident, and for some time previous, a night watchman had been employed by the landlord to look after these and adjoining premises. About a week after the defendants had taken possession, and while the warehouse was still in the builders' hands, under the superintendence of an architect, the plaintiff, as he was walking along the footpath after dark, slipped into the hole, and sustained the injuries complained of. The learned judge told the jury that, if they thought the defendants were in occupation, and that the place was dangerous to persons lawfully passing along the highway, they should (subject to a question of contributory negligence) find for the plaintiff; and this they did.

Powell, Q.C., now moved to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff, and to enter a nonsuit. 1. Though the defendants occupied one of the floors, they had no such possession as to throw on them the duty of fencing off this hole from the street. They could only use the premises for the purpose for which they were let to them, and therefore had no power to interfere. [BYLES, J.—They had paid some rent, and were tenants from year to year, and not merely at will.] Either the proprietor who employed the builder, or the builder, or both, were liable. 2. There was no public nuisance. In Barnes v. Ward (9 C. B. 392), the hole came flush up to the footpath; here it was fourteen inches within defendant's premises. That distinguishes the two cases, and is the only point at which the line can be drawn. [WILLES, J.—I remember my brother Blackburn drawing a distinction between such a hole as a man could fall into off a highway, and a hole which he must wander off the highway before he could fall into.]

ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. This was an action for injuries caused by falling into a hole, which was not on the highway, but within fourteen inches of it. The occupier is liable for that hole as a nuisance, if a passenger using the highway would, by an ordinary accident, be liable to be injured thereby. The plaintiff was using the highway when he fell into this unfenced area, and on the authority of Barnes v. Ward I think the defendants were liable for the nuisance. It is said that the buildings were unfinished, that the landlord put the hole there, and that the defendants had only taken a temporary occupation for warehouse room. That, I am of opinion, is no defence. The party responsible for a nuisance is, as a general rule, the party in occupation of the premises, and to him the public have a right to look, though they may have a right to look to some one else besides.

WILLES, KEATING, and BYLES, JJ., concurred.

Rule refused.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 16, 1865.

BROWN v. THOMPSON.

BROWN v. BEWICK.

14 W. R. 76; 13 L. T. 395; 11 Jur. N.S. 922.

VESTED, CONTINGENT AND FUTURE INTERESTS.—A gift of a life interest in residue to testator's three children during their respective natural lives, and after their decease respectively to their child or children, with a gift over in case they should all die without issue, to L.,

Held, that on the death of any of the three children without issue, his share became divisible among the children of the others then in esse per capita.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of William Thompson, and to determine a question of construction which arose on the wording of his will.

The testator, by will dated 9th July, 1816, gave his real and personal estate to trustees on trusts for conversion and investment of the personal estate, and to pay and apply the interest thereof, and of his real estate, equally between his son Joseph and his daughters Jane and Mary, in equal shares, in such sums and at such times as the trustees in their discretion shall think fit, to his said daughters until they should severally attain their respective ages of twenty-one years; and after that period by equal half-yearly payments during their respective natural lives, and to his said son by equal weekly payments during his natural life. The will then proceeded as follows:—“From and immediately after the decease of my said three last-mentioned children respectively, I give and bequeath one equal third part or share of the said residue of my said real and personal estates unto such of their children as shall be then living, and the child or children of such of them as shall be then dead, his, or their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in equal shares and proportions. And in case they shall all of them die without lawful issue, I give, devise, and bequeath all such residue of my said real and personal estates unto my son Leonard Thompson, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns for ever.

The testator's four children, Joseph, Jane, Mary, and Leonard, all survived him.

Joseph died without issue in April, 1826. Jane married W. Brown, and died in September, 1854, leaving eight children, who are all still alive. Mary married the defendant Bewick, and died without issue in April, 1860. Leonard was the testator's eldest son and heir at law, and died in June, 1859, and the defendant Bewick claimed through him. At the death of Joseph there were four children of Jane in esse.

Malins, Q.C., and Bird, for the plaintiffs, who were some of the children of Jane Brown, contended that on the death of Joseph his one-third became divisible between the four children of Jane, then in esse. If Mary had had children, or if he, Joseph, had had children then living, Joseph's share would have been divisible between the children of all three per capita. The same reasoning applied to Jane's share and Mary's. As Jane was the only one of the three who had had children, those children were entitled to the whole.

Dickinson, for parties in the same interest.

Bacon, Q.C., for defendant, Bewick, who claimed under Leonard, urged that the context showed that the word “their” must mean “their respective;” and that on Joseph's death, without issue, his one-third went as on an intestacy. The same reasoning applied to Mary's one-third. He cited Ayscough v. Savage (13 W. R. 373).

STUART, V.C., said that he could not agree that the word "their" should be construed as "his or her." The testator had spoken of his three children, and the word "their" must mean all the children of these three. It was said that the Court would look to the context, and the Court was asked to do so, and to put a forced construction on the word "their" for the purpose of creating an intestacy; and the only argument urged was that the testator had used the word "respectively." Now, this word was used by him with reference to the event of the death of his three children, and it was sought to construe it in quite a different manner, as turning "their," which was a plural word, into a single one. There must be a declaration that the four children of Jane, who were in esse at Joseph's death, were entitled in equal fourths to his share, and that the shares of Jane and Mary were divisible equally between the eight children of Jane.

Wood, V.C., Nov. 9, 15, 1865.

LINGWOOD v. THE STOWMARKET PAPER MAKING COMPANY.

14 W. R. 78; L. R. 1 Eq. 77, 336; 13 L. T. 540; 11 Jur. N.S. 993.

Injunction—Pollution of stream—Form of order.

INJUNCTION. WATER.—The order restraining the defendants from polluting a stream should restrain them from such pollution as would be to the injury of the plaintiff.

This was a suit for the purpose of restraining the pollution by the defendants of a stream passing through the plaintiff's land. An interlocutory injunction had been granted, and the defendants afterwards submitted to have it made perpetual. A question, however, arose as to the extent to which the pollution ought to be restrained.

Phear, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendants ought to be restrained from polluting the stream at all.

Eddis, for the defendant, argued that the injunction should only be against polluting to the damage or injury of the plaintiff.

Nov. 15.—Wood, V.C.—The only question in this case is as to the insertion of the words "to the damage or injury of the plaintiff." There does not seem to be any regular course of authority on the point. In Dawson v. Paver (5 Hare, 415), the defendants were restrained from using a new drain for the purpose of draining into the plaintiff's ancient drain in such a way as to obstruct the plaintiff's former enjoyment of his ancient drain. In Bidder v. Richards I made an order in the terms given in Seton on Decrees, 3 ed. p. 894, restraining the passage of sewage into a river to the injury of the plaintiff. This is a very similar case to the present, and I shall adopt the same course. There may be ways of letting the matter complained of into the stream so as to avoid any injury to the plaintiff. The decree will, therefore, be in this form: "restrain the defendants from discharging from their works into the river or stream in the bill mentioned, so as to cause it to flow to the plaintiff's lands in a state less pure than that in which it flowed there previously to the establishment of the defendant's works, and to the plaintiff's injury, any such refuse as they discharged into it previously to the filing of the bill, or any other noxious fluid or foul matter whatsoever." I do not wish to encourage applications to the Court for every trifling matter, but the plaintiff is entitled to be protected from injury.

The order was finally drawn up in the following form:—

"This Court doth order that a perpetual injunction be awarded against the Defendants, the Stowmarket Company, to restrain the said Defendants, their servants, agents and workmen, from discharging from their works in the Plaintiff's bill mentioned, into the river or stream in the said bill also mentioned, so as to cause it to flow to the Plaintiff's land, messuage, and mills, therein also mentioned, in a state less pure than that in which it flowed there previously to the establishment of the said works, to the injury of the Plaintiff, any such refuse or other matter as was discharged by the Defendants from the same works into the said river or stream previously to the filing of the said bill, or any noxious fluids or other foul matters whatsoever,"

Wood, V.C., Nov. 16, 1865.

NICHOLL v. JONES.

14 W. R. 79; 13 L. T. 498.

Practice—Motion to dismiss bill for want of prosecution—Acquiescence of defendant in delay caused by a co-defendant.

PRACTICE.—A defendant is not bound to wait while the plaintiff is endeavouring to obtain admissions from a co-defendant, though he is bound to wait while the plaintiff is using the ordinary process of the Court to prove his case against a co-defendant. A defendant is, however, bound by his own acquiescence in delay caused by a co-defendant; but as soon as that acquiescence is at end, he has a right to move to dismiss the plaintiff's bill for want of prosecution.

This was a motion on the part of Mary Hughes, one of the defendants, to dismiss the plaintiff's bill for want of prosecution. The bill was filed on the 19th January, 1863, and amended on the 16th June, 1863. The defendant Hughes's answer was filed on the 26th October, 1863, the other defendants' answers having been previously filed. The plaintiff desired to obtain one set of admissions from all the defendants, and with this view a long correspondence took place between his solicitors and the solicitors of the different defendants, but great difficulty was experienced in settling the proposed admissions with the solicitors of the defendant Jones. During the course of this negotiation, the solicitors of the defendant Hughes several times threatened to move to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution, but ultimately they approved of the draft of the proposed admissions on the 2nd May, 1865. The admissions were not, however, actually signed by them until the 18th October, 1865. No admissions having been obtained from Jones's solicitors, and no step having been taken by the plaintiff to prove the case against Jones, the defendant Hughes, on the 2nd November, 1865, gave notice to the plaintiff of his intention to move to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution.

Swanston now moved accordingly. The defendant Hughes has nothing to do with the delay which has been caused by another set of defendants. If the plaintiff could not obtain the admission of what he required from them, he ought to have proceeded to prove his case in the ordinary way.

E. R. Turner, for the plaintiff.—The delay has been entirely caused by the defendant Jones, and the defendant Hughes was fully aware of this. The cause of delay being a just one, and the defendant having been fully informed of it, he can only move to dismiss at the risk of costs: Ingle v. Partridge (12 W. R. 65, 33 Beav. 287).

Wood, V.C.—The only question is as to acquiescence in the delay by the defendant Hughes.

Swanston, in reply.—The plaintiff had the remedy in his own hands.

Wood, V.C.—The plaintiff might at any time have stopped this delay by availing himself of the ordinary process of the Court in order to prove his case; and this is the course which a plaintiff is bound to take when a defendant refuses to enter into admissions. In this case the defendant Hughes must be taken to have acquiesced in the delay down to the 18th October, 1865, but I do not think I can assume acquiescence to any later date. It would, perhaps, have been the more proper course to have written to the plaintiffs' solicitors before giving notice of the motion, but it was quite clear, from what had already taken place, that this course would have produced no result. No defendant is obliged to wait for the obtaining of admissions from a co-defendant, though he must, of course, wait during the ordinary process of the Court. On the 18th October the defendant Hughes was entitled to terminate the existing state of things by such a letter as I have alluded to, and, no doubt, he had a perfect right to move to dismiss the plaintiff's bill. There must, therefore, be the usual order to speed the cause, and I must give the defendant the costs of this motion; and the plaintiffs must, within fourteen days from now, elect whether they will give notice of motion for decree or file replication.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Nov. 24, 1865.

Re LAWRENCE'S TRUST.

14 W. R. 93; 13 L. T. 580.

Practice—Trustee—Service.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Where a trustee pays money into court, and, in his affidavit, appoints a place for service on him of any legal proceedings, and he is not there to receive service, the Court will not deem such service good unless he cannot be found elsewhere on search made.

This was the petition of a cestui que trust, who was entitled to the income of the trust fund, to have the dividends paid to him. It appeared that one of the trustees was a solicitor, a partner in a firm, having offices at No. 12, Watling-street, and that such trustee, having paid the fund into court, in his affidavit had named the above place as that at which he was to be served in any legal proceedings of which it was necessary to give him notice. This petition being presented, was served upon him at No. 12, Watling-street, but he was not resident there, although his partner was, and service could not be effected upon him personally there.

Under these circumstances,

Schomberg now said that the Registrar (Mr. Milne) doubted whether the service could be deemed good. In support of the service he referred to Ex parte Baugham (16 Jur. 325).

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The case referred to is where the party cannot be found; but it does not appear in this case that any search has been made for him. I think if on being searched for he cannot be found, perhaps the service may be deemed good; but you had better have such search made. The Court always requires trustees to be served, that they may have the opportunity of appearing if they think fit, and then they are bound; and therefore there must be service upon the individual ordinarily speaking. There is nothing to lead to the supposition that this notice will come to his hands. It is the duty of the party serving the notice to find the party to be served; if he cannot be found, the place indicated may be a sufficient address.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Nov. 24, 1865.

Re LUNTLEY.

14 W. R. 93; 13 L. T. 490.

Railway company—Void lease—Reversion.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—A railway company took leasehold houses which had been improved by the tenant, and paid into court 2,200l. as representing his interest. It turned out that the lease was void, and the Court directed an inquiry as to the increase of pecuniary value by the lessee's outlay, such increase to be paid to him. The reversioner having then declined to intervene, the company had the fee simple value assessed at 4,000l., and paid that into court; and the reversioner, by petition, asked a declaration that he was entitled to the whole 4,000l., or to such part as to the Court should appear just; and for all proper inquiries, investment, and payment of the dividends to the tenant for life.

Held, that a second inquiry must be directed as in the former order, and an interim investment.

This was a petition presented by the reversioner of certain property at Long-alley, Norton Folgate, under these circumstances:—George Cooper was the lessee of the property in question, where he carried on business as a cabinet maker, and alleged that he had laid out considerable sums in improvements. The North London Railway Company took a portion of the property and paid 2,200l. as the clear amount representing his interest, and compensation for damage to his trade. A question was then raised as to the validity of the lease, and on argument this Court decided that such lease and another of adjoining property were absolutely void (vide 13 W. R. 364, 492). A reference had been ordered to ascertain the value of the property at the date of the lease, and when the railway company took possession, and when so ascertained to apportion it between the reversioner and Cooper, who was declared entitled to so much as should represent the increase of value due to his outlay and improvements. That inquiry was still pending, the chief clerk not having made his certificate, and meantime the value of the fee simple and inheritance had been ascertained by two surveyors under the Lands Clauses Act, who had found it to amount, free from incumbrances, to 4,000l., which sum the company had paid into court under the Act, so that both sums, 2,200l. and 4,000l., were now in court to distinct accounts. This petition was presented by the reversioner, Mr. John Luntley, for a declaration that he was entitled to the whole 4,000l., or such part as to the Court should appear just; and praying that all necessary and proper inquiries might be directed for ascertaining the amount, and that such sum, until invested under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, might be invested in Consols, and the dividends paid to Mrs. Taylor, the tenant for life. A correspondence had taken place between the solicitor of the company and the owner of the fee simple, the former contending that the reversioner was bound by what had taken place. It was now submitted for him that he was not, and was entitled to the declaration asked.

Fry, for the petition.

Rodwell, for the company, submitted that this application was premature, and a useless expense. The company had paid a certain proportion as representing the leaseholder's interest, and could not be called upon to pay more. The petitioner ought, therefore, to have access to the evidence, and then, when the chief clerk had made his certificate, it would be time to apply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., said it was clear that because there happened to be a lessee and reversioner, the company ought not on that ground to pay more to the latter than the fee simple value; which was what belonged to the reversioner, minus the fair amount to which the lessees were entitled. That was plain justice. The only question was, how, under the peculiar circumstances, that was to be worked out. A question existing between the lessee and the company as to what was the value of the interest of the lessee, the reversioner might have come in to be heard at the same time, and after ascertainment of the value of the lessee's interest, claimed that whatever remained belonged to him. Perhaps he was not unwise in declining to do so; but he could not claim the value of the fee. The inquiry, then, was between the lessee and the company. Now, the company had paid into court 4,000*l.* as the value of the fee, to the whole of which it was admitted the reversioner was not entitled—in short, whatever was the value of Cooper's interest, that must be deducted from the 4,000*l.* It was said that the case was, on the former occasion, fairly decided, and that the reversioner was bound by the result of the inquiry between the company and the lessee, to which he was no party. The reversioner said, "I do not know that the company have sufficiently purchased out the interest as against Cooper;" and he was right, and the company were right also, in these positions; so that the matter could not be disposed of uno actu, although one inquiry was cheaper. The Court could not compel the reversioner to be a party to an inquiry ordered in his absence, and there must be a separate one on this petition; but all unnecessary expense should be prevented.

Let there be an inquiry what the value of the lessee's interest was, in the same terms as in Cooper's case, with liberty to admit any evidence already taken, and to cross-examine upon it. There must be an interim investment, and a declaration that the reversioner was entitled to the whole 4,000*l.*, minus what, on this inquiry, should be found to represent the lessee's interest. Costs according to the Act.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 18, 20, 21, 1865.

DABBS v. NUGENT.

14 W. R. 94; 13 L. T. 396; 11 Jur. N.S. 943.

Account—Jurisdiction—Effect of conduct of parties.

ACCOUNTS AND INQUIRIES.—The Court will endeavour to assume jurisdiction in matters of account where its doing so will promote substantial justice between the parties.

Where three actions at law have been brought by the plaintiff against the defendant in matters relating to the employment of the plaintiff by the defendant, and these actions are consolidated by an order obtained by the defendant, the Court, if it assumes jurisdiction over any of the actions, will assume jurisdiction over all.

Misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, though insufficient to disentitle him to relief or to fix him at once with payment of costs up to the hearing, may be proper ground for a special reservation of the costs up to the hearing, to be dealt with when the cause is heard on further consideration.

This bill was filed by Thomas Dabbs, a builder, against G. W. Nugent, for an account of sums due to plaintiff under two building contracts. The first contract, which we shall call "The Eastbourne Contract," was made by an indenture dated 4th of August, 1862. between the defendant of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part; and was an agreement to build six houses at Eastbourne, under the superintendence of Mr. McCalla, architect, to be completed by 30th April, 1863. This indenture contained the usual stipulations, making the architect sole judge of what alterations, &c., were to be made, and provided for the payment of the contract price (6,150*l.*) by instalments, on McCalla's certificate, and that the balance not so paid should be paid within three months after the whole of the said buildings and other works should be completed to the entire satisfaction of McCalla, and should have been inspected and certified to defendant by McCalla. And the said indenture contained a proviso that the decision of McCalla, with respect to the amount, state, and condition of the work actually executed, and with respect to every question that might arise concerning the construction of the said contract, or the drawings, specifications, and conditions for the execution of the works thereby contracted for, or any other thing relating to the same, should be final and binding on all parties.

The second contract, which we shall call "the Penge Contract," was made in the early part of 1863, and by it the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to complete the building of a house at Penge. On this contract it appeared that the certificate of McCalla was not necessary to enable the plaintiff to sue for breach of it at law.

The time for the completion of the Eastbourne contract was afterwards extended to the 24th of June, 1863. During the progress of the works considerable reductions were made by McCalla's directions in the contract, and the plaintiff received sums amounting in the whole to about 3,970*l.* on account; but a considerable balance remained due to him on the Eastbourne contract, assuming the terms of the specification to have been complied with.

The evidence showed that bill transactions had taken place between the plaintiff and defendant and McCalla, and that McCalla had been in the habit while the works were going on, of accepting bills for the plaintiff's accommodation. McCalla, in his cross-examination, said that these bills had been given in respect of what was coming to the plaintiff from the defendant, but not otherwise, at the request or for the accommodation of the bankrupt. Other bills had been accepted by McCalla, as to which the plaintiff and McCalla alleged that they had been accepted for the defendant's accommodation. This, however, was denied by the defendant; but the evidence shewed that they had been paid by the defendant when they fell due.

The evidence further shewed that on the 20th of June, 1863, the plaintiff obtained from McCalla a letter in the form of a certificate addressed to himself, which certified that 1,200*l.* was due to him on the Eastbourne contract. This letter was admitted on both sides not to be a formal certificate which would enable the plaintiff to sue at law on the Eastbourne contract. McCalla in his cross-examination, said, "The certificate was given addressed to plaintiff, in order that he might produce it to his bankers, to show that he was entitled to a sum of money. The plaintiff knew that I did not know what he was entitled to exactly, though I believe he was entitled to more than 1,200*l.* Mr. Nugent had at that time paid him more money than I was aware of." The plaintiff, on his cross-examination, said "I believe McCalla did not intend the certificate to be used against the defendant. I asked for a certificate to show my bankers."

On the 22nd of September, 1863, the plaintiff's solicitor, by his directions, wrote a letter to the defendant in which he stated that he held McCalla's certificate for 1,200*l.*, and that he would be glad to know when the defendant would be prepared to pay the money. The defendant's solicitor, in reply, expressed his surprise at McCalla's signing any certificate after a notice which had been sent to him claiming deductions and allowances for departures from the specification, in which notice McCalla had been told that the defendant suspected unfair collusion between him and the plaintiff, and that sundry bill transactions had taken place between them. In the same letter the defendant's solicitor stated that those suspicions had become a certainty, and that defendant had instructed an eminent surveyor to go over the works and estimate the deductions which ought to be made.

It was alleged by the bill that, on the refusal of the defendant to pay the 1,200*l.*, the plaintiff applied to McCalla, to make a formal certificate, and that McCalla was willing to comply with plaintiff's request, but that it was necessary, in order that he should do so, that he should have the original contract and specification, and the notes and memoranda which he had made on them; and that defendant, with a view to preventing McCalla from ascertaining and certifying the amount due to plaintiff, and thereby to obstruct plaintiff's legal right, took the contract, specifications, and memoranda away from McCalla, and refused to allow him to refer to them for the purpose of making a certificate. The evidence on this point was also conflicting, and it appeared that McCalla had a copy of the original contract. The defendant, however, acknowledged that he altogether refused to be bound by any certificate that McCalla might make.

On the 8th of October, 1863, the plaintiff commenced two actions in the Court of Exchequer against the defendant to recover the sums alleged to be due on the Eastbourne contract and on another alleged contract not material to be here mentioned.

On the 15th October, 1863, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant on the Penge contract.

On the 27th of October, 1863, the defendant obtained a judge's order to consolidate all three actions; and on the same day the defendant commenced an action against the plaintiff for alleged breaches of the contract of the 14th of August, 1862.

On the 17th of November, 1863, McCalla wrote to the defendant asking for the original contract, and all the papers.

On the 18th of November, 1863, defendant's solicitor wrote to McCalla that he was no longer defendant's architect; that the buildings had been examined with the specification by an eminent surveyor, whose report led to the inference that such numerous breaches would not have occurred unless McCalla had been in collusion with plaintiff, and requesting him to abstain from giving a valueless certificate.

On the 21st of November, 1863, defendant executed a deed purporting to revoke McCalla's appointment as architect, and served a copy of it on the plaintiff and McCalla.

The plaintiff was advised that he could not safely proceed in his actions at law for want of McCalla's certificate, and he therefore obtained a rule to discontinue such actions.

The bill prayed for an account of what was due to the plaintiff from the defendant on the Eastbourne and Penge contracts, or, in the alternative, that defendant might be decreed to deliver up the original contract and memoranda to McCalla to enable him to certify the amount due to plaintiff; and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding at law.

Malins, Q.C., and Bevir, for plaintiff.—It is well known that this Court will grant relief where the architect's or engineer's certificate cannot be obtained: Kemp v. Rose, 1 Giff. 258; Pawley v. Turnbull, 3 Giff. 70. And the case is still stronger where, as in this case, the architect is prevented giving a certificate by defendant's misconduct. In Scott v. The Corporation of Liverpool (1 Giff. 216, 6 W. R. 136) it was not shown that the architect had refused or was incapacitated to act. The defendant could not object to the jurisdiction on the ground that the plaintiff could sue at law on the Penge contract, as the defendant had himself obtained an order to consolidate the actions. There was no imputation on the plaintiff's conduct which would be a ground for refusing him relief. They also quoted Sir J. Wigram's observations in the case of Waring v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company, p. 493, commencing "If, however, the judge:" Macintosh v. Great Western Railway Company (3 Sm. & G. 146).

Jessel, Q.C., and Smart, for defendant, argued, 1.—That there was no jurisdiction as to the Penge contract, inasmuch as there was nothing which would have prevented the plaintiff declaring in the action on that contract and abandoning the other actions, even after the actions had been consolidated. 2. Assuming the plaintiff's case to be made out, his conduct disentitled him to relief. His collusion with McCalla was clearly proved (a) by the bill transactions between them, (b) by their conduct in respect of the certificate of the 20th June, 1863, (c) by the report of the architect who had been employed by the defendant to survey the works, which showed such gross violation of the terms of the contract as could only be explained by collusion between plaintiff and McCalla. No misconduct had been proved on defendant's part, and all the cases quoted had proceeded on the ground of such misconduct. At any rate, the plaintiff, if he obtained a decree, should pay costs up to the hearing.

STUART, V.C., said that this was a bill of a kind which had occurred in these courts only in modern times, although, no doubt, in The Duke of Marlborough's case (reported on appeal, 1 B. P. C. 178) a bill had been filed on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer to recover the amount due on a building contract. He thought that it must be held that with reference to contracts for building and for the execution of large works, courts of law and equity had concurrent jurisdiction. In the case of The Taff Vale Railway Company v. Nixon (1 Ho. of Lds. Cas. 111), the House of Lords decided that cases of complicated account, arising out of a contract to execute works, were cognizable in a court of law by means of a reference to arbitration, although in that particular instance a court of equity was the proper tribunal.

The history of the cases showed that the view taken in that case by the House of Lords was an unfortunate one as it left suitors in doubt to what jurisdiction they should resort. An instance of this might be seen in the case of Phillips v. Phillips (9 Hare 473). Lord Cottenham's judgment in The North-Eastern Railway Company v. Martin (2 Ph. 758); shewed that the question of convenience must to a great extent determine which court should have jurisdiction. The tendency of modern legislation had been, not to drive suitors from one court to another, but to do justice as speedily as possible between the parties.

In the present case the plaintiff had tried to obtain relief by three separate actions at law, and there were also two actions pending by the defendant against the plaintiff. This was a deplorable state of things, and it was the duty of the Court not to shut its doors in such a case, where the proceedings at law would clearly fail to do justice between the parties. It was said, and with perfect truth, although it was a theory admitting some qualification, that at law, in cases of this kind, where the certificate of the engineer was a condition precedent to the payment, the want of such certificate was a fatal objection to the plaintiff's right to recover. He (the Vice-Chancellor) was not prepared to say that in all cases where neither party was to blame the absence of such certificate would be a bar to relief. However, for the purposes of this case, it was of no practical importance. The defendant had urged that the Court should refuse the plaintiff relief because his inability to recover at law arose from his own misconduct, and he had further urged that even if the Court gave the plaintiff a decree it should make him pay costs up to the hearing. But the evidence was conflicting as to the defendant's own conduct, and he (the Vice-Chancellor) did not think that the evidence showed anything to disentitle the plaintiff to relief or fix him then with costs, whatever might be decided as to costs at a subsequent stage of the proceedings. As to the objection to the Court's entertaining jurisdiction on the Penge contract, assuming that there was nothing to prevent the plaintiff recovering at law on it, yet where there were demands on three separate contracts, arising in the course of the plaintiff's employment by the defendant, it would be disgraceful if the Court could not consolidate the contracts, as was done in the case of Marintosh v. Great Western Railway Company, and in one suit do justice between the parties.

There must be an inquiry whether anything and what is due to the plaintiff in respect of works executed and materials supplied or otherwise, having regard to the circumstances under which the works were carried on. And an inquiry whether anything and what is due to the defendant from the plaintiff in respect of breaches of contract, without prejudice to any question of waiver. The costs would be dealt with on further consideration.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 24, 1865.

In re WARD'S SETTLEMENT.

14 W. R. 96; 13 L. T. 494.

S. 30 of the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), was repealed by s. 51 of the Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53).

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—The Court will make an order under the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 30, on the petition of a cestui que trust.

This was a petition presented by Mrs. Ward under the provisions of the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35 s. 30. to obtain the direction of the Court.

By the settlement on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Ward, certain sums of bank annuities were vested in trustees upon trust for the separate use of Mrs. Ward during the coverture, with remainder to the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Ward for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage as therein mentioned. And the settlement contained a power of sale and re-investment of the trust fund with the joint consent in writing of Mr. and Mrs. Ward.

It appeared that Mr. Ward had become bankrupt, and had been divorced from Mrs. Ward, and had married again. Mrs. Ward was desirous of changing the investment of the trust funds.

Hughes for the petitioner.

Vincent, for the trustees, submitted whether the Court had jurisdiction to make an order on the petition of a cestui que trust.

STUART, V.C., said he had no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Court, and directed that the trustees were to be at liberty to exercise the power of sale and re-investment without the consent of Mr. Ward.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 25, 1865.

RANTZEN v. ROTHSCHILD.

14 W. R. 96; 13 L. T. 399.

INJUNCTION.—A defendant, whose servant has committed a breach of an injunction of the Court, but to whom personally no blame attaches, is liable to pay the costs of a motion for committal.

Jemmett moved for a writ of sequestration against such of the defendants as were members of Parliament, and for the committal of the others for disobeying an injunction of the Court.

It appeared that the injunction, which was to restrain the defendants, their servants, agents, and workmen, from pulling down a party-wall adjoining the plaintiff's house, was granted on the 30th of October last, and notice thereof was served about four p.m. on that day on the foreman who was superintending the plaintiff's works. The foreman could not read, but asked a policeman who was passing to read the notice, which he did, and also advised the foreman to disregard it. The foreman accordingly continued his work. The defendants had no notice of the injunction till the 31st October; and at once, on being served with such notice, took proceedings to stop the works.

Malins, Q.C., and Everitt, against the motion.—It is in evidence that, at the time the injunction was applied for, there were not more than two-and-a-half feet of the wall remaining. The injunction was therefore improperly obtained; and that should be taken into consideration on a motion like this: Drewry v. Thacker (3 Sw. 546). Besides, the defendants were not responsible for the acts of a person employed by their architect. It was clear that this was merely a motion for costs, and, under the circumstances, the Court would exercise its discretion and refuse them.

STUART, V.C., said that the question was one of costs merely, as no blame could attach to the defendants, who had taken steps to obey the injunction as soon as it was served on them. They had, however, been unfortunate enough to employ a servant who had been guilty of a gross contempt of Court, and they must bear the consequences. There would be no order but that the defendants pay the costs of the motion.

WOOD, V.C., Nov. 18, 1865.

In re VARLEY'S TRUST ESTATE.

14 W. R. 98.

Evidence—Petition—Affidavits sworn before presentation.

Affidavits in support of a petition for payment of money out of Court, sworn before the petition is presented, but after the payment into Court, will be admitted as evidence.

This was a petition for payment out of Court of a sum of money paid in by the Metropolitan Board of Works.

The affidavits in support of it were sworn before the petition was presented, but after the payment into Court; and they were headed with the title of the account into which the money had been paid. The deponents resided in Jersey.

Edward Cutler, for the petitioners, mentioned the irregularity to the Court.

C. Hall, for the Board of Works, offered no opposition.

WOOD, V.C., said that as the affidavits were sworn after the payment into court, and were headed with the title of the account into which it had been paid, they might be admitted as evidence.

[IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.]

Nov. 16, 18, 1865.

MILLER v. BIDDLE.

14 W. R. 110; 13 L. T. 334; 11 Jur. N.S. 980.

Promissory note—3 & 4 Ann, c. 9—Days of grace.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE. A. A note was made in favour of A. B. simply, and not either to order or bearer. It was payable by instalments, the whole amount to become payable upon default in payment of the first instalment.

Held (per BRAMWELL, CHANNELL, and PIGOTT, BB., POLLOCK, C.B., dissentiente), that the note was a promissory note within the statute of Ann, and that days of grace must be allowed upon the first instalment.

This was an action upon a note, and was tried in the Mayor's Court before the Recorder of London. The note was in the following form:—

“ 260l.

London, 22nd January, 1865.

“ We jointly and severally promise to pay to Henry Miller, Esq., the sum of 260l. by the following instalments, namely, 130l. on the 22nd day of May, 1865, and the sum of 130l. on the 22nd day of August, 1865. In default of payment of the first instalment the whole amount payable under this note to become due and payable.

“ C. MADDER.

“ W. BIDDLE.”

The writ in the action was issued on the 23rd of May, for the whole amount of the note. The Recorder directed a verdict for the defendants, on the ground that they were entitled to three days of grace from the 22nd of May; but reserved leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, if the Court should be of opinion that days of grace ought not to be allowed.

Philbrick in this term obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

Warton now showed cause.—The defendants are entitled to days of grace on each instalment. It makes no difference that the note is not payable to order or bearer: Smith v. Kendal (6 T. R. 123); nor that it is payable by instalments: Oridge v. Sherborne (11 M. & W. 374); nor that the whole becomes due on default: Carlow v. Kinealy, (12 M. & W. 139). Even if this be not so, and the whole amount became payable by default on the 22nd of May, the defendants are then entitled to days of grace upon the whole. He cited also Rawlinson v. Stone (3 Wils. 4); Bentley v. Northouse, (M. & M. 66); Milne v. Graham (1 B. & C. 192); Hill v. Lewis (1 Salk. 132); Brown v. Harradan (4 T. R. 148); Byles on Bills, (191n.).

Keane, Q.C. (Philbrick with him), in reply.—This is not a promissory note within the statute. A promissory note must be for the payment of a sum certain; and this is not so, but a promise to pay one of two different sums according to circumstances: Carlos v. Fancourt (5 T. R. 482).

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18.—POLLOCK, C.B., now delivered the judgment of the Court.*—This case was tried before the Recorder of London, when a verdict was found for the defendants. The question arose upon a promissory note, not made payable to bearer or to order, but simply to Miller; which note was to be paid by instalments, with the condition that if any instalment was not paid upon the day when it was due, the whole should immediately become payable. The Court granted a rule to show cause in ignorance that there is a case of Carlow v. Kinealy (ubi supra), which, in their opinion, decides the express point. That decided that a promissory note payable by instalments, subject to a condition that on default being made in payment of the first instalment, the whole amount should become immediately payable, is within the statute of Ann, and negotiable. A prior case (Oridge v. Sherborne, ubi supra) had decided that a promissory note, payable by instalments, is within the statute, and that the maker is entitled to days of grace, where the note is negotiable. Upon the authority of these cases the majority of the Court are of opinion that this rule should be discharged. As I dissent from this view, I think it my duty to express my dissent for the purpose of giving the parties a right to appeal. The statute of Ann, in my opinion, applies to negotiable instruments only, and I think there is a great difference between holding that a negotiable instrument falls within the provisions of that statute, and holding that the same rule applies to an instrument not negotiable. Moreover, I observe that the Court, in Carlow v. Kinealy, considered that the point before them had been decided by Oridge v. Sherborne; but I am of opinion that that was not so. If it had been I think those cases would have been binding, but in my opinion we are not justified in deciding on the authority of those cases. I am very much inclined to believe that the opinion of Lord Kenyon (Smith v. Kendal, ubi supra) is the correct one, and that this is a mere contract, and that the statute applies only to negotiable instruments. Then we have been referred to the custom of merchants, but the custom of merchants has nothing to do with a mere contract; if it had, every case would have to be decided according to it. But I doubt whether there is any custom of merchants relating to a bill drawn in such a way that upon default in payment of one instalment the whole becomes due. The statute of Ann was passed to apply the custom of merchants to promissory notes; but in such a case there is no custom to apply. For these reasons I dissent from the opinion of the Court. That dissent will not operate, but I do my duty in expressing that dissent, and having done so I pronounce the judgment of the Court that this rule be discharged.

* Pollock, C.B., Bramwell, Channell and Pigott, BB.

Rule discharged.

[BANKRUPTCY.]

Nov. 11, 19, 1865.

Ex parte LAMB; Re ROUSE.

14 W. R. 112; 13 L. T. 337.

See now Bankruptcy Act, 1883, (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52) s. 44.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 125—Order and Disposition.

BANKRUPTCY.—A piano being in the possession of R., with the consent of L., the true owner, was seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. issued against the goods of R., and remained in his custody until the time of the bankruptcy of R., without any notice from L.

Upon application being made by L. for the delivery to him of the piano, Held, that the wrongful seizure by the sheriff did not take the property out of the possession of R., and that the piano being in the possession of R. at the time of his bankruptcy, with the consent of the true owner, formed part of the bankrupt's estate.

This was a special case agreed upon between the parties with respect to the right to a piano.

From the case the following facts appeared:—Mr. Lamb, the father of the bankrupt's wife, at her request, about four years before the bankruptcy, lent her piano, which had ever since remained in the bankrupt's house. Mr. Lamb swore that the piano was lent to his daughter, and not given, but he admitted that he probably would never have made any claim to it but that he saw that his daughter was likely now to be deprived of it. Shortly before the bankruptcy the sheriff seized all the bankrupt's furniture under a writ of fi. fa., and in consequence thereof the bankrupt presented a petition for adjudication against himself and was declared bankrupt thereon. Mr. Lamb never heard of the seizure by the sheriff until after the bankruptcy, but when he did so he took steps for the recovery of his piano. The assignees now claimed the piano as having been in possession of the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy with the consent of the true owner.

R. Griffiths for the assignees.

Doria, for Mr. Lamb, did not deny that the piano was in the possession of the bankrupt, with his consent, until the time of the seizure by the sheriff, but he contended that after such seizure it was in the custody of the law and could not be said to have been in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt. He likened this case to Ex parte Foss, Re Baldwin (6 W. R. 417; 2 De G. & J. 238), in which certain mortgaged goods were seized and held by the sheriff at the time of the bankruptcy, and it was decided that they did not pass to the assignees.

WINSLOW, Comr., after stating the facts, said the first point raised by the counsel for Mr. Lamb was expressly decided in Barrow v. Bell (4 W. R. 16; 5 El. & Bl. 540), where the Court of Queen's Bench held that the wrongful seizure by the sheriff under an execution against B. of the property of A., which was in the house of B., did not take such property out of the possession of B., and the sheriff was a wrongdoer, and his claim to take the goods made no difference as regarded the respective rights of A., the true owner, and his assignees. As to the second point it appeared to him that Ex parte Foss, Re Baldwin, very materially differed from the present case, because the mortgagees, who were the true owners, hearing of the seizure, gave notice before the bankruptcy to the sheriff of their security, and required him to withdraw. Such notice was clear evidence that they no longer consented to the possession by the bankrupt. Now, if Mr. Lamb had heard of the bankrupt's difficulties on the seizure by the sheriff, and had asserted his claim to the piano before the bankruptcy, the case would have been altered; but, unfortunately for him, he did not do so until afterwards, and the bankruptcy being the time at which the rights of the parties must be determined the Court must hold that at that time the piano was in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of Mr. Lamb, and that the assignees were entitled to an order for its sale for the benefit of the creditors.

LORDS JUSTICES, Nov. 24, 1865.

DE HAVILLAND v. DE SAUMAREZ.

DE HAVILLAND v. BINGHAM.

14 W. R. 118.

Articles—Settlement—Executory instruments.

TRUST AND TRUSTEE.—Where an instrument, executed previously to a marriage under the name of "articles of agreement," appears on the face of it finally to declare the intention of the parties, and does not point to a future instrument as necessary to complete the contract, it will not be treated as executory, though, in order to give full effect to its provisions, a future act may remain to be done after its execution.

This was an appeal from an order made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart on a petition presented in the above suits.

Previously to the marriage of Charles De Havilland and Martha Saumarez, an agreement was entered into between their respective fathers and themselves which began as follows:—"Articles of agreement had, made, concluded, and agreed upon the 6th of October, 1819;" by this agreement Richard Saumarez, the father of Martha Saumarez, engaged to transfer a sum of 6,208*l.* Consols and Three and a-half per Cents. into the names of certain trustees, and it was agreed between the parties that the above-mentioned sum should continue upon certain trusts for the benefit of the intended wife, of the children of the marriage, and of certain persons in default of such issue.

The Vice-Chancellor had held that certain of the cestes que trustent took under this agreement as tenants in common, on the ground that the agreement was executory. Hence the present appeal.

Baily, Q.C., and Martineau, for the appellants, contended that, for the purposes of construction, the agreement must be taken to be a complete and not merely an executory instrument.

Chapman Barber, and Dickins, for defendants in the same interest.

Craig, Q.C., and W. Rudall, for the respondents, insisted that this agreement was executory, and must be construed accordingly.

Baily, Q.C., in reply.

KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., said that had the instrument in question pointed, on a proper construction of its contents, to a future instrument as necessary to complete the contract between the parties, Mr. Craig's claim might have been acceded to. But there was nothing in the instrument pointing to a future instrument, and the mere circumstance that it related to marriage, and operated only in equity, could not have the consequence of rendering a future instrument necessary to its completion. His Lordship thought that this instrument must be taken finally to have declared the intention of the parties, and the circumstance of possible inconvenience could not affect its construction. [His Lordship then proceeded to give judgment on the question of construction.]

TURNER, L.J., entirely agreed with the opinion of his learned Brother. The instrument must be construed as a settlement; the fact that a future act remained to be done after its execution probably led to its being called "articles," but the trusts were perfect on the instrument as it stood.

ROMILLY, M.R., Dec. 4, 1865.

TOMLINSON v. LEIGH.

14 W. R. 121; 13 L. T. 516; 11 Jur. N.S. 962.

Rectification of settlement—Mistake—Evidence.

SETTLEMENT.—A marriage settlement gave a life interest to the husband, determinable on bankruptcy, &c. A power of maintenance of the children was given to the trustees, exerciseable after the death of the husband. There had been no written instructions for the settlement. The settlement was, on the affidavits of the husband and the solicitor who prepared it, rectified so as to make the power exerciseable after the bankruptcy, &c. of the husband as well as after his death.

This was a suit for rectification of the settlement made on the marriage of James Walter Tomlinson with Mary Livesey. In the event of the husband surviving the wife, he was to receive the income of the trust fund during his life, or until he should become a bankrupt, make a composition with his creditors, &c. The settlement then gave a power of appointment to the wife, and in default of appointment, the fund went to the children of the marriage on attaining majority or (if females) marrying. A power of maintenance was given to the trustees, which was made to arise after the death of the husband.

Mrs. Tomlinson died in 1860, without having exercised the power of appointment; and there was only one child of the marriage, the plaintiff, John Livesey Tomlinson, an infant.

Mr. J. W. Tomlinson, in May, 1864, executed a deed of arrangement with his creditors, whereby he forfeited his life interest.

The plaintiff, by his father as next friend, now filed his bill against the trustees, alleging that it was the intention and agreement of the parties to the settlement that the power of maintenance should be exerciseable after the determination of the husband's life interest in his lifetime, as well as after his death, and praying that the settlement might be rectified accordingly. The trustees offered no opposition.

There had been no written instructions for the settlement, and the only evidence in support of the application consisted of affidavits by the husband and the solicitor who prepared the settlement, to the effect that it was the intention of the parties and the solicitor that the deed should, and their impression that it did, give the power on the determination in any manner of the husband's life interest.

Baggallay, Q.C., and G. B. Finch, for the plaintiff, referred to Lackersteen v. Lackersteen (6 Jur. N.S. 1111).

Humber for the trustees.

ROMILLY, M.R., said that, although the evidence was somewhat slight, he would make the order. The words "or the sooner determination of the interest hereinbefore given to him" should be inserted after the words "after his death," in the power of maintenance. The costs must come out of the dividends, not the corpus, of the fund.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 21, 22, 23, 1865.

ROBERTS v. ROBERTS.

14 W. R. 123; 13 L. T. 492; 11 Jur. N.S. 992.

Incomplete gift—Parol declaration of trust—Uncertainty of object.

GIFT.—Where a woman signed a cheque in favour of her son's wife, drawn on her son, who held funds belonging to her, and retained the cheque, but subsequently told her son to take it and invest the amount for the benefit of his wife and children, and the son took the cheque, and, after his mother's death, invested the amount in the joint names of himself and his wife.

Held, that the mother had not made a complete gift by the cheque nor a valid declaration of trust of the amount, by reason of the uncertainty of the objects.

This suit was instituted by Thomas Roberts, one of the executors of the will of Margaret Roberts, deceased, formerly of Hubberston in Pembrokeshire, against John Davies Roberts, the other executor of the same will, for administration of her estate.

The plaintiff and defendant were both sons of the testatrix.

The principal question raised in the suit had reference to a certain sum of 500*l.*, which the plaintiff claimed for the benefit of his wife and children, by virtue of a gift or parol declaration of trust by the testatrix previous to her death, the defendant contending that the transaction upon which the plaintiff rested his claim was incomplete, and that the 500*l.* formed part of the estate of the testatrix at the time of her decease.

The facts relied upon by the plaintiff, and substantially admitted by the defendant, were as follows:—

On the 5th of June, 1862, the testatrix made a codicil to her will, the effect of which codicil was to bequeath 500*l.* for the benefit of the defendant for life, and after his death, of his wife, Fanny, for life, with remainder to a daughter of the testatrix in case of her surviving the defendant and his wife, and if not, with remainder to the defendant absolutely. When about to execute this codicil the testatrix remarked to her solicitor that he had omitted one thing which she desired, and that was to give to her daughter-in-law, Jane (referring to the wife of the plaintiff), the same as she had given to Fanny. The solicitor said that he could not alter the codicil without preparing it afresh, and the testatrix reluctantly executed the codicil without alteration.

Two or three days afterwards the testatrix, being then in bed, and in her last illness, called the plaintiff to her bedside, and in the presence of two or three persons (including the defendant) desired him (the plaintiff) to draw a cheque on her bankers in favour of the plaintiff's wife, Jane, for 500*l.* The plaintiff told the testatrix that he believed that she had not so much money at her bankers, and when she expressed herself anxious that the matter should be arranged in some way, he suggested that, as he had funds in his own hands belonging to her, she might draw a cheque on him for the amount. She accordingly signed a cheque drawn on the plaintiff for 500*l.* in favour of the plaintiff's wife, Jane Roberts.

The plaintiff retained this cheque in his possession during a few days, and then placed it by the direction of the testatrix in a box which contained her will, codicil, and some other papers. A short time subsequently the testatrix sent for the plaintiff and requested him to remove the cheque, and to take it into his own possession, directing him to invest the amount and pay the interest of it to his wife during her life, and after her death to divide the principal amongst her children. The plaintiff then removed the cheque and made an entry in pencil in his books debiting the amount to the testatrix, and after her death invested the sum of 500*l.* in the names of himself and his wife, in pursuance of the directions of the testatrix.

There were certain points in the evidence of the defendant at conflict with the above statement of facts; but, inasmuch as the Vice-Chancellor's decision proceeded upon the plaintiff's own showing, such discrepancies are immaterial here.

In the course of the hearing it was arranged that the bill should be amended by making the wife and infant children of the plaintiff parties to the suit.

Greene, Q.C., and Dickinson, for the plaintiff and his wife and children, contended that the gift made by the testatrix was valid and complete: Fortescue v. Barnett (3 Myl. & K. 36); Sloane v. Cadogan (Sugd. Vend. & Pur. 11 ed. App. No. 24). At any rate, the fund being in the hands of the plaintiff, an order upon him for the amount constituted him a trustee, and was a valid declaration of trust: Wheatley v. Purr (1 Keen, 551).

Malins, Q.C., and Bevir, for the defendant.—The gift was not complete. The mere delivery of the cheque was not sufficient. The cheque was not acted upon, and the death of the testatrix was a countermand. Moreover, the objects of this gift or declaration of trust were wholly uncertain. They cited Dillon v. Coppin (4 M. & C. 647); Antrobus v. Smith (12 Ves. Jun. 29); Edwards v. Jones (1 M. & C. 226); Dipple v. Corles (1 W. R. 47; 11 Hare, 183); Bayley v. Boulcott (4 Russ. 345); Tate v. Hilbert (2 Ves. Jun. 111); Hughes v. Stubbs (1 Hare, 476); Wheatley v. Purr (loc. cit.); and the case of Jones v. Lock, decided by Lord Chancellor Cranworth, November 22nd. 1865.

Greene, Q.C., in reply, cited Vance v. Vance (1 Beav. 605), and Kiddill v. Farnell (5 W. R. 324; 3 Sm. & G. 428).

STUART, V.C., said that he had carefully considered the cases bearing upon the point in question, which was one of great difficulty. It had been argued that a valid gift was effected by the testatrix by means of the order drawn on her son, the plaintiff, in the form of a direction to pay to his wife or her order the sum of 500*l.* out of money belonging to the testatrix in the hands of the plaintiff, but under the circumstances of the case it was impossible to treat this transaction as a complete and effectual gift. The law on this subject was most clearly laid down by Lord Eldon in the case of Ex parte Pye, Ex parte Dubost (18 Ves. 140), to which decision his Honour referred. A person claiming in such manner as did the present plaintiff was undoubtedly a volunteer, and to make effectual a gift to a volunteer the subject of the gift must be completely disposed of and be no longer under the control of the donor. [His Honour referred on this point to Gaskell v. Gaskell (2 Y. & J. 502)]. Could it be said that the testatrix in this case parted with all control over the property which the order signed by her purported to affect? She retained the cheque in her possession at the time, and the plaintiff alleged that she afterwards delivered it to him, directing him to invest the amount for the benefit of his wife and children. It is most essentially necessary that the object of a gift, such as that which the plaintiff was attempting to support, should be definitely ascertained; but here, by the plaintiff's own showing, the cheque or order was drawn in favour of the plaintiff's wife, indeed, in favour of the plaintiff himself in his marital right, and when it was alleged to have passed from the possession of the testatrix, she is said to have directed an investment of the amount for the benefit of the wife and children. It was impossible to get over such an inconsistency, and upon the ground of a gift the plaintiff's contention could not succeed. It had at one time during the argument appeared to his Honour that the transaction might take effect as a declaration of trust; and if, as was the case, such an effect was attributed to a power of attorney in Ex parte Pye, Ex parte Dubost, it was difficult to say that the order in the present case did not impress a trust upon that portion of the assets of the testatrix with reference to which it was drawn. But the matter did not rest there. If his Honour were prepared to hold that the order was in itself a declaration of trust, still there existed the insuperable discrepancy which had been already referred to. Was there a declaration of trust for the wife, or the wife and children, or for the plaintiff, his wife, and children, and other persons in remainder, in analogy to the trusts of the codicil executed by the testatrix? All this was veiled in perfect obscurity, the plaintiff himself being unable to state certainly and consistently who were to be the objects of the testatrix's bounty. On these grounds the declaration sought by the plaintiff could not be made.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 23, 1865.

TAYLOR v. SPARROW.

14 W. R. 124; 13 L. T. 494: reversed, [1866] E. R. A.; 14 W. R. 881;
15 L. T. 150; 12 Jur. N.S. 593 (L. JJ.).

Will—Construction.

WILL.—Bequest, after a life interest to S., to testator's twelve nephews and nieces, with a gift over in case any of them should depart this life before the period of distribution, leaving issue, and such issue should die before twenty-one, to the survivors.

Held, not to imply a gift to the survivor except in the exact event specified by the testator.

The above suit had been instituted for the administration of the estate of George Taylor, who, by his will, dated the 16th of March, 1857, devised his residuary real and personal estate to trustees, upon trust to pay the rents and interest to Matilda Sparrow for life, and after her decease to distribute the capital among his twelve nephews and nieces named in his will equally, share and share alike. And the testator directed that in case any of them should depart this life before the distribution of his estate and effects, his trustees should invest the share of him or her so dying as therein mentioned, and apply the rents, interest, and proceeds thereof for all and every the children by their first marriage of any of his said nephews and nieces who should have departed this life, if more than one, equally, share and share alike. as and when they severally and respectively attained their several and respective age or ages of twenty-one years, and if but one, then to such one child only. And he thereby declared that "in case any of his said nephews and nieces should depart this life before the distribution of his estate and effects, leaving issue, and such issue should die before attaining the age of twenty-one years," then that the share or shares of him or her so dying, and to which they would have become entitled had they or either of them survived, should be equally divided amongst his said nephews and nieces surviving, share and share alike.

Matilda Sparrow survived the testator, and on her death a question arose on the construction of the testator's will, as to who was entitled to the capital of the residue, to determine which this petition was presented.

John Taylor, one of the testator's nephews, died in his lifetime, leaving issue.

George Taylor, another of the testator's nephews, died in his lifetime, without issue.

Jacob Taylor, a third nephew, survived the testator and died, without issue, in the lifetime of Matilda Sparrow.

All the other nephews and nieces of the testator survived both him and Matilda Sparrow.

Bacon, Q.C., and Pearson, for the surviving nephews and nieces, claimed the entire fund by implication.

O. Morgan, for the representative of Jacob Taylor.

The following cases were cited: Meadows v. Parry (1 V. & B. 124); Murray v. Jones (2 V. & B. 318); Aiton v. Brooks (7 Sim. 204); Hannam v. Sims (6 W. R. 347; 2 De G. & J. 151).

STUART, V.C., said that the gift to the testator's nephews and nieces was in such terms as to give them an absolute interest, unless such interest were afterwards cut down. Two of the nephews had died in the testator's lifetime, and there was no expression to show that this event had been contemplated by the testator. As to these shares, therefore, there was clearly a lapse. It had been argued that the expressions used in the will as to issue were enough to show that the issue were to take by substitution, but it was clear that issue could not take in substitution for persons whose shares lapsed, and who themselves took nothing. As to the ten who survived the testator, he was asked to imply, although the words of gift to them were absolute, that if one of them died before the time of distribution those who survived that period were to take his share. Now, this could not be so, as the testator had clearly specified the event in which the survivors were to take. The judgment of Sir W. Grant, in Murray v. Jones (supra), was a masterly and subtle piece of reasoning, whether it was satisfactory or not to the common sense of mankind; but he did not consider that it applied to the present case. The fund must be divided into twelfths, nine-twelfths to be paid to the petitioners, one-twelfth to the personal representative of Jacob Taylor, and the remaining two-twelfths to the testator's next of kin, according to the Statutes of Distribution.

STUART, V.C., Nov. 24, 1865.

Re DORNING'S SETTLED ESTATES.

14 W. R. 125; 13 L. T. 494.

Settled Estates Act—Leasing Power—Practice.

SETTLED LAND.—The Court will grant an order under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 10, and the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 45, s. 2, vesting in trustees powers of granting mining leases, without inserting in such order a clause requiring a form of lease to be settled in chambers.

This was a petition under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, and the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 45, for an order vesting in trustees powers of granting mining leases without the insertion of a clause requiring a form of lease to be settled in chambers.

Bedwell, for the petitioners, said that in Re Dugdale's Settled Estates, which was an unreported case before Vice-Chancellor Wood, an order had been passed and entered before the passing of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 45, vesting in trustees the power of granting building leases, with the consent of the tenant for life for the time being, or other the person or persons entitled to the rents, or if they were infants, with the consent of their guardians, and at the discretion of the trustees, and containing a clause directing the form of lease to be settled in chambers; and that the Court had, on petition, after the passing of the Act, ordered that clause to be expunged.

STUART, V.C., said that he did not see any difference between building leases and mining leases. There must be an order like that in Re Dugdale, after the clause requiring the lease to be settled at chambers was expunged. The costs to come out of the three-fourths of the profits which the Act directed to be set apart for the inheritance.

WOOD, V.C., Nov. 10, 13, 14, 15, 24, 1865.

DAW v. ELEY.

14 W. R. 126; 11 Jur. N.S. 923.

Patent—Specification—Sufficiency.

PATENT.—Where a specification in the first instance describes the invention in too general terms; but afterwards, in describing the method of performing the invention, refers to certain figures in drawings annexed thereto, and the claim made is for the manufacture of the invention described with reference to those figures, the specification is sufficient.

This was a suit to restrain the infringement by the defendants of a patent granted to one Schneider, for the invention of an improved kind of central fire breech-loading cartridges—the plaintiff being the assignee of an interest in the patent. The defendants disputed the novelty of the alleged invention, and also asserted that they had not infringed it. On these points a great deal of evidence was adduced on both sides, but in this respect the case does not seem to call for any report. There was, however, another ground upon which the defendants relied, viz.—that Schneider had, by his specification, made too extensive a claim, not defining, with enough precision, what he claimed as his invention, and that the specification was therefore void on the ground of insufficiency.

Schneider's provisional specification was dated the 4th of September, 1861, and was stated to be for the invention of "Improvements in cartridges for breech-loading firearms, and in the machinery for manufacturing the same." So far as the cartridges themselves were concerned (and they alone were in question in this suit), he declared the nature of the invention to be as follows:—

"I make my improved cartridges with the percussion cap placed in the centre of the same, and about level with the end of the cartridge. This percussion cap itself I manufacture in two ways, the first with a spreading top or flanch, the detonating powder occupying an annular space within the said flanch; and the second with an internal metallic gudgeon or anvil, which, on the cap being struck, offers the required amount of resistance for effectually igniting the same. For the first description of cap I manufacture a cartridge with a metallic head, particularly countersunk, to receive the flanch cap; and for the second description of cap I manufacture a cartridge with a metallic base for the anvil to rest against during the explosion."

The final specification, which was dated the 4th March, 1862, repeated the above statement. Having thus stated the nature of the invention, he proceeded more fully to describe the manner of performing the same, by means of a description of some drawings annexed to the specification. The only parts of these drawings which relate to the cartridges in question in this suit are the figures which are therein distinguished as figs. 3, 4, and 3*; and with reference to these figures the specification proceeded as follows:—

"Figs. 3 and 4 shew the sections of two cases for cartridges, suitably constructed for receiving and being discharged by percussion caps similar in form to those ordinary employed on the nipples of firearms, such caps being placed on gudgeons or anvils with grooves formed in them, which, together with the caps, are introduced into the holes or recesses formed at the rear ends of the cartridges. a a are the cylindrical cases of paper or other suitable material, that at fig. 3 having a metal hat or cover, b, over its end, and an internal metal base or lining to the hole or chamber, f, to receive the anvil and cap, whilst that at fig. 4 has a disc of metal, b, formed with a screwed tube, which screws into the socket, c, which may be of metal or other suitable material. The anvil used in these cartridges is, by preference, of a cylindrical form, and has longitudinal grooves in it, by which the fire of the percussion powder may readily pass from the percussion cap to and through the opening at the fore end of the chamber or recess in which the anvil and percussion cap are received. Fig. 3* shews the form of the anvil, and also the percussion cap used therewith. It is not essential that the anvil should be cylindrical, or that it should have four longitudinal cuts or grooves formed in it, as shewn at fig. 3*, as it may be formed with a greater or less number of cuts or grooves, and be formed of other transverse sections, so long as it is made to fill, as nearly as may be, the cap, and has cuts or grooves formed in it." And (after a description of the machinery) the specification proceeded to state (inter alia). "I claim the manufacture of cartridges described with reference to figs. 3, 4, and 3*."

It appeared from the evidence that a central fire breech-loading cartridge, invented by a Frenchman named Pottet, was known and in use in England prior to the date of Schneider's patent. This cartridge, too, had an internal gudgeon or anvil; but this anvil, instead of being, like Schneider's, of cylindrical shape, and formed out of a piece of cylindrical wire, consisted of a thin plate of metal, pointed at one end; and, instead of as nearly as possible filling the chamber in which it was placed, Pottet's anvil occupied as small a space as possible within that chamber consistently with the requisite rigidity of the anvil. There were other differences between the two cartridges, but these were the most material.

Daniel, Q. C., Bushby, and A. G. Langley, for the defendants.—The internal chamber, the moveable anvil, that anvil being pointed at the end so as to receive the impact for the purpose of igniting the powder, and the anvil for communicating the flame; all these were included in Pottet's invention, and were, after it had been published, common to all the world. The language of Schneider's specification precisely describes Pottet's invention. The object of a specification is to ascertain the invention, and to shew the public what they are not to do. Pottet's cartridge is so completely included in the terms of this specification, that, supposing it had been subsequent in date to the specification, no person could have been safely advised to manufacture it. Schneider ought to have stated that central fire cartridges were well known, and what were the defects which he proposed to remedy, and how he proposed to do so. They cited Williams v. Brodie (Dav. P. C. 97); Foxwell v. Bostock (12 W. R. 723).

Rolt, Q.C., Hindmarch, Q.C., Boyle, and T. Aston, for the plaintiff.—The specification only claims the manufacture of cartridges as in figs. 3, 4, and 3*. A patentee is entitled to protection for anything new and material, and is not bound to disclaim everything that is old. The language of the specification is, however, enough to distinguish between the old and the new. In Foxwell v. Bostock what was claimed was a new combination of old parts, not, as here, the manufacture of the whole thing according to certain drawings. The drawings must be included as a part of the specification, and the claim must be cut down by reference to them—Russell v. Cowley (1 Cr. M. & R. 864). In Lister v. Leather (5 W. R. 603, 3 Jur. N.S. 811), all the elements were old, but that did not invalidate the patent. In Seed v. Higgins (6 Jur. N.S. 1264), a disclaimer was held to limit a general claim, and leave the patent good to that extent.

Daniel, Q.C., in reply.

Nov. 24.—Wood, V.C. (after discussing the evidence, and deciding against the defendants on the questions of fact), said that the only point of difficulty in the case was the question whether the specification was too extensive in its terms, so as to include Pottet's invention; for, if so, it would be bad, and the patent would be rendered void. No doubt the first part of the description would include Pottet's cartridge. But when Schneider came afterwards to describe the method of performing his invention, he referred to very definite figures, and what he put forth as his claim was the manufacture of cartridges described with reference to those figures. There he limited his claim, though, of course, this must be taken as subject to those prior words which made a larger claim, where he said that it was not essential that the anvil should be cylindrical, and so on. What he said really amounted to this, "I claim the whole invention, and I have shewn what I consider the best way of performing it. It may, however, be made in other ways, but the anvil must be made to fill as nearly as possible the cap." Schneider was aware of Pottet's invention though that was not in common use in England. Therefore it might be that he thought it worth while to make a claim sufficiently extensive to include the principle of Pottet, though it clearly did not include Pottet's actual cartridge. Pottet's anvil was a thin plate of metal; whereas Schneider said that whatever the transverse section of the anvil might be, it must, as nearly as possible, fill the cap, and must have longitudinal grooves in it. Clearly this was not Pottet's anvil. But it was argued by Mr. Daniel that the way to try the thing was this, would Pottet's cartridge, supposing it to have been made after the date of Schneider's patent, have differed from his only colourably, so that it must have been held to have been an infringement of his patent. This opened quite another question, namely, how far a clumsy way of doing a thing, not fulfilling the conditions of the patent, but anterior to the date of the patent, and which, if done after that date, would have been held to be an infringement of the patent, must, if done before, render the specification bad. He did not think this was at all a necessary conclusion. Of course it might have been more in good faith to disclaim Pottet's invention distinctly, but it was held, in Seed v. Higgins, that a claim must be deemed a limited claim when it is limited by the terms of the specification, and it is not necessary for the patentee to say what parts are new and what old. What was claimed here was the manufacture of cartridges described with reference to certain figures, and he must therefore hold the specification sufficient.

WOOD, V.C., Dec. 5, 1865.

TANGYE v. STOTT.

14 W. R. 128; 13 L. T. 430.

Jury—Alleged Fraud.

Circumstances under which a question fixed to be tried by the Court without a jury, was, on the application of one of the parties, ordered to be tried before a jury.

This was a suit for the purpose of restraining an alleged infringement by the defendant of the plaintiff's patent. The cause was specially fixed for this day, to be tried by the Court without a jury.

Grove, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, opened the case, and stated that he should be able to prove certain specific fraudulent acts on the part of the defendants.

Willcock, Q.C., for the defendants, said that these charges were not raised in the pleadings. He therefore asked to have the case tried by a jury.

Grove, Q.C., said that this would be a very inconvenient course. He had, on the faith of the cause being now before the Court as a jury, so opened his case as to put the defendants in possession of what he meant to prove. At Nisi Prius he need not have done this, but might have kept these facts to come out in the evidence as a surplus to the defendants.

Willcock, Q.C., in reply.

WOOD, V.C., said that he could not, under the circumstances, refuse a jury when one of the parties asked for it. The cause must therefore stand over for that purpose.

[BANKRUPTCY.]

Nov. 23, 1865.

THE EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN FINANCE CORPORATION v.
—, M.P.

14 W. R. 195; 13 L. T. 447.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 76—Judgment debtor summons—Privilege of Parliament.

PARLIAMENT.—A judgment debtor summons under the 76th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, cannot properly be issued against a member of the House of Commons.

This was a judgment debtor summons issued under the 76th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, at the suit of the European & American Finance Association, calling upon the defendant, who was a member of the House of Commons, to appear and be examined respecting his ability to satisfy a debt of 8,000*l.* due to the plaintiff.

Sargood in support of the summons.

Ivimey (solicitor), for the defendant, referred to the Bankruptcy Act, s. 76. He contended that a writ of ca. sa. could not properly be issued against a member of Parliament, and that therefore the present summons would not lie.

Sargood, in reply, contended that the Act of Parliament being in favour of creditors, should be so construed, and that there was a clear distinction between the suing out a writ of ca. sa., as might be done in the present case, and the charging a debtor in execution. [Mr. Commissioner WINSLOW.—Cassidy v. Stewart, M.P. (10 L. J. C.P. 57) decides that you have no right to issue the writ of ca. sa.]. He apprehended that the object of the statute was to provide a test whether a conclusive judgment existed, and not whether by any privilege the defendant was exempted from arrest; not whether the defendant was liable to execution, but whether the creditor was in such a position as to sue out a writ of ca. sa.; whether he was in such a position as established beyond all doubt a legal liability on the part of the debtor. There were cases in which, although a creditor might have obtained judgment, such a delay had occurred as would not entitle him to sue out the writ, or a rule for a new trial might be pending in the cause. Therefore the existence of the judgment was not conclusive evidence of the debt sought to be recovered, unless the judgment was in itself in that undisturbed and unimpeachable state which entitled the creditor to sue out a writ of ca. sa. The fact of privilege in this case was not disclosed in the affidavit, and even if it were that would not be the proper test. There was no evidence that the defendant had been sworn in as a member. [WINSLOW, Commr.—Does the privilege depend upon the circumstance of the member being sworn in?] He had not looked into the cases upon that point, but he contended that in any case privilege from arrest could only be a matter of public convenience in respect of the particular member, and that the privilege could not extend to the exemption from the payment of just debts or the distribution of available assets.

WINSLOW, Commr.—In this case I think it will be conceded that the defendant is a member of Parliament, having privilege of Parliament; and the question for my determination is, whether a person so circumstanced is liable to a summons under the 76th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Now it has been decided with regard to trader debtor summonses, that where the statute lays down certain rules they must be strictly complied with in order to support a bankruptcy. The present summons is grounded on the 76th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. [His Honour read the section.] Is then a member of Parliament a person against whom a writ of ca. sa. can properly be issued? Cassidy v. Stewart, M.P., decides that he is not, and my brothers Holroyd and Goulburn have followed that decision, in which I also quite concur. The summons must be dismissed with costs.

[IN THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.]

Nov. 27, 1865.

JEFFRIES v. ONIONS AND ANOTHER.*

14 W. R. 145; 13 L. T. 606.

See Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913 (3 & 4 Geo. V. c. 34), s. 28.

Bankruptcy—Arrangement—Certificate under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 221—Dispensation from performance of proposal.

BANKRUPTCY.—The certificate of a commissioner in bankruptcy, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 221, is not conclusive evidence that the resolution therein mentioned has been carried into effect, and that the creditors have been satisfied; and where those facts are disproved, will not operate as a bar to an action by a creditor.

In an action by a creditor, wherein the defendant pleaded a discharge by virtue of a certificate under the 221st section above, evidence was given on behalf of the defendant that before the second sitting mentioned in section 216, the plaintiff refused to accept any composition, and told the defendant that he need not trouble himself to offer him any.

Held, that it was, nevertheless, the duty of the defendant to pay or tender the composition to the plaintiff after the second sitting, and that the evidence did not show any dispensation from that duty.

Appeal against a decision of the Queen's Bench refusing a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff or for a new trial. The cause had been tried before Channell, B., at the Shrewsbury Assizes, 1862, when a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for 398l. 18s. 4d.

Declaration by the plaintiff, as drawer, against the defendants, as acceptors of a bill of exchange, and for price of goods sold, and money due on accounts stated.

The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff ought not further to maintain the action because the defendants, after the accruing, &c., being traders within the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, were also indebted to divers other persons, and unable to meet their engagements, and thereupon made an arrangement with their creditors, under the superintendence and control of the Courts of Chancery, in pursuance of the said Act, and filed such petition, and did all such things as are required by the Act, and such sittings were appointed and held, and such notices given, and all things done as required, and that three-fifths in number and value of the creditors who had proved their debts to the amount of 10l. and upwards did, at the second sitting, agree to the proposal made by the defendants at the first sitting; that such proposal was then reduced into writing and signed by the said creditors, and afterwards the said Court of Bankruptcy approved and confirmed the said proposal and caused it to be filed and entered of record, and afterwards, and after the commencement of this action, the said Court of Bankruptcy, in pursuance of the said Act, granted to the defendants such certificate as in the said Act mentioned, setting forth therein the filing of the said petition, the said agreement of the creditors, and that the said agreement had been fully carried into effect; that all things had been done, &c., to render the certificate valid and effectual to discharge the defendants from their debts owing at the time of filing the petition, and that nothing had been done or had happened or existed to prevent the said certificate from being a bar to the claims in the declaration mentioned; and that by virtue of the said certificate and by force of the said statute, the defendants, upon the granting of the said certificate, were discharged from the said debts and claims; that the said petition was filed before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and that at the time of the passing of that Act, the said petition and proceedings were pending; that the debt and claim in the declaration mentioned were not contracted, either wholly or in part, by reason of any manner of fraud or breach of trust, or without reasonable probability of the defendants being able to pay the same, or by reason of any of the other matters in the said first-mentioned Act in that behalf mentioned and excepted.

* Before Erle, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Willes, J., Bramwell, B., Channell, B., Byles, J., Keating, J. and Pigott, B.

The plaintiff took issue on the plea.

The questions which arose were upon 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 221, and were: whether the defendants gave sufficient prima facie proof that the proposal agreed to by the creditors had been carried into effect, and, if not, whether it was necessary to give such proof.

To prove that the proposal had been carried into effect, they proposed to show, not that the composition had been actually paid, but that the defendants were ready and willing to pay, and that the plaintiff had refused to accept the composition, and dispensed with a tender.

By the arrangement proposed and accepted by the creditors, a composition of five shillings in the pound was payable by two instalments, the first within fourteen days after the confirmation of the proposal, the second within six months from the last-named day; and it was arranged that the defendants should, within fourteen days from such confirmation, pay to, or tender for acceptance to, or forward by a registered post letter directed to their creditors at their last known place of abode or business, two shillings and sixpence in the pound in cash upon the amount of their debts, and also, at the same time, deliver or tender for acceptance to all the creditors, or forward through the post by a registered letter directed as aforesaid, joint and several promissory notes, payable to the order of the several creditors, for the amount of another instalment.

The defendants also proposed and stipulated that the payment or tender of the first instalment, and the payment of the promissory notes so tendered or delivered, should be deemed a carrying into effect of the resolutions to be founded on their proposal, so as to entitle them to certificates under section 221 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

The first meeting of creditors was on the 15th of February, 1861; the second, at which the proposal was confirmed and accepted, was on the 15th March, 1861. The plaintiff was not present at either. The certificate ultimately granted, issued upon an affidavit by the defendants that they had, within fourteen days after the confirmation, paid or tendered to every creditor the cash for one instalment, and the promissory notes for the other in accordance with the proposal.

The defendants had accepted two other bills drawn by the plaintiff. These, when the petition was presented, were in the hands of indorsees unknown to the defendants, and, for that reason, the defendants had been unable to give them notice, and in the schedule the defendants had inserted the plaintiff as creditor on them.

On the day of the first meeting the defendants were served with a writ by the holders of one of those bills; and, under these circumstances, the defendant James and one Stokes had interviews with the plaintiff after the first meeting and before the second, when the proposal was confirmed and accepted. The defendant James stated that at such interviews he informed the plaintiff of the proposed composition payable as aforesaid, and pressed him to accept it, but that the plaintiff refused to accept any composition at all, or anything short of payment in full; and stated that the plaintiff said the defendants need not take the trouble to come and offer him the proposed composition, as he would never take it, nor any composition at all; he would have his debt in full. The defendant James also stated that he had never paid or tendered the composition or any part of it, after the second meeting.

The defendants were about to call Stokes to give further evidence to prove the dispensation, when the judge interposed and asked the defendants' counsel if he had any evidence of anything to show a dispensation after the meeting, at which the proposal was confirmed and accepted, and whether Stokes could do more than corroborate James, and, on the defendants' counsel answering in the negative, held that nothing which had been proved as taking place before such meeting operated as a dispensation with a tender of the composition, because, until the second meeting, there was no final agreement of the creditors, or any of them, to accept such composition, and that a dispensation with a tender could only be after such final agreement.

The defendants' counsel then contended that it was unnecessary for them to prove that the resolution or agreement accepting the proposal had been carried into effect, because, as they contended, the granting of the certificate was conclusive; but the judge held that it was not conclusive, and that, in order to entitle the defendants to a verdict it was necessary to prove the facts substantially, and, on the above grounds, directed the jury that the plea was not proved.

In Easter Term, 1862, the rule nisi was granted on the grounds—1. That the judge was wrong in point of law in ruling that there had been no dispensation by the circumstances occurring before the second meeting; 2. That he was wrong in ruling that, in order to entitle the defendants to a verdict, they must prove substantially that the resolution or agreement, accepting the proposal, had been carried into effect. This was an appeal against the refusal of that rule.

Gray, Q.C., for the appellants, the defendants.—The questions in this case turn upon the 221st section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and are—first, whether the certificate mentioned in that section is conclusive of the facts recited in it, viz., that the resolution or agreement has been fully carried into effect; and, secondly, whether, supposing the Court is against the defendant upon that point, whether the facts appearing in evidence at the trial show a dispensation by the plaintiff of the defendant from the performance of the agreement. It is admitted on the part of the defendant that Allcard v. Wesson (7 Exch. 753, affirmed in error, 8 Exch. 260), is against him on the first point; but, as the decision of that case in error does not rest upon the ground of the decision in the court below, that case is not binding upon this Court.

He then argued that upon the true construction of the Act of 1849 that case should be overruled; that the commissioner's jurisdiction was to inquire whether the creditors had been satisfied, and to decide one way or the other: and that, although there might be an appeal under the 12th section of the Act, if that were not done the certificate was conclusive in a suit that the creditors had been satisfied. He referred to the arrangement clauses, sections 211, 213, 215, 216, 221, and sections 6 and 13, and, as to the effect of a certificate of conformity, to sections 198, 199, 201, and 205. The 221st section enacts that the certificate in that section mentioned shall operate to all intents and purposes as fully as a certificate of conformity, except as therein provided; and those exceptions are negatived by the plea in this case.

As to the second point it is not averred by the plea that the composition was in fact either paid or tendered, but the evidence of what took place before the second sitting (see sections 215 and 216) shows that the plaintiff refused to accept the composition, and dispensed with the necessity for any payment or tender. A refusal by one creditor under such circumstances does not affect the validity of the certificate: Tindall v. Hibberd (5 W. R. 566; 2 C. B. N.S. 199). [CHANNELL, B.—Whether there was a dispensation or not you cannot contend that it puts the defendants higher than if there had been a tender, and in that case the money must have been paid into court.] By the general law, independently of a statute, as in the case of tendering amends, it is submitted that it is not necessary that the sum tendered should be paid into court. In Hochster v. De la Tour (1 W. R. 469; 2 E. & B. 678), where the defendant had agreed to employ the plaintiff as courier, it was held that a party to an executory agreement may, before the time for executing it, break the agreement by renouncing it; and that, upon such dispensation, an action would lie for the breach before the time for the fulfilment of the agreement.

H. Mathews, contra, was not called on.

ERLE, C.J.—The point last argued was that the bankrupt had shown, by his evidence at the trial, but the proposal agreed to by the creditors had been carried into effect; but I do not think the facts relied on establish that allegation. The proposal is assented to at the first sitting, and is confirmed at the second meeting; and, after that meeting the composition was a debt due to the creditors. That which is relied on for the defendant is that after the first meeting, and before the second meeting, the creditor refused to accept any compensation, and said that the defendants need not trouble themselves to offer him the proposed compensation as he would never take any. Is that a standing dispensation from the payment of the composition, and a satisfaction of the creditor. I say that it is not; and that it was the clear duty of the bankrupt, after the second meeting, to perform and carry into effect the proposal. The case is quite different, and has no analogy to that of a contract, where, in case one of the parties says that he would not perform it, the other party may, if he chooses, commence an action. There the rights of the parties exist. The bankrupt was bound after the second meeting to give the plaintiff an opportunity of taking the compensation.

As to the other point, having decided that the proposal was not carried into effect, and that the creditors were not satisfied (see section 221), I am of opinion that there is nothing in the statute which makes the certificate conclusive evidence of those facts. The remedy by appeal would not be a satisfactory remedy; and there are no words in the statute which say that the certificate shall be conclusive. The commissioner has power to grant the certificate if the facts show that the agreement has been carried into effect, and the creditors shall have been satisfied. We think that those facts did not exist.

The rest of the Court concurred.

WOOD, V.C., Dec. 7, 1865.

MAIR v. THE HIMALAYAN TEA COMPANY (LIMITED).

14 W. R. 165; L. R. 1 Eq. 411; 13 L. T. 586; 11 Jur. N.S. 1013.

Injunction—Contract for personal service—Agent—Wrongful dismissal.

INJUNCTION. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.—In the case of a contract for personal service, even when an agent has been wrongfully dismissed by his employers, this Court, having no power to compel the agent to fulfill his duties, cannot interfere, by way of injunction, in his favour.

The articles of association of the Himalayan Tea Company (Limited), (a company formed under the Companies Act, 1862, and being the principal defendants in this suit) recited (inter alia) that upon the treaty for the formation of the company, it was agreed that, as soon as practicable, after the formation of the company, one half of the shares in the nominal capital of the company, viz., 2,000 shares of 25*l.* each, should be issued by the directors, and that of those shares one-fifth in number should be allotted to, and accepted by, the plaintiff, on the following conditions, viz., that until the remaining four-fifths in number and value of those shares should have been fully paid up, the plaintiffs should not be liable to pay to the company any principal moneys on account either of the first payment or of any subsequent call in respect of any of the shares so allotted to him, but that, so soon as the remaining four-fifths in number and value of those shares should have been fully paid up, then the plaintiff should be liable to pay to the company the full amount of all the shares so allotted to him; and that in the meantime he should pay to the company interest at 5l. per cent. per annum on all principal moneys which would have been payable by him from time to time in respect of the shares so allotted to him in case this special agreement had not been made. And, after similar provisions with respect to the remaining one-half of the shares in the company, when and as they should be issued, it was provided that, in case at any time and from any cause the land and plant of the company should be depreciated in value below the paid up amounts thereof respectively, the plaintiff should pay to the company such principal moneys then unpaid by him on account of all or any of the shares then allotted to him, as the directors from time to time should think requisite for the protection of the interests of the other shareholders in the company, and should call upon him to pay, and he should pay, the same in each case within the space of one calendar month after such call should have been made.

Then followed a recital that the several persons, whose names were thereunto subscribed, had resolved to adopt the above-mentioned agreement, and to carry the same into effect, and to adopt the rules and regulations thereunder written, for the government of the said company; and it was thereupon agreed in manner therein following.

Then came a number of clauses, of which the only material ones are the 69th, which provided that the directors might, from time to time, appoint, employ, and remove all such managers, secretaries, clerks, agents, and other officers and servants, as they might consider necessary for the purpose of the company, and might pay them such salaries as they might think requisite; and the 95th, which provided that the plaintiff's firm of Messrs. Mair & Co., of Calcutta, should be the agents of the company in India at the remuneration therein mentioned, and that produce of the estate to be sold in England should be consigned to the plaintiff's English firm of Messrs. D. K. Mair & Co., who should be entitled to the usual merchant's commission in respect thereof. These articles of association were signed by the plaintiff, and by other shareholders in the company. The plaintiff alleged that he consented to take the said shares, and to incur the said liabilities in respect thereof, solely on the express agreement and condition that the said appointments of his said firms were to be permanent and lasting appointments; and in proof of this he relied upon the printed prospectus of the company, and a printed letter, which were circulated together when the company was being got up. These, he said, amounted to such an express agreement. It is, however, unnecessary to state them here, because the decision of this case did not turn in any way upon them. The plaintiff's said firm of Mair & Co. carried on the agency of the company in India from the formation of the company until the month of August, 1865. On the 12th July, 1865, at a meeting of the directors, at which the plaintiff was present, Mr. Bazley, one of the directors, on their behalf, strongly urged the plaintiff, on behalf of his said firms, to resign the said appointments. The plaintiff objected, but Mr. Bazley then proposed that the plaintiff should be relieved from all liabilities in respect of the said shares, and relinquish all claim to the said shares if he would resign. This proposal the plaintiff afterwards accepted, and accordingly resigned, and his resignation was accepted by the directors, and they appointed another agent for the company in India in his stead. The directors were subsequently advised that the proposal so made by them to the plaintiff was one which they could not legally make, and they accordingly wrote to the plaintiff informing him of this, and, at the same time applying to him for the payment of interest on account of the said shares. Some correspondence ensued, and, ultimately, the company commenced an action at law against the plaintiff for the recovery of 945*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, interest upon the said shares. The plaintiff thereupon filed his bill in this court, and thereby prayed (inter alia) for an injunction to restrain the company from appointing or retaining any person other than the plaintiff's firm of Mair & Co., as agent of the company in India, and from consigning any produce of the estates of the company to any person other than the plaintiff's firm of D. K. Mair & Co., and from prosecuting the said action, and from carrying on any other proceedings at law against the plaintiff in respect of the said shares.

Giffard, Q.C., and Bristowe, for the plaintiff, now moved for an injunction, and contended that the directors had no power to dismiss the plaintiff without the sanction of a general meeting of the shareholders. The 95th clause of the articles of association contained an express appointment of the plaintiff's firm to be agents of the company in India, and that the clause was in no respect altered by the former 69th clause. The dismissal of the plaintiff would therefore involve the alteration of one of the articles of association, and this, by virtue of the Companies' Act, 1862, could only be done by a general meeting of shareholders. The plaintiff's resignation could not be taken advantage of to oust him from his office, without at the same time releasing him from his liabilities. His salary was fixed by virtue of an agreement between him and the company, for which he had given valuable consideration. Some of the shareholders had sworn that they had taken their shares upon the faith of Mair & Co. being the agents of the company. [Wood, V.C.—This Court cannot compel an agent to fulfil his duties.] The plaintiff could not sustain an action against the company for wrongful dismissal, because of his resignation, which was really only intended to be a conditional one.

Rolt, Q.C., and Archibald Smith, for the defendants, disclaimed any intention of relying on the resignation, and were not otherwise called upon.

Wood, V.C., said that he could not see his way to giving the plaintiff any relief in this Court. His remedy (if any) must be at law. The plaintiff's case must rest entirely on the articles of association, there being no case raised by the bill that they did not represent the true agreement between the plaintiff and the company. Taking the matter in the most favourable way for the plaintiff, and assuming that he was to be irremovable from the agency except by a general meeting of the shareholders, or that he was to be freed from all his liabilities if removed, in what way could this Court interfere? It had no power to enforce the fulfilment of the agreement upon the agent; he must therefore be left to his remedy at law. As, however, the plaintiff had, as it was alleged, resigned, upon the faith of an agreement that he should be released from his liabilities on his shares, the defendants must undertake not to set up that resignation in any proceeding which the plaintiff might commence at law, and there would be no order upon the motion.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 4, 1865.

PATCH v. WARD.

14 W. R. 166; L. R. 1 Eq. 436; 13 L. T. 496; 12 Jur. N.S. 2.

Solicitor and client—Production of documents.

MORTGAGE.—Where a solicitor has acted for both mortgagor and mortgagee in the preparation of a mortgage, and he afterwards acquires a right to the money thereby secured, and a decree is made in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, the mortgagor is entitled, in a suit instituted by him to impeach that decree, to call for the production of the mortgage deed against a person holding it as trustee for the solicitor, although no fraud is alleged in the preparation of the deed.

A mortgagor is always entitled to inspect the mortgage deed, although not the other title deeds in the hands of his mortgagee.

This was a summons adjourned from chambers, that the defendants should produce, amongst other documents, three indentures, dated respectively 3rd May, 1845; 5th May, 1845; and 1st December, 1848.

The suit was instituted for the purpose of impeaching the validity of a foreclosure decree.

By indenture, dated the 4th November, 1844, the plaintiff mortgaged certain leasehold premises to the defendant Ward, to secure 3,000*l.*, and further advances up to 5,500*l.*

By the indentures of 3rd May, 1845, and 5th May, 1845, indorsed on the indenture of 4th November, 1844, and which recited that the 5,500*l.* was due on the security of that indenture, the mortgage was transferred to Ward, Baily, and Leaf.

On the 10th September, 1845, the same premises were mortgaged by plaintiff to defendant Vulliamy for 1,000*l.*

The defendant Ward acted as solicitor for the plaintiff and mortgagees in the preparation of these indentures, and he is still solicitor for the defendant Vulliamy. In March, 1847, Ward ceased to act as the plaintiff's solicitor. In May, 1847, a suit was instituted by Ward, in the name of the transferees, against the plaintiff for foreclosure, to which suit Vulliamy was not originally a party, but was made so by amendment. In May, 1848, a decree of foreclosure was made in this suit.

On the 1st December, 1848, the premises were assigned to Vulliamy by an indenture of that date which showed that Ward had paid off the transferees, and that, except as to the 1,000*l.* advanced by Vulliamy, the foreclosure suit would be for Ward's benefit.

On the 16th March, 1849, the foreclosure decree was made absolute.

The grounds on which the decree was impeached were, that the accounts, on the footing of which it had been made, were wrong, and that the defendant Ward's position as plaintiff's solicitor had given him an undue advantage over the plaintiff.

Malins, Q.C., and Nalder, for the motion.—The mortgages were prepared by the defendant Ward, who acted as solicitor for mortgagor and mortgagee. The defendant Ward therefore cannot, as against plaintiff, protect himself from their production. They quoted Balch v. Symes (T. & R. 87), Crisp v. Platel (8 Beav. 62), Davis v. Parry (27 L. J. Ch. 294).

Greene, Q.C., and Bevir, against it.—There is no allegation here of fraud by defendant, Ward, in the preparation of the deeds; and it is not disputed that the sums expressed to be secured by them were bonâ fide paid to plaintiff. These deeds are evidence of the title of the defendant, and the plaintiff has not shown that their production would assist him in making out his title. They quoted Gill v. Eyton (7 Beav. 155), Greenwood v. Rothwell (7 Beav. 291). The deed of 1st December, 1848, only carried out the foreclosure decree so far as Vulliamy was concerned, and there was no ground to call on him to produce that deed.

STUART, V.C., said that no one doubted the rule, that, as against the mortgagor, the mortgagee had a right to resist the production of any deeds which evidenced his title; but this rule did not extend to the mortgage deed itself. A mortgage deed contained a proviso for redemption on payment of principal and interest, and was the evidence of the mortgagor's title to the equity of redemption, and on that account the mortgagor was entitled to its production. Mr. Powell, in his learned work, vol. 2, p. 935, says, "It is understood that a mortgagee is not compellable to produce the title deeds before he has received his money, for otherwise, under pretence of repayment, the mortgagor may look into the deeds with a view to discover faults and impeach the security; but the mortgage deed itself, which puts him in the character of mortgagee, must be always open to the inspection of the mortgagor, that he may know his right to redeem." He (the Vice-Chancellor) considered that such was the doctrine of the Court. In the present case a further question arose. If a mortgagor and mortgagee, or any other grantor and grantee, employed the same solicitor, and he subsequently became owner of a right purporting to be conveyed by the deed, there were strong grounds for saying that if the mortgagor sought inspection of the deed, the solicitor did not stand in the position of transferee of a right acquired in the usual way. The mortgagor in this case sought the production of the deeds of 3rd and 5th November, 1845, to evidence his title. He was of opinion that he was entitled to such production, but not to production of the deed of 1st December, 1848. That deed could not assist the plaintiff in impeaching the foreclosure account as against the defendant Ward. As it was indorsed on the other mortgage deed the defendant Vulliamy would be at liberty to cover it up.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 4, 1865.

BARNETT v. LEUCHARS.

14 W. R. 166; 13 L. T. 495.

Injunction—Trade mark—Label—Fraud on the public.

TRADE AND TRADE NAME.—Defendant restrained from selling, or exposing for sale, fireworks, not manufactured or sold by the plaintiff, in boxes bearing the plaintiff's labels.

The plaintiffs in this case, Frederic Barnett and Charles Albert Roussille, were the inventors of a new firework called "Pharaoh's serpent."

A French patent had been obtained for the invention, and also provisional protection in the United Kingdom under the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852; but in the present suit no question with regard to the patent arose.

The bill sought to restrain the defendant (a toy dealer in Cheapside), his servants and agents, from selling or exposing for sale, or procuring to be sold in boxes bearing the label of the plaintiffs, any "serpents" or other similar articles which had not been manufactured or sold by the plaintiffs; and also asked an account of all "serpents" or other similar articles so sold.

It appeared by the evidence that the plaintiff's fireworks were made in the form of a small cone covered with tinfoil, and were always sold in paper boxes bearing a particular label, each of such boxes containing a single serpent.

The plaintiffs asserted that in the early part of November last they discovered that the defendant was selling boxes bearing their label and containing "serpents" not of their manufacture, and thereby deceiving the public with a spurious article.

The evidence adduced on behalf of the defendant went to prove that customers had occasionally asked for more than one of the plaintiff's "serpents;" and to avoid the trouble of carrying several boxes, had requested that all the cones purchased might be put in one box. That thus several empty boxes bearing the plaintiff's label came to be lying about the defendant's shop; and it was admitted that four of these boxes had, at different times, been filled for the convenience of customers, with "serpent's eggs" not manufactured by the plaintiffs, and consisting of small pieces of a white substance wholly different from the cones manufactured by the plaintiffs.

The cause now came on, on motion for an injunction which was, by consent, treated as a motion for decree.

Malins, Q.C. (W. S. Owen with him), for the plaintiffs.

W. Morris, for the defendant, contended that there was no proof of the public being deceived, the plaintiff Barnett and his agent being the only persons produced as having been supplied with the so-called spurious articles in the plaintiff's boxes. He cited Welch v. Knott (4 K. & J. 747).

STUART, V.C., said that the plaintiffs had shown an exclusive right to a label designed by them, and placed upon boxes used in the sale of fireworks of their own invention. An argument had been founded upon the fact that the witnesses produced to show the fraud practised on the public could not have been deceived, as they already knew the facts of the case, but his Honour could not see the force of such argument. The using of boxes bearing the plaintiff's label for packing up fireworks, not of the plaintiff's manufacture, was plainly an infringement of the plaintiff's right. His Honour granted the injunction prayed by the bill, stating that it was ridiculous to direct an account, and refused to make an order as to costs, as the defendant had acted fairly in the transaction, and had desisted from the practice complained of immediately upon notice of motion being served upon him. His Honour, in refusing costs to the plaintiff, expressed himself as disinclined to encourage cases of this description.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 5, 1865.

DEANE v. HAMBER.

14 W. R. 167; 13 L. T. 522.

Practice—Motion to dismiss—Costs.

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.—Where the plaintiff has sued the defendant at law as administratrix for a debt owing by the testator to the plaintiff, and has also instituted a creditor's suit in chancery in respect of the debt, and the defendant has obtained an order dismissing the action at law on payment of the debt and costs at law, the Court, on motion by the defendant, will make an order staying the chancery proceedings on payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of such costs as it considers reasonable.

This was a motion by Hamber and Pearse, two of the defendants to the suit, that the plaintiff's bill might be dismissed as against them with costs.

The following were the material facts of the case:—

Mr. T. Pearse died in 1858 indebted to the plaintiff, as rector of St. Martin's Outwich, in the sum of 22l. 10s. for rent of premises held by him. He left a will under which the moving defendants were tenants for life of a small piece of land, with remainder to the testator's children, the defendants Samuel and Elizabeth Pearse. The executor named in the will disclaimed, and administration to the testator's effects was taken out by the defendant Hamber. All the defendants were persons in very poor circumstances. The plaintiff repeatedly applied to the defendant Hamber for payment of the 22l. 10s., and at last, on the 26th of October, 1864, brought an action in the Lord Mayor's Court to recover that amount.

The defendant Hamber did not, at first, put in an appearance in the action, and the plaintiff did not prosecute it, being advised by counsel that he would fail, as the covenant by Mr. Pearse to pay the rent did not bind his heirs.

On the 27th of May, 1865, the plaintiff filed a bill on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of the testator, against the moving defendants and the testator's heir at law, and other devisees, for administration of the testator's estate. Interrogatories were filed on the 16th of June, 1865, but leave was from time to time granted to the defendants extending their time for answering.

On the 2nd August, 1865, the defendant Hamber entered an appearance in the action in the Lord Mayor's Court, and on the 3rd August obtained an order dismissing the action on payment of the 22l. 10s. and costs.

On this order being made the defendants' solicitor wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor that there was no need for further proceedings in Chancery, and asked the amount of plaintiff's costs. The plaintiff's solicitor replied that his costs were 68l. 10s., and that he was willing to have them taxed, if desired, and his bill dismissed on their being paid. He, at the same time, offered to take thirty guineas at once in discharge of his claim. The defendant's solicitor, in reply, offered to pay him 20l., which he refused and wrote requiring the defendants to answer.

Malins, Q.C., and Ellis, for the motion.—The institution of the chancery suit was vexatious. The plaintiff was bound to elect to proceed either at law or in equity. The quoted Hogue v. Curteis (1 J. & W. 449).

Bacon, Q.C., and Karslake, contra.—The motion is irregular in point of form. The proper motion would have been by plaintiff to stay all proceedings on payment by defendant of taxed costs: North v. Great Northern Railway Company (2 Giff. 64). Apart from this, we are clearly entitled to our costs in equity. We had a right to file the bill, and it is the defendant's own delay in paying the debt which has brought these proceedings on him.

STUART, V.C., said that the motion was certainly wrong in form, but it was clear that the suit could not be allowed to go on, and the only question was on what terms the proceedings should be stayed. It was impossible to say that the bill was improperly filed, whether it was necessary or not was another question. The proper time for discontinuing the chancery proceedings was when the order to dismiss the action in the Lord Mayor's Court was obtained. But no steps were then taken with that object, and that suit remained as before, and the defendant was bound to answer. He (the Vice Chancellor) thought that the defendants' offer of 20l. for plaintiff's costs was a reasonable one and should have been accepted. He should order that the defendants moving pay to the plaintiff the sum of 20l., and that thereupon all proceedings should be stayed till further order against the defendants moving.

[BANKRUPTCY.]

Nov. 21, 1865.

Ex parte HOPCRAFT.

Re FLAVELL.

14 W. R. 168.

See, Pulbrook v. Ashby, [1887] E. R. A.; 56 L. J. Q.B. 376; 35 W. R. 779 (Q.B. D.).

See now Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) s. 4, and Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43) s. 8.

Bills of Sale Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36—Non-registration under—Bankruptcy.

BILLS OF SALE.—A brewer's lease, which contains a licence and authority to the lessor, in case of default being made in payment of such sum of money as should be due and owing to him from the lessee "on the balance of the account current," to take possession of the stock-in-trade and effects of the lessee must be registered under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, otherwise it becomes void as against assignees in bankruptcy.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the Court between Alfred Hopcraft, a creditor of Frederick Flavell, and Thomas Marshall, the creditors' assignee of the estate of Frederick Flavell.

The bankrupt previously to, and at the time of his bankruptcy, occupied an inn at Bramston, in the county of Northampton, as tenant to the creditor, who is a brewer, under a lease dated 28th August, 1864, for one year, and thence from year to year. This lease was not registered under the Bills of Sale Act.

On the 5th June, 1865, the bankrupt, being indebted to the creditor in the sum of 11l. 15s. for rent, and also in the sum of 52l. 0s. 4d. for articles supplied to him in accordance with the terms of the lease. The creditor distrained upon the bankrupt's goods for the rent, and pursuant to the power contained in the lease in that behalf, the bailiff who distrained also took possession of the goods of the bankrupt for recovery of the debt of 52l. 0s. 4d. None of the goods were sold or removed from the bankrupt's premises, but the bailiff remained in possession in the house. The bankrupt and his family also remained in the house and carried on the business as before until the 8th of June, 1865, when the bankrupt signed a declaration of insolvency, and was thereupon adjudged bankrupt on his own petition.

No act of bankruptcy had been committed prior to the 8th June, 1865.

The assignee paid the rent distrained for, but disputed the right of the creditor to sell the goods, &c., seized under the deed; and in order to save the cost of litigation it was agreed between the parties that the matter in difference should be left to the determination of the commissioner acting in the bankruptcy.

The whole of the goods were sold by the assignee with the consent of the creditor, and the decision of the Commissioner was requested—whether the creditor was entitled to his debt of 52l. 0s. 4d., and costs in full out of the proceeds of the sale, or was entitled only to his dividend with the other creditors, and also by whom the costs attending the present application were to be paid.

The lease contained a covenant by the lessee to pay all and every sum, and sums of money which should be due and owing on the balance of the account current. Then followed this proviso:—

"And further that in case default shall be made in payment of the same moneys, or any part thereof in manner aforesaid, it shall be lawful for, and the said Frederick Flavell doth for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, hereby give and grant unto the said Alfred Hopcraft, his executors, administrators, and assigns, full and free liberty, leave, license, and authority to seize and take into his or their possession all and every the present and future, or any after-acquired goods, stock-in-trade, and effects for the time being belonging to the said Frederick Flavell, and whether the same shall be upon the said demised premises or elsewhere, without any let, suit, trouble, or impeachment whatsoever, and the goods and chattels so seized, be taken to sell and dispose of either, upon the premises where they may be found, or after removing the same for such price and in such manner as he or they may think proper, and to receive and take the money to arise from such sale and give receipts and discharges for the same, and after paying all expenses incurred or paid by him to retain all and every sum and sums of money which shall be then due and owing from the said Frederick Flavell on the balance of his said account current, and then to pay the surplus, if any, unto the said Frederick Flavell, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and in case of any action being brought for such seizure by any person or persons whomsoever, these presents may be used as conclusive evidence of leave and license for such seizure, and all matters to be complained of in such action or other proceedings."

Bagley, for the assignees, referred to the 133rd section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, which provided for seizure and sale before the date of the fiat, in order to support an execution against the effects of the person becoming a bankrupt. He also cited the 184th section of the same Act, and contended that the creditor in this case could not be in a better position than if he had levied an execution which had not been completed by a sale, and that, therefore, he had no right to the property against the assignees. 2. The deed was in contravention of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, ss. 1 and 7. He was then stopped by the Court.

Sargood for the creditor.—It was very doubtful whether the lease required registration under the Bills of Sale Act, there being no conveyance of chattels contained in it. The cases go to this extent, that bills of sale are not void for want of registration as between the parties, but only as against creditors: Hills v. Shepherd (1 F. & F. 191); Barker v. Anson (Id. 192, Shelford's Bankruptcy, 3 ed. 701).

Bagley was not called upon to reply.

HOLROYD, Commr.—I think this case may be decided upon the point which has been raised with regard to the non-registration. It is quite clear that the case contained a license or authority to take possession of chattels, and, as such, required registration under the Bills of Sale Act. It is unnecessary for me to consider the question of order and disposition, though I think upon that point also the case of the creditor would fail. The order will be, therefore, that the assignees are entitled to the goods seized by the creditor.

Sargood asked for his costs out of the proceeds.

HOLROYD, Commr.—The case is so clear that I cannot make any order as to your costs.

ROMILLY, M.R., Dec. 18, 1865.

MAYES v. MAYES.

14 W. R. 169; 13 L. T. 549; 11 Jur. N.S. 1033.

Practice—Evidence—Affidavits—Time for filing.

EVIDENCE.—A party to a cause will not be allowed to file affidavits after he has cross-examined witnesses on the other side.

Semble, he may do so under very special circumstances.

This was an application adjourned from chambers, on the part of the plaintiff in an administration suit for further time to put in affidavits.

The plaintiff, who was the residuary legatee of the testator in the cause, had taken out this summons on the 7th instant, to enlarge the time for closing evidence in order to enable him to file further affidavits to rebut the evidence of Sarah Fisher, who claimed as a creditor against the estate of the testator the sum of 1,250*l.*, alleged to be due to her on account of wages owing to her under an agreement with the testator, by which, although she was merely a farm servant, he had agreed to pay her wages at the rate first of 50*l.* and afterwards of 100*l.* per annum. Before this summons was taken out the plaintiff had served the claimant with a subpoena to attend before the examiner to be cross-examined, and an appointment had been made for such cross-examination on the 9th instant. The plaintiff had been ordered to file his affidavits by the 7th inst., but wishing to enlarge this time he wrote to the claimant's solicitors to ask their consent to allow him to postpone the time for closing his evidence upon certain terms, one of which was that he would forfeit his appointment before the examiner for the cross-examination of the claimant on the 9th inst., and would take, instead thereof, the first appointment that he could obtain in January next. His Honour's chief clerk had endorsed this letter, "I think this is reasonable," but the claimant's solicitors had refused the plaintiff's request, and accordingly the plaintiff had proceeded with the cross-examination of the claimant on the 9th inst.

F. C. J. Millar now appeared in support of the application.

ROMILLY, M.R.—You have cross-examined the claimant, and after that you cannot file affidavits. The same rule applies in this case as in the case of answers.

Millar said there were special circumstances in this case. The claimant professed to have in her possession a document in the testator's handwriting which would support her claim. This document had already been submitted by the plaintiff to an examination by one expert, who had given it as his opinion that it was spurious. The plaintiff desired to obtain the opinion of other experts upon the question of its genuineness, but the claimant refused to produce it to him for this purpose.

Field, for Sarah Fisher, the claimant.

H. M. Jackson, for the executors, said that the document was in their possession, but they were ready, if his Honour thought proper, to deposit it with the chief clerk for the plaintiff's inspection.

ROMILLY, M.R., said that he thought, with regard to this particular document, the plaintiff ought still to be at liberty to examine witnesses, and he would allow him to do so within seven days after the document had been deposited with the chief clerk. But the general rule was constant; you must file your affidavits before cross-examination of the witnesses on the other side. He would reserve the claimant's costs of this application, but it was to be understood that in no case was she to pay the costs of it. The costs of the executors must come out of the estate.*

KINDERSLEY, V.C., Dec. 8, 1865.

NOTTLEY v. PALMER.

14 W. R. 170; L. R. 1 Eq. 241; 13 L. T. 647; 11 Jur. N.S. 968.

Not applied, In re Butler's Will, 1873, L. R. 16 Eq. 479 (L.C. for M.R.).

Practice—Payment out of court of a share of a fund—Tenancy in tail—Disentailing deed.

INFANT.—One of several infant tenants in tail of a fund in court, representing real and personal estate, on attaining twenty-one, petitioned for payment out of her share, and, the family being in poor circumstances, it was also asked that 150*l.* might be paid to the mother for future maintenance.

Order made without requiring a disentailing deed to be executed.

* See Besemeres v. Besemeres, 1 Kay, 17 app.

This was a petition by the five children of a devisee under the will of a gentleman named Nottley, asking for payment out, to one of them (a daughter) of a share of the fund in court, representing the estate, and now consisting of 1,657*l.*, on her attaining twenty-one; and also that a further sum of 150*l.* might be paid to their mother out of the remaining capital, for the maintenance of the other children respectively.

The property, then consisting of real and personal estate, was devised by the will to the petitioners' father for life, with remainder to the petitioners as tenants in common in tail, with cross-remainders, free of succession duty.

The father being dead, the children had lived with, and been supported by, their mother, and portions of the fund had been paid out from time to time, in consequence of the small means there was of maintaining them.

G. Murray appeared in support of the petition, and produced a letter from Somerset House releasing the sums now sought to be dealt with from succession duty. It had been suggested that a disentailing deed ought to be executed by the daughter who had attained twenty-one; but it was submitted that such deed was not necessary. In Re South-Eastern Railway Company (9 W. R. 404, 30 Beav. 215), certain compensation-money, representing land taken by the company, to which a tenant in tail was entitled, was paid into court, and, on the execution of the conveyance, he petitioned for payment out to him of the fund under the 69th section of the Lands Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), to which the company objected, that he ought to execute a disentailing deed; but the Master of the Rolls considered that, inasmuch as the land had been conveyed to the company in fee simple, such deed was unnecessary.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—On the authority of the case before the Master of the Rolls, I think I may dispense with the execution of a disentailing deed, and I will make the order asked as to the other sum, only suggesting that I hope great care will be exercised in the application of it, as otherwise the whole fund may soon be frittered away by the application of such small sums.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 9, 1865.

Re COMBER'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS.

14 W. R. 172; 13 L. T. 459; 11 Jur. N.S. 968.

Will—Construction—Power of appointment—General devise.

POWERS.—Where a testator by will (before the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26), after referring to a fund over which he had a power of appointment by will, and declaring that he intended to dispose thereof "as follows," proceeded to dispose of certain parts, less than the whole of the fund, and made a general devise of all the residue of his personal estate.

Held, that the general devise operated as an execution of the power over that part of the fund of which no specific appointment had been made.

By the settlement, made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Comber, a sum of 2,500*l.* bank annuities, was transferred by Mr. Comber to the trustees, upon trust to pay the dividends to Mr. Comber for life, and after Mr. Comber's decease to Mrs. Comber for life, if she survived Mr. Comber; and after the decease of the survivor to stand possessed of the capital of the trust fund, in trust for such person or persons, &c., as Mr. Comber should by will appoint, and in default of appointment, for Mr. Comber's next-of-kin, according to the Statutes of Distribution.

Mr. Comber made his will, which was dated the 24th of November, 1825, and after disposing of his real estate, and some bank 4l. per cent. annuities, standing in his own name, he proceeded as follows:—"Having the disposal of 2,500l. capital stock in the same 4l. per cent. Bank Annuities, now standing in the names of Charles Finch, the younger, and Goodman Francis, trustees named in my marriage settlement, I dispose thereof as follows:—I give the sum of 200l. part thereof, unto T. C. Eaglesfield; and I give the sum of 100l. other part thereof, unto each of the other children of Mr. and Mrs. Eaglesfield. And I also give 100l. capital stock, other part of the aforesaid stocks, unto each of my cousins (naming them). And as to all the rest residue and remainder of my personal estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, I give and bequeath the same to my wife, Rebecca Comber, for her own use and benefit.

The testator died in 1829. Rebecca Comber survived the testator, and died, having made a will appointing the petitioner Mr. Hurrell, and Mr. Finch, who was one of the trustees of the settlement, her executors, and they both proved her will. The trustees of the settlement paid the legacies which the testator specifically bequeathed out of the 2,500l., and which amounted to 1,300l. and they transferred the residue (after deducting the costs of the affidavit on transfer) into Court, under the Trustee Relief Act.

The petition was presented by Mr. Hurrell as one of the legal personal representatives of Mrs. Comber, praying for transfer of the entire balance to him. It was opposed by the next of kin of Mr. Comber according to the statutes, who contended that they were entitled to the balance, as in default of appointment.

Malins, Q.C., and Rigby, for petitioner.—By the law as it stood before the Wills Act, although, as a rule, a general devise did not operate as an execution of a power, yet, where the testator, by referring to the power, or to the sum over which it extended, showed that he had the power in his mind, that rule was relaxed. It must be taken into consideration also, that the testator was himself the settlor, and that his probable intention was to reserve to himself the entire interest in the fund, giving his wife a life interest if she survived. They quoted Davies v. Fisher (5 Beav. 201); Morgan v. Surman (1 Taunt, 289); Standen v. Standen (2 Ves. Jun. 589); Churchill v. Dibden (2 Ld. Kenyon, 2nd part, 69); Sugden on Powers, 8 ed. 332.

Bacon, Q.C., and Westlake, for the next-of-kin of Mr. Comber.—The testator has given 1,300l. expressly in execution of the power. Where a testator executes a power as a power as to part of the subject of it, one cannot infer that he intended by a general devise to execute it as to the remainder. In Davies v. Fisher, and that class of cases, the reference to the power was a sort of general introduction to the other bequests in the will. Here the testator has clearly shown that he knows the difference between property and power. They quoted Walker v. Mackie (4 Russ. 76); Hughes v. Turner (3 M. & K. 666).

STUART, V.C., said that this was not a case in which any difficulty occurred from the testator's omitting to refer to the power. He had clearly referred to the sum over which he had a power, and had declared his intention to dispose thereof. It was, therefore, in his opinion, necessary to look at all the following dispositions made by the testator, and it must be a very strong reason which would induce him to say that the general devise did not affect the balance of the sum which was subject to the power. When he considered the length to which the Court had gone in giving effect to dispositions by will as operating in execution of powers, even where there was no reference to the powers, he did not think that the fact of the testator having referred to the power when disposing of parts of the fund over which it extended, and not having done so in disposing of the residue of his estate, could affect the question. He felt the force of that objection, but did not think that it was strong enough to override what he considered to be clearly the testator's intention, to dispose of the property subject to the power. There must be an order in terms of the prayer of the petition.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 14, 1865.

MORRALL v. PRITCHARD.

14 W. R. 172; 13 L. T. 425; 11 Jur. N.S. 969.

Practice—Supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review.

PRACTICE.—After a decree has been made in an administration suit directing the usual accounts, if it is sought to charge the executors with wilful default, a bill must be filed for that purpose, and the leave of the Court to its being filed must be obtained.

The application for leave to file such a bill must be supported by affidavit, showing that the plaintiff did not know, and could not have known, at the date of the decree, the circumstances on which he seeks to charge the executors.

This was a motion by the plaintiff, R. Morrall, made in the above suit and various other suits instituted for the administration of the estate of one Adam Lodge, that the plaintiff might be at liberty to file a bill on behalf of himself and all others the unsatisfied creditors of Adam Lodge against the defendants (Lodge's executors), seeking to charge them with wilful default, and praying that the suit might be taken as supplemental to all the other suits.

It appeared that so long ago as 1842, a suit of Morrall v. Pritchard had been instituted by Mr. C. Morrall, who was now represented by plaintiff, and that a decree had been made in that suit in March, 1847, directing the usual accounts.

Before any accounts had been taken under that decree, another suit of Lodge v. Pritchard was instituted by a residuary legatee of the testator, Adam Lodge. The bill in that suit was framed so as to charge the executors with wilful default; but the decree, which was made in July, 1851, only directed the usual accounts.

In March, 1859, the chief clerk certified, in the suit of Morrall v. Pritchard, that the parties to that suit had agreed to adopt the accounts in Lodge v. Pritchard.

On the 11th of March, 1863, an order on further consideration was made by Vice-Chancellor Stuart in these and certain other causes, which order directed payment to the plaintiff, R. Morrall, of a sum of 1,855*l.*, but on the 23rd of July, 1863, the Lords Justices reversed that order, and directed the plaintiff, R. Morrall, to refund so much of the 1,855*l.*, as was required to satisfy certain claims, which they decided had priority over the claims of the plaintiff. Under the last-mentioned order the plaintiff refunded 600*l.*

In June, 1865, the taxing-master certified the amount of costs, and it appeared that after payment of costs the testator's estate would be insufficient for payment of his debts. The plaintiff still remained a creditor of the estate for 600*l.*

The plaintiff, R. Morrall, alleged that the executors had wrongfully paid the debt of a creditor of the testator over whom the plaintiff had priority, that they had neglected to sell the testator's leaseholds specifically bequeathed, and that they had omitted to obtain a return of probate duty, which had been over paid. He also alleged that till the taxing-master's certificate was made he had believed that there would be enough to satisfy his claim without making the executors chargeable for wilful default.

Mulins, Q.C., and Woodroffe, for the motion.—It was necessary to apply for leave to file this bill. It was not a supplemental bill in aid of the decree, but a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, and sought to vary the principle of the decree. If we had filed the bill without leave, the executor might have moved to take it off the file for irregularity. [They cited Hodson v. Ball (1 Ph. 177); Partington v. Reynolds (6 W. R. 388, 4 J. N.S. 201).] On the merits it was clear that the executors had been guilty of wilful default. The plaintiff did not know till June, 1865, that the estate of the testator would be insufficient to satisfy his claim. He could not, therefore, be blamed for not taking any proceedings sooner.

Bacon, Q.C., and Kay, contra.—It was unnecessary to apply for leave to file his bill. [STUART, V.C.—It is too late in the face of the authorities to contend that. The authorities proceed on the ground that it is inconsistent with the common administration decree to extend it to wilful default.] Assuming that to be so, this is a bill of review.

STUART, V.C.—No. A supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review. The decree has not been signed and enrolled.

The plaintiff must show that he did not know at any time during the former proceedings, and that he could not, by reasonable diligence, have discovered the facts on which he now seeks to charge the executors. An application like this must be supported by an affidavit that these facts could not be produced or used at the time when the decree was made. The only affidavit here was one by the plaintiff that he did not know the testator's estate would be insufficient to satisfy his claim. It was clear that he could not allege ignorance of what the executors had done, as the bill in the suit of Lodge v. Pritchard, the accounts in which had been adopted by the plaintiff, charged them with wilful default. They cited Lord Portsmouth v. Lord Effingham (1 Ves. sen., 430); Ord v. Noel (6 Mad. 127); Partridge v. Usborne (5 Russ. 195); Bingham v. Dawson (Jacob. 243); Young v. Keighly (16 Ves. 348); Mit. on Plead. 110, n. 1.

Malins, Q.C., in reply.

STUART, V.C., said that in order to justify the Court in allowing such a bill as this to be filed, there must be an affidavit proving that new facts had been discovered, showing a title to relief in the plaintiff, and also that the plaintiff could not have known these facts at the date of the decree. Now, in this case, the bill which it was sought to file only asked the relief which had been prayed by the bill filed twenty years ago, and it was clear the plaintiff could easily have discovered if he did not actually know the facts on which he now relied. The motion must be refused with costs.

Wood, V.C., Dec. 19, 1865.

PENNELL v. DAVISON.

14 W. R. 174; 13 L. T. 533.

Cross-examination—Notice to co-defendant—Statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.

EVIDENCE.—The cross-examination of one of defendants to a suit was proceeded with without any notice being given to a co-defendant who had given notice to read the first defendant's evidence:—Held, that this proceeding was utterly void.

This was a summons for the enlargement of the time for the cross-examination of witnesses who had made affidavits in the cause. The summons was adjourned into court for argument. The plaintiff had given notice of motion for a decree, and the defendant's affidavits were filed on the 15th July, 1865. The time for filing evidence in reply would have expired on the 22nd July. On that day the plaintiff obtained an order to enlarge the time for reply to the defendant's affidavits until the 9th August. The result of this was that the fourteen days within which the plaintiff must give notice of cross-examination (the long vacation not being counted) would not expire till the fifth day of Michaelmas Term. On the 31st October the plaintiff obtained an order enlarging the time for cross-examination till the 13th November. The plaintiff gave notice to the defendant Davison of his intention to cross-examine him on his answer and affidavits, but gave no notice whatever to another defendant, Susanna Emery, of his intention to cross-examine either herself or Davison, she having given notice of her intention to read Davison's evidence on her own behalf. On the 11th November the cross-examination of Davison was commenced before the examiner, but was not then concluded.

On the 16th November the plaintiff applied for another appointment to proceed with the cross-examination, which was made for the 21st November. The defendant Emery was served with notice of this second appointment and her solicitor attended, and he raised the objection that as no notice had been given to her of the first cross-examination, at which she had a right to be present, the whole proceeding was null and void. The examiner, thereupon, held that he had no jurisdiction to proceed. The plaintiff, therefore, took out the present summons on the 4th December. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff had given no notice to the defendant Emery, because he wished to cross-examine Davison apart from her.

W. H. Terrell, for the plaintiff, referred to sections 31, 32, 38, of statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86. There was no provision there that cross-examination or re-examination should take place in the presence of the parties. There was no oral examination in chief here, and, therefore, it was not a case in which the plaintiff was bound to serve all the parties with notice.

De Gez, Q.C., for the defendant Emery, and Bovill for the defendant Davison, were not called on.

WOOD, V.C., said that there was a deliberate intention on the plaintiff's part to abstain from giving notice to Miss Emery of Davison's cross-examination, and it was not a case of accidental omission. There could not be a more complete irregularity. Miss Emery had made Davison her own witness, and she was entitled to be present at his cross-examination. It was impossible to suppose that the statute was intended to do anything so inconsistent with the ordinary rules of justice as what had been contended for in this case. The cross-examination which had been taken was utterly void to all intents and purposes. The present application must be refused with costs.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 15, 1865.

Re GRANT.

14 W. R. 191; 13 L. T. 583.

Petition—Equity to a settlement—Capital of fund.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The Court will not, as against her husband and a mortgagee, direct payment of part of a fund in court, to which a married woman is entitled, to her on her separate receipt, but will settle a proper portion of the fund on her and her children, and direct payment of the residue (if any) to the husband, or his assignee or mortgagee.

This case came before the Court upon a petition presented by Mrs. Thomas, a married woman, by her next friend, to enforce her equity to a settlement out of a sum of 1,050*l.* stock in court, to which she was entitled under a settlement executed on the marriage of her parents.

In 1853, George Thomas (the husband of the petitioner), with his wife, mortgaged the fund to one Gullan for 600*l.*; but it was contended by the petitioner that she was not bound by this mortgage, as she signed it without being aware of its effect and without proper legal advice.

The trustees transferred the fund into court under the Trustee Relief Act.

George Thomas, the husband, was, at the time of the petition being presented, in insolvent circumstances, and unable to maintain his wife and children.

The petitioner, beyond the fund in court, possessed property producing an income of about 99*l.*, and an annuity of 34*l.*; and no settlement had been made upon her marriage. She now asked that, after payment of costs out of the fund, a part of the fund, sufficient to realize 350*l.*, might be sold, and the proceeds, together with a dividend of 30*l.*, paid to her on her separate receipt, for the immediate necessities of herself and her children. And that the residue of the fund might be settled in the usual form for their benefit.

The petition was served upon the husband, the trustees, and the personal representative of Gullan, who was dead.

Bacon, Q.C., for the petitioner, asked that an order might be made in the terms prayed. As an authority for paying out the capital of 350*l.* on the separate receipt of Mrs. Thomas, he cited Gibbons v. Kibby (10 W. R. 54).

Malins, Q.C., and Langworthy, for the representative of Gullan, asked for half the fund.

Salmon for the trustees.

STUART, V.C., refused to pay out the 350*l.* to Mrs. Thomas, on her separate receipt as asked. His Honour considered the fair and proper course would be to order that so much of the fund as would produce 350*l.* should be transferred to the representative of Gullan, the mortgagee, and that the residue (after providing for the costs of the other parties) should be settled in the usual form on the petitioner and her children. His Honour made no order as to the costs of Gullan's representative.

Wood, V.C., Dec. 20, 1865.

STORMONT v. WICKENS.

14 W. R. 192; 13 L. T. 533.

Suit for assignment of dower—Costs.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The defendant to a suit for assignment of dower set up an assignment of rent which he failed to prove, and entered into evidence as to the improvement of the lands since the title of the dowress accrued.

Held, that he was liable to pay so much of the costs of the suit as was thereby occasioned.

This was a suit for assignment of dower. The defendant had set up an alleged assignment of rents in lieu of dower, but the Court held that he failed to prove it. He had also gone into evidence as to improvements of the property since the time when the widow first became entitled. The plaintiff, therefore, contended that he should be decreed to pay costs.

Jones, Q.C., and Daunay, for the plaintiff, cited Bamford v. Bamford (5 Ha. 203).

Rolt, Q.C., and Winterbotham, for the defendant, cited Sheaf v. Cave (24 Beav. 259).

Wood, V.C., directed that the defendant should pay such of the costs of the suit as had been occasioned by his setting up an assignment of rent, and entering into evidence as to improvements.

Wood, V.C., Dec. 22, 1865.

WHITTAKER v. FOX.

14 W. R. 192; 13 L. T. 588.

Specific Performance—Waiver of Agreement.

CONTRACT.—A valid contract cannot be waived unless both parties assent at the same time to the proposal to put an end to it.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain an action at law.

The bill was for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of some houses, and to restrain an action brought by the defendant in respect of it.

The agreement, which was contained in two letters was for the sale of some unfinished houses, and it was alleged by the defendant that the real contract contained a stipulation, not reduced into writing, that the houses should be completed by the plaintiff. On the delivery of the abstract he said that he would not complete the contract till the houses were finished. The plaintiff afterwards wrote to the defendant a letter, stating that he supposed he intended to abandon the contract, and that if he did not hear to the contrary, he would assume that the contract was at an end. The defendant only replied that he had put the matter into the hands of his solicitor; and he shortly afterwards commenced an action to recover a sum of money which the plaintiff was only liable to pay under one of the stipulations of the agreement for sale.

Giffard, Q.C., and A. E. Miller, for the plaintiff, urged that the plaintiff's letter could not be taken as a waiver of the agreement, since the defendant, by bringing the action, shewed that he had not assented to the waiver. They cited Carolan v. Brabazon (3 Jo. & La. T. 309), Moore v. Crofton (3 Jo. & La. T. 445), Harrison v. Brown, unreported.*

Wilcock, Q.C., and Surrage, for the defendants.

Wood, V.C., said that the defendant, by bringing the action, had shewn that he did not assent to the waiver, and a mutual agreement was necessary to waive a prior contract. The question as to the parol term in the contract would be decided at the hearing. The Court therefore ordered that the action should be stayed, the plaintiff undertaking, if the bill should be dismissed, to abide by any order that the Court might make with respect to what was sought to be recovered in the action, and the costs of the action.

* Harrison v. Brown was heard before the Master of the Rolls February 13, 1861.

The defendant had entered into a contract with the plaintiff for the sale to him of a house. He had delivered an abstract, which the plaintiff returned alleging that it showed no title. He then delivered a supplemental abstract, which was returned with the same allegation. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendant for a return of the deposit. The declaration, however, claimed unliquidated damages for breach of contract, and the defendant, without paying the deposit into court, took out a summons for particulars of demand, but took no other step in the action. The defendant then, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, advertised the property for re-sale, and at the same time the plaintiff, without the knowledge of the defendant, discontinued the action. He then filed a bill against the defendant for specific performance of the original agreement.

The Master of the Rolls held that the defendant, by taking out the summons, showed an intention of relying on the contract, and that there had been no acquiescence in the plaintiff's desire to put an end to the contract. He therefore made a decree for specific performance.

[BAIL COURT.]

Nov. 24, 1865.

REV. FREDERICK JOHNSON, Appellant, v. GEORGE SMITH, Respondent.

14 W. R. 209.

Highway, stopping up part of—Notice of appeal—Commons Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, ss. 62, 63, 64.

COMMON. HIGHWAY.—Section 63 of the Commons Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118) gives an appeal to the quarter sessions within a certain period against the discontinuing, stopping up, diverting, or altering roads, upon giving to the valuer fourteen days' notice in writing of such appeal, together with a statement of the grounds thereof.

The appellant gave notice of appeal against stopping up part of a road only, which was objected to at the quarter sessions, when the Court refused to hear the appeal.

Held, on application for a mandamus to hear the appeal, that the notice of appeal was sufficient.

Metcalfe (Douglas Brown with him), showed cause against a rule obtained by Markby on the 16th of November last, calling on certain justices of Huntingdonshire to show cause why a mandamus should not issue directing them to enter continuances for the next General Quarter Sessions to hear an appeal.

The appeal was, under section 62, 63, and 64 of the Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, against the stopping up of part of a road, described in the recital contained in the notice of appeal below. It had come on to be heard at the October Quarter Sessions, when it was dismissed.

The notice of appeal was as follows:—

“To George Smith of the Corn Exchange, Northampton, the valuer acting in the matter of the enclosure of the waste and commonable lands situate in the parish of Great Gidding, in the County of Huntingdon.

“Whereas on the 4th of July, 1865, you gave notice that the road from Oundel-road to Luton-corner, at the side of the Tuddington Mere hedge, or near thereto, is intended to be discontinued and stopped up, I hereby give you notice that I intend to appeal to the next General Quarter Sessions of the peace to be holden in and for the said county of Huntingdon against the discontinuance and stopping up of so much of the said road as lies between a certain house occupied by one William Fletcher, and the said point called Sutton-corner.

“And take notice that I shall be injured and aggrieved if this portion of the said road be discontinued and stopped-up.

“And take notice that the grounds of such appeal are:—

“1. That the said portion of road so proposed to be discontinued and stopped-up is necessary and useful to the public.

“2. That if the said portion of road were discontinued and stopped-up I and my tenants, occupiers of certain pieces of land adjoining the said portion of road, and who have heretofore used, and have a right to use the same, and also other persons and the public, would be put to and sustain great inconvenience and delay in going to and from the city of Peterborough and the town of Thrapston, which are the nearest markets of importance to the said land, and in carrying corn and other produce to, and in fetching manure and other things from the said city and town, and in conveying manure, corn, and other produce between the said pieces of land and the residence and farmyard of my said tenant or tenants.

"3. That if such portion of road were discontinued and stopped up, I and my tenants aforesaid, and also other persons and the public, would be compelled to travel to the place to which I and they have theretofore had and shall still have occasion to travel by such portion of road, especially to and fro between the parish of Caldecote and said parish of Luddington by another and more circuitous road, and by a greater distance than I and they would have had to travel if the said portion of road were continued open.

"And take notice that at the hearing of the said appeal I shall avail myself of all or some or one of the said grounds of appeal."

Section 62 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 218 enacts:—That, in the first place, the valuer acting in the matter of any inclosure shall, and may, before he shall proceed to make any of the divisions and allotments of the land to be inclosed in pursuance of, or in any manner not inconsistent with the instructions given to such valuer as aforesaid, set out and make public roads and ways and widen public roads and ways in or over the land to be inclosed, and stop up, divert, or alter any of the roads and ways passing through the land to be inclosed, or through any old inclosures in the parish or respective parishes in which the land to be inclosed shall be situate, and the soil of such of the roads and ways so to be discontinued and stopped up as pass through the lands to be inclosed shall be deemed part of the lands to be inclosed: provided always that nothing herein-contained shall authorize the altering or diverting of any turnpike road unless the consent of the majority of the trustees of such turnpike road assembled at public meeting called for that purpose be first obtained: provided also that before any public road or way shall be discontinued, diverted, stopped-up or altered by the valuer acting in the matter of any inclosure, the valuer shall cause to be affixed at each end of such road or way a notice to the effect that the same is intended to be discontinued, stopped up, diverted, or altered, as the case may be, from and after a day to be mentioned in such notice, and the valuer shall also cause the same notice to be given by advertisement for four successive weeks, and also on the church door on the four Sundays of the said four successive weeks, and after the said several notices shall have been so given such road or way shall, from and after the day in such notice mentioned, be deemed to be discontinued, stopped up, diverted, or altered, as the case may be, subject, however, to such appeal as is hereinafter mentioned.

Section 63 enacts:—That it shall be lawful for any person within four months after the first Sunday on which such notice shall have been given on the church door of the intention that such road or way should be discontinued, stopped up, diverted, or altered, as the case may be, to make his complaint thereof by appeal to the justices of the peace at the quarter sessions for the county, riding, division, or other jurisdiction in which such road or way, or the greater part thereof, shall be situate, upon giving to the valuer fourteen days' notice in writing of such appeal, together with a statement in writing of the grounds thereof, but it shall not be lawful for the applicant to be heard in support of such appeal unless such notice and statement shall have been given as aforesaid, nor on any hearing of appeal to go into evidence of any other grounds of appeal than those set forth in such statement as aforesaid.

R. v. Milverton (5 Ad. & E. 841), where an order stopping-up half the breadth of a highway was held bad, was cited.

BLACKBURN, J.—My strong impression is that the legal effect of notice of appeal against stopping up part of the road is notice of appeal against stopping up the whole road. The inquiry might be—whether it is desirable to stop up the whole, and it would be very judicious when it comes before the magistrates to put the matter in such a way that the point might be raised hereafter. The chairman might put the question to the jury divisibly (firstly, whether part of the road was unnecessary, and the appellant aggrieved as to part, and, secondly, whether the whole road was unnecessary and appellant aggrieved). It might be a question of some difficulty how far a man can keep open a cul de sac. As at present advised I am inclined to think this is an appeal against the whole road. I think the appeal should be heard and that this rule for mandamus should be made absolute.

Rule absolute for mandamus peremptory in the first instance by agreement.

[PROBATE.]

Nov. 28, 1865.

In the goods of HOOPER (deceased).

14 W. R. 210; 13 L. T. 445.

Misdescription in a will of the person intended to be benefited.

WILL.—Where a legatee was erroneously described as the sister of deceased, being her daughter, the Court, on being satisfied that it was a mistake, allowed the grant of administration cum testamento annexo to pass to such legatee.

Testatrix died in February, 1865, having previously left all her property to Mary Lott and her lawful children in equal proportions. In the will this legatee was described as "my sister Mary Lott." It appeared, however, that the testatrix had no sister of that name, but an illegitimate daughter; and that she had frequently mentioned that it was her intention to leave everything she had to her.

A clergyman who prepared the will stated in his affidavit that he had inserted the words "my sister" under the impression that Mary Lott was the sister of the testatrix.

A difficulty having arisen in the registry as to the grant, Prideaux now moved for grant of administration with the will annexed.

Sir J. P. WILDE.—It is a mere falsa demonstratio. The grant may pass as prayed for.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 10, 1865.

LOVETT v. HANKINS.

14 W. R. 216; 13 L. T. 580.

Void Agreement—No Consideration.

CONTRACT.—An agreement to take, in lieu of arrears of income, in respect of a life interest, recoverable in equity, a certain sum, less than the estimated amount of such arrears, recoverable at law, is, in equity, void for want of consideration, and will not be supported.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of setting aside two agreements, of the 2nd and 11th of May, 1864, respectively, the first having been entered into between the plaintiff, Mary Lovett, widow, and Thomas Hankins, her brother, who died between the dates of the two agreements, and the second having been signed by the plaintiff after her brother's death at the instance of his representatives, who were the principal defendants in the suit. The circumstances which led to these agreements being signed were as follows:—Joseph Hankins, father of the plaintiff and Thomas Hankins, by his will, dated December 17, 1823, directed a sale of certain real estates, and bequeathed one-third of the proceeds to Thomas Hankins, one-third in trust for the plaintiff for life, with remainder for the benefit of her children (if any), and if none, as to one moiety of the plaintiff's share, to Thomas Hankins absolutely, and as to the other moiety upon such trusts as were declared of the remaining one-third part, which he bequeathed in trust for another daughter, Sarah Penner, for life, with remainder to her children. After the death of the testator (which occurred in 1824) the trustees of his will agreed with Thomas Hankins for sale to him of the real estate for 19,700*l.* At the time of this sale Thomas Hankins only paid 1,320*l.* 10*s.*, which went to clear off incumbrances on the estate. Of the remaining purchase-money (18,379*l.* 10*s.*), a part—viz., 1,002*l.* represented a legacy charged by the testator on his real estate, and the ultimate remainder of 17,377*l.* 10*s.* represented the residuary proceeds of the sale to be divided in thirds and appropriated as above mentioned. It was agreed at the time that Thomas Hankins should retain 5,792*l.* 10*s.* (being his own third part), and should grant a mortgage to the trustees of the will to secure the legacy, and also the two-third parts or shares of his sisters, the plaintiff and Sarah Penner.

To carry this arrangement into effect Thomas Hankins, by an indenture, dated 14th May, 1835, mortgaged the estates to the trustees for 1000 years, to secure the same sums with interest at 4*l.* per cent. Shortly afterwards the legacy was paid.

The plaintiff at the time of the hearing was about seventy-four years old, and had never had a child. Sarah Penner had children who were interested in remainder under the will of the testator.

Shortly after the date of the mortgage above mentioned, Thomas Hankins purchased the reversionary interests of all the children of Sarah Penner, in the sum of 11,585*l.* (being the sum in which the plaintiff and Sarah Penner were interested in moieties during their respective lives), and so became absolutely entitled to that sum, subject only to the respective life interests of the plaintiff and Sarah Penner therein. In order to raise the sum necessary for purchasing these interests, Thomas Hankins was obliged to mortgage the estate, which he did by an indenture dated 17th November, 1852, his sisters, the plaintiff and Sarah Penner, joining therein for the purpose of postponing their security for the 11,585*l.*

By another indenture, dated the same 17th November, Thomas Hankins assigned all the rents and profits of the estate which should accrue during the life of the plaintiff and Sarah Penner (subject to the mortgage of even date) to the surviving trustee of the will of the testator upon trust to satisfy and keep down the interest to become thereafter due to the plaintiff and Sarah Penner.

Sarah Penner died in 1853.

Subsequently to the last-mentioned deed Thomas Hankins made the plaintiff unequal payments on account of her life interest, the income of which fell considerably into arrear.

Thomas Hankins died in May, 1864, having made a will whereby he devised his real estate to his sons, Thomas and William Hankins, and his son-in-law Richard Hobbs, in trust for all his children (two sons and three daughters) in equal shares.

The bill stated that a few days before the death of Thomas Hankins, his son William Hankins came to her and asked her to sign an agreement to take 1,000*l.* (a sum less than the estimated amount of arrears) in discharge of all arrears. The plaintiff was then ill and in bed, and supposing that her brother, Thomas Hankins, was in difficulties, and knowing that he was dying, she consented to sign, and did sign, the first agreement, whereby she agreed to take 1,000*l.* in full of all arrears and Thomas Hankins agreed to pay the plaintiff 1,000*l.* with interest at 4*l.* per cent., on the plaintiff giving him twelve months' notice requiring payment thereof. And the plaintiff agreed to give to Thomas Hankins, on payment of 1,000*l.* and interest, a receipt for the arrears of her annuity up to the day of the agreement.

The bill proceeded to state that after the death of Thomas Hankins, William Hankins and Richard Hobbs induced the plaintiff to consent to give up her claim for interest on the 1,000*l.*, telling her that it was the only plan to avoid leaving her brother's debts unpaid, and she accordingly signed the second agreement, dated the 11th May, 1864, releasing her claim for interest.

The plaintiff alleged that she was induced by misrepresentation to sign these agreements, and that there was, in fact, no consideration for them. The defendants to the suit were the two sons and three daughters of Thomas Hankins, the respective husbands of two of the daughters, and the representatives of the last surviving trustee of the will of the original testator, who was also trustee of the securities given by Thomas Hankins for the plaintiff's life interest.

Malins, Q.C., and B. Rogers, for the plaintiff, contended that the agreements could not stand. They were wholly without consideration. They cited Cumber v. Wain (1 Str. and 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. new ed. 288); Heathcote v. Crookshanks (2 T. R. 24, 27); Fitch v. Sutton (5 East, 230); Cross v. Sprigg (6 Ha. 552, 555); Peace v. Hains (11 Ha. 151).

Bacon, Q.C., and De Longueville Giffard, for some of the principal defendants, argued that there was a consideration for these agreements. Previously the plaintiff had only a general charge in equity for whatever arrears she could claim. The first agreement gave her a distinct legal right to a fixed sum. These agreements were such as would be enforced at law, and there was no ground for setting them aside in equity. They also referred to Cumber v. Wain, loc. cit.

Archibald Smith, for other defendants in the same interest, cited Topham v. Morecroft (8 Ell. & Bl. 972), and commented upon Peace v. Haines, loc. cit.

Freeman and Phear, for the representatives of the last surviving trustee of the will of Joseph Hankins.

STUART, V.C., said that he could not but hold that both agreements had been executed under such circumstances that they could not be supported in equity. The counsel for the defendants had not attempted to uphold the second agreement, but as to the first an attempt had been made to show that it was founded upon a sufficient consideration. It was argued that, before that agreement, the plaintiff had only a right enforceable in equity, and that the effect of that agreement was to give her a remedy at law. His Honour was not aware of any authority for saying that an agreement to take 500*l.* recoverable at law, for 1,000*l.* recoverable in equity, could be said to be founded upon a sufficient consideration. Again, it had been contended that this agreement was one which would be enforced at law: it might be so, but it was not necessarily, on that account, valid in equity. His Honour made a declaration that the two agreements were invalid and ought to be set aside, and directed an account of what was due to the plaintiff for arrears of her life interest.

STUART, V.C., Dec. 22, 1865.

FORBES v. PRESTON.

14 W. R. 217; 13 L. T. 662.

Privity of Contract—Remedy against third parties.

CONTRACT.—Where A. has a right against B. and B. has a right against C., and it is essential to the enforcement of A.'s right against B. that B. should enforce his right against C., and B. neglects to do so, A. may properly make C. party to a suit for enforcing his (A.'s) right against B., although there be no privity of contract between A. and C. And it is not necessary to prove fraud or collusion between B. and C. if a special case is made out.

Hugo Forbes, the plaintiff in this case, was the inventor and patentee of certain improvements in the manufacture of breech-loading fire-arms and in projectiles used with the same. These inventions had been patented in England, France and Belgium. Various and rather complicated transactions took place between the plaintiff and Francis Preston, one of the defendants in the suit, as to the working of the patent by the latter, and the payment of a royalty by him to the plaintiff. Two different deeds were executed with reference to this matter—the second releasing some and altering other clauses contained in the first. Eventually a supplemental agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and Preston, whereby it was agreed that the plaintiff should always receive a royalty at the rate of 5l. per cent. on all articles manufactured upon the principle of his improvements, and that a complete account should be given to the plaintiff by Preston of all articles made and sold either by him (Preston) or by the Mersey Steel and Iron Company—a company which was engaged with Preston in the manufacture of the fire-arms in question.

No contract of any kind was entered into between the plaintiff and the company.

The account was not rendered to the plaintiff in accordance with the agreement between himself and Preston. The bill was filed for the purpose of enforcing this part of the agreement, and contained a statement to the effect, that the defendants, Preston and the company, had colluded together to prevent the plaintiff getting the account required, and that Preston, for that purpose, had neglected to call upon the company to account at all. The Mersey Steel and Iron Company were joined with Preston as defendants.

Malins, Q.C., and Birkbeck, for the plaintiff.

Bacon, Q.C., and Osborne Morgan, for the defendant Preston.

W. M. James, Q.C., and Kay, for the Mersey Steel and Iron Company, argued that the company were not properly brought before the Court. There was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the company. The plaintiff's only right was against Preston, and he could not call upon the company except upon a special case, which had not been made out. They cited: Utterson v. Mair (4 Bro. C.C. 269); Troughton v. Binkes (6 Ves. 573); Alsager v. Rowley (6 Ves. 748); a M. S. case, cited by Lord Eldon in his judgment in Alsager v. Rowley; Jerdein v. Bright (2 Joh. & Hem. 325); Benfield v. Solomons (9 Ves. 77).

Malins, Q.C., in reply, cited Barker v. Birch (1 De G. & Sm. 376), and commented upon Alsager v. Rowley, loc. cit.

STUART, V.C., said that the plaintiff was entitled to call upon Preston for an account, and that Preston was entitled to call upon the company; but, inasmuch as no privity existed between the plaintiff and the company, the former could only bring the latter before the Court upon a special case being made out. His Honour did not understand that it was necessary to prove anything like fraud or collusion. It was enough to prove something which may induce a right to call upon a third party. There must be a special case made out, but it need not be a case of fraud—neglect would form a sufficient ground. In that view, and considering the position of the parties, the company was, in his Honour's opinion, properly brought before the Court.

Account decreed against all the defendants.

Wood, V.C., Dec. 11, 1865.

PACIFIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. GIBBS.

14 W. R. 218; 13 L. T. 431.

Practice—Ex parte injunction—Undertaking as to damages—Signature—Registrar's book.

INJUNCTION.—The Court permitted the undertaking as to damages, on an ex parte injunction obtained by a company, to be signed by an officer of the company on a separate piece of paper and transmitted to the registrar.

In this case an ex parte injunction had been obtained, but as no director or officer of the company was resident in London, it was inconvenient to obtain the signature of any such person to the undertaking as to damages in the Registrar's book, according to the usual practice.

Robinson asked that it might be given on a separate piece of paper, and transmitted to the Registrar.

Wood, V.C., assented.

Wood, V.C., Dec. 18, 1865.

Re SMITH.

14 W. R. 218; 13 L. T. 626.

Railway company—Petition for investment—Life estate—Incumbrancer—Costs.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE.—On a petition by a tenant for life for the investment of money paid into court by a railway company, the incumbrancer of the life estate being served is entitled to his costs of appearance against the company.

This was a petition by a tenant for life for the investment of money paid into court by a railway company.

The life estate was incumbered, and the Vice-Chancellor had, on a former occasion, directed that the petition should stand over in order that the incumbrancer might be served.

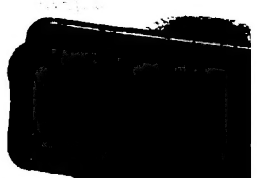

The only question was whether the incumbrancer was entitled to his costs of appearance against the railway company.

Buckton, for the petitioner.

Kingdon, for the incumbrancer, cited Re Hungerford (1 K. & J. 413); Re Brooke (12 W. R. 1128; 30 Beav. 234).

Waller, for the company.

Wood, V.C., allowed the costs of the incumbrancer.

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA

3 1951 D02 042 982 D

ONE WEEK